By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. State whether, at the time the question was pending as to whether indictment should be found in connection with route No. 40101, Mr. Hinds was not an available witness for the Government.—A. Without doubt. He had made an affidavit, and had gone to the district attorney—

By Mr. FYAN :

Q. When did he make that affidavit?—A. Early in 1881. My contract was not annulled when Hinds published his statement in relation to the Las Vegas and Albuquerque route. My contract was still in existence. That was early in 1881.

Q. Did you ever see that affidavit?—A. I have read it.

Q. Where is it?—A. It was published in the Times. I think I have it somewhere among my papers, but I may not have brought it with me.

Q. Do you say that you have read the affidavit of Mr. Hinds?—A. I have read the affidavit or statement that appeared in the New York Times, and I have it somewhere among my papers.

Q. Did that affidavit set forth the same facts to which you have testified here in relation to route 40101?—A. I rather think it did. The reason why I am not positive about that is that Hinds also made a statement or affidavit in relation to the route from Las Vegas to Albuquerque, and I am a little confused between the two.

Q. For what purpose did he make the first statement?—A. With a view, I think, to its use in prosecuting Brady.

Q. Before whom did he make it?—A. I suppose before the post-office people, probably before Mr. Woodward.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Have you any further remarks to make on Mr. Bliss's testimony?—A. Oh, yes. On page 181 he says, in a letter to Mr. Brewster, dated November 6, 1882 :

As to the other general combinations, that of Barlow, Sanderson & Co., of Kerens and others, while I found plenty of facts to excite suspicion, I found nothing that would, in my judgment, secure indictment and conviction.

On page 192 Mr. Bliss says that the Kerens route was one of the worst of its kind, a fraud, the very worst case of all.

Q. Who was Kerens?—A. R. C. Kerens, a mail contractor.

On page 191 Mr. Bliss says :

Among other routes in them was the San Antonio and Corpus Christi route, upon which Mr. Price was the contractor. We always felt, from the knowledge we acquired, that Mr. Price was the man out of whom we were most likely, if we could get hold of him, to get valuable information as bearing upon the general subject; and let me say here, that my theory in all these cases was that the officers were chiefly the guilty men, and that therefore I was at any time ready to recommend the granting of immunity to every contractor or anybody else who would give evidence which was conclusive as against any of the public officers. We procured the indictment on the Corpus Christi and San Antonio route. The evidence with regard to that is substantially contained in the letter transmitting the reports of the special agents, on page 146. The committee will find that it is the case of an expedited route; expedited upon affidavits which were subsequently shown by these inquiries not to contain the facts; and that the Government, therefore, was made to pay a good deal of money that it ought not to have paid. We took some special pains with that route, because we regarded Price as a valuable man to catch, and we sent an officer specially out West to find a Mr. Ellis, whom the post-office inspectors had failed to find, and whom they reported had gone out into the country somewhere, and they did not know where. We sent Inspector Foster there, and after a great deal of traveling around among the wilds of Texas, he finally found Mr. Ellis, and he was brought here as a witness. On his evidence an indictment was found as against Mr. Price, Mr. Brady being included. At that time there was not available to the Government a particle of evidence of payment of money by Price to Brady to support allegations of that kind.

Now, you see at that point he is taking the part of Brady; he says there is no proof that Brady got any money.

Q. Was there any evidence to that effect?—A. My evidence before the grand jury.

Q. Was Hinds cognizant of it?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was S. P. Brown cognizant of it?—A. No, sir. My testimony was that I knew that one-half of the $20,000 that was paid to Price went to Brady.

By Mr. FVAN :

Q. You did not testify to that until after Price and Brady were indicted?—A. That was the testimony on which they were indicted.

Q. Then you were before the grand jury as to which we have had testimony here from the foreman?—A. Yes, sir; Brady and Price were indicted by the grand jury that preceded the Hutchinson grand jury.

Q. Was there any other witness against them?—A. I think there was. My impression is that I was told that there was a gentleman named Ellis, but his testimony was not material.

Q. Did you exhibit the same facts before the first grand jury that you did before the second?—A. The Mitchell grand jury was the first. The investigation before that grand jury was quite short; it did not last, I think, over fifteen or twenty minutes, and I see that that is Mr. Mitchell's recollection also. The result was the indictment of Brady and Price. The term of the jury had expired. I was here at the Arlington Hotel, and Mr. Merrick sent Mr. Woodward to ask me to come to his (Merrick's) office. I said I did not know Mr. Merrick and had no business with him, and that I did not like to go. Mr. Woodward said, "Will you receive Mr. Merrick if he comes here?" I said, "I will, very cheerfully." Mr. Merrick called. He stated that rumors had come to him of the character of my testimony before the first grand jury, and he said, "Mr. Walsh, I have come to you in my capacity as assistant United States attorney, and I call upon you as a citizen to tell me whether that was not the character of your testimony." I said, "Mr. Merrick, the character of my testimony was very much stronger than it has come to your ears—very much stronger." Said he, "Will you relate it to me?" I related it to him. He expressed great astonishment—intense surprise. Said he, "Mr. Walsh, George Bliss is a damned scoundrel." I said, "There can be no difference of opinion between us, Mr. Merrick, on that point; there is no difference, sir. If he did not tell you of that evidence, I have no difficulty in joining in your opinion of Mr. Bliss." Mr. Merrick said, "He never told me of it. He has suppressed it all, and with that evidence, Mr. Walsh, the case that is now pending in the court against Dorsey, Brady, and others, and which is in extremis [the court had intimated that a motion to dismiss would be entertained], with that evidence we can achieve success." "Mr. Merrick," said I, "I differ from you. I think there is no chance for success. I think your case is the weakest of all the cases, and I differ from you as to the possibility of succeeding, and I would rather not appear as a witness in that case, because it would prejudice my civil action against Brady, and that is my interest after all. It is not fair to call upon me to come to the rescue in this case." "Oh," said Mr. Merrick, "you will have to do it; and, further than that, I shall go to the court and ask that this grand jury which has been adjourned [the Hutchinson grand jury] shall be called in extraordinary session." That jury had been brought together, and Mr. Bliss had stated that there was no business for them, and, without organizing, they were dismissed; and, upon getting this information from me, Mr. Merrick announced his purpose to appear before the court and demand the reconvening of the grand jury. Had Mr. Bliss stood up and opposed Mr. Merrick in that, I have no doubt that there would have been a culmination of matters at that time; but, as I am informed, Mr. Bliss rushed to Mr. Merrick and asked what was the matter. Mr. Merrick told him what the matter was; and Bliss then said, "There is no necessity of your going any further; I will have the grand jury called together."

By Mr. FVAN:

Q. Do you say that Mr. Bliss had this Hutchinson grand jury discharged immediately upon its organization?—A. Well, I do not know that; but of course the court would naturally ask, "Is there any business for the grand jury?" and it was stated that there was no business, and the jury was adjourned without organization. Then, on Mr. Merrick's moving in the direction he did, and as he was bound to do as an honest man and a man of integrity, Mr. Bliss saw that he could not resist, so he co-operated.

Q. Were you here to testify before that second grand jury?—A. Of course I was.

Q. Was that your object in being here?—A. No, I was not here for any such object. I had come over from New York in relation to other business. Mr. Merrick came to see me and then he had me subpoenaed. He first found out the character of my testimony, I suppose from some member of the grand jury. There was a good deal of talk about it. I went about my business and did not say much, but there was one gentleman, Mr. Beall, I think a book-seller on Pennsylvania avenue, who said, as I have heard, that it was an infamous thing to indict Brady and Price and leave the other man out; that there was no reason in God's world why that should be done; and I suppose it was in some such way that information of my testimony came to Mr. Merrick's ears. At all events, he came to me about it as I have told you.

The second grand jury was called together and I again appeared before it, Mr. Bliss appearing as the attorney for the United States. Well, it did not take me long to discover that there was a large majority of the sons of Belial on that grand jury. [Laughter.] I never got into an atmosphere that was so unmistakably hostile. I felt it intuitively and instinctively. I felt that there was no use in talking there. I read the papers that related to the case, a good many of them, the first day, and I said, "Gentlemen, if you want any more I will telegraph for my papers and have them brought here." That was the first day, so that the papers arrived the next morning. The case was so overwhelmingly strong that—well, comment is unnecessary. Even Mr. George Bliss, in order to hedge, had to come out and state that if he had been a member of that grand jury he would have had to indict; but he omitted to say that he had told that grand jury that it was a serious matter to indict a United States Senator. That was brought out in this way: A certain member of the grand jury had resolved himself from the beginning into a rigid cross-examiner. I recognized that the defendants were ably represented there. [Laughter.] This gentleman addressed himself to me. We sat around in this way [indicating], and I put the papers on the table, and as I would take up paper after paper I would pass it to Mr. Bliss and Bliss would read it, and he would say, "Gentlemen, do you want to look at this?" Nobody at this end of the table [indicating] looked at the papers at all. The others seated along here [indicating] looked at them in an indifferent sort of way. As the case came out there was one member of the jury, Mr. Semken, a jeweler here, who seemed to be appalled at the idea of one of the appointed being in danger of being indicted. [Laughter.] He would look at me in a dazed way as if inquiring whether the case could possibly be as stated, and I would say, "Yes, that is so." Bliss evidently got very angry with me, in a quiet way, and so did this cross-examiner, Tuesdell. His face got very red, and he got to be just a trifle impertinent, and I said to him, "Mr.—I don't know your name—I think you are crowding matters a little. I have answered that question three or four times, and if you are going to cross-examine me just let me know and I will prepare myself." He said, "You ought to answer the question." I said, "I have answered the question, but you reiterate and reiterate the same question." Said he, "Mr. Attorney, haven't I the right to get an answer from this witness?" Mr. Bliss said, "Yes." I said, "Mr. Bliss, do you assume that the Government ought to exhaust its case in the grand-jury room? If you do, say so." Bliss replied, "No, I do not assume that." "Well," said I, "that is what this gentleman wants. This is not a traverse jury but a grand jury." "Well," said he, "I think you ought to answer;" and it was in that connection that Mr. Bliss finished his remarks by saying, "Well, Mr. Walsh, it is a serious matter to indict a Senator of the United States." To which I replied, "Mr. Bliss, it is a very serious matter that a United States Senator should be a subject for indictment." Bliss says that my language in the grand-jury room was offensive. I think I am never offensive. I certainly never try to be offensive. I felt, of course, that those gentlemen were friends of the people against whom I was testifying, and that my testimony might as well be given to the winds. The next day I came down and produced more papers. I told them I had more if they wanted to look at them. They said "No, no, Mr. Walsh; we have enough." They returned no indictment. Then I published the whole thing in the New York Herald of July 17, which I have with me.

By Mr. FVAN:

Q When Mr. Merrick came to interview you, you told him this story and he was shocked because Kellogg had not been indicted?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And he declared that Mr. Bliss had not stated to him the facts as you stated them?—A. He said that Bliss had not told him anything about my testimony.

Q. And then he said that he would go and have that grand jury reconvened?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that is what was done?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And when he went up to court for the purpose of having the grand jury reconvened Mr. Bliss volunteered to do it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, when you asked Mr. Bliss whether he wanted his whole case exposed before the grand jury were you withholding any of the facts from them?—A. They were not hearing my testimony.

Q. But you made the remark you have stated to Mr. Bliss; you asked him whether he wanted to exhaust the case of the Government before the grand jury?—A. Yes, sir; I asked him that.

Q. Were you at that time withholding any of the evidence in the case?—A. I was not withholding anything; but I was being cross-examined as if it were a petit jury, and I objected.

Q. But if they were asking you about the facts of the case for information why did you not answer?—A. They were not asking me about the facts in that spirit. I have described how they treated me.

Q. I ask you that question so that you may explain, because your remark would create perhaps an erroneous impression that there was some withholding of evidence on your part.—A. There was nothing whatever of the kind on my part. The best evidence of that is that they did not look at all the papers I had there, though I tendered them.

Q. You say that Mr. Merrick wanted to take you before the petit jury that was then trying the case in court?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you did not want to go because you said that might jeopardize a recovery in your civil suit against Mr. Brady?—A. Yes, sir; that was it.

Q. But you did go before that petit jury?—A. I went before that petit jury when the case was in extremis, but I stepped out from that grand-jury room discredited, in pursuance of what I believe to have been a conspiracy to break down my testimony before the traverse jury. I have not hesitated to say heretofore, and I am reiterating it again now, that that was part of the conspiracy to discredit me before the petit jury and before the country, so that when I got upon the witness stand before the petit jury I should stand in the attitude of a man whose testimony would not be believed by the grand jury.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You have stated that you did not present all the papers that you had to the grand jury on that occasion?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. State whether you presented all that were called for by Mr. Bliss or by any of the members of the grand jury?—A. They did not call for anything. I had the papers there, just as I have them here, and Mr. Bliss read some of them.

Q. Did he read them to himself or aloud?—A. Aloud. Mr. Bliss discharged his duty fully, so far as talking and reading the papers went. I would say, "Here is a letter," &c., and he would take it and read it. There were enough papers presented to have justified the finding of a hundred indictments. I speak now of the papers as far as we got, without reference to what we left untouched. In fact those that were left were the most immaterial anyhow, but the grand jury said they did not want to see any more. The Spofford-Kellogg testimony was in the grand jury room. I early became satisfied that it was there. I said to myself, now that testimony is here. I do not care anything about it, but there are ear-marks of outside influence here. What do these men know about that case? None of these men ever knew me, and how would they know that I had ever testified in that case unless they received the information from outside? When I got through with my testimony and the grand jury said they were done with me, I remarked, "Gentlemen there are still more papers bearing upon the case, if you would like to look at them;" but they hardly looked at them. The members of the jury did not appear to take any stock in the case at all. Some of them tilted back in their chairs, some of them glared out of the window, and generally they showed indifference, and acted in a manner as if to say, "Let that fellow go ahead. We do not believe him anyhow." I realized that very fully, and then when Mr. Bliss made the remark that it was so serious a matter to indict a United States Senator, I said to myself, "Well, of course these men understand their business."

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You did appear before the petit jury?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was the purpose of calling you there?—A. It was to establish a conspiracy by my testimony in relation to the payments made to Brady, and Brady's conversations wherein he had said that it was his habit to make these assessments of 20 per cent. per annum.

Q. On what?—A. On the mail contractor's pay whenever he expedited or increased their service.

Q. Did you testify before that petit jury that Mr. Brady had told you that he charged 20 per centum upon the amount of such expedition?—A. Yes, sir; I so testified. I was on the stand three or four days, and you remember that the jury stood ten for conviction and two for acquittal. The foreman of that petit jury, who did some very extraordinary voting on that occasion, was Mr. William Dickson. Mr. Dickson, in attempting to explain his extraordinary verdict and vote, said he had voted as he had because of Walsh's testimony—that he did not believe me. It is very unpleasant for me to repeat this, but you see I have to do it in my own behalf. He said, among other things, that the reason he did not believe me was that when he was secretary of what was known here as the Yellow-Fever Commission, a body organized to aid the Southern sufferers from yellow fever, I had attempted to have paid by that commission a fraudulent voucher belonging to Lieutenant Benner, who, as the committee will remember, was in command of the boat that went from Saint Louis to Vicksburg, and who died of yellow fever. He belonged to the Eighteenth Infantry. Lieutenant Benner had obtained some discounts on vouchers from me, and after getting my money he volunteered to take charge of this yellow fever boat, and he died at Vicksburg. As I have said, there was organized at that time a yellow fever commission, of which Alexander Shepherd was a member and Dickson was the secretary. After the death of Benner the people of the country were appealed to, and it was suggested that there should be contributions raised for his family. The result was that this commission was in some way put in charge of the fund, which swelled to rather large proportions, and it occurred to me that perhaps I might get my pay from the commission out of that fund; at all events I thought there was no harm in asking for it. I sent my clerk to see some of the gentlemen of the commission. My clerk knew Dickson whom I did not know, so he went to Dickson, showed him the vouchers, and told him all the facts in relation to the case, and said to him, as I understood, "Now, don't you think that this ought to be paid? Don't you think that it is perhaps a debt of honor, a sacred debt? Mr. Walsh discounted those vouchers for Benner under peculiar circumstances. Benner was very necessitous and very importunate, and Mr. Walsh let him have the money, and I think it ought to be paid." Dickson was rather encouraging at first. Shepherd went to see the other members of the commission, and they said they did not like to pay the claim; that perhaps the people who had contributed to the fund would say that they had not contributed their money to pay any banker's debts, and that they were afraid to pay it, although they would like to do so.

I then wrote to Mrs. Benner about it, thinking that perhaps she would feel disposed to pay her husband's debt, incurred under such circumstances; but she would not pay me, so I dropped the matter and heard no more of it until Mr. Dickson stated that it was on account of this "fraudulent" claim that he would not believe me as a witness. In connection with this matter there were the most infamous publications made about me in the Critic here, calling me a "ghoul" and all that sort of thing. I asked the Government to protect me as a witness and to prosecute these libelers, but Mr. Bliss said he did not think the Government was bound to protect its witnesses in that way. Mr. Merrick thought I ought to be protected, but still there was nothing done. There was a Pickwickian motion made in court one day, at the usual compensation, $100 a day, and that is all that was done about it. I assure you, gentlemen, that if the Government's treatment of witnesses generally who testify in its behalf is to be such as it accorded me it will require a man of the most extraordinary strength of character to venture upon the stand as a witness. He will be entitled to promotion. I have a very considerable fund of aggressiveness in me; I was born very far South, and I have been accustomed all my life to fighting odds, so that I perhaps go into it con amore, but I have had just as much as I could do to hold my ground.

Now, I have here Benner's vouchers and the checks given to Benner, which bear his indorsement. I will read his letter to me asking this loan:

McPHERSON BARRACKS,
Atlanta, Ga., September 12, 1878.

DEAR SIR: You are already aware of the fact that I have anticipated my accounts up to December 31, 1878, and my present circumstances impel me to inform you of the necessity therefor. Last summer, in Columbia, S. C., I became entangled in an affair of a peculiar nature, which, to avoid an unenviable notoriety before the public, forced me to raise $800 to satisfy the other party concerned. This, with other necessary expenses (outside of my own individual wants), has strained me so badly that, to meet my obligations and preserve my honor, I must realize $250 from some source on or before the 25th instant, and, to be frank, I scarcely know where to look for it excepting yourself. In this extremity I must ask if you would be willing to take my accounts for two months further at 5 per cent., and send your check so that it would reach me on 25th instant? If so, please telegraph me (night message) at my expense, and oblige,

Very truly, yours,

H. H. BENNER,
First Lieutenant, Eighteenth Infantry.

You have heard Benner's letter, and here are the checks and other vouchers, from which you will see that if I was a "ghoul" I was at least an odd one:

H. H. BENNER,
1st Lieut., 18th Infantry.

These are the papers that that man Dickson saw. They were shown to him as secretary of that commission, and with the full knowledge of the genuineness of these papers and their character he gave to the world the statement that the reason he did not believe me as a witness was that I had attempted to pass a "fraudulent" claim before that commission. I have asked the Government time and again to prosecute the men who thus libelled me, claiming that it was nothing but simple justice to me that they should be prosecuted; but Mr. Bliss said no, no; that he was opposed to it; that the Government was not called upon to "fix up these fellows" that happened to be witnesses in its behalf.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Lieutenant Benner was an officer of the Army, and simply applied to you to have his pay discounted in advance?—A. Yes, sir; Mr. Benner did nothing that was at all improper in the matter.

Q. And after obtaining that loan from you he died of yellow fever.—A. Yes; he volunteered and died like a man. Having made the loan under such circumstances, and there being a considerable fund raised, I tried first to get my pay through that commission, and having failed there I thought that perhaps Mrs. Benner, having this money, might feel moved to pay her husband's debts of this character, but she did not, and I dropped the subject, as I have dropped thousands of other debts in my life, and I thought no more about it until Mr. Dickson was kind enough to revive it in this slanderous manner. Here is what the Critic said about me. [Reading:] "John A. Walsh, a ghoul as well as a liar." Where I was born it would cost a man his life to put that in type, or else he would shoot me first, but up here I have changed my ethics. Here is the heading of this Critic article in full:

JOHN A. WALSH.

A GHOUL AS WELL AS A LIAR.

Uncovering an Honored Grave and Insulting the Memory of the Dead—A Brief Sketch of the Yellow Fever Scourge in 1878, and of Lieutenant Benner's Heroic Self-Sacrifice—A Fund Raised For the Relief of Mrs. Benner Excites Walsh's Cupidity, and With the Aid of Ben. Shekell He Tries to Get a Slice—The Infamous Proposition Which Shekell Wanted Dickson to Sign—Walsh and His Clerk Convicted Out of Their Own Mouths.

And here is an extract from the National Republican, the organ of the Administration, the organ of the party to which I belong, and for which I have spent a great deal of money in an endeavor to advance my own theories, which I merely claimed I had a right to do, though many of my ex-Confederate friends insisted I had not. Dickson said: "There was nothing against Brady until Walsh's testimony was introduced, and that evidence I placed no weight on uncorroborated." He also said in a significant way that he had known me in New Orleans. I went to see Mr. Dickson, and said to him, "You say you knew me in New Orleans; a great many people in New Orleans knew me, and really I think I am known quite favorably there. Some of the people there believe I am a crank on political matters, but that, you know, is not criminal. Now, will you kindly tell me what you know about me in New Orleans? I do not remember that I ever had the pleasure of your acquaintance there." "Well," said Dickson, "that part is a mistake; I did not know you there, but I saw you one night crossing the rotunda of the Saint Charles Hotel. I was talking to Governor Warmoth and Mr. Fairfax, the secretary of state, and Governor Warmoth said, 'There goes John Walsh.'" Said I, "Was that the extent of your acquaintance with me?" He answered, "Yes, sir." "Well," said I, "that is good; that is a good reason certainly for not believing me under oath." Dickson in this interview goes on to speak of the remissions made in my favor as having something to do with my testimony.

Now, the remissions had been made, as I have testified, just about one year or, perhaps, thirteen or fourteen months before I went upon the stand as a witness.

Q. Was there anything in the cross-examination in the Dorsey-Brady case to bring that evidence to the knowledge of the petit jury?—A. Yes, sir; Brady had made remissions in all or nearly all cases. That fact also was brought out. It was an entirely proper thing to make remissions on a proper showing. There was nothing wrong or irregular in that. It is the practice of the Department. But the main point made by Dickson was that I had presented a fraudulent voucher in the Benner case. Of course I do not for a moment imagine that the man really thought it, but if he did, I have shown what evidence he had to go on.

Q. After the adjournment of this grand jury without indicting, when did you next appear as a witness in any of these cases?—A. I published in the New York Herald and the New York Times what my testimony had been. As a result, a cry of indignation went up all over the country, and representatives of the Government felt that another effort must be made. Mr. Merrick, at least, felt that way. I do not believe George Bliss ever felt that way; I think he thought that there ought not to be any effort made. At any rate, in December, 1882, or somewhere along there, Mr. Merrick wrote me some letters in relation to appearing again as a witness before the grand jury to secure an indictment on the evidence which would be adduced. I received Mr. Merrick's letters and answered them. I refused to appear as a witness for the United States if the Government was to be represented by George Bliss in the grand-jury room. I refused on the ground that Mr. Bliss was not an honest man, and that Mr. Merrick knew as well as I did that he was not an honest man. I said that in my opinion Mr. Bliss was as much a defendant as any man at the bar of that court, and that it was an utter travesty of justice to pretend to prosecute anybody in these cases through the agency of Mr. Bliss.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. What was your opinion based upon?—A. It was based upon what Mr. Merrick had told me about him as to his neglect or omission to tell Mr. Merrick of the testimony given by me before the first grand jury. Mr. Merrick told me that Bliss had never mentioned that testimony to him, and my opinion was based upon that mainly. Mr. Merrick felt indignant about Bliss's conduct in that matter. He said it was a violation of professional etiquette and of good faith, and that it had left him utterly in the dark. He said, "Here is a case staggering through court and here is evidence that we might have had all the while. I have not been able to see you. I have repeatedly asked Bliss to bring us together, but, for some reason or other he has failed to do it right straight along."

Q. Was an indictment found by the grand jury?—A. An indictment was found against Brady and Price. Mr. Mitchell, the foreman of the first grand jury, testified here that I gave testimony in the Brady-Dorsey case. I never did. Mr. Mitchell was mistaken about that. The only testimony I gave before the Mitchell grand jury was in relation to Brady, Price, and Kellogg, and Brady and Price were indicted.

Q. Then the testimony was not kept from the grand jury by Mr. Bliss?—A. No, sir. I gave the testimony before the grand jury.

Q. And no indictment was found?—A. An indictment was found against Brady and Price, but Kellogg was left out, and Mr. Merrick afterwards came to see me in relation to what my testimony had been before that grand jury, it having come to his knowledge in some vague way.

Q. Do you testify here that Mr. Bliss was a dishonest man because he did not communicate all the testimony that was given before the grand jury?—A. Yes; because he did not tell Mr. Merrick about my testimony, and further, because I thought his expression before the grand jury that it was "a serious matter to indict a United States Senator," was made in the interest of one of the defendants. I did not think it was a proper remark, or made for a proper purpose.

Q. The foreman of the grand jury testified here that he did not make that remark.—A. Mr. Mitchell testified that Mr. Bliss did not make that remark before the grand jury of which he (Mitchell) was chairman; but it was not before that jury that the remark was made; it was before the Hutchinson grand jury, and Mr. Hutchinson, the foreman of that grand jury, testified here this morning that Mr. Bliss did make the remark there.

I wish now to read one of my letters to Mr. Merrick, giving my reasons for not appearing. Mr. Merrick sent me this telegram:

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 26, 1882.

JOHN A. WALSH:

You have seen a certain person, and you now understand my letter. I must see you Wednesday morning. Come to-night. You can take your testimony in your civil suit Wednesday.

R. T. MERRICK,
Special Assistant United States Attorney General.

In reply I wrote him the following letter:

NEW YORK, December 29, 1882.

Hon. R. T. MERRICK,

Assistant United States Attorney-General, Washington, D. C.:

MY DEAR SIR: Your wire of 26th instant at hand. From its tenor I infer that the prosecution has a witness in its behalf, whose testimony will prove valuable as against the star-route conspirators; but whether or not that is a result desired by the prosecution, as a whole, or by this Administration is subject to many and grave doubts in my mind. In obtaining this additional evidence I recognize solely your indefatigable energy and singleness of purpose, which must be gratifying to every good citizen, but especially so to me, as the Government can now not only make out its case against the present defendants but the other and, as yet, unscathed star-route conspirators, whom your associate, Mr. Bliss, seems so anxious to protect. With this evidence I was in hopes that you would feel strong enough to go ahead without calling on me to make any further sacrifices of my time and feelings.

Surely it cannot have escaped your observation that I have been libeled—criminally libeled—by sundry persons in the District of Columbia, all of whom are known to you; that I have been abused in the most shameful manner in open court by counsel for the defendants, without any interruption from you or your associate counsel for the Government; that a respectful communication addressed by me to Attorney-General Brewster remains unanswered to this day; that all faith, implied and expressed, as regards me has been violated, and yet this same Government that has accorded me such infamous treatment calls on me again to make sacrifices. It appears to me that this is asking too much when you reflect that the Government in the past has completely failed to give me any protection whatever.

Failing to secure a reply to my communication addressed the Attorney-General of the United States, I wrote to the President, and although ten days have elapsed no response from him. Perhaps he too has referred my communication to George Bliss, esq., for "arbitration."

As an American citizen, as one of the sovereign people of the United States, I have, in the exercise of my rights as such, addressed respectful communications to the President of the United States and his Attorney-General, neither of whom deigns to reply. If this be not the insolence of office, what is it? Or is this silence born of a brotherly sympathy for an erstwhile Warwick and comrade, now a defendant at the bar of a criminal court?

It is fresh in my memory that this same Attorney-General, who apparently has no time to answer my communication, occupied the valuable time of the court in the first star-route trial in paying a tribute of respect, officially anointing the star-route partner of the ex-Senatorial defendant, one whom public opinion says should also have been a defendant at the bar!

It is true, I have not rendered the distinguished law officer of the Government yeoman service, such as the annointed did on the occasion of the "Dorsey-Brewster" meeting at the restaurant Chamberlin, on which occasion rumor says these distinguished men "fraternized."

On my part, I might plead, if I were given the opportunity, that I had rendered the state, the people, some service at great sacrifice to myself, which fact, in addition to my rights as a citizen, might have plead that I be treated with at least a semblance of courtesy by the Chief Magistrate of the nation and his law officer.

I regard my appearance as a witness in these cases as entirely attributable to you; and to you as the representative of the Government I shall now look for that protection which is due a witness for the United States. I have appealed to the Attorney-

General and the President of the United States asking that the law be enforced without obtaining any satisfaction whatever, and I now appeal to you as Assistant, United States Attorney-General to see that the laws are vindicated by the prosecution, without fear or favor, of these conspirators and their associates, no matter how exalted their official status, even though they be members of the Cabinet.

If you are prepared to proceed as your sense of justice and of duty to the people dictate I am ready to aid you to the best of my ability, but I say to you frankly there must be no more halting, no more dependence on others, whom you know are not in earnest, and probably dare not be so, even though they would. No man knows better than you the course that this Government should pursue, and no one knows better than you how cowardly it has proceeded.

The gravity of the issues involved in this struggle is known to no person better than yourself. The difficulties to be overcome are great, and, in my opinion, the time for throwing aside professional etiquette has arrived. Men and their acts must be called by their proper names. Simple citizens must not be expected or permitted to bear unaided the brunt of this war, else all will be lost. Never did the armed hosts of the rebellion threaten the Government with as much of danger, as much of evil, as now menace its welfare, its very existence. From all points of the compass come these plunderers to aid their brethren in danger. Their battalions are formidable, their officers occupants of high official places, and if you do not sound the tocsin of alarm the battle will be lost. If you do not who will? Who can?

Whenever I again appear to testify before a grand jury in the star-route cases it will be only when the Government is represented in the jury room by yourself or some other gentleman who is not as much on trial, in my opinion, as the present defendants; one in whom you, and honest men like you, have confidence.

Whenever you assure me that you will appear before the grand jury as the representative of the Government; that the Government will prosecute the men who have criminally libeled me because I testified to the truth in its behalf; that the member of the late grand jury, together with his official and other coconspirators, who violated the law by bringing into the grand-jury room the Spofford-Kellogg testimony, will also be prosecuted as the law directs, I shall appear and give my testimony.

You will recall that you volunteered to me the statement that you would see that as a witness of the United States, under subpoena from its judiciary, I would receive the protection of the law. This assurance was made me at a time when you felt that such unheard of abuse was being heaped upon me that my outraged feelings might find expression in some rash act. You counseled me to be calm, to maintain perfect self-control, and you would see that the law afforded me ample protection. When you thus assured me you undoubtedly supposed that your associate counsel felt as you did as to the methods to be pursued in such cases. Having had ample time and opportunity to learn how radically your views and at least one of your associate's differ, I take it that in giving out your personal assurance hereafter you will understand the necessity of seeing personally to the execution of the same.

Yours sincerely,

J. A. WALSH.

The letters, of which this is one, show why I questioned the honesty of Mr. Bliss. I questioned his honesty of purpose, and in view of the evidence that he has given before this committee I feel that I was more than justified in doing so.

By Mr. MILLIKEN :

Q. Now, I will take a hint from your letter and ask you this question: Did you question the honesty of the Administration in those prosecutions?—A. Yes, sir; I doubted it very much.

Q. Did you question the honesty of the President?—A. I do not know that the President had anything to do with it. I do know, however, that we have had no expression from the President similar to that that we had from President Garfield. We have not had any expression from the President calculated to lend any moral support to the prosecutions. We had, so far as we had anything, an intimation that the Administration was not in favor of the prosecutions, because its organ, the National Republican, opposed them. I am speaking now as a Republican.

By Mr. STEWART :

Q. When you say "we," what do you mean ?—A. I speak as one of the people—an American citizen.

Q. I do not understand that you undertake to say that President Arthur ever manifested any disposition to smother or suppress or hinder in any way the star-route prosecutions ?—A. I think, if you will refer to Mr. MacVeagh's testimony you will find that he said that he received no moral support from this Administration; I think you will find that he says he retired from the Cabinet because he did not have the moral support of the Administration.

Q. We know what Mr. MacVeagh testified to.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you appear before another grand jury subsequent to the Hutchinson grand jury ?—A. Yes, sir; I appeared before a third grand jury.

By Mr. MILLIKEN :

Q. Did the prosecution in the star-route cases receive sympathy, support, and encouragement from President Garfield and his Administration ?—A. (After a pause.) You will have to define that question more clearly.

Q. You have testified that the star-route prosecutions received no support from President Arthur's Administration.—A. I say we have had no public expression of opinion in that direction.

Q. Now, I ask you, how was it in that respect with President Garfield's Administration—either the President himself or his prosecuting officers ?—A. We had from President Garfield a direction that his prosecuting officers should "cut the ulcer to the bone," hurt who it might.

Q. How were the prosecuting officers, the Attorney-General and the Postmaster-General, under President Garfield in that respect ?—A. Mr. Wayne MacVeagh, I think, proceeded with the utmost vigor; and Mr. Attorney-General Brewster, I am satisfied, would have proceeded in the same manner had he had the same lights that Mr. MacVeagh had; but Mr. Brewster met entanglements which he was not responsible for, and which served to mislead him. I am satisfied that in the past I have criticised Mr. Brewster erroneously, unnecessarily, and not at all fairly. I say this in the light of his explanations to me, and in the light of such facts as have come to my knowledge otherwise. I feel that I have done him an injustice.

Q. Who was responsible for the "entanglements" of which you speak ?—A. Mr. George Bliss.

Q. Then it is your opinion that Mr. Bliss entangled Mr. Brewster ?—A. It is, sir. I think he entangled everything and everybody.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Did you get that from the Attorney-General ?—A. No, sir. The Attorney-General simply said to me, in relation to my letters to him and in relation to Mr. Bliss, that his mind had been poisoned against me by Mr. Bliss, who had set about it very early and assiduously. You will see how early from the quotation I have made from an interview with him away back in February, 1881, in which he animadverted upon me, for which he afterwards apologized. On the occasion of the calling together of the Hutchinson grand jury we met in the ante-room, and after some conversation Mr. Bliss said to me, "Mr. Walsh, I suppose you have seen an interview with me which was unfortunately published some time ago, in which I reflected upon you?" I said, "Yes, I have read that." "Well," said he, "in the light of subsequent events I feel that I did you great injustice there, but I hope you won't have any feeling about it." I said, "I have no special feeling. Of course I can see that, taking the average man as you have come in contact with him, you had formed probably about a proper estimate." Said he, "That is just about it." Now, thought I, here is a man who has done me a wrong, and done it publicly, and who admits the wrong. Why not, then, make the reparation as public as the injury? I felt that he was not acting manly with me; not doing as he ought to have done; but I let it pass.

Without concluding the examination of the witness the committee adjourned.

WASHINGTON, May 11, 1884.

JOHN A. WALSH recalled and further examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. When the committee adjourned I believe we were approaching the time when you were to appear before the third grand jury?—Answer. Yes, sir.

Q. Please state whether you did appear before that grand jury, who was the foreman of it, and what was done there.—A. Some events occurred prior to my appearing before the third grand jury which, I think, had better be stated in chronological order before I come to what took place before the jury.

Q. Very well; please make whatever statement you desire of those matters.—A. For example, I referred yesterday to libels that were printed in two papers. In that connection I might state that one of those papers, the Critic, was owned by Thomas J. Brady, ex-Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and the other paper, the National Republican, was owned by Mr. George Bliss, Secretary of the Navy Chandler, and other friends.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Other friends of yours do you mean?—A. Well, I thought I would leave that blank. I might say, however, friends of the Administration. So that the spectacle was presented of a gentleman engaged as a representative of the Government in prosecuting certain defendants, while at the same time the paper of which he was part owner was denouncing the prosecution and abusing the witnesses for the prosecution.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you know what interest Mr. Bliss had in the Republican at that time?—A. I understood that he, with twenty-nine other gentlemen, friends of President Arthur, purchased the paper, each putting in $1,000.

Q. How much was Mr. Bliss's interest?—A. One thousand dollars, as I understood. Mr. Bliss commenced negotiations with Mr. Brady for the purchase of Brady's interest in the paper about the time the prosecutions began.

Q. What was Brady's interest?—A. I think he held a controlling interest—just a fraction over a controlling interest of the stock. On account of this arrangement Mr. Bliss was probably imbued with General Brady's prejudices against me. I think that is evidenced by his going into print on the subject as early as February, 1882, as I have shown you he did.

Prior to my being served with a subpoena to appear before that grand jury several letters were addressed to me by Mr. R. T. Merrick, Assistant United States Attorney-General, calling upon me to come here and testify. Necessarily I had to answer them, and further, I had necessarily to state what were my objections to appearing. I think, Mr. Chairman, that in justice to me, and as tending to show the condition of things at that time, I may properly ask to be permitted to file those letters as a part of the record here. I do not wish to take up the time of the committee in reading them all, but I read one of them yesterday.

Q. Those letters state your reasons for refusing to appear or for desiring not to appear?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And those reasons are, in substance, that the attorneys on the part of the prosecution or some of them, were not acting in good faith?—A. Yes; Mr. George Bliss. I did not speak of any other attorney.

The CHAIRMAN. I suppose the letters may be filed.

The letters will be found at the end of this testimony.

Mr. Merrick, in response to my complaints of the non-prosecution of these people who had libeled me, did tell me to go to Mr. Corkhill, then district attorney, and file my papers with him. I am referring now to the libels upon me in the matter of the Benner claim, a libel uttered by Mr. Dickson and printed by these papers. I told Mr. Merrick that I did not think there would be any action taken in the matter. Indeed, I said, "I do not know that I want Mr. Corkhill to prosecute the cases. Mr. Corkhill is a very amiable gentleman, a very pleasant man no doubt, but he has very friendly relations with those gentlemen, and I do not think he will ever sit up o' nights to prosecute them." "Well," said Mr. Merrick, "give him the papers, and I will talk with him and tell him that it is his duty to prosecute them." Well, I gave Corkhill the papers. Five or six weeks elapsed (I was here at the time) and Mr. Corkhill did nothing, and finding that he was doing nothing about it I sent for the papers; I told my attorney, Mr. Thomas, to go and get back the papers. I had given Mr. Corkhill the original papers in the Benner matter. The papers were turned over to Mr. Thomas very cheerfully, I believe, and he sent them to me in New York. Of course, as I have said, that was the result I expected. I did not expect Corkhill to prosecute, and I did not want him to prosecute, those parties anyhow, because I thought he was not the man to do it; but later on Mr. Corkhill, moved probably by something that Mr. Merrick had said to him, wrote me the following note:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY OF THE UNITED STATES, FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
City of Washington, May 29, 1883.

Mr. JOHN A. WALSH,

Care of Mr. E. H. Grandin, 11 Wall St., New York:

SIR: I herewith enclose subpoena for you to appear before the grand jury, one having been sent to the U. S. marshal and returned "not found." Please accept service thereon and come as soon as you can.

Very respectfully,

GEORGE B. CORKHILL,
U. S. Att'y, D. C.

I can best tell you how I treated that by reading the indorsement which I made upon it.

Letter from Corkhill, dist. att'y, dated May 29, 1883. No answer necessary to this; as the absurdity of his appearing before a grand jury to prosecute for slander, etc., such friends of his as Dickson et al. is so patent that comment is unnecessary.

I felt that the Government was going through the Pickwickian operation of turning me over to Corkhill, who had never been intrusted with any share in the prosecution of the star-route cases, and I objected to that; I thought that my services to the Government entitled me to the very best counsel. I wanted the expensive counsel, the $100 a day men. [Laughter.] I did not think Corkhill was a good enough counsel to prosecute the matter, so, of course, I paid no attention to his letter.

Now, prior to these letters to Mr. Merrick, I addressed a letter to the Attorney-General in November, 1882. I set forth in that letter what had occurred in the grand-jury room on my second appearance. I stated it as briefly as I could. I called the attention of the Attorney-General to what I conceived was Mr. Bliss's lack of faithfulness to the Government. To that letter I received no response. Later on I thought I would write the President, and I wrote him a letter inclosing the one that I had written to Mr. Brewster. I received no reply to that. Then I wrote the letters to Mr. Merrick, referring in them to this letter to the President. The reading of those letters will develop the fact that I set forth in them what Mr. Bliss was doing, and begged that his proceedings should be looked into. That was not done. I have here first the letter to Mr. Brewster, the Attorney-General, and next the letter to the President. I suppose I can put them in.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Those letters relate to the good faith of Mr. Bliss in the matter of the prosecution of the star-route cases?—A. Oh, yes.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. It seems proper that the letters should be admitted, if they conveyed information on this subject to the Attorney-General and the President.

The WITNESS. They conveyed it to everybody. I have done my duty in the matter. If some other people have not done theirs, owing to total depravity or "professional etiquette," that is not my fault.

Mr. STEWART. It would seem to be entirely proper that the letter to the Attorney-General should be put in evidence here, but it appears to me that there may be some objection to putting in the letter to the President. The Attorney-General was the responsible law officer of the Government; if this matter belonged to anybody it belonged to him, and if there was any issue of any sort between a Government witness and any of the prosecuting officers, probably the Attorney-General would be the proper authority to appeal to; whereas the President could not say anything in the matter.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you reiterate substantially in the letter to the President the facts which you had stated in the letter to the Attorney-General?—A. I set them forth very much more fully in the letter to the President.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. There is one other consideration. If this letter, by its statements of facts, tends to inculcate the Attorney-General, perhaps he should have extended to him the comity of exculpating himself, because it has been stated here that Mr. Bliss was brought into the proseecution of these cases by reason of his relations with the Chief Magistrate.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think that is any reason. It does not appear that Mr. Bliss was appointed by President Arthur or at his suggestion or request. He was appointed really by the former Postmaster-General and Attorney-General, and I think it is going far enough to put in the communication to the Attorney-General. Of course, viewed in any light, the letter is entirely an ex parte statement. It is merely a statement of what Mr. Walsh conceived to be the true situation at that time. I think there can be no impropriety in putting in the letter to the Attorney-General, but I do not think the communication to the President is in the nature of any evidence that we ought to consider or receive.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course a letter simply addressed to the President would not commit him to anything. I suppose if we look into the matter it will appear that the President simply referred the letter to the Attorney-General.

Mr. STEWART. Yes; but the President cannot say anything as to what he did; we are not a committee appointed to investigate the President of the United States; we are investigating the Department of Justice, and anything that falls within the scope of that Department, from the Attorney-General down, properly comes within our jurisdiction. It is entirely proper for Mr. Walsh to communicate his understanding of the situation to the Attorney-General of the United States, and I think that any communication made to him on the business of the Department is proper evidence to be received by us. Of course every citizen has a right to address a communication to the Chief Magistrate. I do not question at all the propriety of Mr. Walsh's act in writing to the President, but I think the matter ought to stop there. It is nothing to us what he did. In other words, I do not see what bearing it has upon any issue that we are trying or investigating. It is a mere matter of gossip to state here what he wrote to the President. We have seen enough of Mr. Walsh to know that he understands tolerably well how to put his ideas together either on paper or orally, and it is quite apparent that he can state a very strong case without any great amount of effort. Now I think that if we put in his statement of the case to the Attorney-General and then his further statement, which we have already, that he addressed a letter to the President setting forth more fully his view of these matters, we ought to stop there.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Our investigation has taken a very wide range. It has been sworn to, I think, by one of the prosecuting officers in the star-route cases, and a late Attorney-General of the United States, that those prosecutions during some portion of their progress did not have even the moral support of the Administration. That is very well so far as it goes. Then I suppose the purpose of this evidence is to show that the Department of Justice has been derelict, and I think that perhaps, under all the circumstances of the case, it might be well enough to receive the explanation, or what may be presumed to be an explanation in part, with the allegation.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was this letter to the Attorney-General written on the date which it bears, November 3, 1882?—A. It was.

Q. Are the facts stated in this letter true?—A. Undoubtedly, sir; to the best of my knowledge and belief. Of course I do not undertake to state anything else.

Q. I understand that you desire to present this letter as a part of your evidence in relation to matters that were then taking place with reference to the star-route prosecutions?—A. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the letter to the Attorney-General will be received.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Now, as to the letter to the President; was it written at the date it bears, December 18, 1882?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Are the facts stated in that letter correct?—A. Yes, sir; to the best of my knowledge and belief.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the pleasure of the committee as to the reception of this letter?

Mr. Fyan moved that the letter be received and made part of the record.

After some further discussion the committee decided by a vote to receive for examination the letter to the President and the other letters offered by the witness in evidence but not read, postponing for the present the determination of the question of their admissibility. The letters were subsequently admitted and will be found at the end of this testimony.

The witness offered to read in evidence an editorial published in the New York Herald calling upon the President if he wished the prosecution of the star-route cases conducted honestly to dismiss Mr. Bliss.

Objection was made to the reception of the editorial and the objection was sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Walsh, you may proceed with your statement.

The WITNESS. I have here a letter which I addressed to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Elmer, in relation to the month's extra pay, which I should like to read.

The witness read the letter as follows:

WASH., Jan. 21, '82.

R. A. ELMER, Esq.,
2 Asst. P. M. G., Wash.:

SIR: Touching the matter of the month's pay on route No. 40101, I would most respectfully suggest to the Department that in all fairness and as a matter of law payment should be made me without any further delay. It is not the theory of the Government that injustice should be done any of its citizens, especially when the latter in their dealings with it are not charged with fraud or evasions of the term of contract had with it. In my contract with the Department on route No. 40101 I faithfully executed the provisions contained therein, and on that point I challenged the most rigid inquiry, from its commencement down to the time of its discontinuance. As I understand it, the principal obstacle lying in the way of this payment to me is based upon an order made by Mr. Brady (then 2 Asst. P. M. G.) annulling my contract, because, as he was pleased to allege, of "abandonment of service." In point of fact there never was an abandonment of service on my part, and the record does not support him in his alleged reason for annulling my contract. There is no occasion, however, for my discussing this point, as the bureau over which you preside has substantially refused to believe that I abandoned the service. All that I ask now is that you carry out legally and logically to the end the spirit expressed in the orders issued by you rehabilitating me, orders bearing on their face the impress of the fact that the Department very properly discredited the action taken against me by the late 2nd Asst. P. M. G.

If, however, the way does not appear clear to you at this time to allow me the month's payment on the entire length of the route, as it stood originally from Albuquerque to Prescott, then I suggest that I at any rate be now paid the one month's pay on that part of the service which was ordered carried by mail from Albuquerque to Fort Wingate. The order issued by Mr. Brady discontinuing star service from Albuquerque to Fort Wingate preceded this one, wrongfully annulling my contract from Fort Wingate to Prescott, and on its face I was entitled to the allowance promised by law in such cases. Route No. 40101, as you found it and as you discontinued it, was from Fort Wingate to Prescott. I again repeat that Mr. Brady had discontinued that part of No. 40101, from Albuquerque to Fort Wingate because of completion of railway, and it is on that part of the said route that I think there certainly can be no ground for longer withholding the month's pay. I cannot refrain from trusting, however, that you will find me entitled, in your judgment, to payment now in full of the entire allowance.

In conclusion, I thank you for the patient hearings which you have given me in this matter and the sense of justice which has directed you in repairing, as far as legally lay in your power, the injustice which had been done me by the corrupt and unscrupulous act of your predecessor.

Respectfully,

J. A. WALSH.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. I object to the admission of that letter in evidence, on the ground that it is entirely irrelevant to the matter in hand and is not within the scope of our investigation.

Mr. MILLIKEN. It seems to me that the letter is irrelevant.

The CHAIRMAN. I think I can explain the relevancy of it. Mr. Walsh was objected to by Mr. Bliss as a witness for the Government, Mr. Bliss charging upon him that he was a co-conspirator with the other parties, and that he ought to be a defendant instead of a witness. Mr. Walsh explained yesterday the nature of the claim that he had against the Government on account of his service as a mail contractor. His claim is either one that is made in good faith and based upon his legal rights, or else it is one that the Government ought not to pay. If it is a claim made in good faith then the officers of the Government ought not to have been prejudiced or influenced in relation to the acceptance of Mr. Walsh as a witness by the fact that he had made a claim of this kind and insisted upon its payment. Now, this letter sets forth and explains the grounds of the claim, and for that reason seems to me to be relevant.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Has not Mr. Walsh brought suit against the Government for this very claim?

The CHAIRMAN. I don't know.

Mr. MILLIKEN (to the witness). Have you not?

The WITNESS. Yes, sir. Mr. Bliss, himself, told me that this claim ought to be paid, although he swears here before this committee that the claim is unjust and that I am not entitled to it. Now, I am prepared to prove that Mr. Bliss sent me word that the claim was a proper one, and that it ought to be and would be paid.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is the suit now pending?

The WITNESS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Well, is not the court the proper place for you to put in this testimony, and ought we to receive it here while your case is pending in court?

The WITNESS. I am not putting it in as testimony to establish my claim against the Government. I am offering it here in contradiction of certain testimony given by Mr. Bliss before this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Refer to the testimony of Mr. Bliss to which you think this letter relates.

The WITNESS. If you choose we will hold this in abeyance until I come to it in regular course. Mr. Bliss swears that the claim was an improper one, but, as I have said, I am prepared to prove that he sent me word that it ought to be paid, and that he told me personally it ought to be paid. This being so I submit that in fairness and justice the rest of Mr. Bliss's testimony ought not to be deemed worthy of credit, and it is upon that point that I offer this letter, and not to affect my suit in any way. On page 222 Mr. Bliss, referring to this matter, says:

When he was declared a failing contractor his pay was stopped, and he now came in and claimed that, in some form, he had been made a failing contractor through the unjust action of the Department, and, therefore, that he ought to be paid the balance due him, $6,000 or $8,000, I think it was, that he claimed, and they gave him the benefit of the doubt and paid him the money, and then supposed that his case was all settled. But pretty soon Mr. Walsh came around with a claim for a month's extra pay. When a contractor's contract is terminated by the Department, not for any fault of his own, he has a right under the law to a month's extra pay, and Walsh claimed that paying him this $6,000 or $8,000 on the ground that he had been made a failing contractor through some unjust action of the Department showed that he was not at fault and was a failing contractor through no fault of his own, and that, therefore, he was entitled to this month's extra pay, and he was very earnest to get it. On the other hand, the officers of the Department considered that when they had paid him that money there had been an agreement that that was to be the end of the matter, and the present Second Assistant Postmaster-General was very earnest in that view, and regarded the assertion of this later claim as an act of bad faith on the part of Mr. Walsh. I may say in passing that Mr. Walsh has since gone into the Court of Claims in an endeavor to establish that claim, and that the Government is fighting it there.

It was in the Court of Claims when Mr. Bliss sent me word it ought to be paid.

Q. What is the amount of that claim for the extra month's pay?—A. I think it is $14,000.

Q. One-twelfth of $105,000 a year?—A. No; that would be only eight or nine thousand dollars. There is so many changes on these routes that you cannot take the pay at any given time as a basis of such a calculation. I think the amount is about $14,000, but I may be wrong. So much for that. There was Mr. Walsh in that position, with a claim upon the Government and making an allegation that he had paid money to Mr. Brady. His claim was that he had loaned money to Mr. Brady. The impression was very strong on my mind from the outset that if Walsh had had these money transactions with Brady they probably would turn out to have been of a different character from what he stated. He did not admit and would not admit at any time that he had had any corrupt dealings with Mr. Brady.

And yet Mr. Bliss undertakes to swear that I had.

The idea he gave out was that Brady had undertaken to blackmail him.

Of course Mr. Bliss would not believe that!

At all events he claimed that he had paid this money to Mr. Brady.

Q. Do you know whether that claim of Walsh's for the extra month's pay has ever been paid?—A. No, sir; it has never been paid; it is in litigation in the Court of Claims, and from what I learn of the evidence I apprehend that it never will be paid.

Q. Did Walsh demand that pay in consideration of testifying before the grand jury?—A. I cannot say as to that. I had nothing to do with it.

Now, I am prepared to prove, by Mr. Woodward, that Mr. Bliss did have to do with it, and that on his own motion; and, so far as I could understand, moved by a sense of justice, he sent me word by Mr. Woodward that the claim ought to be and would be paid. He afterwards said that he was "not sitting up o' nights to rectify the wrongs done Walsh, who had been abusing him in the newspapers," and that he "be blowed" if he was going to pay any more attention to the matter; so you see that, having angered a great man, he resolved to "sit down" upon me. He comes in now before your committee, and swears that the claim was unjust, and that he thought it ought not to be paid. Now, it is in that connection, and with reference to Mr. Bliss's testimony on that point, that I have offered this letter in evidence, and I offer further to prove by Mr. Woodward what I have already stated, that Mr. Bliss himself sent me word that the claim was just, and ought to be paid.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to me to be admissible, in answer to Mr. Bliss's testimony on that point.

Mr. Van Alstyne appealed from the decision of the chair, and the decision was sustained.

The WITNESS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe you want me to speak of what took place before the third grand jury.

The CHAIRMAN. State when you next appeared before a grand jury in the District of Columbia.

The WITNESS. I was served with a subpoena some time in the early part of 1883, in January or February, I think.

Q. When did you appear before that grand jury?—A. As my memory serves me, it was in the month of March, 1883. I was also summoned to appear as a witness in the Brady-Dorsey case. It was the 6th of April.

Q. Who appeared before that grand jury to represent the United States?—A. W. W. Ker.

Q. To what cases did he call the attention of the grand jury, in your presence?—A. To the case of the Corpus Christi and San Antonio route; contractor, James B. Price.

Q. Were you called upon to give evidence in that case?—A. I was, sir.

Q. Did you submit the evidence that was in your possession, or that was within your knowledge in relation to that contract?—A. I submitted the same evidence on that occasion that I did on the two other occasions. I have the papers here, and I tender them to the committee.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Did you submit the same evidence that you had submitted on former occasions, without increase or diminution?—A. Yes, sir; here it is.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you say that you presented to the third grand jury the same evidence that you had presented to the previous grand juries before which you had appeared?—A. The evidence that I had presented to the second grand jury particularly. The first grand jury before which I appeared considered that they got enough in about fifteen or twenty minutes, but the second went into the subject exhaustively. I presented to the third grand jury precisely the same evidence that I had presented to the second—before which Mr. Bliss had said that it was a serious matter to indict a United States Senator.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Was the same party or parties accused of criminal conduct in both instances?—A. The testimony related to the same parties, Brady, Price, and Kellogg, but Kellogg was the subject of investigation exclusively, in my mind, before the third grand jury; Brady and Price having been indicted previously.

Q. Please state what case was being investigated by that Mitchell grand jury when you appeared before them.—A. The Mitchell, or the first grand jury as we have designated it here, investigated the case against Brady, Price, and Kellogg.

Q. What presentments did they make?—A. They presented Brady and Price, and no others. They left Mr. Kellogg.

Q. The grand jury of which we are now speaking, the third—what presentments did they make?—A. Kellogg was indicted.

Q. I understand you to say that you presented precisely the same case to the third grand jury that you did to the second.—A. Precisely.

Q. And I understand you to say that when you appeared before the first grand jury you had in your possession the same papers that you produced before the third grand jury.—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Were they in the grand jury room?—A. Just as they are before me here now. They were in the first grand-jury room just as they were in the others, but I think I read only a few papers before the first grand jury.

Q. Why did you not read the rest?—A. The jury did not want any more; the oral testimony was sufficient.

Q. Who interfered to prevent your reading the rest of the papers?—A. Oh, they all seemed to be satisfied. I said, "I have some papers here; shall I read them?" and they said, "No, no; that is enough."

The CHAIRMAN. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that at the time when this first grand jury met there is no question but that the statute of limitations had not run so as to affect the transaction in any light in which the court might view it.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was the meeting of the second grand jury within the period of the statute of limitations?—A. I think so. It was very close, though.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. When you were before the first grand jury, who appeared there as an attorney to represent the Government?—A. Mr. George Bliss.

Q. Had you told him before that time the whole history of this transaction in substance as you have stated it here?—A. No, sir. I would not talk to the Government counsel. I did not conceive that that was my business.

Q. Then, so far as you know personally, Mr. Bliss was entirely ignorant of the connection of Kellogg with the case?—A. I cannot imagine that he was ignorant of it. Mr. MacVeagh was not ignorant of it.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Do you know whether Bliss was ignorant of it or not?—A. I do not know whether he was or not.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Previous to the time when you appeared before the first grand jury had you made a statement of the substance of your testimony to any agent or officer of the Government, to Mr. Woodward, Mr. Merrick, or any one else charged with the prosecutions?—A. Yes, sir; I had, incidentally, to Mr. Gibson. In speaking to him in relation to the testimony that I expected to produce in my civil action against Brady, I said that Mr. Kellogg was a competent witness in my behalf if he would only testify; that he was aware of transactions between Brady and myself, that he knew—indeed, that he had told me that Brady had stated to him that he, Brady, owed me money, and I said that if I could get Kellogg's and Price's testimony, my judgment was that I would establish my case very thoroughly.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. At the time the second grand jury convened Mr. Bliss knew all the facts in the case with reference to Mr. Kellogg?—A. He knew them in the first grand jury room. He knew the Kellogg case just as well as he knew that there was testimony against Brady and Price.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was there any other witness than yourself in reference to these cases before the third grand jury by which the indictment was found?—A. Not that I know of.

Q. No other witness was examined in your presence?—A. No, sir. I did hear that Price was a witness.

Q. Was there anything said in the presence of the grand jury while you were on the witness stand with regard to the dates of the transaction, so far as the indictment was concerned?

The WITNESS. Do you mean as to my knowledge of the dates?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

A. Yes, sir; I testified, so far as I had knowledge, in relation to the dates.

Q. Did you testify before the grand jury as to the dates of the several transactions that you had had, just as they had taken place?—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Transactions with whom?—A. With the drafts.

Q. What drafts?—A. Those postal drafts that were drawn by Price and given to Kellogg for his and Brady's account. Those drafts were turned over to me as a banker for collection. They came due from quarter to quarter, $3,000 each quarter, and as they came due I collected them.

Q. The dates of those collections were the dates to which you testified?—A. Those were the dates.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You testified according as the transactions took place, I suppose?—A. Precisely. The checks and drafts were there.

Q. Do you know whether the dates that you testified to were the dates that were put into the indictment?—A. Really, Mr. Chairman, I never felt that I had to read that indictment, and I have never looked at it or paid any attention to it.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Who drew that indictment?—A. My impression is that it was the joint production of Mr. Merrick and Mr. Ker. I know I heard them both discussing the very point that the judge passed upon the other day. I heard Mr. Merrick maintain that the successive payments kept the case alive. In talking to Mr. Merrick a few days ago I said that I had heard a great deal of abuse vented upon the unfortunate Ker on the ground of his incapacity to draw an indictment, and I told Mr. Merrick that in justice to Ker I would say that in my opinion that indictment was the joint production of his, Merrick's mind, and Ker's. Mr. Merrick said, "You state the fact, Mr. Walsh. The indictment is a perfectly good one." I am stating this here now in justice to poor Ker. Ker is deaf, and he does not hear all these things, but he is a very good-hearted fellow, and I think he meant to do his duty to the best of his ability.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Mr. Ker heard enough to know what you testified to before the grand jury, I suppose?—A. Oh, I talked very loud there, for his benefit. I talked very loud in the grand jury-room.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. You have testified that you gave evidence before two grand juries in regard to certain drafts; have you got those drafts?—A. Those are in the Government archives. I have got all that belong to me.

Q. What are they?—A. They are checks to Kellogg, letters from Kellogg, letters from Price, telegrams, &c.

Q. Do those relate to these matters that you have been talking about?
—A. Yes, sir.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Now, I offer those checks in evidence.

(Mr. Hemphill objected to the reception of the checks, and upon a vote they were excluded by the committee.)

The WITNESS. That finishes the record for me.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you appear in Washington for the purpose of testifying before the court at the recent trial?

The WITNESS. You mean the trial of the United States vs. Kellogg?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

A. Yes, sir; I did.

Q. State to the committee why you declined to appear at the December term of the court when the case was continued on account of your business.—A. I can do that best by reading a letter which I addressed to the President on the 3d of November, 1883.

Q. Did that letter embody your reasons for declining to appear at that time?—A. It did.

(Objection being made to receiving this letter in evidence, the committee, on motion of Mr. Fyan, resolved to consider the question of the admissibility of this letter in connection with the same question as to the other letters and papers offered.)

Q. State whether any efforts were made by you to avoid the service of process upon you to appear at that trial.—A. There were no efforts to avoid. I did not feel like going around and looking for deputy marshals, though; it did not seem to be any part of my business.

Q. Were you in the city of New York any part of the time?—A. Nearly all the time.

Q. Were you in a position to be accessible to those who were charged with the duty of serving the process of the court?—A. Undoubtedly, if they had known me. I have no doubt that if the gentlemen engaged in the business of process serving were a different grade of men from what they usually are, they would have found me, but inasmuch as that class of men generally resort to beer saloons and other such places, I fancy they would not be very likely to find me.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Were you on the public streets?—A. Undoubtedly. I had my being; I existed; I rode down on an elevated train with Mr. George Bliss one morning.

Q. Did you recognize Mr. Bliss?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have you any doubt that he recognized you that day?—A. Well, I don't know about that. I cannot say, you know, what passes in another man's mind.

Q. Were you disguised in your apparel?—A. There was no disguise, sir.

Q. When was this?—A. It was some time in March, I think. I believe the World made some allusion to it.

Q. It was after December, at all events?—A. Oh, yes; it was at a time when Mr. Bliss said that he had some sort of process for an "audacious" witness—whatever that meant under the Maryland statute.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. During what period was it that the Government wanted you as a witness and could not get you?—A. Oh, really, I could not tell you that.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Your presence was desired at the December term of the court?—

A. Yes, sir; the case was fixed for December 10, 1883. I should think that by that time they wanted me. Mr. Merrick and Mr. Ker came to New York to see me. First came Ker; he went to my attorney, Judge Grandin, and told him that there was a wild desire on the part of the Government to interview me; that the case of Kellogg was coming up on December 10, and hence the counsel for the Government would like to confer with me. I told Mr. Grandin that I had no desire to confer with the representatives of the Government; that I had not found any evidence of a desire on their part to do what was even half-way decent in my case; and I told him, generally, that I did not want to see them. He said, "All right, I will tell them so." Mr. Merrick might have met me on the street at that time; it was just a matter of chance, his failing to see me. Mr. Ker came to New York; then came Mr. Merrick, a gentlemen for whom I have a very high regard, but I also declined to see him. He, with others, had been rather lax, as I thought, in according to me what I believed I was entitled to in the matter of protection as a witness, and after the Merrick attempt to see me, I then wrote this letter to the President. Although these gentlemen wanted to have interviews with me, and I was not at all unwilling to do my duty in the matter, I knew that Mr. Merrick was powerless, and that it was useless to have any more promises from him because he could not fulfill them, being overruled by Mr. Bliss. I saw that as soon as the question of professional etiquette came up the professional garb was taken off the hook, and they dressed themselves in it and left Walsh out in the open field, and I said to myself, "Somebody else must do some fighting; this shall not be going on sub rosa;" so I wrote this letter to the President. Receiving no response, I came to the conclusion that there was to be a continuation of the treatment that I had received in the past, and I determined that I would not appear unless they got service on me, and that if they did get service on me I would come to Washington and tell the court that I would not testify.

By Mr. MILLIKIN :

Q. Did you expect an answer to the letter which you wrote to the President?—A. I did. I think it was due me. I have sacrificed a great deal for the Government.

Q. Where were you living at the time when they wanted to make service on you?—A. In the city of New York.

Q. Doing business there?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you on the streets every day?—A. Yes, sir; just as much as I am ever on the street. I am not gregarious in my habits. I don't go with flocks at any time.

By Mr. STEWART :

Q. Come right down to the point and be perfectly square. I suppose there is not any doubt that you concealed your address as far as you could, so that they could not find you?—A. I will be perfectly frank with you. I would not go to the post-office, because I knew that there was a subpœna there for me. Neither would I go up to the marshal's office and say, "Here is Walsh; have you anything here for him?"

Q. Your letters were addressed in the care of somebody else, were they not?—A. No, sir. They were addressed John A. Walsh, poste restante; my usual address. I sent somebody for them usually.

Q. Somebody that you could trust?—A. Well, no; not particularly

I did not emphasize that. But I knew that if I went there and asked if they had anything for me they would say yes, and would probably hand me a subpoena.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Then you were evading subpoena?—A. Not in that sense.

Q. If you were not evading the service of the subpoena why were you taking all those precautions?—A. Well, perhaps it was not agreeable for me to go to the post-office. I frequently sent to the post-office for my mail; in fact, that is my custom.

Q. If it is your custom why do you mention it here in response to a question asked you about evading a subpoena?—A. I did that because I wanted to answer as frankly as Governor Stewart asked me the question. I would not go to the post-office, if you call that evading service.

Q. Why would you not go to the post-office?—A. Because I thought they might give me a subpoena.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Do you mean anything further than this: that you did not intend to submit yourself as a witness to the Government unless you had those assurances for which you had asked?—A. I would have gone to jail first. I made up my mind that I would not testify with the representatives of the Government conspiring against me.

Q. You mean to say further that your habits in New York, and that which you did there, did not conceal you to the extent that an ordinary man in pursuit of you could not have found you?—A. I could easily have been found had I been known to the class of people who usually serve subpoenas.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you ride down on the elevated train from day to day to an office down town?—A. Yes, sir. Whenever my inclination prompted me. I often walked down. I sometimes walk, sometimes ride on the surface road, and sometimes on the elevated. On the occasion referred to here I was at the corner of Twenty-sixth street and Sixth avenue, and I got on the elevated road, in the last car in the train. Directly I heard a gentleman say, "Why, how do you do?" I recognized Mr. Bliss's voice, and he passed right along by me and took a seat beside a gentleman nearly opposite to me.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Did you send the same person to the post-office for your letters from day to day, or were they brought to you by different persons?—A. Different persons.

Q. Did Mr. Gibson get them sometimes?—A. Mr. Gibson got them once or twice.

Q. Did Mr. Bliss see you on that car on the elevated road?—A. I will not undertake to say that Mr. Bliss saw me.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. At this time, when you sat in an elevated car opposite Mr. Bliss, had you and he seen each other enough to enable him to know you personally?—A. Oh, yes.

Q. Did he know you?—A. Oh, yes, Mr. Bliss knew me.

Q. You did not accost him?—A. No, sir. Mr. Milliken might consider that an evasion of service. I did not go up to him and say, "Bliss, here I am, have you a subpoena in your pocket?" I did not do that.

Q. You may state the circumstances under which you did appear here at the recent trial.—A. I had read in the public prints that on the 29th of March the case of the United States vs. Kellogg had been called in the criminal court of the District of Columbia, and that Mr. Merrick, representing the United States, had taken occasion to make some remarks in relation to statements made by me to this committee.

On the 24th of March, 1884, I had addressed to this committee a communication in which I had gone on to explain why I refused to appear before the committee. Mr. Springer had expressed a desire to hear me testify. That was conveyed to me through Mr. Gibson. I felt that an answer was necessary, and I set forth in the letter to your committee the reasons why I did not think that I could appear and testify here. When the case against Kellogg was called on the 29th of March, counsel for Mr. Kellogg read this letter of mine of March 24 to this committee—read it in open court. Its reading called from Mr. Merrick certain denials. He said that he had never told me that the Secretary of the Navy, William E. Chandler, had allowed Bliss and Kellogg to meet at his, Chandler's, house. That was one of the allegations in my letter. Mr. Merrick said further that he had never said that Mr. Bliss had betrayed the interests of the Government—that he had never said that to me, that that language was never used by him. He also said (I quote from one of the counsel for Kellogg) that he did not know where my letters were written from, but, to use the language of the counsel on the other side, perhaps they were written from a lunatic asylum. On that occasion, Mr. Merrick said further:

We do not need this witness, Walsh. It is not Walsh that we need so much as it is the important papers that he has in his possession.

Of course, it is unnecessary for me to reiterate here that Mr. Merrick did tell me, as accounting for the escape of Kellogg before the second grand jury, that Mr. Bliss and Mr. Kellogg did meet at Mr. Chandler's house. It is very unfortunate that there should be such a difference of recollection between Mr. Merrick and myself, but, unhappily, we have to join issue on this point.

I regret very much that Mr. Merrick's memory is so defective. He did say that Mr. Bliss had betrayed the interests of the Government, and I submit that he agreed substantially to that proposition in the correspondence that passed between us in relation to my appearing before the third grand jury. As to the suggestion about a lunatic asylum, I presume that was metaphoric. We will not discuss that, but I presume that I am perfectly composed. As to the proposition that papers were all they wanted, I said this: "I am about to go to Europe; I shall sail from Quebec on the 10th of May; I shall go to Montreal, in the course of business (a place I frequently visit), and from there I will offer the President the papers; because I am not willing to take any part of the responsibility for a failure of justice, and inasmuch as the Government has been kind enough, through its very learned and very able and very expensive counsel, to allow a loop-hole for an important witness, I think I ought to reciprocate." Hence I did tender the papers to the President, provided he would give me a receipt for them and a promise to return them, inasmuch as they were of very great importance to me in my pending civil action against Mr. Brady, involving some $34,000 or $35,000. In response to that the Attorney-General, I believe, was directed to communicate with me. However, with the permission of the committee I will read the correspondence that passed between the Attorney-General and myself. I wrote to the President, as I have stated, and I received a reply from him—in effect it was from the President—the first one that he had ever accorded me. I don't know why he answered that letter any more than the other three, but he appears to have thought it was time to accord me some consideration. In reply to my letter to the President I received the following:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.
Washington, April 18, 1884.

SIR: The President has referred to me, for such action as may be proper, your letter dated Montreal, April 16, 1884, in which you refer to certain papers in your possession that are desired by the Government in the prosecution of the case against William Pitt Kellogg, and which you say you are willing to surrender to an accredited agent of the President. By his direction I have authorized Mr. Brewster Cameron to go forthwith to St. Lawrence Hall, Canada, and to receipt in the name of the President for the papers referred to in your letter; with the understanding that such papers be returned to you intact after the trial of Mr. Kellogg.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

JOHN A. WALSH, Esq.,
St. Lawrence Hall, Montreal, Canada.

Mr. Brewster Cameron and Mr. Ker came to Montreal. They reached there I think on Saturday night. I was not in the hotel when they arrived. I came in about 12 o'clock. Reaching my room I found this letter:

MONTREAL, April 19, 1884.

SIR: The President of the United States has received your letter dated Montreal, April 16, 1884, wherein you state that if a person is sent to you with authority to receipt in the name of the President for certain important papers in the case of the United States vs. William Pitt Kellogg, and the assurance is given to you that the papers will be returned to you intact after the trial, that you will turn said papers over to the Government for use in the trial of that case. I have been authorized and directed to come to Montreal to receipt for the papers, receive them from you and give you the assurance desired as to their return. I have just arrived at St. Lawrence Hall [9 p. m.]. Will you be kind enough to fix the earliest possible moment for an interview with me, as the case will be called for trial on Monday, and it is important I should not be detained here. Mr. Ker, special counsel for the Government in the case, has accompanied me to obtain from you any explanation he may need for efficient use of the papers at the trial. Will it be convenient for you to see him when you hand the papers to me, or afterwards:

Very respectfully,

BREWSTER CAMERON.

JOHN A. WALSH, Esq.,
St. Lawrence Hall, Montreal, Canada.

I immediately went down to the office and asked what rooms those gentlemen occupied. I was told. I sent up my card. It was then 12 o'clock or a little past 12 o'clock at night. I then met Mr. Cameron for the first time. Mr. Ker I had met before. Ker at first did not come into the room although their rooms communicated. Mr. Cameron addressed himself to me saying, "I suppose you have read my note. Can we have the papers?" I said, "Yes; you can have the papers. I will turn them over to you now." He said, "Well, I would not like to take them now, because I have no place to put them." I said, "You can put them in the hotel safe, where I keep them." "No," said he, "you had better keep them for the present." I said, "Where is Ker?" He heard me mention his name and he came in and I said to him, "What is this? Are you assuming the mysterious airs of the doges of Venice?" He said, "I did not know whether you would want to see me or not." "Oh," said I, "I am very glad to see you." He sat down and Mr. Brewster Cameron went on to deliver some oral messages that the Attorney-General had sent me. He said that I had done the Attorney-General great injustice ; that the Attorney-General had never spoken of me as a "fellow" in court, as I imagined he had. I told him who my informant was, and we went on discussing the matter for some time, Mr. Cameron asserting that Mr. Brewster had been very profuse in his verbal messages to me ; that he did not have time to write them, because my letter was presented to him at the Cabinet meeting at 12 o'clock, and he did not get away from the meeting until 3, and he wanted Ker and Cameron to leave on the 4 o'clock train for Montreal.

"Now," said Mr. Cameron, "the Attorney-General is absolutely desirous of doing his duty to the fullest extent, and you have done him great injustice, under a misapprehension of the facts. The Attorney-General desired me to say that to you, and to say further that, as an American citizen, you owed a duty to the Government in this matter, and that you ought to return ; that the papers will be entirely useless to the Government unless you return, and, taking all things into consideration, he thinks you ought to come back." I said, "Mr. Cameron, there is no hesitation on my part whenever I am treated with decency, or whenever I see the slightest evidence of a disposition to treat me decently, whenever I have even the slightest reason to believe that this Administration means to accord me any sort of recognition, I am perfectly clear as to what my duty is. My duty clearly and unmistakably is to return. You can telegraph the Attorney-General that I shall respond to his request. You may telegraph him, and I will telegraph him myself also." Mr. Cameron said, "The first train away from here is on Monday morning, I believe?" I said, "Yes." "Will you go with us?" said he. "No," said I, "I won't go with you ; I do not want to travel with Government people ; I do not want to have any sort of appearance that you gentlemen have persuaded me to return, that I have been overcome by any sort of argument or persuasion, and therefore I do not want you to travel with me."

Mr. Cameron saw the force of that objection and he said, "We will leave to-morrow night by the Delaware and Hudson road ; when will you leave?" I said, "I will leave in the evening, on the Vermont Central." We left in pursuance of that arrangement, but a washout occurred on the Delaware and Hudson road which delayed the train on that road and also the Vermont Central train, and which ultimately resulted in bringing Mr. Cameron, Mr. Ker, and myself together next morning. You see the fates were against me, and consequently I did come with them as far as New York ; that is, I traveled with them from early morning until we reached New York. I left Montreal by the evening train, and on waking up next morning to go out to breakfast, whom should I see but Ker, looking exceedingly wise, and crawling out of an upper berth in the most ungainly manner. I said "Egad! There is the apparition of Ker! Where do these fellows come from anyway?" Ker, when he saw me, seemed to be very much embarrassed. [Laughter.] He is an exceedingly juvenile man in many of his ways of thinking, and he seemed to be very much distrain. Said he, "Walsh, I hope you won't think that we did this on purpose?" [Laughter.] "Oh," said I, "that is too absurd ; do not suppose that for a moment." He referred to the matter two or three times, and I did my best to relieve his mind. I said, "I don't deal with people in that way. Get rid of the idea ; get rid of it. When we reach New York I will get rid of you."

When we reached New York Mr. Cameron asked me, "What train are you going to take?" "Well," said I, "I would take the 3.45 train ;

I usually travel on that train; but I suppose you are going to take that, so I will take the 1 o'clock train, which is slower. I do not want to travel on the same train with you, because if I did, when we got to Washington the newspaper men—that is, the bad newspaper men [laughter]—would say that I was brought back in charge of Cameron and Ker." Indeed, they have said that, notwithstanding all my precautions; so that there is no use in trying to avoid the inevitable. Well, Mr. Cameron and Mr. Ker said, "No, Walsh, we won't subject you to that inconvenience; you take the 3.45 train and we will take the 1 o'clock train." I arrived in Washington, and next day the Attorney-General sent for me, and I wish to say for him that his explanation of his conduct in relation to these cases was most ample; in a word, he did me that justice which had been denied to me so long through prejudice which had been excited against me, and which the Attorney-General informed me was the result of Mr. Bliss's studied efforts in that direction. That terminates that phase of the matter.

I was told by a friend of mine that when it was learned that I was coming back one of the counsel for Kellogg said, "I notice that Walsh is going to return." "Yes," said my friend, "I see that he is going to return." "Well, then," said the other, "I suppose the Government is going to pay him that $8,500 that it owes him, and that is the reason that he is coming back." Now, of course, we cannot keep people from suspecting; that is part of the worst side of human nature; but I assure you, gentlemen, there was no reference made to anything of that kind. I give Mr. Cameron and Mr. Ker credit for having refrained from any such suggestion, because if they had mentioned it I do not think I would have come. Punic faith is all that the Government has ever accorded to me so far, and hence I would not ask them to go on record again. It would be too painful to put them on record all along the line.

Q. Then there was nothing said to you in reference to the payment of your claim as an inducement for you to come back?—A. Nothing whatever. Nothing of that kind was required. Mr. Brewster's apology and his explanation of his attitude in this matter was all that was necessary.

Q. And that was given you by Mr. Brewster Cameron, as you have stated?—A. Yes, sir; by Mr. Cameron, and very much more at length by Mr. Brewster himself when I saw him.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Did you send a telegram announcing that you were coming back?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you receive any answer?—A. No, sir; I received no answer. I merely telegraphed "I will return," or something to that effect.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You may state what was said between you and the Attorney-General in regard to his former treatment of you—what explanation he gave.

Mr. STEWART. I object to that.

The WITNESS. I would rather not state that.

The CHAIRMAN. I mean only in so far as it related to the conduct of Mr. George Bliss.

The WITNESS. I have stated that part of it.

Mr. STEWART (to the chairman). You had better ask the Attorney-General about that conversation.

The WITNESS. Yes; I would rather you would do that. There were many things said that I should not care to state here.

Now, here is another letter, a copy of which was given me. It was addressed to Mr. Brewster Cameron by the Attorney-General, and is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, April 18, 1884.

SIR: Since writing Mr. Walsh to-day, by the direction of the President, requesting him to deliver you certain papers desired by the Government in the case against William Pitt Kellogg, I have read more carefully his letter to the President, dated Montreal, April 16, 1884. Referring to his statement that I said I did not need him, if it was so reported to him, it is not so. The other counsel said the material part of his testimony would be fortified by documents that were essential, but the presence of Mr. Walsh was required. [The Attorney-General, you see, was kind enough to try to explain away Mr. Merrick's unhappy remark in court, that my presence was not necessary. He bent before the wind at that time; the pressure was too great for him; Atlas became sick.] We needed him here. I wish you to say to Mr. Walsh now that I wish his presence here, and I call upon him in the most positive and most emphatic way to come at once with you and Mr. Ker, and to be present at the trial of the case, and testify to all the facts within his knowledge, so that there may not be any complaint of the failure of justice by reason of his absence.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General U. S.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Were you present in court at the proceedings on the trial the other day in accordance with that request?—A. Yes, sir; I was there. I was in the district attorney's office. The atmosphere of that court is not very enjoyable. The windows are kept closed and the mob crowd in there so that the atmosphere is not nice.

Q. You were not in the court-room, but you were accessible?—A. Oh, yes, sir; I was very accessible.

Q. You were not evading process?—A. Oh, no. I never have evaded any process.

Q. You were not called upon as a witness, though?—A. I was not.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Could the Government, if it had made proper efforts to do so, have found you in New York and have summoned you at any time within the last six months prior to this meeting that you had with Messrs. Cameron and Ker at Montreal?—A. I can only give you my impression on that point. My own impression is that Mr. Bliss stated the truth when he said here that they had done their best to find me. But you must remember the media that they would naturally work through. I do not suppose I was known to many men of the class that would be naturally selected to serve subpoenas. I have no doubt that I passed and repassed men who had subpoenas for me in their possession. Really, to be just, I must say that I do not think there was any lack of effort to find me.

By Mr. HEMPHILL:

Q. Do you know what efforts they did make or do you simply infer?—A. Oh, I infer that; of course I do not know. Mr. Brewster told me they had made earnest efforts, and if I had had any doubt about it before that would settle the matter in my mind. He complimented me upon my ability in keeping out of the way. I told him it was not so much a case of ability in keeping out of the way as it was a case of defective eye-sight on the part of his subordinates; which he, of course, accepted.

Q. Have you read the testimony of Mr. George Bliss before this committee?—A. Yes, sir; I have read it with a good deal of feeling. I have been very much amused by portions of it.

Q. Is there any part of that testimony to which you desire to reply?—
 A. Yes; I would like to make some pleasant allusions to a few slight contradictions into which Mr. Bliss has fallen; in other words, I think we shall proceed to demolish Mr. Bliss. It is not hard to do, for he is a most unhappy witness. It seems to me that a gentleman who has had so much business in Albany ought to be a better witness.

Examination suspended. Adjourned.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 14, 1884.

JOHN A. WALSH recalled and further examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Please proceed with your statement. When the committee adjourned you were about to refer further to the testimony given here by Mr. George Bliss.—Answer. Yes, sir. On page 206 of the record Mr. Bliss refers to me in these words:

With Mr. Walsh I had comparatively little to do. He early conceived a hostility to me.

It is unnecessary for me to say that I never conceived any hostility to Mr. Bliss; I never felt that he had incurred any hostility on my part. True, he went into print at a very early date to discredit me, as I have already shown the committee. I felt, however, that that was probably owing to his associations and in accordance with the measurement of men which he had been accustomed to make, owing to his long association with "practical" politicians. I did not know but what it was natural enough and in accordance with the average human nature with which he was accustomed to associate that he should form such an estimate of me.

As I have already stated, he apologized later on for what he had said about me, but, as I have also stated, he did not make the apology quite so public as he made the insinuation. All through Mr. Bliss's testimony I find allusions to myself as being a man who, if ever the necessities of the case should compel me to be the sole witness for the Government, might prove unreliable in this, that I would absent myself. He calculated that I would be paid by the defendant, Brady. I having a suit against General Brady for $34,000 or $35,000, Mr. Bliss calculated that Mr. Brady might pay me, and that I would then cease to have any sort of interest in this matter. From Mr. Bliss's stand-point I think that, perhaps, was also a natural judgment, and I presume that the best way I can proceed to disprove and overthrow any such theory or belief in the mind of any person is to recite here the numerous efforts that that were made to pay me my money. Some portions of the statement I would omit and make no allusion to, but for the appearance of an interview in this morning's paper in which Mr. Kellogg makes an attack upon me.

I was offered my money in whole or in part no less than five times during the pendency of the Government's criminal prosecutions against Brady, Dorsey, and others.

By Mr. FVAN:

Q. By whom were you offered your money?—A. By Mr. Brady at times and his representatives.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Who were those representatives?—A. I will come to that. The first time an overture was made to pay me was when I had come here in response to a subpoena to appear before the second grand jury. I had filed my civil action against Mr. Brady in June, 1881, long prior to the indictments had against Brady and Dorsey. Of the two counsel whom I had employed in my action against General Brady one was Mr. L. G. Hine, of this city, with whom was associated later Mr. W. A. Cook. I paid Mr. Cook a retainer. I showed Mr. Cook my papers. I told Mr. Cook some of my case—I did not tell him too much. In the mean time, as I have said, I was subpoenaed to appear before the second grand jury. Mr. Cook came to me in the court-room while I was waiting to be called before the grand jury and suggested to me that Mr. Kellogg was willing to do what was “right in the matter.” He spoke in a Delphic way, looked mysterious, looked at the ceiling, looked around in every direction, and said to me, “You see which way your interest is.” I did not make any response further than to say that perhaps I did not know enough to understand which way my interest was—didn’t have sense enough.

Q. At what time was this?—A. This was while I was here waiting to go before the second grand jury. Some days intervened before I was called, and during that time, of course, it got pretty generally known what my business was here, and that Mr. Merrick had forced the reconvening of the Hutchinson grand jury to take up the Kellogg case. Hence there was a pooling of the issues of the defendants in court and the defendants that ought to have been in court, among whom, of course, was Kellogg. Mr. A. M. Gibson called upon me and said that I could get one-half of my money which I claimed from Brady. I asked him how. He said that Kellogg would pay one-half of it if I would not testify. I don’t think that Mr. Gibson put it in just that way, but he said, “You will get one-half your money; Kellogg realizes that Brady owes you the money, and he (Kellogg) will pay one-half of it.” I said, “Mr. Gibson, Mr. Kellogg does not owe me any money. I don’t care anything about it. That is a mistake. Whom do you come from?” Mr. Gibson replied, “Mr. Cook told me to come to you.” “All right,” said I, “that settles it; I don’t want it. Mr. Brady owes me some money, but Mr. Kellogg does not.”

Then, about the same time, or perhaps a little later, there came here from Chicago Mr. Charles W. Wills, Mr. Kellogg’s brother-in-law, a most estimable friend of mine, a man for whom I have even more than regard; I esteem him more than any other acquaintance that I have ever had. Mr. Wills said to me, “John, I have been telegraphed for to come here from Chicago. I had just got up from Louisiana (he was engaged in sugar planting); my health is very bad, and I came up to Chicago, and I had no sooner got there than I received a telegram stating that you were here making a good deal of a row, and asking me to come on. I came on and Kellogg has talked with me. Of course, with his usual indisposition to deal frankly, he don’t tell the truth. He is in great trouble and greatly distressed, and he thought that if I could be brought here and could see you, I could induce you to desist. Now,” said Mr. Wills, “I will state the case frankly to you. I appeal to you, by reason of our friendship and owing to my relation to Kellogg, to tell me is there anything that you can with propriety do to let up.” I said, “Charley, I have nothing in the world to do but to do my duty in the matter,” and I went on and rehearsed the case to him. After listening, he said, “I am very sorry to know that the matter has reached that condition. Of course you must understand that I cannot help feeling for Kellogg. Of course it is natural that I should feel for him, and, if there is any way of coming to a settlement, Kellogg will pay one-half the money." I said to him, "Wills, it is not a question of money; it has got above and beyond that. I cannot occupy any doubtful attitude in this matter." We dined together. I don't know but we dined together every day he was here. We talked constantly about the matter, Mr. Wills urging me to do something. He was satisfied that Kellogg was guilty. He said that Kellogg denied it, but that he (Wills) knew that he was guilty, because he said, "Mr. Kellogg is a man that will never pay any money unless he is in extremis, and when I found that he was ready to pay you money, I knew, without any remarks from him, where he was."

As the matter progressed Mr. Wills became considerably worked up. He said that the way out of this matter seemed so easy that he didn't see why I would not make a settlement, and he said, "Really, I have come to the conclusion that you are angry or annoyed." Said I, "I don't feel particularly annoyed about anything. The abuse of these men is something that every man must be prepared for; I have had that for a long time; there have been (in the language of Mr. Arnold) many delicate amenities showered on me, but I pay no attention to that particularly." "Well," said Mr. Wills, "if you want to indict Kellogg, it is not possible for you to do it; you might as well make up your mind that you can't do it. This Administration is going to stand by him. They are all going to stand by Kellogg to the extreme end. Now you know what a power you are warring against. You know that you cannot succeed in any such fight as that, and that you are bound to go down. Now, as a friend of yours, and a well-wisher, and a man that is speaking it heartily, I tell you frankly that they will crush you in this fight." I said, "All right, let the crushing go on; I can't do anything." Well, Mr. Wills bade me good-bye, saying, "For the first time since I have known you, I leave you wishing you to fail." I said, "Wills, I will join you in that wish; in deference to you, I hope I shall fail." I mention this to show the relations between us. Wills left. I went before the grand jury. Ah! I am getting a little ahead of my story. Mr. Wills before he left said to me, "There is a studied disposition to protect Kellogg. Mr. George Bliss will do all he can to protect him. If you are at all desirous to do it, it will be made very easy for you, for the reason that Mr. Bliss is posted and he is going to stand by Kellogg. They will give you Brady's scalp if you want it to propitiate you. There is no disposition to save Brady. The understanding is that your animus in this matter, if you have any, is against Brady; they will give you Brady." I said, "I don't want Brady; I don't want anybody. I simply want to tell the truth, Charley."

I went before the grand jury, and in view of what my friend Wills had told me, I looked at the course of the proceedings there with a good deal of curiosity. Mr. Bliss's examination commenced haltingly. I could see that he had been told that I was going to omit Kellogg's name. He was feeling the ground tenderly and cautiously. As it dawned upon him that there was no disposition on my part to screen anybody, he assumed the role of a good examiner. He asked me all the questions; he drew the matter out very fully. He did all the reading of the papers. Two or three of the jurors may have looked at them in a perfunctory way, but Mr. Bliss read them. As he went along he seemed to be annoyed at me, and the thing ended by his making the remark which I have already quoted in my testimony. Afterwards, when he was interviewed about it, he thought he would "hedge" (in the vernacular of the racing men) by saying that if he had been a member of that grand jury he would have voted to indict.

I think this offer that I have just described was the second one that was made to pay me. The first one, I think, was that which was made by Senator Dorsey at the Gilsey House in New York—yes, the Dorsey incident was the first, as I now recollect. I had taken out an attachment against Mr. Brady's property in New York. I had attempted to discover some property in the hands of Hatch & Foote, of New York, and the Telephone Company, but I had not discovered any.

The deputy sheriff wrote to my attorneys, Ira Shafer and E. H. Grandin, that he would like to see Mr. Walsh. My recollection is that the name of the deputy was Shelley. I did not know him. My attorney said to me, "You had better go and see what Shelley wants." I said I would, and I went to see Shelley. He was a very pleasant gentleman. He said, "Mr. Walsh, I thought I would convey to you a message which Senator Dorsey gave me for you. I have just been having some business with him touching some property of his in the hands of the people of the hotel (the Gilsey House), and in the course of the proceedings I became acquainted with him; and, speaking of your attachment against Brady, he said that he was of the opinion that if he could see you, he could adjust the differences between you and Mr. Brady. Now, don't you think you had better go and see him?" I said, "Yes, perhaps I had." I went up to the Gilsey House and saw Mr. Dorsey. Mr. Dorsey intimated that if I would settle for $28,000, there would be no difficulty about the matter. I told him that was not the amount of the indebtedness and I would not settle for that amount, and I advised Mr. Dorsey not to have anything to do with the matter. My acquaintance with him was merely casual, and I advised him not to have anything to do with this business. He said that he was moved to do it because Brady seemed to be in such a state of anguish that he thought he had better make the suggestion, but if I didn't want to talk about it, why, all right. I said I did not want to talk about it.

Another proposition that was made to me was this: I was telegraphed for by my attorney, Mr. L. G. Hine—

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. (Interposing.) Was this suggestion made by Dorsey coupled with a proposition and condition that you should not appear as a witness?—
A. No, sir.

Q. Did he suggest in any way that the matter should be arranged on that basis?—A. Well, perhaps that might go without saying.

Q. Did you understand that that was one of the objects of the proposition?—A. Of course that would be my understanding, undoubtedly. I did not suppose there was any wild desire to pay me money unless I would consent to go away. I had not been able to make Brady see the propriety of paying me up to that time.

I was going on to mention another occasion when an offer was made to me. I received a telegram from my attorney here, Mr. L. G. Hine, to come over to Washington; that he thought there could be a settlement effected; that Mr. Jere. Wilson had been to see him and advised me to come. I didn't think that there was much in that. It was winter, and I was not feeling very well, and I telegraphed Mr. Kellogg—I knew that he was cognizant of the efforts to compromise, and I thought I would telegraph directly to him to see what he thought of it, Jere. Wilson being his attorney and his personal friend. I telegraphed Mr.

Kellogg and he replied that Wilson said to come. I came. I went to see Mr. Wilson at his office. Mr. Wilson very pleasantly referred to the differences between Mr. Brady and myself, and suggested that it would perhaps be well to settle. I said yes; that I thought it would be very well to settle; that I was very desirous of a settlement. "Well," said Mr. Wilson, "General Brady says he don't owe you that much." "Then," said I, "if he does not owe me that much, perhaps he can show me wherein I have made errors, and if he does that, I will correct them with pleasure." "Well," said Mr. Wilson, "I don't know that it is that." "Then," said I, "what is it?" Mr. Wilson said, "Well, I don't think he will pay that much." Said I, "Mr. Wilson, do you say that General Brady is not able to pay it? Is that the ground you take? Because if you take that ground I will consider it." "No," said he, "I cannot put it on that ground. General Brady, in my opinion, is financially able to pay you." "Then," said I, "it is simply the question whether he owes the money or not." Mr. Wilson said, "Yes." "Very well, then," said I, "he will pay every cent of it or else he won't pay any of it." "That is your ultimatum?" said Mr. Wilson. I replied, "Yes." "When do you go away?" said he. I replied, "I think I shall go to-night." Said he, "You had better not go to-night. Where are you stopping?" I said, "I am stopping at the Riggs." Mr. Wilson went on to say, "I will see my principal and will call to see you to-night at the Riggs House at 9 o'clock." I waited until half-past 9 or a quarter to 10, but Mr. Wilson did not come, and he never made any allusion to it again. The subject was dropped and I went my way.

Q. How much did he suggest that you would be paid?—A. He did not make any suggestion as to any particular amount.

By Mr. FVAN:

Q. How much was your demand?—A. My demand at that time stood at about $42,000, but there was a credit of $7,500 that Mr. Brady was entitled to; so that the debt amounted to between $34,000 and $35,000.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What was the basis of that claim?—A. Moneys loaned him at different times.

The next offer to compromise was made prior to the trial of the second case against Dorsey, Brady, and others. When here in the city of Washington I was approached—

Q. (Interposing.) What time was that?—A. I fear that I am not getting these offers in their proper order. On the occasion of which I am now speaking a gentleman approached me here in Washington, saying to me, "Mr. Walsh, I want to talk to you in relation to your claim against General Brady." I said, "All right, sir."

By Mr. FVAN:

Q. What was the name of that gentleman?—A. Will you insist upon that? He is a gentleman who makes his living largely by retaining confidences, but, of course, I will give it if you say so.

The CHAIRMAN. I think you had better state the name.

The WITNESS. Well, I have a great regard for this gentleman; but, really, this thing is becoming so oppressive that I don't think I can keep anything secret about it. The gentleman that approached me on that occasion was Mr. Rice. I think his initials are W. P.; at any rate, he was the secretary of Senator Conover, of Florida, I think. He is a tall gentleman. Inasmuch as there was no impropriety in what Mr. Rice did, there can't be any harm in mentioning his name. What he did was perfectly proper for him to do. He did not do anything which would implicate him improperly. He called to see me at my room, corner Twelfth and G streets. He said, "Mr. Walsh, I come to speak to you in relation to your claim against General Brady. I think the time has arrived when you can get your money." I said that was a time I had been very anxiously looking forward to, and that I was glad to hear tidings of the bread that had been cast upon the waters so early in life. He asked me how much it was. "Well," I said, "as filed in New York it is $42,000, but that is wrong, because Brady is entitled to a further credit of $7,500. Still, when you figure interest and everything, it will stand somewhere in that neighborhood." "Well," said he, "you can get your money." Said I, "Have you got it in your pocket?" "No," said he, "not exactly; but the matter has reached this shape, Walsh. The defendants realize that you are the material witness against them, that you are the man that has caused them all this trouble, and, seeing that, realizing it, and appreciating further that Brady is a hog, and that he either will not pay you, or is not able to pay you, they have determined, for their own protection, that the best thing they can do is to—(I think I will use Mr. Rice's language)—to chip in and pay you." Mr. Rice did not seem to think there was anything wrong about that. I don't know myself whether there was or not. I said to Rice that that was rather a singular proposition to make to me; that the defendants outside of Brady did not owe me any money, and I said, "Mr. Rice, I should think that would astonish you. They have said that I am a blackmailer; I have seen that in print frequently coming from those gentlemen." Mr. Kellogg very early went into print after the second grand jury had adjourned without indicting. Feeling that he was out of the woods, he rejoiced exceedingly, and lifted up his voice in the New York Evening Post of July 15, 1882, if my memory serves me right; and, speaking of the failure to indict him, he told the world that there was not a check, there was not a paper, there was not a document, there was not a scrap of paper of any kind produced before that grand jury bearing his (Kellogg's) name. He went on to say, "This is all over now, but the day of reckoning for blackmailers is coming." "Now," said I, "Mr. Rice, don't you think that if I were to put myself in the position you propose, all that would be true?" He said no; that he didn't see it in that way. Said he, "It is a large sum of money, and I don't think you have any right to inquire where the money comes from." "Well," said I, "perhaps, Mr. Rice, I would not have inquired, but you have been indiscreet enough to tell me. If I were to stop the inquiry now undoubtedly I would be particeps criminis. I cannot do what you propose; I cannot do that." "Well," said he, "Walsh, I am astonished at your drawing such lines as those." "Well," said I, "Mr. Rice, I can't help it; perhaps my education has been defective—too much pride, may be; I don't know what it is, but I won't do that." "Well," said he, "will you see Dorsey?" Said I, "I have no business with Mr. Dorsey. I saw him once (referring to the Gilsey House interview); he is a gentleman with whom I have a very slight acquaintance; and I told him then that I thought it was indiscreet on his part to take a hand in this Brady business; that he had better let Brady do his own talking; that he (Dorsey) was going to be tried, and that perhaps if I got on the stand as a witness there might be some questions asked me and my answers might militate against him. I said to him," "I would not do such things if I were in your place." "Now," said I to Rice, "when the trial occurred the inquiry took that very turn. I was asked whether I had ever been offered any compromise, and of course I was going to testify that I had; but the counsel objected, claiming that that was not proper. There was some argument about it and the court sustained the objection, saying that the defendant had a right to purchase his peace." All this I recited to Rice, and I said to him, "Clearly, I do not want to have any talk with Dorsey. His case is coming up again." You will understand that I was not then under subpoena. The case was not on; so that Mr. Rice was doing nothing but what was perfectly proper; the only impropriety would have been in my receiving the money. I told him I did not want to see Dorsey. He said he was sorry; that if I would talk to Dorsey about it he thought it would be made clear to me. I said, "Mr. Dorsey does not owe me any money; why then should I talk to him? Put yourself in my place and tell me why I should talk to him." "Well," said Rice, "I don't know. If you want your money you ought to be willing to talk to anybody." "All right," said I, "I will not do it." He left me. I met him next day on the street and he said, "I have spoken to Dorsey about that, and I now renew the request that you see him." I said, "I am much obliged, but I won't do it." "Well," said Rice, "I must express my regret about it." I said, "All right," and we parted. A day or two following he met me again and said, "Walsh, Dorsey is very much affected by what you have done and said." Said I, "What have I done and said?" "Well," said he, "Your refusal to see him; he feels it very bitterly. He says, 'Good God! what have I done that Walsh won't speak to me?'" "Now," said I, "Rice, don't talk to me that way. It would not matter to me if there were one hundred indictments against him. I treat men as a rule in a polite and gentlemanly manner, and if I meet Mr. Dorsey I will bow to him and recognize him just exactly as I have always done since I have known him; but I don't want to talk to him about that matter." That was the end of it.

Q. Was this conversation to which you have referred prior to the time you appeared and testified on the trial of the case the second time before the petit jury?—A. Yes, sir; prior to the time of my appearance before the second traverse jury, and subsequent to the second grand jury's failure to indict Kellogg.

Q. Was there any intimation or any suggestion made by Mr. Rice or others during that time that the receipt of any money by you from those persons who were to contribute to pay you was to operate not only to the payment of your claim against Mr. Brady, but also to keep you from appearing as a witness?—A. Mr. Rice did not say that.

Q. He did not?—A. Oh, no; perhaps, as the French novelists say, that goes without saying. The difficulties surrounding me in the matter were simply these: I felt that, if I received money, it would be very difficult for me to go on the stand, and I felt also that Mr. Brady would not pay me if I were to go upon the stand.

Q. If there had been no suits pending, no litigation in which you were to appear as a witness, there would not have been any impropriety in Brady's friends contributing to a fund to pay his debts, would there?—A. No; but they are not generally under such humanizing influences.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. I suppose you have no other evidence that this man represented either Brady or Dorsey beyond his own statement?—A. None whatever.

Q. So that you cannot testify that either Brady or Dorsey ever sent him to you?—A. No, sir; not of my own knowledge.

Q. He did not present any credentials of any sort?—A. None whatever.

Q. And you did not have any communication with either Mr. Brady or Mr. Dorsey in reference to this matter?—A. I did with Mr. Dorsey, in the Gilsey House in New York. That was a prior proposition; but, of course, I understand your question to refer to this transaction of which I have been speaking. Your question suggests something to me, Governor Stewart. You have asked me if this gentleman came accredited from anybody. I have no proof of that; nothing but his simple statement. But prior to this interview with Mr. Rice one afternoon, traveling between here and New York, I happened to take the same train on which Mr. Kellogg was a passenger. I found him seated well forward in the parlor car. I went up in that direction. I did not see him, however, until I got quite close to him. He spoke to me; said, "How do you do, Mr. Walsh?" "How are you, Governor?" said I. "Sit down," said he. I sat down in the next seat and talked to him. Mr. Kellogg's relations and mine have always been pleasant—always, until he fancied that I was disposed to do him some individual injury. I think he fancies that all that I have done has been done as a personal matter. In that he is wrong. I am not doing anything with regard to him personally. Personally, my feelings toward him are kindly. On this occasion he said, "Walsh, why don't you settle that matter with Brady?" I replied, "There is no trouble about my being willing to settle; Brady is the obdurate man." Mr. John I. Davenport, of New York, was also a passenger on the train. Mr. Kellogg would probably deny that he ever talked to me, being an apt man at denials. But Mr. Davenport was on the cars, a gentleman whom I know, and I talked with him also. Kellogg and myself, however, talked nearly all the way to New York. He said there would be no difficulty whatever in settling the matter; that he would do all he could to facilitate it; that he felt friendly towards me; that he considered that Brady owed me money, was satisfied of it; indeed, he said Brady had admitted to him that he owed me money; and, said he, "I will do all I can, and, if you are willing to settle, there will be no trouble whatever in the way." I said, "Certainly I am willing to settle; a settlement is all I want. When we got to New York we rode up together in the elevated train as far as 32d street. He got out there and went to the Fifth Avenue Hotel, and I went on up-town. When I got to Washington next time after that Mr. Rice approached me as I have stated. That is the order in which those two interviews occurred.

Mr. Merrick commenced writing me letters asking me to appear as a witness before the third grand jury. I told him that I would not appear any more as a witness before a grand jury with George Bliss acting as attorney for the United States. Then ensued that correspondence between us, which is of record here. They say there was some difficulty in finding me to subpoena me, but finally they did find me. I was standing one day on the corner of Broadway and Wall street, and I started from there and went down to the Battery, where I got on the elevated train; and, as I learned afterwards, a man was following me all the way, and when we reached Thirty-second street he managed to get some ink somewhere and filled in the date, and served the subpoena on me. I telegraphed to Mr. Merrick that I was not feeling very well, and I should prefer to wait in New York, but would come on when he said it was necessary. When he did say it was necessary I came. I stopped at Wormley's. I got in at night, perhaps, and the next day Mr. Gibson called on me and said, "Walsh, you can get your money." "Indeed," said I. He said, "Yes, you can be paid your money." Said I, "I am very glad of that, Gibson." Said he, "You can get your money with consequential damages." "Consequential," said I, "What does that mean in this case?" "That means," said Mr. Gibson, "compensation for the annoyance and the expense to which you have been subjected. Whatever you say is reasonable for that will be paid to you in addition to your claim." Said I, "Do you know that I am here under subpœna?" "No," said he, "I did not know that." "Well," said I, "I am. Is there any wild desire to pay me now?" He said, "No," and that ended the matter.

I think the last time that any offer of payment was made to me was last January. My attorney was approached, and he said that he thought it would be a good thing to settle the claim; that they did not have much money, but still would do the best they could.

Q. Who was that attorney?—A. Mr. E. H. Grandin.

Q. Who approached him?—A. Mr. Charles H. Reed, the great defender in the Guiteau case, counsel for Brady, and counsel for Kellogg.

Q. Tell us about that offer.—A. Mr. Reed came to see Judge Grandin, my attorney, and offered to pay $10,000 as a compromise of this matter. I had begun proceedings in New York to get the testimony of Brady and Kellogg. I had got service on both of them; but they managed to escape testifying on account of the defectiveness of my papers. The papers were defectively drawn—the court so held. Mr. Reed appeared as attorney for Brady, and also for Kellogg. Hence he was brought into contact with my attorney, Mr. Grandin. Owing to this defect in the drawing of my papers, Brady and Kellogg were released from subpœna, and consequently I could not get their depositions. Mr. Reed then approached Mr. Grandin some time in January of this year. He told Grandin that there was a great desire to settle this difference between Brady and me, and that they would pay $10,000. He made some mention of Kellogg's name in it; the impression left on Grandin's mind was that Kellogg was to pay something. Mr. Grandin told me of this, and I said, "Grandin, you know that I have no business with Kellogg; he owes me no money; I owe him none. These transactions were entirely between Brady and myself, and there must be a total avoidance of Mr. Kellogg's name in this matter." Mr. Grandin said, "I told Reed that." "Well," said I, "Reed ought to have known better." And then I said, "However, that proposition is ridiculous. I would not take any $10,000. Just let the matter rest." Mr. Reed came a few days subsequent to that and stated that he had had interviews with Brady and offered $15,000. Mr. Grandin by note communicated this proposition to me. In that note he said, "Mr. Reed has now offered $15,000. In my opinion, if you say $25,000 the matter can be arranged." I said that I would not take anything less than the amount of my claim. Said I, "There is no use in bothering with it anyhow, Grandin; of course there is no desire to pay me unless I leave the country, and I cannot do that; so don't bother your mind about it. I have been approached unceasingly about this matter up to this time, now just let it drop. So it dropped.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Have you ever authorized anybody to demand of any of these defendants a sum of money in consideration of your failing to attend as a witness?—A. No, sir.

Q. No one has ever been authorized by you to make any such demand or proposition?—A. No, sir; no one has ever been authorized by me. All it would have required was that I should accept their propositions. As that idea runs all through Mr. Bliss's testimony, that I would probably be out of the way in case I was paid my claim against Brady, I have thought it material to make this statement as to the offers of payment that have been made to me.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Bliss in that testimony refers to your claim against the Government, not to your claim against Brady.

The WITNESS. Oh, he refers repeatedly to my claim against Brady—more to my claim against Brady than to anything else.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. He had nothing to do with your claim against Brady, had he?—

A. Nothing, except that he had a general knowledge of it. It was filed in court in June, 1881, and telegraphed all over the country long prior to the finding of any indictment.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What is the form of action in that case?—A. It is an action at law for money lent Mr. Brady.

Q. Do you sue Brady on notes or on open account?—A. I had to sue him on open account, because he took his notes at the time of our December interview. He said that the matter was adjusted and settled, and he captured the notes.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. What was the date of that loan?—A. I had loaned him money prior to that indebtedness, for which I had brought suit in court; but he had paid the prior loans. I had one or two transactions with him as early as July 21, 1879, according to my recollection.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How did it happen that Mr. Brady came to you to borrow money?—

A. He borrowed of me just as you see by that "ginger" letter that he wanted to borrow more. What moved him to ask me to lend him that $24,000? Simply that I had money, and that that was in the line of my business.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Well, men do not ordinarily, when they want a simple loan, talk about "ginger," do they? If it was an ordinary transaction, would not he say, "Mr. Walsh, I want to borrow $24,000, and I offer you such and such security?" That round-about way of applying for a loan strikes me as rather odd.—A. But, judge, would not that be largely dependent upon the man's character, the drift of his mind, and the kind of language he is accustomed to use?

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Brady used the expression "ginger" in relation to a loan of a certain stock in the market?—A. Yes, sir. He knew that I was interested to some extent in that stock. He had seen me buy 300 shares, and he probably said to himself, "Now, Walsh, to the extent of 300 shares, is in the same boat with me." According to rumor, he had a large quantity of that Chattanooga stock, as much as 2,500 shares. It was a small capitalization, and was held by a few, and they had had it up as high as 130, a fabulous price, but it had gone down again.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. No matter about that now. At the time you gave Brady this credit, of which you have spoken, for $10,000, what was the amount of his indebtedness to you?—A. Do you mean at the time of his first loan, which is of record in the court?

Q. You have stated that you credited Brady with half the money that you got through the Price drafts, and that the amount of the credit was $10,000?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. My question is, what was his indebtedness to you at the time you gave him that credit?—A. About $10,000 or $12,000. I can refresh my memory by referring to papers, if you desire.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you mean that the amount of his indebtedness was that much after the payment had been made or before?—A. The first money loaned him in the sense of a loan was July 21, 1879, $12,000. Some time in the fall of 1879 Kellogg handed me the Price drafts, amounting to $20,000, one-half to be put to his, Kellogg's, credit and one half to Brady's credit. I handed over Brady's first note after receiving that payment.

Q. How much was that note?—A. Twelve thousand dollars, according to my best recollection.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. And you handed over the notes when you had received only $10,000?—A. Well, governor, it will really get worse if you go into it further. I had had the half of Peterson's drafts turned over to me by Brady. Peterson was a mail contractor on the route from Alexandria to Shreveport—

Q. (Interposing.) You have stated that. Now what else? You had this $10,000?—A. I had the $10,000 and half of this $15,000.

Q. That made $17,000 and over?—A. Yes, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Your claim against Brady was $12,000?—A. Yes.

Q. So you gave him up the $12,000 in notes?—A. Yes, sir; I had paid him about $3,000 on the drafts.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Then you owed him?—A. No; I do not know that I owed him. Don't get ahead of the record, please.

Q. Explain that Peterson matter.—A. Brady wanted me to buy the half of Peterson drafts, $15,000; I did not feel like buying it, but I let him have about $3,000, which is not included in this suit of mine at all. I advanced him that on account of the $7,500, being one-half of the Peterson drafts.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Who gave you those Peterson drafts?—A. Peterson himself.

Q. Who is he?—A. A mail contractor.

Q. What was the nature of those drafts?—A. They were postal drafts—drafts on his pay.

Q. And he directed you to pay half the amount to Brady?—A. No. He said to me, "You know about these drafts." Kellogg had come to me and said that Peterson would hand me over $15,000 in drafts.

Q. Well, what did you do with the drafts?—A. I kept them and collected them.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Did Mr. Kellogg tell you what to do with the money?—A. Oh, yes; one-half was to go to him and one-half to Brady. Brady spoke to me about it, and wanted me to buy his half, which I did not want to do, and which I was very fortunate in not doing, because later on there came a dies iræ, such as always seems to follow these things, and Peterson's pay was curtailed.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. What did you receive on those drafts; or did you receive anything?—A. Oh, yes. The records of the Department will show how much I collected.

Q. Did you credit Brady with anything on the Peterson drafts?—A. He was not entitled to the credit until he got through discharging the $3,000 debt that he owed me on those drafts.

Q. And that he did discharge?—A. No, sir.

Q. He discharged a portion of it?—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. By your collections?—A. Yes, sir; pretty nearly all of it; that is my recollection.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. How did the account stand between you and Brady? I do not want to ask you anything about your private business, but how did the account stand between you after you had credited him with the $10,000?—A. Well, at the time of the filing of my suit, the account stood against him in round numbers, $42,500; but I had omitted a credit of $7,500 to which he was entitled, and I afterwards gave him that credit.

Q. But you filed your suit a long time after this credit of $10,000 was given, did you not?—A. Oh, yes.

Q. Now, my question is, how did the account stand between you and him after you had credited him with the $10,000?—A. Well, I should say that at that particular time, taking the $10,000 from the $12,000 there would be a balance of $2,000 due me.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. His chief indebtedness to you has grown up since?—A. O, yes; in repeated transactions.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. After that time you advanced him money?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you take his notes?—A. I did. Sometimes I did not. For the large amounts I did.

Q. Then you had notes of his?—A. Oh, yes; I had $25,000 of his notes, which he captured as abandoned property.

Q. You understand that it is a pretty serious thing to talk about a man taking property that does not belong to him?—A. Yes. Well, that is what he did.

Q. Upon what claim?—A. Upon the claim that he had done me valuable service in increasing the pay on route 40101. I had met him at his house for the purpose of having an adjustment of the accounts between us and he captured the notes.

Q. You are not a weakling in any sense—

The WITNESS (interposing). "A Roman gladiator." [Laughter.]

Mr. STEWART. No; but you are not a weakling at all, and I want to know how you came to allow him to capture your property in that way. How much do you say he took?—A. The notes amounted to $25,500.

Q. Was there anybody else in the room at the time?—A. No.

Q. Won't you please tell us the circumstances of his taking the notes?—A. With a great deal of pleasure, sir. It is a little old, but I will go into it again if you desire. You will perhaps remember that I introduced here on the first day of my testimony a note which was addressed by me to General Brady asking him to meet me at the house of General George A. Sheridan.

Mr. STEWART. I remember all about that, and that you had an interview with him there.

The WITNESS. Well, at that interview I had the notes with me. There was a matter of interest to be discussed, and there was a matter in relation to the Peterson drafts. I had made memoranda and had gone all over it in my mind, with the view of having a settlement of some sort with General Brady. Matters were approaching a crisis. He had some time before that tried to borrow about $24,000 more of me, as you will remember, by the "Ginger" letter.

At this interview I began the conversation. The relations between General Brady and myself were fairly pleasant, and I began the conversation and said that I thought we perhaps might as well have an adjustment of our account, that I was not getting any richer, that, on the contrary, there was a very steady depletion of the exchequer in my case, and that if it was agreeable to him and he was in condition, I would like to have the matter adjusted. He sat there silent. He is not a very communicative man at any time. I put the notes on the table with the memorandum of interest. "Now," said I, "General, in relation to the interest, we of course will have to determine that, for the reason that money has been pretty high at times and quite low at other times, and I take it that you are willing to do whatever is fair about that." "Well," said he, "how do you figure it?" I said, "There it is." The notes were on the table with other papers. He took them, nervously moved them about, and went on talking—talking about Chattanooga, among other things, and finally he says, "Well, Walsh, do you think there is really any indebtedness by me to you?" Said I, "What do you mean, General?" "Well," said he, "don't you think, now, that you understood these transactions perfectly? You are not really going to regard these transactions as borrowed money, are you?" "Well," said I, "what other light can I regard them in? In what other light can I view them?" "Oh, well, now," said he, "there is no use of your pleading ignorance about it; you must understand these things by this time. You have good common sense." He flattered me very much, as Governor Stewart did just now, and suggested that it did not require a surgical operation to get an idea through my head. However, I told him I did not understand the matter; that I did not see where I came in. I said, "Gad, I don't see where I come in." "Ah!" said he, "you don't?"

All this time he was nervously twitching the papers about. "No," said I, "I do not." "Well," said he, "you are aware that your service was increased from $74,500 up to $134,500 per annum, are you not?" I said, "It was increased from $18,000 to $135,000." "But," said he, "up $74,500 (in round numbers, $74,000) that was paid for." "Paid for?" said I, "Oh, yes; yes, it was; I paid that myself." I began to have a faint recollection that some of my own money had gone to old Brown, and I said, "Yes; I paid that myself." "Now," said Brady, "$75,000 from $135,000 leaves, in round numbers, $60,000 per annum, don't it?" I said, "Yes." "Twenty per cent. of $60,000," said he, "is $12,000; that multiplied by three years makes $36,000. I think you understand that?" By the time he said this the notes went into his pocket. I said to myself, "Presto, change! the great Cagliostro, by gad!" However, I was very calm. I have to be calm. All my life has required calmness. There have been great drafts made upon that element in my character. Said Brady, "You figure that, do you?" I said, "Yes—yes." "Then," said he, "further, you will remember the remission of fines and penalties amounting to about $6,000 or $7,000, as near as I can recall." Said I, "Yes, that is so." "Well," said he, "50 per cent. of that, Mr. Walsh, would be how much?" "Oh," said I, "that is clear; $3,000, if the amount was $6,000; $3,500 if it was $7,000." "Then," said he, "you owe $8,000 to the Congressional fund, which you affected to know nothing about." "Yes," said I, "I took occasion very early to say that I knew nothing about that. You refer to Chase Andrews's demand?" "I do," said he. "Now," said I, "General, it is not possible that there is anything of that kind to be charged against me." "Why not?" said he. Said I, "Why not? My gracious! the fund must have been an enormous one. If I was assessed $8,000, and everybody else was assessed in proportion, my conscience! what an awful fund it must have been!" "Then, further," said I, "there would be a doubt in my mind as to who disbursed the fund, or whether it was disbursed properly. There are many questions which suggest themselves to me, and which would perhaps occur to you if you were in my place." Said he, "That is none of your business. You have nothing to do with that. The appropriation went through and you were benefited by it just as the rest were." I said, "Yes, I was benefited by some inverse rule, but not in any other way that I have been able to discover." "All right," said he, "there will be no more discussion about that. You saw quite enough to know what you were expected to do if you chose to use your common sense." "What do you refer to?" said I. "I refer," said he, "to the drafts that came into your possession. I refer to that; I refer to your common sense." "Well," said I, "General, the drafts that came into my possession might have been entirely fair and proper. Why should I infer anything from that business?" "Well," said he, "there are things that any man ought to infer." "All right," said I, "I will infer it then." Said he, "The $25,000— in drafts that Price turned over to you on the Indianola and Corpus Christi route represented the balance of Mr. Price's assessment for the Congressional fund. Price is a pretty hard man to deal with, or to make understand anything, but I had no difficulty with him or with the others." "Well, General," said I, "Price is an optimist; he is an enthusiast; he always thinks that there is a great deal of money in anything he touches. I cannot be induced to take that view." As I sat there I thought over the state of things, and the idea occurred to me that I would see what effect it would have on him to threaten him with litigation, and I said, "General, you do not really think you are going to settle this matter in this way, do you?" Said he, "Why not? What are you going to do?" Said I, "I will go to the courts." "Well," said he, "you can go there. The courts are all wide open. What good are you going to do there? You do not really imagine, Walsh, that you are going to gain anything by doing anything of that kind. What good will it do you?" "All right," said I, "I can stand a good deal, but this is going too far. Now I will tell you what you can do. You do not want me to lose money, I am sure; there is no reason why you should. I was moved to advance this large sum of money to these men, McDonough, &c. (which was the beginning of all my woes), largely through your representations that McDonough was in good standing as a contractor, and therefore, in all fairness, I think you ought to help me out"——

Q. (Interposing.) You have stated all that already. Did you demand the return of the notes, or did you submit as philosophically as you say, merely telling him that he was not going to settle the matter in that way?—A. Undoubtedly I did. I may have shown a little more feeling than I have shown here in reciting it.

Q. How did you expect to prove your case if you went into court?—A. I expected to prove it the best way I could, by getting Price's deposition in one instance and Kellogg's in another.

Q. You did not know that you could get those?—A. I did not. I knew, though, that Price had not given me any $20,000 of drafts. The record will show that I pursued Price with the greatest diligence in order to get his deposition, and he has sworn that the reason he did not depose in the case was on account of Senator Kellogg.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Did you demand of Brady to give up those notes after he put them in his pocket?—A. Of course I did.

Q. What did he say?—A. He said, "Oh, Walsh, that is too silly. It is puerile to talk in that way. You know that you have had a valuable contract." I think Brady really believed that that $135,000 a year was a bonanza. I could not disabuse him of that idea. I referred to my testimony before the Blackburn committee. I said, "Put yourself in my place; would you think for a moment that you owed anybody in such a case, especially when you recall the fact that I agreed to pay Hinds $20,000 for no other reason in God's world than to secure peace?" "Oh," said Brady, "$20,000, Walsh, is not anything. How can other men do these things? You have a most valuable contract." "Well," said I, "I don't seem to be able to convince you of anything. I tell you it is not a valuable contract. I am willing to go out at any time. Just instruct some of your contractors to let me out and I will go out at a loss of $20,000 or even $25,000." He could just as easily have done that as I can testify here to-day.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. When he made the statement that 20 per cent. on $60,000 per annum was $12,000, and that three times that was $36,000, did he make any explanation of that peculiar statement?—A. He said that that was the method; that that was what he asked for all increases and expeditions.

Q. Three times 20 per cent.?—A. No; but the contract ran for three years, you know.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Then, I understand you to say that Brady insisted that this money that he had got from you was a payment to him for having increased your service?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And also for lobbying a bill through Congress?—A. Also for money paid to Congressmen to get the star route appropriation through subsequent to the investigation which was conducted by the subcommittee of which Mr. Blackburn was chairman.

Q. You took another view of it, and assumed that he had borrowed the money of you, and was still indebted to you to that amount?—A. Undoubtedly. I had no reason to assume anything else. If he had succeeded in getting my $25,000 worth of Chattanooga stock, as he tried to get it, I have no doubt that I would have been treated in precisely the same way as to that—subjected to the same procrustean operation that I was subjected to in these other matters.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. State what he said in regard to that Congressional fund.—A. Well, he would not go into that. There was talk at that time to the effect that Brady had not really disbursed that money. Contractors charged him, if I may be permitted to use so harsh a term, with stealing the money—charged that he had got it out of them on this pretext, and had put it in his pocket; but he did not go into that.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Have you ever brought a suit for those notes?—A. Yes, sir; for the amount of them.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. What is the amount?

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. He has already stated that the amount of his claim was $42,000, from which was to be deducted a credit of $7,500.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Is that suit pending in the District of Columbia?—A. No, sir; it has been transferred to New York.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Have you ever instituted any criminal prosecution against Brady for taking those notes in the way he did?—A. No, sir; and after witnessing the Government's performance in the other criminal prosecutions, I am very glad that I never did. [Laughter.]

Q. You waited to see how the Government would come out?—A. Well, I thought. Mr. Milliken, that if I could get out without being prosecuted myself for testifying, I would be very fortunate.

By Mr. FVAN:

Q. If I understand the statement which you made a few moments ago, the fault that the contractors found with Brady was that, instead of using the money to buy up Congressmen, he had pocketed it himself.—A. Yes, sir; they spoke that way, and I suggested to him that if I had to pay $8,000 to that fund I ought to know where it went; and in reply to that he said that I would perhaps find more business in attending to my own affairs. Well, I thought that $8,000, if I had to pay it, would constitute a part of my affairs, but he did not seem to take that view.

Q. Have you ever taken Price's testimony?—A. I could never get it. I attempted to take it here, and, to my intense surprise, when I went in before the commissioner, Price appeared there with counsel. Jere. Wilson and Jeff. Chandler appeared representing Brady, and Mr. Cole, the partner of Mr. William A. Cook, appeared to represent Price. Mr. Cook, to whom I had paid a retainer in my civil action against Brady, comes in before the commissioner, through his partner, Mr. Cole, as the counsel of Price. [Laughter.] Well, the whole thing is really too funny. To speak figuratively, they fairly snorted over me, and said that I was a very bad man indeed, and my lawyer, a young man by the name of Thomas, looked as if he had done something wrong himself, and the result was that I had to do the principal part of the talking there. Price was reticent. He said that he had nothing to do with Walsh's affairs or Brady's affairs, and generally he assumed a lofty and magnificent air and declared that he would not testify. He was asked, "Mr. Price, don't you think you ought to give your testimony in this case?" He said, "No; I do not think so." He was then asked, "Do you remember these drafts?" "Yes," said he, "those are my drafts." "Did you ever give those drafts to Walsh?" I think he answered that he did not—either that, or he declined to answer. I asked the commissioner to certify to the court that Mr. Price had refused to answer, and let me bring the matter before the court in order to get a ruling as to whether or no he should answer.

Q. Did Price decline to answer, upon the ground that he could not do so without criminating himself?—A. He would not put it so squarely as that. It was, perhaps, substantially that; but Price seemed to be unwilling to do anything—anxious, seemingly, only to get away.

Q. Well, the upshot was that you did not get his testimony?—A. Oh, no; I did not get his testimony. The commissioner let him off.

Q. When was that?—A. I think that was after I testified before the third grand jury.

Q. Who was the commissioner?—A. Mr. Bradley.

Q. Have you made any effort to get Price's testimony since?—A. No. I don't know where he is.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. I thought you stated that you had a subpoena for him, and one for Kellogg, to appear in New York, and that they were served, but the service was not good?—A. No; that was Kellogg and Brady. I expected to get Mr. Price the other day, as I understood that he was to appear before this committee, but he went off. Mr. Price does not want to testify.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. He does not know anything of your transactions with Brady subsequent to those drafts?—A. No, sir; but he knows that he never gave me the $22,500 of his paper that I had. He knows that. Then, that being so, the question arises, "How did you come by it, Walsh? Were people giving you money?" Of course, there could be but one answer to that.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Your statement in regard to Brady would imply that they were taking it away, rather than giving it to you.—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Does Brady now deny that he took those notes?—A. I don't know. I think that perhaps he would deny it. He admits, however, that he owes me some money, but not so much as I claim. I have tried to get him to say how much he does owe me. Mr. Reed sent to my attorney in New York about it, as I have stated. My attorney thinks I am a fit subject for incarceration, because I have not taken my money, and I don't know but what he is right. He said to me, "You have played the devil now; you have returned from Montreal and gone on the witness stand, and now Reed says they'll be blowed if you ever get a cent. Brady is execution-proof, and you can go to the bow-wows." Reed said this in substance to my attorney, Judge Grandin, and he so wrote me, and he thinks I have been foolish.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. He thinks you have been foolish because you have been testifying?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. He thinks that you should have taken your money and kept your mouth shut?—A. Yes, sir. He says, "Walsh, the United States Government has acted in your case as I have never known it to act in the case of any Government witness before, and you are under no obligation to it at all." "Well," said I, "Judge, I owe something to myself. I can't help it. If I were to leave now, these men would all publish to the world that they had bought me, and that I was the worst scoundrel in the world." While the Government people were trying to find me to subpoena me Kellogg and these other men were going around claiming that I did not dare to come back, and that I had been bought. Indeed, I think the Government itself was impressed with that idea. That was one of the misfortunes of my position.

Q. Are there indictments pending against Brady?—A. I think there are.

Q. Have you been subpoenaed as a witness in any such case?—A. No, sir; I am not under subpoena now. The Government, I suppose, does not want to pay me $1.25 a day for an indefinite period. You see at $1.25 a day I have been inclined to give expression to Red-Republican ideas. The conservatism of $100 a day has not extended to me. At that rate a man can afford to be very conservative.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. I don't understand that last expression or yours about "Red-Republican ideas."

The WITNESS. I mean that I am, perhaps, rather inclined towards Socialism, Saint Simonism. [Laughter.]

Mr. FYAN. I asked you that question because of the intimation of your attorney, as you understood it, that you had now put yourself out of the way of getting any money by being ready to testify against these defendants.

The WITNESS. My attorney was not giving any opinion at all. He was simply repeating what Reed had stated to him.

Q. Since this recent action in the Kellogg case has Brady admitted that he owes you anything?—A. I have not been in New York for a month.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. You have not had any interview with Mr. Brady, directly or indirectly?—A. No.

Mr. FYAN. But Mr. Walsh has stated the substance of this communication which came from Brady's attorney to his (Walsh's) counsel in New York, and I am asking him whether that has occurred since the disposition of the Kellogg case by the court here.

The WITNESS. No; it has not. It has occurred, though, since I came from Canada. Mr. Grandin was referring to my coming from Canada here. He said that Mr. Reed considered that I was acting badly in coming back; that I should not have returned. Indeed, I would not have gone away but for the gate-way that Mr. Merrick was kind enough to leave open to me by saying that it was not Walsh they wanted, but the papers that he had in his possession. The Attorney-General, who has to take the responsibility, saw that that was a very unfortunate statement to be made by the counsel for the Government, and therefore he was unwilling to let the matter rest there. Hence the explanation made by the Attorney-General—hence the response from the President of the United States to my last letter—the first response that I have been able to draw from him.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Then, as I understand you, the reason why you did not accept any of these propositions to compromise Brady's indebtedness to you was that you understood that those proposed compromises were connected with a proposition that you were not to appear as a witness?—A. Oh, there's no doubt of that. The evidence of it is very clear, you see.

Q. I am asking you the question now.—A. Oh, clearly it was expected that I was not to appear. Of course, I could not take the money and then appear upon the stand against them. I could not do that. Kellogg says that I am "broke;" that I did have some means at one time, but that I have none now. Well, it is no fault of Brady's if I have any left.

Q. Is there anything further that you desire to say in regard to the testimony given here?—A. Yes. Mr. Bliss, on page 213, speaking of the Spofford-Kellogg testimony, says, "I do not mean to say that it was knowledge that they (the grand jurors) had not a right to have." The committee will remember that Mr. Hutchinson, the foreman of the grand jury, testified here on Friday that he asked Mr. Bliss whether it was a proper thing for them to have that volume of testimony in the grand jury-room, and that Mr. Bliss told him it was.

Mr. Bliss goes on to say:

For instance, while I was waiting in the ante-room to be allowed to go before the grand jury, somebody was sent out, and that person came back after a little while with a book. When I got into the room, I ascertained it to be a book from the Congressional Library, containing testimony in the contest with Kellogg regarding his seat. Some member of the grand jury knew that in that contest there was testimony given by Walsh.

You see Mr. Bliss testified that he knew generally about the book.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Let me ask you whether in fact your testimony in the Spofford-Kellogg case was contradictory to your testimony before that grand jury.—A. No, sir; it was not. I have brought with me here an extract from that part of the testimony which was evidently expected to distract and confuse the mind of any person on that jury who was willing to have his view distorted. I had noticed the book there with the foreman and passing from the foreman to Mr. Semken. I had had some notion, from outside reports which had reached me, that Kellogg had been giving out, not in print, but by word of mouth, that my testimony in the Kellogg-Spofford case was contradictory to what I was expected to testify to before the grand jury—that I had sworn to so and so, something quite different, before the committee which had investigated the Spofford-Kellogg case; and hence I was somewhat suspicious of those people, and when I got through testifying in the grand-jury room I addressed the foreman, who was seated with reference to me about where the stenographer is now: "Gentlemen, have you got through with me? Do you want to see any more papers?" They said, "Nothing more." I then said, "Would you be kind enough, Mr. Foreman, to let me have that?" and I reached for the book. The foreman put his hand on it. Mr. Willard jumped up and put his hand on it. I said, "What is the matter?" They said, "You have no business with that." I said pleasantly, "Don't you think that that which would instruct you would be of some benefit to me?" They said, "No; mind your own business, Mr. Walsh." Mr. Bliss was engaged in conversation with somebody, and I turned to him and said, "Mr. Bliss, will you be kind enough to get that book?" "What book is it?" said he. Said I, "My opinion is that it is the testimony in the Spofford-Kellogg case." You will remember, gentlemen, that Mr. Bliss said in his testimony here that he saw the book go into the jury room, but there he looked quite blank, quite surprised. Said he, "What has that to do with this case?" "Well," said I, "what is it doing in here, anyway?" Mr. Bliss turned to the foreman and said, "Mr. Hutchinson, will you be kind enough to let me look at that book?" The chairman handed him the book and he handed it to me and I opened it and found a place marked. Mr. Bliss sat there, looking around nervously, and asked, "What is it that you have found?" I said, "I have found this, Mr. Bliss; will you be kind enough to read this portion of the testimony?" This extract is from page 1022 of the record in the case of Spofford against Kellogg:

By Mr. MERRICK [attorney for Mr. Spofford]:

Q. Had you ever had any pecuniary transaction with Governor Kellogg?—A. No, sir.

Q. Officially or personally?—A. No, sir; I never had any transaction with Mr. Kellogg officially at all, and pecuniarily none at all except such as may have come in the matter of discounts; but I do not recollect it.

Q. That is what I asked, in the matter of discounts? I ask you if in business in New Orleans you were ever brought into contact with Governor Kellogg officially or as an individual?

That shows you what place was referred to in the examination. I have not copied my next answer here, but it was about this: "Officially," you will have to define what you mean by that. I never had anything to do with him officially, except perhaps to ask some friends of mine to be appointed to office. Pecuniarily, I had none. Mr. Kellogg was in the room during the examination. Mr. Merrick asked me: "Were your friends generally appointed?" I replied: "They were generally not appointed. Sometimes they might have been appointed. Mr. Kellogg indicated or intimated to me that they were done for me, but I never believed that. I thought they were done for politicians." Mr. Merrick said: "You are not a politician?" and I answered that I wa .

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you read that to the grand jury?—A. Mr. Bliss read it. When he got to that point I said: "That is enough, now, will you be kind enough to say how you understand that testimony?" Mr. Bliss said: "That is quite clear. You were examined and were testifying in relation to matters that had occurred in New Orleans." "Well," said I, "I hope that no gentleman here misunderstands that." Addressing myself to Mr. Hutchinson, he and the others nodded their heads. Mr. Hutchinson testified here the other day, as you will remember, that he did not understand that there was anything contradictory between my testimony on these two occasions; but it is my opinion that if I had not taken the dilemma by the horns the way I did, the statement would have gone to the world that the reason that grand jury did not believe me was that I had sworn differently in the Spofford-Kellogg case. The time when I testified in that case was the very heyday of our friendship, but I said at the time that it was disagreeable to me to appear as a witness, and that except for being a Republican and in sympathy with Mr. Kellogg, I had no desire at all to mix in the political quarrel; but he compelled me to appear. I happened to have had a suite of rooms adjoining his at Willard's, and a man named Barney Williams swore that on a certain night Mr. Kellogg had brought a certain number of members of the legislature of Louisiana there and, in the presence of Williams, had paid each of them $500. Williams swore to this transaction and fixed the time. Mr. Kellogg's rooms adjoined mine and the communicating doors were generally open and Mr. Kellogg insisted upon my coming before the committee to testify that on that night, to the best of my knowledge and belief, no such thing had occurred—and no such thing had occurred, and I so testified.

Q. Then you appeared in that case as a witness in behalf of Kellogg?—

A. Yes, sir; I appeared as a witness, greatly against my desire, as I stated at the time, because I did not conceive that I had anything to do with his political fights.

Q. And the matter in controversy in that part of the case was whether such payments had been made?—A. Yes, sir; whether this Barney Williams, at the time and place named, did see Kellogg pay $500 or some other amount of money, to each of several members of the legislature.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. What do you say your testimony was?—A. That he never did any such thing.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. When you were asked in that inquiry whether you had had any pecuniary transactions with Kellogg, had this Price transaction occurred?—A. I cannot tell you; but the record will show.

Q. I understand that when you made the answer which you did make in that examination you understood the question as referring to pecuniary transactions occurring in New Orleans?—A. Clearly so. I had not and I have not the slightest recollection of any such transaction in New Orleans. Mr. Kellogg has borrowed money from me here, but I do not recall any instance in which he did so in New Orleans.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. When was Kellogg elected Senator?—At the same time that Hayes was elected—1876.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. The object of introducing this Spofford-Kellogg testimony into the grand-jury room was to show that you were contradicting it before that grand jury when you stated that this transaction with Price had taken place?—A. Yes, sir; that is what they were driving at. But you ask me the further question whether I can recall now any pecuniary transaction with Mr. Kellogg in New Orleans, and I say I cannot.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Were you a broker in New Orleans?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When did you break up your office there and come here?—A. I think it was perhaps in 1876 or 1877.

Q. And all the transactions you have testified about occurred here?—A. They occurred here.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. I suppose you understand and intend to convey the idea here that that Kellogg-Spofford testimony was introduced into the grand-jury room for the purpose of leading the jury to believe that although you there testified against Kellogg as to these pecuniary transactions you had testified differently before the Spofford-Kellogg committee?—A. Yes, sir. You see I was asked about "pecuniary transactions." Of course I might have had pecuniary transactions with him which might have been perfectly legitimate, but if he could have shown that I had had any before that time there would have been a contradiction.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Is there any other point on which you would wish to make any remark?—A. Yes; I want to say a few words further on this point. Mr. Bliss goes on to say:

At the same time I beg to remark that the book was not there by any instigation of mine, and I would have been sorry to have had that question to meet on a motion to quash.

You will recall that Mr. Hutchinson testified here that he had consulted Mr. Bliss as to the propriety of having that book in the grand-jury room, and that Mr. Bliss approved of it.

Mr. Walsh had testified before the Congressional committee, in a sort of general way, that he had never had any dealings with Kellogg, or something of that sort. Of course this question of his drafts there seemed, in a measure, to be inconsistent with that theory, and, therefore, I took the book and questioned Mr. Walsh about it right there.

He never took the book voluntarily; I had to make him take it. He never questioned me about it; I questioned him.

Again, Mr. Bliss testifies as follows:

Q. What member of the jury was that?—A. Somebody was sent out for the book; the attendant went, I believe. I always believed, without knowing the fact, that the party went to the district attorney's office, and the district attorney sent up to the Congressional library and got it.

You see he is very vague. He does not wish to assume any responsibility, but I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that Mr. Hutchinson, the foreman of that grand jury, in his testimony here puts the responsibility upon Mr. Bliss.

Mr. Bliss speaks in his testimony about Mr. Corkhill. I do not want to say anything derogatory to Mr. Corkhill. As I said before, he is a pleasant gentleman, but I would like to state in this connection that Mr. Bliss volunteered to me, I think as early as the first interview that I had with him, the statement that Mr. Corkhill was to be removed the next day. "Indeed," said he, "MacVeagh is waiting for me now down stairs with a carriage. I am going to see President Arthur, and Mr. Corkhill's successor will be appointed to-morrow. Mr. Corkhill is a man whom the Government cannot repose any confidence in, and they must not have him there."

Again, in his testimony, page 222, Mr. Bliss says something about route 40101 not being a good case for the Government to take up, for the reason that it depended wholly upon my testimony. I have already stated that there were three other witnesses in that case besides myself—McDonough, Hinds, and U. E. Fisher. Hinds had made an affidavit setting forth what he knew about the case, and I understand that Fisher also had made an affidavit.

Q. That case was embraced in the information filed, the first proceeding had?—A. Yes, sir; route 40101 was the basis of the information.

On page 223 Mr. Bliss was asked the question:

Q. Do you know whether that claim of Walsh's for the extra month's pay has ever been paid?—A. No, sir; it has never been paid; it is in litigation in the Court of Claims, and from what I learn of the evidence I apprehend that it never will be paid.

Q. Did Walsh demand that pay in consideration of testifying before the grand jury?—A. I cannot say as to that. I had nothing to do with it. I know that he did time and again insist upon it to me that he should have that pay, and that that matter should be arranged before he went further; but all that was later, at a time when I was settling the Prescott and Santa Fé case.

Now, of course, here is the objective point in this, and it is a material point. He says, "I knew nothing about it," and he expresses the opinion that it should not be paid. I had spoken to Mr. Bliss about it. I had said to him, "If you have the leisure, Mr. Bliss, I would be very much obliged to you if, in justice to me, you would look into the merits of my claim for the one month's extra pay, and if you find there is any merit in it, I would like very much to have you say that it ought to be paid." He said he would look into it. I don't know whether he did so or not. I spoke to him once again about it, and I saw that he had not looked into it up to that time, and I concluded that he would not. After I came here and testified before the second grand jury, a long time subsequent to this conversation with Mr. Bliss, I was approached by Mr. P. H. Woodward, of the Post-Office Department, who called to see me at Wormley's, and stated that Mr. Bliss had said to him that he had examined this claim for the one month's pay, and believed that I was entitled to it in law and justice, and that he, Bliss, would see that it was paid. That was on his own motion, in response to no request of mine at that time. I had long before given up the idea that Mr. Bliss was going to do anything about the matter. However, I told Mr. Woodward that I was very much obliged to him. In the mean time I had filed a suit against the Government in the Court of Claims, and at the time Mr. Bliss sent me this word my claim was pending before the court in that suit. After I testified before the traverse jury, and about the time I was thinking of leaving here, I met Mr. Bliss; I said to him, "I am very much obliged to you for having looked into that claim, and said that it ought to be paid. Don't you think the time to pay it has about arrived?" "Well," said he, "Walsh, I do not think it would be wise to pay you now, until the verdict is had in this case." Said I, "I can't see why not." "Well," said he, "I think you will on reflection."

When the case reached a verdict—that extraordinary verdict which was rendered by the first traverse jury—I again spoke to Mr. Bliss about the claim and he said he would see about it—that he would "see about it." I thought then that perhaps he had changed his opinion as to the payment of it. However, I went off. When I next met Mr. Woodward he said, "Walsh, I feel very much embarrassed at meeting you." I said, "What about, Woodward?" "Well," said he, "the lack of faith towards you." "In what way," said I. Said he, "I have reference to that extra month's pay." I said, "Why does that weigh on your mind, Woodward? That is Mr. Bliss's responsibility." "Well," said Woodward, "he spoke about it and sent me to you to tell you that he had looked into the matter and that it ought to be paid, and the other day when I asked him about it he said to me, 'Mr. Woodward, I am not sitting up o' nights looking after Walsh's interests just now. He has seen fit to go into print and to abuse me in the most outrageous manner, and if he ever gets his pay it will be through some other means.'" I merely mention this in connection with Mr. Bliss's statement that he knew nothing about that claim of mine. You can of course examine Mr. Woodward on this point, and I hope he will corroborate me.

Now, I will call your attention to a portion of Mr. Bliss's testimony, which will show you the pertinency of the statement I have made here in relation to offers of payment that I have received. On page 224 I find the following:

MR. MILLIKEN. If you have already testified on that point in my absence you need not go over it again.

THE WITNESS. I have stated the reasons why the Dorsey case was the best case to begin with. As to this other case I think there can be no question that Mr. Walsh did at that time make assertions which implied corruption on the part of Mr. Brady, but I regarded Walsh's statements as certain to be contradicted by Brady; and then when you came to the circumstances of the case my idea was that the record evidence as to that route was not so strong as the evidence in regard to other routes which we were investigating, and I regarded Mr. Walsh as in this position—that if the transaction was truthfully stated by him, and if Mr. Brady thought that he was in danger from Walsh's testimony, the probability was that if we took up that case Walsh would take a trip somewhere before we got to the trial, and we would be left without any evidence. In other words, that he would collect from Mr. Brady the twelve or fourteen thousand dollars that he was claiming of the Government, or perhaps more, and would disappear. We would be resting in that case entirely upon a single thread, the testimony of Walsh, and for these reasons I did not think that a proper case to put ahead.

In the light of events Mr. Bliss does not appear to much advantage as a prophet, because "Walsh" has not disappeared, but has been here, to Bliss's great pain and sorrow, and will continue to be here. On page 230 Mr. Bliss, defending himself for having selected the weakest case and accounting for the verdict in the Brady-Dorsey case, says:

But by taking this variegation of frauds we got the benefit of that, and we got the benefit also of Walsh's testimony as to the transactions which had been alleged in the Prescott and Santa Fé route, but the jury did not believe Mr. Walsh, either.

Now, gentlemen, it never was any part of Mr. Bliss's plan to have me appear as a witness in the Dorsey-Brady case. In that case I was never considered as a witness at all, and I was called as a witness at last simply because when the case as he had made it up and had gone into court with it, was about to be dismissed, Mr. Merrick accidentally discovered the nature of the testimony that I had given before the grand jury and came to the conclusion that I was the witness that could save the case.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Were you before the grand jury in the Brady-Dorsey case at all?—

A. No, sir; I knew nothing about it. The evidence that I gave before the first grand jury Mr. Bliss suppressed from Mr. Merrick, so that, as I have already stated, Mr. Merrick had no knowledge of it until it came to his ears in the most accidental manner.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. How do you know that?—A. Mr. Merrick told me.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Were you subpoenaed to appear before the petit jury?—A. No; I think I was subpoenaed to appear before the second grand jury, and when I arrived here I was served with a subpoena to appear before the traverse jury.

Q. Were you subpoenaed before you saw Mr. Merrick?—A. No, sir.

Q. You have stated that the case was in extremis when Mr. Merrick found out what you had testified to before the grand jury; now, I want to know whether you were subpoenaed as a witness in that case before the petit jury before Mr. Merrick found that out?—A. No, sir. I think I was subpoenaed to appear before the grand jury. I came over here to see my attorney, Mr. Hine. Mr. Merrick sent Mr. Woodward to me at the Arlington to ask me to call upon him, Merrick. I declined to do so, saying that I did not know him, and had no reason for calling upon him. Mr. Woodward then said, "Will you receive Mr. Merrick?" I said I would, and Mr. Merrick called. To the best of my recollection I was not under subpoena at all at that time.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. And, at the request of Mr. Merrick, you appeared as a witness?—

A. No, sir; I would not appear at his request. I told him that the weakest case had been selected, that the case was in extremis, and that by appearing as a witness I could not save it; and I told him it was not fair to ask me to appear as a witness in that case.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. With what object do you think Mr. Bliss selected the weakest case?—A. I set forth my views on that point in my first letter to the President, and if you will allow me, I will refer to that letter and read it.

Q. You can answer the question without reading that letter.—A. Well, I think I said that, in my opinion, he selected that case because he thought he could gain political capital thereby; he could pose as a prosecutor of the secretary of the national committee of the Republican party, thereby securing considerable éclat; while at the same time he knew that the case could not be sustained; that an acquittal was inevitable, and he believed that that would result to Mr. Bliss's credit.

Q. Do you mean to give the impression here that Mr. Bliss was in sympathy with the defense in those cases?—A. Well, is it fair for me to answer that question? You are asking a man whose convictions you know are pretty strong upon that point.

Q. It is fair if you wish to answer it. I shall not press you for an answer if you decline to give it.—A. Oh, I do not decline. I have not come here to decline anything. But at the same time I wish to deal fairly with everybody. My opinion of Mr. Bliss is on record, but I have no objection to stating it again. I have been putting it on record for a long time, and I am willing to put it on record once more. I have no sort of doubt that Mr. Bliss was in sympathy with the defendants from the beginning; and I think that therein he has done the President great injustice, because he has been held out as the President's intimate personal friend; he has paraded himself as such, and has made people believe that.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Is there any further comment that you desire to make upon Mr. Bliss's testimony?—A. Mr. Bliss made a reference to me in connection with his account of how they looked for me, which is calculated to make an unfavorable impression. He says that a lady aided them in discovering me. I would like to state, in relation to that matter, that I was subpœnaed three times for the Government. The first time the subpœna was served on me by a deputy marshal in New York. I had heard of him going to several offices in a mysterious manner looking for me, and I think he finally went to Judge Grandin's office, and said he was looking for me. Judge Grandin told me of it, and said, "What do you think you had better do?" Said I, "If he comes here with a subpœna, tell him to leave it here for me; I will answer the subpœna." However, he did not do that, and being up in the vicinity of the City Hall next day, I went into the marshal's office and said, "Is there a subpœna here for me? I understand that somebody has been looking for me very anxiously." They said "Yes; do you acknowledge the service?"

The second time I was served by Mr. Newcomb, in the office of Judge Grandin. Mr. Newcomb came in and said, "Is this Mr. Walsh?" I said, "Yes." "Here is a subpœna for you" said he, and I received it.

The third time was while I was corresponding with Mr. Merrick, and when I declined to appear before the grand jury with Mr. George Bliss as the representative of the Government. I had been talking to some acquaintance on Broadway, quite close to the corner of Broadway and Wall street, and when we got through I walked down to the Battery, and there got on an elevated train. The gentleman who served the subpoena told me afterwards that he had followed me all the way up, and when we got to one of the up-town stations he procured some ink and filled in the date and served the subpoena.

Now, I do not see wherein a lady could have aided Mr. Bliss or his assistants in any of these cases.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. I suppose if she was really a lady there could not be any objection to the remark. I do not see how that would cast any imputation upon you?—A. In this way: The statement was that the "lady" was taken out sleigh riding by some person who wanted to find me to serve a subpoena upon me. Now, process-servers are not persons of a class with whom ladies usually go out sleigh riding. I know of no lady acquaintance of mine who would go out sleigh riding with a process-server.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Some of the men who serve court processes are very respectable gentlemen.

The WITNESS. Undoubtedly they are in the rural districts; but process-servers in cities, and especially in the city of New York, and more especially the class of persons that Mr. Bliss would probably select for that business, would not be likely to be such as a lady would go out sleigh riding with. However, the material point, perhaps, is that the Government had to pay for a sleigh ride for somebody.

On page 301, Mr. Bliss, speaking of the grand jury, says:

After that Mr. Walsh was put before the grand jury (I do not remember the time exactly), and gave evidence and produced certain papers. [That grand jury was in June, 1882, to the best of my recollection.] As the result of that at that time before that grand jury, as I recollect it, the only mention of Mr. Kellogg's name that was made was in connection with the production of these papers. We were going for Brady and Price. Certainly, when I went into the grand-jury room I had no idea that there was any question about Mr. Kellogg in the case. In the course of that meeting some of the jurors asked Walsh about certain papers, and as to where he had got them—the Price drafts, I think—and he said that Mr. Kellogg had brought them to him. I confess that the mention of Mr. Kellogg's name at that time did not convey to my mind the idea of Senator Kellogg.

That, of course, is unqualifiedly untrue. He knew perfectly well whom I had referred to. The best evidence that he did know who it was, and that he must have known, is found in Attorney-General MacVeagh's testimony, on pages 26 and 27, where he says that he knew of Mr. Kellogg's relation to the cases before the death of President Garfield. It is not possible, I think, that Mr. MacVeagh could have had knowledge of it and Mr. Bliss have remained in ignorance of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Gibson also testified that he informed Mr. Bliss of it.

The WITNESS. I did not know that. Mr. Bliss does all he can to prejudice me in the minds of this committee.

On page 302 he goes on to say:

He was pressed a good deal by the defense in that case, they claiming that his whole evidence was untrue. He said that this difference of dates arose from a mistake of his lawyers. Then he had commenced attachment proceedings in New York, and the same error was found there; and finally he said that he did not tell his lawyer any more than he thought it was necessary to tell him—that that was not his way. He made this statement to the grand jury.

Mr. Bliss, you see, was trying to discredit me even before this committee. I presume that he felt that he was paid to do that. Now, in relation to the matter of the discrepancy between the bill of particulars filed here and the bill filed in New York, I call your attention to the testimony in the first star-route trial, page 1777, where I produced a letter which I had received from my attorney in Washington, Mr. Hine, on which I based my attachment proceedings in New York. I had written to my attorney here to send me a copy of the bill of particulars as filed here. He sent me this one [producing a paper]. I produced this in court. I had stated on the day previous, in court, that the error had been committed by Mr. Hine's son. It was a clerical error, and I was as much surprised at it as anybody. Among my papers in New York I have Mr. Hine's letter inclosing me the copy of the bill of particulars, and on the Monday following I brought it into court. This Mr. Bliss carefully refrains from alluding to.

Here is the bill of particulars which was sent me by Mr. Hine :

I will pass over some passages in Mr. Bliss's testimony that I had marked for comment.

On page 304 he says :

Mr. Walsh has since so conducted himself that Judge Wylie did not hesitate in court last fall to express the opinion that he did not suppose the Government cared anything for the testimony of such a witness, and that all they could want from him was his papers. In a bearing the other day in court that was reiterated substantially by Judge Wylie, and Mr. Merrick, representing the Government, substantially the same view, saying that he wanted Walsh, not for his testimony, but for the papers, and he referred to Walsh as possibly writing from a lunatic asylum, or something of that sort.

Well, I have dealt with that. I don't think the court ever said any such thing; but even if the court did say it, the court is not infallible, and the court has evidently made as great a mistake in that as Mr. Bliss has made, and as Mr. Merrick made when he said that they did not want me, but my papers. The Attorney-General, who I think is quite a good lawyer, took a different view, you know, and said that they wanted me as well as the papers.

Mr. Bliss says further :

Those papers I have never seen. I think there was an error committed in the case, and I do not think I should have committed it. When Walsh produced those papers before the grand jury I should have impounded them.

You will understand that Mr. Bliss is here insisting that Mr. Ker ought to have "impounded" those papers. Now, Mr. Bliss himself did not impound them. Those papers were before him when I appeared before the second grand jury; they were before him in the first grand-jury room also, if he had chosen to look at them, and he did ask me for some of them, and I left them with him, as this letter will indicate.

NEW YORK, June 22, 1881.

GEO. BLISS, Esq.,
Assistant U. S. Attorney, Washington, D. C.:

MY DEAR SIR: Oblige me by returning the letters, &c., that I left with you when last in Washington. Deeming it possible that you will be here Saturday, I would suggest that if you will bring them with you I will call at your office for them, as I dislike trusting them to the mail.

Yours respectfully,

J. A. WALSH.

In response to that letter Mr. Bliss gave me my papers. So you see that when he had the papers he did not impound them any more than Mr. Ker did. Of course, there was no occasion at all to do it, because I was acting in perfect good faith, but if Mr. Bliss thought there was occasion you see he did not do any more impounding than Mr. Ker did, and it was not fair for him to cast any such reflection upon Mr. Ker.

Again, referring to the difficulty of finding me, Mr. Bliss says:

He has always been very troublesome to find. Mr. Merrick went to see Mr. Grandin, and finally told him that he wanted to see Walsh, and Grandin said he would try to arrange an interview. Mr. Merrick then came to my office, and we talked over the whole business of Walsh. I said, "Look here, Walsh's trouble is me; now let me stand aside; I will go out of the case in any form you wish; you may give him any assurance you desire that I am entirely out of the case. I will submit to anything, except public degradation in connection with the matter."

Now, the trouble was that Mr. Merrick could not give me any such assurance, because Mr. Merrick did not seem to be able to keep his promises. My attorney communicated to me the information that Mr. Bliss would no longer appear in the case, but there had been so many assurances given me already, and none observed—Punic faith all the time—that I concluded to take no more assurances, and I never did take any assurance that Mr. Bliss was out of the cases until the Attorney-General sent me word to that effect at Montreal through Mr. Brewster Cameron. I didn't even take the press reports.

There is another passage in Mr. Bliss's testimony in which he refers to me in connection with the matter of money, on accounts which I presented for a large amount—an amount so large that it would be liable to disturb the Treasury balance—so Mr. Bliss was unwilling to have it paid.

On page 308 he gives this testimony:

He said in substance, "My contract was not taken away through any fault of mine; it was taken away because of the wrongful action of the officers of the Government, and therefore I am entitled to this month's extra pay." That was the plausible way in which the claim was put in the Court of Claims. All that was ever said to me on that subject—I will not say that it was said to him, but I have understood it was said—was that the Government would facilitate getting a decision on the subject. Mr. Walsh made various claims, and demanded various payments. For instance, I have got here a letter of his dated New York, October 26, 1882, in which he says:

G. BLISS, Esq.,
Special Counsel Star-Route Cases, New York:

MY DEAR SIR: You will oblige me by directing payment to me of the $350 for which I submitted to you a voucher in Washington.

This is what he calls the voucher:

United States to John H. Walsh, Dr.

To services rendered in star-route cases..... $350

Q. Did you pay that?—A. No, sir.

Q. What is the service for which that bill is made?—A. I have not the remotest idea. I think the claim was for being in Washington here.

Q. It is not paid yet?—A. No, sir.

H. Mis. 38, pt. 2—33*

You will remark that Mr. Bliss here says that he hasn't the remotest idea what that account was for. Now, I will tell you what it was for. After I had testified before the traverse jury in the first Brady-Dorsey case and had been discharged I was about to leave Washington, when Mr. Merrick called upon me at Wormley's, where I was stopping, and said, "Mr. Walsh, when are you going?" I said, "I think I shall go to-night or to-morrow morning. It is very warm here, and I am tired and very badly disgusted, and I want to get away as quickly as I can. You have had me under subpoena a long time." Mr. Merrick said, "Now, Walsh, you do not want to go away; I wish you would not go; it is particularly desirable in the interest of the Government that you should not go. I want to talk to you in reference to certain persons that are going on the stand in behalf of the defendant, for I cannot cross-examine them intelligently without having somebody to talk to. Stay here, and whatever your charge is it will be paid you." I demurred. Mr. Merrick said, "They are going to bring other witnesses on the stand to contradict you, and really you ought to stay here." He put the case very forcibly and I did remain, and when I got ready to go away, or perhaps later, I rendered this bill to Mr. Bliss, saying, "Here is a bill which I think the Government owes me; I have put the amount at $350. If it is not enough increase it; if it is too much cut it down." I had no idea at that time that the lawyers were getting such enormous fees. Mr. Bliss said, "It is enough." I said, "Will you pay it?" "Oh, yes," said he, "it will be paid." "All right," said I. Mr. Bliss said it would be paid, but he did not say when. I let the matter drop for the time, but two months afterwards, on October 26, as you will see by that letter, not receiving a check for the amount, I dropped Mr. Bliss a line about it. I never heard anything further from him on the subject. He never answered my note. I came over here under subpoena to go before the second traverse jury and before the third grand jury, and Mr. Woodward said, "Mr. Walsh, I have just learned with the greatest surprise that you have not been paid that $350." "Oh," said I, "are you really surprised at that, Mr. Woodward?" He said, "Yes, I am astonished." "Oh, well," said I, "I suppose the Treasury reserves will be disturbed by any such payment as that; I do not think the Treasury is in a condition now to meet such an enormous claim." Mr. Woodward said, "That is facetious; but Mr. Bliss is paid very largely and he is paid largely for the purpose of paying just such bills as that." "Well," said I, "Mr. Woodward, I don't care what Mr. Bliss is paid for or what he is not paid for; Mr. Bliss shall not pay me that fee; I shall be paid that by a check on the Treasury or not at all. Mr. Bliss can pocket his own fees, but I am no appendage of Mr. George Bliss or anybody else." "Why do you take that view of it?" said Woodward. I told him that I took that view out of regard to my own dignity and self-respect. I said to him, "You don't think that I am taking money from Mr. George Bliss, do you, for my services? What I receive I shall receive from the United States." "Well," said Woodward, "Bliss doesn't seem to want to pay you at all." "Well," said I, "he can't pay me in that way." I happened in Mr. Merrick's office on one occasion and he said, "Walsh, I feel very badly about that $350 not being paid you." "Well," said I, "I feel badly too, but what are you going to do about it?" Said he, "I have talked with Mr. Bliss about it; I learn with surprise from Mr. Woodward that you had not been paid and you certainly ought to be paid. I said, 'I think so, and I am ready to receive the money.'" Said Mr. Merrick, "I told Mr. Bliss that we ought to pay that; that each of us ought to contribute to its payment, but Mr. Bliss says that he does not consider that he ought to contribute anything; he considers that the Government owes you that money and the Government should pay it."

I said, "Mr. Bliss is singularly correct about that. The Government does owe it, or else nobody owes it." Mr. Merrick said, "No; I think we ought to pay that." Said I, "No, Mr. Merrick; Mr. Bliss is right about that. I do not agree with you." Said he, "And if you say so I will give you my check for my share of it." I said "No, sir; keep your money; reserve it for charitable purposes; the United States owes me that money and when it is ready to pay the money I will receive it, and if the United States does not pay me I will sue it." Said he, "I think you are wrong;" but I insisted that I thought I was right. Now, you will see from that whether Mr. Bliss knew anything about this claim or not. The money remains unpaid to this day. When I came here and read this statement of Mr. Bliss putting me in this attitude with reference to this matter, I went to Mr. Merrick and said, "I have learned with surprise that Mr. Bliss in his testimony has made a reference to that $350." Said he, "I have not read his testimony." Said I, "You ought to read it, for many reasons." I think he ought, too. I called his attention to this statement made by Bliss, and he looked at it and said, "That is bad. That is bad." "Now," said I, "Mr. Merrick, the time has come when that ought to be paid. Its payment will be the most complete refutation of Mr. Bliss's statement," and I added, "Here is the bill; will you approve it?" Mr. Merrick took the bill cautiously, as if it were dynamite, and said, "Yes, that bill ought to be paid." Said I, "Yes, I think it ought; it has been due now pretty nearly two years." "Well," said he, "that is all right, Walsh;" handing me back the bill. Just at that moment Mr. Woodward came into the office and his coming seem to be a source of relief to Mr. Merrick. He turned to Woodward and said, "Woodward, you know about that bill of Walsh's?" Mr. Woodward said, "Yes; that bill ought to be paid; it ought to be paid now." Mr. Woodward, you see, not being a great man, knew that it ought to be paid at once. [Laughter.] I said, "Will you approve the bill, Mr. Merrick?" Said he, "I would rather not, Walsh; I would rather not; but there is no doubt the bill will be paid." I said, "It is not the money I care about particularly, but does it not occur to you that in justice to me there ought to be something done about it?" Well, Mr. Merrick did not approve the bill. I went up to see Mr. Cameron, at the Department of Justice and asked him what was necessary in order that the bill might be paid. He said that Mr. Merrick's approval would be all that would be required. I then wrote Mr. Merrick the following letter:

WASHINGTON, May 7, 1884.

Hon. R. T. MERRICK, Wash'n:

MY DEAR SIR: I have seen Mr. Brewster Cameron since seeing you yesterday in relation to the matter of the Government's indebtedness to me for services rendered as per account shown you by me yesterday, which voucher you will please find inclosed. As Mr. Geo. Bliss has referred to the matter in his testimony before the Springer committee (p. 308), I think it is due me that I should now be paid. Mr. Cameron informs me that all that is necessary to secure payment of the said account is your approval. In justice to me, I beg that you give the voucher your approval, and oblige, yours respectfully.

J. A. WALSH.

I have never received an answer to that. I suppose I shall have to litigate for my money.

In reading over the testimony of Mr. Bliss, I find the most glaring inconsistencies in different parts of it, and if Mr. Milliken has no objection I will rapidly recite some of them.

Mr. MILLIKEN. You may recite them all so far as I am concerned.

The WITNESS. On page 191 Mr. Bliss lauds Price as a man from whom valuable testimony was to be obtained. He says that his, Bliss's, theory was to prosecute the officers of the Government and give immunity to contractors, and so on.

On page 210 Mr. Bliss expresses himself as being opposed to granting immunity to Price for the purpose of indicting Kellogg.

On page 241 he says, "I differed with my brethren (about Price), and while Price's testimony might be morally convincing, it would not secure the conviction of Kellogg.

Again Mr. Bliss says, the money did not go to Brady; that is, Price would so swear, yet Kellogg, who according to him did get the money, was not indicted, and Brady who did not get it, was indicted.

On page 212 Mr. Bliss says his impression was that Brady did not get any of the money in the case of the Corpus Christi route, the orders having been obtained by political influence. Then, if Brady did not get any of the money, why was he indicted in that case?

On page 303 Mr. Bliss again says that he was opposed to giving immunity to Price. On the same page, farther down, when he heard of the production of the additional papers and what was in them, he says, "I stated to the Attorney-General, &c., &c., it was proper to let go of Price and proceed against Kellogg, and have not changed my mind or view on that subject."

Now, let us see whether he changed his mind. On page 304 he says, "The Kellogg case was one that the Government ought to proceed with." In an interview in the New York Herald of May 2, 1884, Mr. Bliss says:

It is a well-known fact that I did not favor the indictment of Kellogg. My reason for not doing so was that in the effort to convict Kellogg we would have to promise immunity to Price, and I did not think we should do that.

In reference to the Kerens case you will find the same. Mr. Bliss, in making his apology to me in the ante-room of the grand jury, told me that Mr. Kellogg had admitted his guilt to him, Bliss. He also told the same thing to Mr. Merrick and Mr. Ker. In an interview published in the New York Tribune June 16, 1883, Bliss said:

There are some strong elements in the case against Brady and Kellogg, but I have always thought that when that case came up for trial some of the best testimony would have been spirited away.

Mr. Bliss was there referring to me. I have also heard that he suggested to Mr. Merrick, during the first star-route trial, that the case against Dorsey should be dismissed, and that the suggestion excited considerable feeling on the part of Mr. Merrick. I have been told by a newspaper man that Mr. Merrick told him that Secretary Chandler had called upon him, Merrick, and asked that he should desist from his prosecution of Kellogg.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Who is that newspaper man?—A. Mr. Nelson.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You have said that Mr. S. B. Elkins came to you early in these transactions, which you have detailed here, and desired you to pay Mr. Hinds a certain amount of money?—A. Yes.

Q. Will you explain what interest Mr. Elkins claimed to have in the matter?—A. Mr. Elkins did not claim to have any particular interest.

Q. Whom did he represent?—A. Oh, he said that he came in the interest of Brady. He said, "I am a friend of Brady's, Mr. Walsh, and I would like to see things go along amicably and peaceably. Congress is in session, and, in a resolution of two lines, or not to exceed four, perhaps, they may abolish all this expedition, and then where will you get your money from? You certainly won't get your money that way. Now hadn't you better placate this man?" I said, "Mr. Elkins, I cannot look at the matter in that way. The proposition is such a monstrous one that I should pay a large sum of money to a man whose firm owes me a great deal of money already." "Oh," said he, "that is not the way to view it. Divest yourself of that view, Mr. Walsh." "Well," said I, "I won't pay the money." "Well, then," said he, "there will be trouble."

Q. Was Mr. Elkins interested in any of the contracts?—A. Not so far as I know.

Q. Did he state that he had any interest in them other than your interest or the public interest, or Brady's interest? Whom did he say that he represented?—A. Oh, he was speaking generally. Contractor Kerens was generally supposed to be friendly with Mr. Elkins, but Elkins did not say that he had any particular interest in the matter.

Q. He came to you as a friend of Brady?—A. Yes; he came as a friend of Brady, and also in the general interest of all parties having those contracts, feeling that it would be very unfortunate to have any conflict arise at that time lest Congress should rescind the whole matter. He suggested that that might be done in a very short resolution not to exceed three or four lines, and that then I wouldn't get my money. I replied, "Really, Mr. Elkins, I cannot take that view of it." "Well," said he, "I am sorry." I said, "I am sorry too, but I cannot do it." I had no previous acquaintance with Mr. Elkins; he merely knew me by sight and I knew him by sight. That was all.

Adjourned.

WASHINGTON, June 5, 1884.

The committee met at 10 a. m. The chairman called attention to the necessity for a decision of the pending question as to the admission of the letters offered by the witness, John A. Walsh, as a part of his testimony. After examining the letters, the committee decided to admit the letters, which are as follows:

MR. WALSH TO MR. MERRICK.

NEW YORK, November 6, 1882.

Hon. R. T. MERRICK,
Special Counsel, &c., Washington, D. C.:

SIR: As special counsel for the Government, I call your attention to the following extracts from a letter written by Mr. F. H. Fall July 12th, '82, he being at that time in the employ of the United States, addressed to Brewster Cameron, special agent of the Department of Justice: "1. The grand jury has, as I have intimated, gone back on the Government and found no indictment." "2. It means that Brady, Kellogg & Co. have fixed some of them, as indicated through the information I have received from Lemar," &c.

I find the above printed in the N. Y. Times of even date. The grand jury referred to in this communication is the same body that is now travestying justice in the District of Columbia, and the same that failed to find indictments on the oral and documentary evidence submitted by me to them, thus by their action endeavoring to stamp me as a witness unworthy of belief. If the language used by Mr. Falls in this letter means anything at all, it implies that this officer of the Government had some evidence—perhaps had submitted the same to the Department of Justice—going to show that the grand jury had been tampered with, &c. As I have insisted on an investigation of this grand jury, as is evidenced by my letter to Hon. Benjamin Harris Brewster, of 3d inst., I regard the statement of Falls as very pertinent, and if properly inquired into calculated to aid in the discovery of the methods and the names of the persons that engaged in the conspiracy to thwart the ends of justice.

As the examination of Falls may begin to-day, or in the near future, will you direct or suggest to the gentlemen engaged in the prosecution that Falls be examined as to that part of his letter to Brewster Cameron hereinbefore quoted? I address you this communication for the reason that I understand this matter of the prosecution of the bribery cases is under your control and direction.

Respectfully,

J. A. WALSH.

P. S. Who is the Lemar that is referred to by Falls?

WALSH.

¶ (Indorsed :) Letter to Hon. R. T. Merrick, dated Nov. 6th, '82, to which I received no response.

NOTE.—(Not contained in the original, however.) The Lemar referred to by Fall in his letter was a member of the (in) famous grand jury "composed of citizens of eminent respectability."

MR. MERRICK TO MR. WALSH.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, December 16, 1882.

MY DEAR WALSH: I have been much disappointed not to have seen you here before this date.

I am now ready to vindicate you and to maintain by confirmatory proof the truth of your statement in court.

Your presence is required on Tuesday before the grand jury, which is, by the way, composed of men of high standing and intelligence. I have requested Mr. Bliss to have a subpœna sent on for in New York, that your expenses, &c., might be paid.

Truly yours,

R. T. MERRICK.

(Indorsed :) Letter from R. T. Merrick. Dec. 16, '82. Answered by me Dec. 19, '82.

MR. WALSH TO MR. MERRICK.

NEW YORK, December 19, 1882.

Hon. R. T. MERRICK,
Washington, D. C.:

MY D'R SIR: Yours of 16th inst. at hand and contents noted. To be frank with you, I scarcely know what you mean when you say that you are "ready to vindicate me," &c., &c. Has it reached a point, even in your mind, when I am in need of vindication "by confirmatory proof"? I do not think so, but if I felt that I needed vindication I know of no one to whom I would rather intrust it than yourself.

The only vindication that is needed, from my stand-point, is the vindication due justice and common decency by prosecuting the conspirators on the late grand jury, and especially by the prosecution of that member of the late grand jury who brought into the jury room, in violation of the statutes, the Kellogg-Spofford testimony.

You have the evidence in your possession going to show how cruelly I have been libelled by Buell, Gorham, Dickson, and Helm; consequently do not need my presence to prove it, as documentary evidence thereof is in existence, and, as I said before, in your possession.

You say "Your (my) presence is required on Tuesday before the grand jury," &c. I do not know what for, as it seems to me that the prosecution ought to have the witnesses in the cases against Salisbury, Parker, Kerens, Elkins, Sanderson, Patrick, Brown, Andrews, and Colegrove before the grand jury. It cannot be possible that the Government has not summoned witnesses on these cases! Or can it be that the resolution to proceed against these men was adopted so late in the day that the witnesses have not had time to reach Washington? Of course, I know you cannot answer these queries, for the reason that you take charge of the cases only "after indictments are found," but they naturally present themselves to me for the reason that I find it strange that the Government is apparently unable to do anything in these cases unless

I am called upon, and knowing as I do, and as you must know, that it is not lacking in deserving objects for prosecution, about whom I know nothing, but of whom it knows much, my amazement grows. Indeed but for the fact that I am not in receipt of the emoluments of office I might be inclined to suspect myself as "of counsel." This might, by some enthusiasts, be considered distinction, but to me it is stale, flat, and very unprofitable. No, sir, you are in error as to my needing any "vindication." The "vindication" is needed for the prosecution, not by me, but I thank you for your kind proffer, actuated as I know you are by none but the kindest and most chivalric sentiments, the more marked for the reason that I have observed no evidence of the existence of either in my official intercourse with the head of the Department of Justice, or your associate, Mr. Bliss. In the event of my going before the grand jury, not for my "vindication," however, I may as well say to you that I will not testify if George Bliss, esq., is to represent the United States in the jury room.

Y'rs respectfully,

J. A. WALSH.

(Indorsed:) Letter to R. T. Merrick, Dec. 19, '82, in reply to his of Dec. 16, 82.

MR. WALSH TO MR. MERRICK.

NEW YORK, December 21, 1882.

MY D'R SIR: I appeal to you, as a lawyer and a gentleman, to know whether or not the remarks made by Mr. Chandler yesterday in his opening for the defense are proper? I refer to his strictures on me as reported in the New York Herald of to-day. I beg that you take such action in the premises as you deem proper.

Is it possible, Mr. Merrick, that there is to be no limit to this abuse of me?

Yours, truly,

J. A. WALSH.

Hon. R. T. MERRICK,
Washington, D. C.

P. S.—I am, of course, under the impression that Mr. Bliss, in his opening, made no reference to me, at least it was not reported if he did. Will you be kind enough to let me know whether Mr. Bliss made any statement as to what he expected to prove by me?

WALSH.

(Indorsed:) Letter to R. T. Merrick of date December 21, 1882, to which I received no response, his ox not being gored.

MR. MERRICK TO MR. WALSH.

[Merrick & Morris, counsellors, No. 1306 F street.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 30, 1882.

DEAR SIR: Yours without date, except Dec. 1882, was received this morning.

I have most carefully kept faith with my assurance to you that I would defend and protect you as a witness for the Government in the case which is now being a second time tried.

To obtain evidence in corroboration of your testimony, and thereby repel the accusations brought against your integrity, and at the same time overwhelm your malignant assailants, was, in my judgment, of the utmost importance to you, and a more desirable result than any that could possibly be achieved in executing the obligation I had assumed in your behalf. I had supposed, some days since, that I had accomplished this result, but my efforts in that regard have been seriously embarrassed, if not, indeed, defeated, by the unwise course you have pursued, especially in the particular of not granting me a personal interview in accordance with my repeated requests to that effect, and also by the prevalence of a report that you are evading the service of the subpoena which has been issued for you, and that it is your purpose not to testify at the present trial of the case if you can avoid it. This report I do not, of course, credit, but it nevertheless largely prevails, and is doing serious mischief to you and subjecting me to some humiliation.

I fear that you have not fully appreciated my personal consideration for you.

Yours, truly,

R. T. MERRICK.

JOHN A. WALSH, Esq.

(Indorsed:) Letter from R. T. Merrick, esq., dated December 30, 1882. Rec'd by me January 2, 1883, in reply to my letter to him of December 29, 1882.

MR. WALSH TO MR. MERRICK.

NEW YORK, January 3d, 1883.Hon. R. T. MERRICK,
Washington, D. C. :

Yours of 30th ult. at hand yesterday p. m. The date of my letter to you, which was omitted by me, was Dec. 29, '82.

To say that I am surprised at the tenor of your letter would be to but faintly convey to you my feelings, after many and careful readings thereof.

You say, "I have carefully kept faith with my assurance to you that I would defend and protect you as a witness for the Government in the case which is now being a second time tried." That the Government has not protected me has been, and is, part of the burden of my complaint. If you would be kind enough to indicate to me how and in what way and at what time there ever has been manifested any disposition by the Government through its officials, judicially or otherwise, to protect me, I would feel obliged to you. That you have felt something ought to be done in that direction is believed by me, but that any steps looking to such action have been frowned down by your associate, Geo. Bliss, esq., is also believed by me. I have heretofore felt, as relates to your position in this matter, that I would accept the will for the deed; hence did not say much on this subject during the first trial, but have determined as to the future that I shall have some distinct understanding.

You say, "To obtain evidence in corroboration of your testimony, and thereby repel the accusations brought against your integrity and at the same time overwhelm your malignant assailants was, in my judgment, of the utmost importance to you, and a more desirable result than any that could possibly be achieved in executing the obligation I had assumed in your behalf." I would suppose that the Government, in obtaining corroborative evidence, was simply doing that which all litigants aim to do; i. e., presenting the very best evidence and as much of it as can be had. I shall not flatter myself that the Government, in its efforts to obtain this corroborative evidence, was influenced therein solely by its desire to "vindicate" me. This very corroborative evidence that you refer to has been made possible solely and entirely by me, and mainly through my efforts. I might also add, even, at my expense, pecuniarily and otherwise.

It ought not, and ordinarily does not, require assurances from any individual that witnesses for the United States shall be protected. The protection that I referred to was not such as takes the shape of obtaining corroborative evidence, as it goes without saying that such is the end of all properly-conducted prosecutions on the part of the people against criminals. The protection that I refer and referred to, and of which you assured me, but do not now, was that protection which the law prescribes, a protection that takes the form of criminal proceedings against men who have criminally libeled a witness for the Government for testifying to the truth in its behalf. That protection, in fine, which assumes definite shape by indicting that member and his coconspirators of the late grand jury who violated the law in order to endeavor to discredit and impeach me. You have the evidence in your possession, or under your control; why not protect me by prosecuting these men? You know the names of the persons, together with all the facts, and I ask you to vindicate the majesty of the law. If you are unable, because of your surroundings, because your associate does not believe in such sentimentalism, avow it, say it is due me, but you cannot accord it me.

A moral verdict of guilty was found by the nation against these men on the first trial, and, without egotism, I may add entirely on my testimony. If being universally credited by the nation and by ten out of twelve jurors is to constitute "protection" for a witness, there never was a witness much better protected than I. Your case against these defendants was a mere nothing, about to be dismissed from court, when my testimony came to stem the tide. Surely, I am not indebted to the Government for that kind of "protection." Now, if through my efforts and at my expense, you are about to get corroborative evidence, why should you term it protecting me, repelling "accusations" made by my "malignant enemies." These men are not my "enemies" personally; they are the "enemies" of all honesty, the "enemies" of the people, the enemies of the United States Government. They have libeled and conspired, not against me but against justice, and I demand of you, in the name of the outraged law, that they be punished. This will be my "protection;" it is all I ask of you as the representative of the Government. If I am asking too much, or if these men are above and beyond the reach of the law, let me be informed thereof, and I will desist from my mad demands.

You say "The prevalence of a report that you are evading the service of a subpoena which has been issued for you, and that it is your purpose not to testify at the present trial of the case if you can avoid it." This report, I do not of course, credit, but it nevertheless largely, prevails, and is doing serious mischief to you and subjecting me to some humiliation.

You are justified in not believing this report, if for no other reason than the fact that I am not an official, nor have I lately been appointed to office by the administration. Why should I evade a subpoena? Why should I not rather rejoice in receiving one? To be allowed to testify on behalf of the Government at one's own expense is distinction enough, but when that is supplemented with the most robust personal abuse by counsel for the defendants and their organ, "The Robbers' Own," the average mind fails to comprehend the delicacy of the compliment conveyed, in the tender of a subpoena to testify in the case of the United States vs. J. S. Brady, Dorsey, et al.

No, sir, you are correct in not believing that I am evading service. I am simply awaiting from you the assurance requested of you in my communication of 29th ult. I am not evading service, nor do I intend to. Why you should feel "humiliated" is beyond my ken. You say, in the conclusion, "I fear that you have not fully appreciated my personal consideration for you." You, if you ever harbored such a thought, do me great injustice. Indeed, sir, the only oasis in this awful waste of official corruption, official deceit, and official neglect of duty has been the reflection that you were an earnest, honest prosecutor, and as such you had alone appreciated the character and extent of the sacrifices that I had made in appearing as a witness for the Government.

If during the heat and smoke of battle you have forgotten me I have overlooked it; but if before engaging again in battle I ask that you have a care for my feelings, that you throw around me the protection of that power which you represent, is it asking too much? Do I, by asking of you that these violators of the law be punished, indicate that I have grown weary in the struggle for good government? I trust you do not so reason.

I fear there is some misapprehension existing in your mind as to my status in these cases. As I am neither an officer of the Government nor "of counsel" I fail to understand why I should be called on to sacrifice my time and my money, when I reflect that persons in the employ of the Government and the prosecution have assiduously avoided doing that which they are enormously paid for doing. I marvel that you should expect of me such extraordinary zeal in sending these men to prison. I have not volunteered as a witness in these cases, nor am I an informer. So far as my own personal interests are and were concerned I have given testimony against these men at great loss to myself.

You emphasize in your letter to me the fact that you were engaged in obtaining "corroborative evidence," &c., in support of mine, &c. I was not aware that my testimony had ever been contradicted or impeached. Certainly not in open court. The only attempt at impeaching me was when the late grand jury as conspirators assembled, aided by a Cabinet officer and others, undertook to impeach me by not finding indictments on my evidence. How do you know but that the effect of this impeachment by this body was the cause of the disagreement of the petit jury in the first trial? That such was the object of this impeachment by the grand jury does not admit of a doubt. By the conduct of the grand jury the extraordinary spectacle was afforded the nation of the Government conspiring to impeach its own witness, as the grand jury certainly represents the Government. William H. Dickson, late foreman of the petit jury, is being prosecuted by the Government for attempting to corruptly influence the late petit jury, and I might add very properly. Why do you not likewise cause the prosecution of the men who corruptly influenced the late grand jury? What difference is there in the gravamen of the offense?

I have written the Attorney-General of the United States, as well as President Arthur, requesting that these men be prosecuted. Receiving no reply from either of them I asked you, as Assistant Attorney-General of the United States, and your reply is as set forth in your letter to me of date Dec. 30th, '82, which I respectfully suggest is not an answer to my communication of Dec. 29th, '82.

Assuring you of my kindest regards and highest esteem, I am,
Yours sincerely,

J. A. WALSH.

MR. WALSH TO THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

NEW YORK, November 3, '82.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General of the United States, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: In the month of June, 1882, a subpoena was served on me in this city to appear before the grand jury of the District of Columbia to testify in the matter of the U. S. vs. Brady et al. In accordance with this summons I appeared before the grand jury whose term expired June 30th, 1882. Mr. George Bliss, counsel for the Government, was present during my examination. On my testimony an indictment was found by the jury by ex-Assistant Postmaster-General Brady and mail contractor James B. Price for conspiracy to defraud the Government of the United States. During the following month, July, 1882, one of the special counsel for the Government in the star-route cases, with whom I had then no acquaintance personally, called on me in his official capacity, and during the conversation recited that which he had heard rumored as having been the tenor of my testimony before the grand jury whose term had just then expired, and asked of me confirmation. I then related to him substantially my testimony, whereupon he expressed the greatest indignation and astonishment at the action of the grand jury in not including in the Brady-Price indictment Senator Wm. P. Kellogg. I inquired of him if this was the first official information he had received of the character of my testimony, and, to my surprise, he said it was.

A few days after this interview the grand jury (a new body) was called together in extraordinary session; indeed, the gentleman, after listening to my recital, said he would have the jury called together immediately. In the mean time I had been subpoenaed to appear as a witness before the traverse jury in the suit of U. S. vs. Brady, Dorsey, et al., and while awaiting to be called, I was summoned to appear before the grand jury of the District of Columbia, bringing with me my books and papers. I was before this body the greater part of two days, giving my testimony and exhibiting original papers, etc., etc., with the result as is known to all the world—a result as insulting to all law and justice as it was mortifying to me, reflecting as it did on my veracity. The purposes of this negative action, i. e., not finding an indictment were, in my opinion, two. First, to the end that a distinguished Senator should escape indictment, and, secondly, to vitiate my testimony which I was to give before the traverse jury in the case of Brady et al., then on trial. That influences of a most potential character were brought to bear on the grand jury to accomplish such a result, unhappily, does not admit of a doubt. Manifestly testimony which was considered ample on which to find an indictment against Brady and Price had not been deemed strong enough to reach a Senator. This was the finding of the first grand jury, whose term had expired June 30th, '82. The finding of indictments against comparative pigmies, the hoi polloi, and allowing official giants to escape had become embarrassing, for some jurors revolted against this system on the first jury, and hence this latter grand jury, to avoid similar complications, determined to indict no person. In order to furnish them, if possible, with something like a reason for not finding an indictment in accordance with my testimony, the conspirators on the grand jury had presented them by their associates outside, for the undoubted purpose of influencing the minds of their fellow members, a copy of the testimony in the case of Spofford vs. Kellogg, a contested-election case in which I had testified. My testimony before this jury was direct and positive, and, supported as it was by documentary evidence, simply overwhelming. What could possibly be the reason, then, for the remarkable action of the grand jury? Were they dazed by reason of the high official position of one of the persons against whom my testimony bore most heavily? Or could it be that they concurred with the special prosecuting officers of the Government who, in the grand-jury room, gave expression to the opinion, "that it was a serious matter to indict a Senator of the United States"? Were the jurors influenced by the Spofford-Kellogg testimony? Who directed them to inquire into the case of Spofford vs. Kellogg? Whether they were or were not influenced by the testimony, the criminal object had in view by those who brought it there was to influence them. Precisely the same object which the prosecution say Wm. H. Dickson had in view when he, as foreman of the traverse jury read to its members his statement of the alleged attempt of the Government to bribe him and for which attempt to influence the minds of the jury he is now being prosecuted. I assert that whoever brought into the room of the grand jury the Spofford-Kellogg testimony is far guiltier than Wm. H. Dickson. That this book was there, does not admit of a doubt, as counsel for the Government, Mr. Bliss, will bear me out.

In behalf of justice and of law and of order, I call upon you, as the highest law officer of the Government, to discover who it was that brought into the grand jury-room the testimony in the case of Spofford vs. Kellogg; who it was on the grand jury that entered into the conspiracy to protect these men from indictment, and by rendering me despicable, thereby, tending to break down the case of the Government against Brady, Dorsey, et als. This is a discovery, sir, which the Government owes me and owes to itself.

You will please recall the condition of the Government's case at this juncture; I mean that against Brady et als. To say that it was in extremis would be untrue, for it hardly had life enough to die; indeed it was generally understood that a motion to dismiss it would be listened to by the court. A material witness for the Government, indeed an officer thereof, then under subpoena, was moved, as he has said, to go away at this time, for the reason that he was satisfied that the case would be dismissed, and for the further reason that he did not believe the prosecution was in earnest. This gentleman's official, commercial, and social relations with members of the administration gave him exceptional opportunities for informing himself. I take this from the public prints as going to show the condition of sentiment about the time that this grand jury resolved to protect these criminals. Everything was against the prosecution; hence, how necessary it became to braek me down in behalf of the defendants in court, and those who ought to have been defendants, that were not yet at its bar. As John A. Walsh, I was not personally known to a member of that grand jury; to them I was simply an important witness for the Government, and, as such, and in the interests of crime, they showed their bias against me from the moment that I appeared in the jury-room. Such of them as did not listlessly tilt their chairs against the walls, resolved themselves into cross-examiners in the interests of the person against whom I was testifying, with the apparent motion of trying to exhaust the Government's case in the grand-jury room.

I again repeat that it behooves the Government to find out the person or persons who first informed a member or members of this grand jury of the existence of the Spofford-Kellogg testimony and the member or members of that body who brought it into the jury-room. I emphasize this, not because there was anything in that testimony on which to base such an infamous result, but because it will be the first step toward develoving the conspirators in this case. Inasmuch as this book came from some one of the public libraries, surely it ought not to be a difficult task for this great Government, and such action, believe me, would go far toward evidencing that witnesses for the Government would have at least its moral support, a condition it pains me to say that it does not enjoy, in my mind, at least, for I have yet to see the first evidence of any support of any kind from it. Simultaneously with the extraordinary action or rather non-action of this grand jury, now holding session in Washington, a daily paper of that city, conducted in the interests of the star-route conspirators, gave joyous expression to the information that a grand jury had unanimously refused to believe me on oath. Branded thus by a corrupt grand jury, in furtherance of this conspiracy, as one unworthy of belief, I literally stepped from the threshold of their room to the witness stand in open court, to be there taunted by counsel for the defense as one whom the grand jury did not believe. Such in brief was the character of my introduction to the court, to the traverse jury, and to the people of this country.

I do assure you: sir, that nothing but my own sense of duty and self-respect sustained me in such an ordeal, the most trying of all ordeals for a man of honor. Indeed, while I was on the witness stand, the leading counsel for the defendants asked me contemptuously, "if I was the same Walsh that had appeared before the grand jury?" In the mean time, I was assailed in column after column of the vilest abuse, and that, too, in a paper the control of whose columns it was sworn to in open court was exercised by a man who was then, and is now, the occupant of a lucrative office under the same Government in whose interests I had been summoned to appear as a witness. At this period, when I felt as though this combination of conspirators, composed as it was of the grand jury, the defendants in court, together with such other allies as rumor assigned being in sympathy with these robber barons, were about to crush me I bethought of appealing to that national jury composed of the millions of freemen, who, in their honesty, could not be influenced. Through the medium of a free and enlightened press I addressed myself to this jury, which evidence being weighed has resulted in a moral verdict of guilty against these men. I am convinced that but for the aid extended the cause of justice by the press of this country, these conspirators would have triumphed. I have been informed that you have expressed the opinion that my testimony before the traverse jury saved the prosecution from defeat in a case which special counsel had selected as the strongest, albeit well-informed people never agreed therein with the said counsel. Whether or not I rendered the Government any service in these cases it is not for me to say, but such aid as I have contributed has not been without great sacrifice to me in many ways. Because of my appearance as a witness against these men I have been criminally libelled in the District of Columbia while under subpœna from its judiciary, and I have yet to see the first evidence that the Government intended to protect me. I have never witnessed such terrorism as was exercised against witnesses in this case. I have been informed by counsel that the persons who have been engaged in libelling me are criminally liable, and yet, sir, I say to you in all candor that I am practically unable to obtain the slightest legal redress in the capital of the Republic.

All that I have set forth in this communication, and more, has been printed by the great journals of the country touching the present grand jury of the District of Columbia, and it is in no spirit of sentimentalism for myself alone that I beg of you to take cognizance of the conspiracy which has been entered into by this body. Some member or members of this jury conspired to protect certain people from indictment. This must be obvious to you. If it was really "a serious matter to indict a Senator of the United States," why did they not so resolve and let it go to the world that the Senate of the United States was an asylum for violators of the law? If this jury feared trenching upon the divinity that, in their minds, hedged in a Senator, why not so proclaim, and then the people of this country would know and understand that there was a body of men in the Republic who were not amenable to its laws! Why endeavor to stamp me with reproach, thus affording aid and comfort to the enemies of the Government whose interests they were sworn to protect?

In giving my testimony against these men I was actuated by no feelings of hostility, and in no sense of the word was I a voluntary witness. As a matter of fact, with the exception of one or two of the defendants, I scarcely had any acquaintance with them, indeed some of them I had never seen until I appeared as a witness, and such feeling as I had was rather of sympathy than otherwise, for as a body I regarded them as petty offenders composed with those who, having had recourse to precisely the same methods of plundering the Treasury of the United States, had gone unscathed, or whose gigantic frauds have since been referred to arbitration, as I have read in the public prints.

Whatever of prestige or material benefit that will rebound to the credit of the gentlemen engaged in this prosecution, none can ever reach me by any possibility. I am painfully aware that thus far I have reaped naught save abuse, and have been made the object of a conspiracy by a body acting under the forms of law, a body supposed to be engaged in conserving the interests of law and order; that this is a fiction, however, their acts have proved. I have endeavored to point out to you wherein I conceive that some member or members of the present grand jury of the District of Columbia have violated the law and their oaths, and I now ask that you, for the protection of the interests of the Government and for the protection of its witnesses, take such steps as will bring to light the extent and ramifications of this conspiracy and prosecute the offenders as the law directs.

Yours, respectfully,

J. A. WALSH.

(Indorsed :) Letter to Brewster.

MR. WALSH TO THE PRESIDENT.

NEW YORK, December 18, 1882.

DEAR SIR: Accompanying please find copy of a letter written by me to the Hon. Benjamin Harris Brewster, Attorney-General of the United States, on the 3d day of November, 1882. Inasmuch as I have received no reply thereto, I am reluctantly compelled to address myself to you, to the end that official cognizance be taken of the matters and things set forth in that communication. I submit that the terms of this letter were polite, couched in the most respectful language, to which in all courtesy I was entitled to an answer. This violation of official propriety, to call it by no harsher term, was the more surprising to me occurring as it did in an office whose etiquette, like its embellishments, is popularly supposed to partake of the Renaissance period.

On referring to my communication addressed the Attorney-General you will discover that I have set forth the way, though not as clearly as in this, in which I came to be called as a witness by the prosecution in the star-route cases. You will doubtless agree with me that in testifying I simply obeyed the law, and having obeyed it, by testifying to the best of my knowledge and belief—the tenor of which was held to be very favorable to the Government you will readily comprehend that I do not quite enjoy the role which the prosecution has forced upon me. I am not prepared to be treated as though I were arrayed against the Government. The time has not yet arrived when I am disposed to rest supinely while conspirators, as grand jurors assembled, together with their official allies, impeach my veracity, thus defeating the ends that justice ought and is popularly supposed to have in view. If I am in error as to the ends and purposes of the prosecution, and I beg leave to say, with all due respect, that its ways have been and are devious enough to create doubts in many reflecting minds, the speedier the correction is made the better; but silence on the part of the highest law officer of the Government will not be understood by me as a response to the grave charges made by me to him. I have distinctly stated to the Attorney-General the objects of the conspiracy of the late grand jury. The machinery of the Department of Justice put into proper and judicious motion would have developed the ramifications of this conspiracy, bringing to light the distinguished participants therein. If these men, bound together as they are by the cohesive power of public plunder, are stronger than the State against which they have conspired and are conspiring that fact should at least be known, together with the inability of the Department of Justice to deal vigorously with them.

I will venture to explain to you as briefly as possible the case in point, in order that you may understand the reasons that impel me to address myself to you. In doing so I do assure you that I approach the subject with the greatest confidence in your wisdom and sense of justice as chief magistrate of this nation.

On the 21st of June, 1881, I filed a suit at law in the courts of the District of Columbia, against ex-Assistant Postmaster-General Brady, one of the defendants in the criminal suit now pending in Washington. The amount of money involved was large, the indebtedness being for cash loaned him by me at various times in my capacity as a banker. On January 14th, 1882, I sued out an attachment in New York against the property of the said Brady. These proceedings having obtained quite a deal of publicity in the metropolitan journals, resulted, I presume, in attracting the attention of the Government toward me. In the early part of June, 1882, I was summoned by the United States to appear as a witness before the then grand jury of the District of Columbia. No one, not even the counsel for the Government, had any idea of the full import of what my testimony was to be, and in the light of events it grieves me to say that had its full scope and bearing been known it is possible the prosecution would not have called me.

I am of the opinion that my being called before the grand jury was an accident, as painful as it was surprising to certain interests. I volunteered no testimony to the grand jury, but simply answered the interrogatories propounded by Mr. George Bliss, who represented the United States in the jury room. The evidence resulted in an indictment for conspiracy to defraud the Government being found by the grand jury against ex-Assistant Postmaster-General Brady and mail contractor James B. Price, but omitting from the presentment the name of Senator Wm. P. Kellogg, against whom by the way, the facts in the case being such, my evidence bore most heavily. Of course, this result was most surprising to me. I do not know what impression it made on Special Counsel Bliss, as I did not converse with him on the subject, but it evidently did not cause him any especial astonishment, as he did not make any mention of the character of my evidence to his associate counsel Mr. Merrick. The term of this grand jury expired in June, 1882. A new grand jury was sworn in with the advent of July, 1882, but, without being organized, was adjourned until October, 1882, special counsel saying there was no business for it, notwithstanding the fact that overwhelming evidence of fraud on the part of sundry mail contractors was then, and is now, in possession of the Government, all of which you can verify by calling on the proper officers.

The fact that Senator Kellogg was not indicted by the jury did not call for any expression of opinion from me, as I had, and have, no personal feeling in the matter whatever. I had simply discharged faithfully a very unpleasant and painful duty. This failure to indict Senator Kellogg was not, on this occasion, heralded to the world as in the second instance, of which we will treat hereafter, as being an evidence "that the grand jury would not believe me on oath," etc., etc. On the contrary, this gentleman and his allies maintained the silence of the grave as to what had occurred in the grand-jury room. Evidently it must have appeared to them that the least said about it the better, as it would not do to say that I was not believed "on oath," &c., &c., for there stood the Brady-Price indictment, against whom my testimony was as nothing compared with that against their Senatorial associate who escaped. I have heard it rumored that Mr. Kellogg's name was actually included in the presentment, but in some mysterious manner took unto itself wings. Suffice it to say, that Mr. Merrick, associate counsel for the Government, called on me stating that he had heard rumors of what my testimony had been before the grand jury, but having received no official information thereof from Mr. Bliss, asked me to recite it to him substantially, which I did. His astonishment was as profound as it was unfeigned, and he told me he would have the adjourned grand jury called together in extraordinary session.

It might be well for me to state here that I had, at that time, no acquaintance whatever with Mr. Merrick. The interview was solicited on his part through a gentleman then, as now, connected with the prosecution, and occurred about three weeks subsequently to my appearance before the first grand jury, whose term expired in June. I was accordingly summoned to appear before the grand jury whose term began in July, 1882. In some unaccountable manner the now allied defendants, in and out of court, having pooled their issues, so to speak, were notified of what was coming. Then it was that their conspirators lighted their signal fires, calling every sympathizer to his post, be his condition policeman, grand juror, editor, merchant, or head of a Department! All, all must come! How well their cohorts responded is fully set forth in my unanswered letter to the Attorney-General, wherein I essay to show the illegal methods resorted to to compass so disgraceful a result. It is known of all men who it was on that grand jury that violated section 5405 of the Revised Statutes by bringing into the jury room the Spofford-Kellogg testimony. Indeed, Mr. President, it is said that a member of your Cabinet gave to a certain grand juror, in violation of the statute, the afore-mentioned testimony. Then it was that the organs of the pooled issues, viz, Brady et al. in court, and Kellogg et al. not yet there, heralded to the world that, "A grand jury composed of citizens of eminent respectability refused to believe Walsh on oath." This was supplemented by the most infamous abuse of me in the columns of their organs, and that, too, while I was under subpoena from the court.

Senator Kellogg, on the 15th July, 1882, a day or so following the adjournment of the grand jury that had failed to indict any of the persons against whom I testified, said, in an interview, referring to my testimony: "There was not a scrap of paper or a document of any kind, bill, check, or voucher with my (Kellogg's) name on it. The whole thing is over, but the day of reckoning is coming for the blackmailers." Is it over? Can it be possible, Mr. President, that he knew whereof he spoke? It is not over, for if I have testified falsely against himself and others I have grievously wronged them and should be punished by the law. If on the contrary it be shown that a grand jury conspired with others to shield these guilty men, then those conspirators should be punished. I demand that justice be done me by this Government. It is my right as an American citizen and I shall insist upon it, confident in receiving your support as well as that of every fair-minded man. When Senator Kellogg gave expression to the above he did not for a moment imagine that I would dare print my testimony together with checks, telegrams, and letters of his—papers that carried conviction to the hearts of their readers as to the guilt of these men.

On the 17th of July, 1882, copies of these papers were printed in the N. Y. Herald and N. Y. Times, together with a statement of what had been my testimony before the grand jury that failed to indict him. On July 20th, 1882, the N. Y. Herald published a fac-simile copy of a check drawn by me to the order of Wm. P. Kellogg and by him indorsed, for two thousand dollars. This amount represented part of the twenty thousand dollars of postal drafts, which Mail Contractor James B. Price had paid Senator Wm. P. Kellogg and ex-Assistant Postmaster-General Thos. J. Brady, for corruptly expediting his mail service and enormously increasing his pay on a certain mail route from San Antonio to Corpus Christi, Texas. These drafts were subsequently given me as a banker for collection by Senator Wm. P. Kellogg, one-half for his account and one-half for account of Thos. J. Brady, ex-Assistant Postmaster-General. To the end that I may be perfectly explicit as to the matter, I will state that fifteen thousand of the amount paid by Price was in drafts, known as postal drafts. The other five thousand dollars, going to make the twenty thousand dollars, was represented by a note of James B. Price for five thousand dollars, drawn to his own order and by himself indorsed, payment thereof being secured by collateral, consisting of mining stock, together with a note of a certain mail contractor by name of Hugh White, said note in its turn bearing the indorsement of Mail Contractor Monroe Salisbury.

The action of the grand jury that indicted Brady and Price resolved itself into this: The contractor, James B. Price, was indicted for paying twenty thousand dollars to Senator Wm. P. Kellogg for the latter's and Brady's use, in return for the increase in pay, corruptly given him by the Post-Office Department, through the instrumentality of Kellogg, as the negotiator, and Brady, as the official. Thos. J. Brady was indicted for receiving one-half of this amount for his use and benefit. Senator Wm. P. Kellogg, who received the money or drafts and note in person from Price, giving them to me as a banker for collection, and who benefited to the extent of one-half of the amount, escapes indictment. This result caused great discontent among the conspirators who had been indicted and their following. They apparently did not understand why Mr. Kellogg had escaped, and if he escaped why not all? When the second grand jury was called together in extraordinary session, through the sole desire of Mr. Merrick, it was determined by the conspirators that no such illogical presentments would be allowed to come from it. Then occurred the pooling of the issues between the defendants, whose trial was then progressing in the criminal court and the individuals threatened with indictment, to wit, Kellogg, Buell, and mail contractor Petersen, together with many others interested in staying the law's tidal wave. It was then determined by the combined allies that this grand jury, composed of citizens of "eminent respectability," should refuse to believe me on oath, to the end that all might escape indictment, and I being thus discredited by the grand jury, my testimony, which I was to give as against the defendants in court and before the petit jury, would not be believed, in this way removing the only obstacle to their acquittal. While on this subject I will state that, if you desire it, I will take great pleasure in showing you the papers in this case. If after the inspection of letters, telegrams, bank checks, and postal drafts you say there is not a prima facie case of the strongest kind against these men I will plead guilty to criminally libeling them.

As to the criminal libels uttered against me by these men, and given currency in the columns of the regular star-route organ and another owned in part by Special Counsel Bliss, I suppose whatever of remedy I have is in the courts. I do not feel, however, that I can school myself to present the cases against these men to a district attorney whom Mr. George Bliss told me, not more than fifteen months ago, was to be removed by you the very next day, because he was not trustworthy, a district attorney whom even the Department of Justice will not trust.

Now, sir, you will understand why it is that these people have warred against me. The unpleasant prominence into which I have been forced, by no action or seeking of mine, is not the least of the many embarrassments which surround me. I trust that you will appreciate why it is that attacked as I have been by these desperate men, assailed in all that man holds most dear, for no reason other than having been an involuntary witness against them, I feel called upon in response to my sense of duty to the Government, in response to my own sense of honor and manhood, to resist their attempts at discrediting me, in furtherance of the conspiracy to shield guilty men from indictment and punishment.

"When bad men combine, the good must associate; else they will fall, one by one, an unpitied sacrifice, in a contemptible struggle." That the bad men have combined is apparent in the immunity which has, for eighteen months, favored them—an immunity as surprising as it is disgraceful. An immunity explicable only on the grounds that the servants of this great Government are not in earnest in prosecuting these men. Notwithstanding the expenditure of vast sums of money in the accumulation of overwhelming evidences of fraud against these star-route conspirators, it has been allowed to remain unused by special counsel for a year and a half. The results thus far of this unequal war of the people against this band of conspirators, numbering in all probably forty persons, after a contest of two years and the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars, are the indictment of seven of their number and the Cadmean victory obtained by the Government in the ridiculous verdict rendered on the first trial, by the traverse jury, against the aforesaid seven defendants. Even this last result, pitiful and disgraceful as it was, was the result of chance—yes, chance testimony—i. e., testimony not in existence so far as went the knowledge of special counsel when he selected the Brady-Dorsey case as the strongest. The evidence presented in this case, I mean that evidence which guided the special counsel in selecting it as the best one the Government had, appears to have been barely sufficient to give the indictment against the defendants a standing in court, and but for the testimony, which he will designate as chances, this case against these defendants would have been dismissed, would never have gone to the jury.

I have been informed by a gentleman, now connected with the prosecution, that the Government was in possession of evidence against other mail contractors of a character much stronger than that offered by the present case at the time of its selection as the strongest—cases that would not have required chance testimony to save from being dismissed. So weak was the case that the court, indeed, said he was nearly ready to hear a motion for dismissal of the proceeding against the defendants. Was the selection of this case a mistake, an error of judgment on the part of the learned special counsel? Such mistakes are crimes. Could it be that it was expected to carry on a travesty of justice under the disguise of a prosecution? Men's minds are so fashioned, Mr. President, that they cannot resist reasoning, and many very intelligent observers seem to think in this wise, after a careful analysis of events. What, for instance, would have been more plausible than to cause the indictment of the present defendants, comprising an ex-Senator and an ex-Assistant Postmaster-General? Next, the selection of this case as a test one against the star-route ring, on the grounds that it was the strongest (when it was not), submit the evidence to the court and petit jury, apparently doing the best that could be done, and be defeated by the defendants. What renown might not await a distinguished special counsel under such circumstances, who, notwithstanding his party affiliation, heroically rose superior to them and selected for especial sacrifice the secretary of the party's national committee?

These same reasoners, in this strain, think that the shifting of the scenery in this celebrated case clogged when the chance testimony came to be heard, which event very materially changed the aspect of things, for in lieu of Chinese warfare, the rattle of musketry and roar of artillery was substituted, figuratively speaking. At this point in this most remarkable trial it was noted that the defendants, whose wont all through the trial had been to lounge in the adjacent saloons, thereby indicating contemptuously that the State had no case, now came into court and battled for their liberty, barely escaping the iron grasp of the law. The evidence, the chance evidence, that accomplished this, that gave the case a standing in court, was not of record when the special counsel selected this case for the Government's strongest. People inclined to have doubts as to the sincerity of this prosecution, notwithstanding the selection of a target so conspicuous as ex-Senator Dorsey, remember that Special Counsel Bliss failed so far in his address to the jury in making any reference as to the guilt of the defendant S. W. Dorsey that his failure elicited unfavorable comment. Indeed, to such an extent did he carry this avoidance that Mr. Merrick, associate counsel for the Government, in his argument to the jury, referred to Mr. Bliss's omission in language more forcible than courteous and more truthful than either. I omitted to mention as one of the results of this unequal war of justice against these conspirators, the fact, as I am informed that some cases presenting the very worst features in this vast scheme of plunder have been referred to arbitration. In justice to Mr. Bliss I make this correction, as I understand the credit for the acceptance of the arbitration theory on the part of the Government is due him.

The beauties of this system must commend themselves at a glance to every practical plunderer of the Treasury, especially a star-route conspirator, who, on being accidentally brought to bay for defrauding the Government, and on being satisfied that it has the evidence of his wrong-doing in its possession, will simply reply by calling for an arbitration commission, demanding of justice how much in dollars and cents it will take to close her gaping wounds? This much, doubtless, all these gentlemen will agree to, including the present defendants. Indeed, it is difficult for the ordinary mind to understand why it is that Brady, Dorsey, et al., are excluded from the practical workings of the most philanthropic and humane system. Perhaps it is this reflection that causes the feeling which seems to obtain among them that they are being persecuted. Can it be that it was held that sufficient was done for them in not selecting a stronger case, and that they should have been skillful enough to break down the chance testimony that had marred the symmetry of things? They might assume, as some people doubtless do, that inasmuch as they stand charged with taking only about ten pr. ct. of the "four millions of dollars," which Attorney-General Brewster alleges were stolen from the Treasury, their offending does not reach the colossal proportions which admit of arbitration. Having engaged in comparative petit larceny, they must suffer the consequences of so venial a sin. I beg that you remember that none of these beneficiaries of the "four million of dollars," save the present defendants, are under indictment. Of course I do not include the insignificant persons who technically violated the law, nor the poor wretches who were mere figure-heads. In point of fact it appears that but two of these unscathed beneficiaries have even gone so far as to suggest arbitration. The others have, doubtless, on assurance from counsel that all would be well, retired to their ranches, where, removed from the tumult of the world, they can study at leisure the growth of that maudlin sentiment, reform, which bids fair, under your guidance, to assert itself most vigorously.

Mr. President, permit me to say to you in all candor that I know of no man who believes that the prosecution, as a whole, is in earnest. Its acts have been of such a character as to preclude the possibility of intelligent men believing in its honesty of purpose, in proof of which I refer you to the press. As an illustration of this feeling one of the leading journals of the country, if not the leading one, says: "If the President desires to put the prosecution of these cases (star route) entirely above suspicion, he will do well to provide that the place hitherto occupied by Mr. Bliss shall be occupied by some other man."

It is the first time, I believe, in the history of the Republic that men unblushingly, and in the full glare of day, organized as plunderers, openly defy the power of the State. The laws of the land have been most wantonly and shamefully violated by these men, witnesses for the Government have been terrorized by them and their agents, juries corrupted officers of the Government made to violate their oaths, and justice itself made a mockery of in the capital of the Republic. Such has been the weak and vacillating character of the prosecution, as a whole, that men knew not on which side the Government was arrayed. Such feelings of doubt and distrust have been engendered by this vacillation, that, in the opinion of many law-abiding citizens, nothing less than your action and positive direction in these cases, Mr. President, will ensure a result commensurate with the gravity of the occasion.

Respectfully, yours,

J. A. WALSH.

MR. MERRICK TO MR. WALSH.

[Merrick & Morris, counselors, No. 1306 F street.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 10, 1883.

JOHN A. WALSH, Esq. :

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 8th inst. has been received.

As I have heretofore stated to you, I think it is important to have a personal interview with you. Mr. Woodward also desires to communicate a message, which will require your attention, and wishes you to look over some papers in his possession. In such interview a time for your examination in the pending trial might be fixed to suit convenience. The course of the present trial will not be the same as that pursued at the last, and it is impossible for me to say now when you will be placed on the stand. Indeed, your presence might be needed at any moment. I am not privileged to modify the obligation of the subpoena.

Your suggestion, in a communication received just previous to that above referred to, that the grand jury ought to be indicted, contemplates what is, in my professional experience, a novel proceeding. The introduction into the grand-jury room of the printed report of the testimony in the Spofford-Kellogg contest was certainly very improper, and I have no doubt was done from bad motives, but who brought the book in, or who caused it to be brought there, I do not know, and very much doubt if the act, though wrong and censurable, would be held to be criminal.

In October last I called the attention of the district attorney to the libelous articles in regard to you which had appeared in the journals of this city during the time that you were in attendance upon the court as a Government witness, and stated to him that I thought those journals, or the parties conducting them, ought to be indicted. He agreed with me and promised to present the cases to the grand jury as soon as the approaching session of the court should open. The court met on the 4th of December last, and the grand jury was organized. I afterwards again spoke to the district attorney upon this subject, and he informed me that he was ready to proceed at any time that you might come forward personally as a witness, but that your personal presence was necessary. In this he was right, and I have no doubt that had you been here and adopted the course uniformly pursued in such cases indictments would have been found.

Yours truly,

R. T. MERRICK.

MR. WALSH TO MR. MERRICK.

NEW YORK, January 12, 1883.

Hon. R. T. MERRICK,
Washington, D. C. :

DEAR SIR: Yours of 10th inst. at hand to-day.

I note what you say touching the subpoena served on me, etc., etc. In reply to this point I can simply reiterate that I am ready to respond at any time; but it is not fair nor just on the part of the Government to expect me to leave my business and wait in Washington for days, perhaps weeks, to be called to the witness stand, when you can reach me so promptly by telegraph. In all fairness, I am sacrificing enough as it is, without being expected to lounge around Washington at the magnificent rate of $1.25 pr. diem. In addition to the above, I am not feeling well enough to be moving about just at present, and would suggest that I can meet Mr. Woodward here at any time that would suit his convenience.

You have misunderstood me if you thought I suggested the prosecution of the entire (late) grand jury. It was quite a "novel" proceeding for a member of the grand jury to violate the statutes, and the prosecution of the member who did violate the law might prove beneficial as well as "novel." I am surprised that you should say you do not know his name. From information received by me his name is Henry A. Willard. The Department of Justice must know all about this. I have seen it printed in the N. Y. Herald that the copy of the Spofford-Kellogg testimony came from the U. S. Senate library. It came from some one of the public libraries. Mr. Bliss might know, as he handled the copy in the jury room, reading therefrom at my suggestion. If the act of Mr. Willard is not criminal, I fear there is nothing criminal in Foreman Dickson's act, for which he has nevertheless been held by Judge Snell.

As to the necessity of my personally appearing as the prosecutor of these people who have libeled me, I have simply this to say, that if the United States takes no more interest in all its witnesses than it has in me I fear that the time for convicting plunderers of the Treasury has passed. When the Government desired proceeding against Wm. H. Dickson et al., it very soon found persons to make charges against him. As a matter of delicacy I do not like to appear as the everlasting complainant. Surely, Mr. Merrick, there must be some Governmental employé to be found who can go forward, and from what he has read in the prints know that I have been libeled, and on that base his affidavit. I am, of course, willing to appear as a witness in the matter, but is it right that I should have to appear in the preliminary steps?

The reason that these men have libeled me was because I was a witness for the Government. This being the case, ought not the Government institute the proceedings? Why should not the district attorney, with the papers that you could give him, commence proceedings? I trust that I am not unreasonable in my request, for really I do not mean to be so.

Y'rs truly,

J. A. WALSH.

MR. WALSH TO MR. GRANDIN.

NEW YORK, November 3d, '83.

SIR: In obedience to a subpoena issued out of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, I appeared before a grand jury of the said District of Columbia in the matter of the United States against ex-Senator Wm. Pitt Kellogg.

This body found an indictment against the said Kellogg for bribery.

Last month, as I learn by the public prints, the case of the United States against Wm. Pitt Kellogg, for bribery, was fixed for trial on the 10th day of December next.

The House of Representatives of the United States, of which body Mr. Kellogg is now a member, will assemble a few days before the date fixed for the said trial.

It is surmised by some of the gentlemen engaged in the prosecution of the star-route cases that Mr. Kellogg will plead his privilege as a member of Congress, in this way avoiding trial when his case is called.

The Attorney-General, as I understand it, deems it desirable that an earlier date than the 10th of December next be fixed for the trial of the said Kellogg, to the end that it will not be possible for him to raise the question of privilege.

Doubtless having in view the fixing of an earlier date for the trial of the said Kellogg, certain gentlemen connected with the prosecution of the star-route cases called to see me in this city.

The information is conveyed me that it is absolutely necessary for the representatives of the prosecution to hold an immediate conference with me, to the end that the case of the Government against the accused may be properly prepared. This pressing necessity exists, it is said, for an early interview with me even though the trial should not be had at an earlier date than the 10th prox.

Notwithstanding the high regard in which I hold the gentlemen, I declined to see them. The reason which governed me in this refusal I will endeavor to set forth as briefly as possible.

In obedience to the law, and in no sense voluntary, I have been compelled to appear as a witness on behalf of the United States in the matter of the star-route cases no less than five times. Inasmuch as I had and have no interest whatever in these cases it is needless to say that my appearance against the defendants has been quite painful to me, and not unaccompanied with great sacrifices on my part.

During these appearances, and while under subpoena as a witness, indeed whilst actually testifying on behalf of the Government, I was slandered and criminally libeled by sundry persons and newspapers in the city of Washington, known to every one connected with the Department of Justice, without the representatives of the Government taking any legal steps for their prosecution and my protection.

In the past I have appealed to the representatives of the Department of Justice without any result. Indeed, I understand Mr. George Bliss has assumed the position that the Government is not under any obligations to protect its witnesses. In justice to that gentleman's associates I must add they did not agree with him, but have confessed that they were powerless.

If the defendants, together with their numerous and powerful allies, were to surround the witness box with arms in their hands, threatening the life of every one who dared obey the law by testifying, can there be a doubt as to what the position of the Government would then be? Yet, Mr. President, that moral assassination to which I have been subjected in the past is far more formidable to a sensitive man than any armed force.

The proposition that the Government owes a citizen no protection when appearing as a witness on its behalf in obedience to its mandate is too revolting to be considered.

My own sense of manhood and self-respect will not permit me in the future to undergo such an ordeal. The Government has no right to ask for such a sacrifice. I insist upon that legal protection from the Government which the law prescribes. This being accorded me, I will consider also that the Government is lending the cause of justice some moral support, an element which, in the past, many have deemed lacking.

If my presence as a witness on behalf of the United States in its cases against Thomas J. Brady and William Pitt Kellogg is deemed of sufficient importance by you to give your assent to the following requests, I will hold such conferences with prosecution as are proper and will appear as a witness in response to a subpoena: Co-

First. Mr. Merrick or Mr. Ker to appear before the grand jury of the District of Columbia, with the view of procuring indictments against Wm. Dickson for slander, and against George C. Gorham, of the National Republican, and A. C. Buell et al., of the Critic, for criminally libeling me in the matter of the "Benner claim."

Second. That you request Attorney-General Brewster to answer my letter of inquiry addressed him of date Sept. 25th, '83, touching a letter written by him to the Secretary of the Navy, W. E. Chandler, concerning me.

Third. Your assurance that the Government will protect me as a witness. By protection I do not mean physically, as I can do that myself. I mean that protection from slander and libel which the law entitles me to as a witness.

Fourth. The assurance that Mr. George Bliss will not represent the Government in its actions against Thomas J. Brady and William P. Kellogg.

Believe me, Mr. President, if I thus address you, it is because experience has taught me that no proper remedy will be accorded me elsewhere. When you reflect, sir, that the accused proclaims his intention of placing on the witness stand a member of your Cabinet to discredit the prosecution's own witness by having him recite the language used concerning the said witness by another member of your Cabinet, to wit, the Attorney-General of the United States, is it not time that I should know whether or not I am to have the moral and legal support of the Government?

Very respectfully,

J. A. WALSH.

MR. WALSH TO MR. HOPKINS.

NEW YORK, March 15, 1884.

Chairman Congressional committee in the matter of the Keifer-Boynton investigation :

SIR: I find printed in the columns of the New York World of even date the following:

“ELDER CROSS-EXAMINED BY MR. MERRICK.

“A subcommittee of the committee investigating the charges against H. V. Boynton held a meeting in the United States Hotel in this city to-day for the purpose of allowing Mr. Merrick to cross-examine Mr. Elder, who is confined to his room by sickness. Nothing of importance bearing on the case was elicited, and the only interest centered in the replies of the witness to queries as to his desire to secure employment in the Department of Justice in connection with the letter written by Mr. Keifer to the Attorney-General vouching for his good character. He said that he thought he could earn $10 a day as well as some Democrats could earn $100, and that he had seen Mr. Merrick in New York seeking in vain to find John A. Walsh, while he (witness) saw Walsh every day. In reply to a question as to whether he knew Walsh's present whereabouts he said that that was his business, and refused further information.

If all the testimony given by Mr. Elder in the matter of the Keifer-Boynton investigation should be as wholly devoid of truth as the above, then I regret that your committee have been compelled to listen to such a person. In a word, his statement relative to “seeing me every day” is false. I have never seen the man in the city of New York, nor anywhere else, for over a year, unless, perchance, I may have seen him on the streets of Washington when I was there last March or April.

Of course my understanding of the word “seeing” is that he meant and intended to convey the impression that he held conversations with me, &c., which I repeat is false. Having eyes he may have seen me on the streets here, as I have been quite visible, even to the naked eye. It is unfortunate, perhaps, that my “whereabouts” for subpoenaing purposes, so to speak, should be a mooted or debatable question, and especially to be regretted that such people as the witness Elder and the “general agent of the Department of Justice,” under the Brewsterian dispensation are thereby enabled to advance theories concerning the same before committees representing the people of the United States. Theories quite in keeping with men—

“Whom want or infamy has chased from home,
And driven in bare-foot multitudes to Rome.”

There need be no difficulty anticipated in finding me with a subpoena in the matter of the case of the United States vs. William Pitt Kellogg, Representative from Louisiana, if President Arthur will acquiesce in my reasonable requests made him in the letter addressed to him by me of date November 3, 1883.

Very respectfully,

J. A. WALSH.

WASHINGTON, May 26, 1884.

WILLIAM W. KER, sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Please state your age, residence, and occupation.—Answer. My age is 43. I reside in Philadelphia. I am an attorney at law.

Q. State whether you have been in the service of the United States at any time, and, if so, in what capacity.—A. In January, 1882, Mr. Nickerson, who is employed in Attorney-General Brewster's office in Philadelphia, came to me with a telegram and showed it to me. The telegram requested me to come to Washington on the first train, as the Attorney-General wished to see me. I took the first train, the midnight train, and arrived in Washington next morning, which was the 21st of January, 1882. I called on the Attorney-General and he explained to me the star-route cases that were then in progress. I had seen mention of them in the newspapers and that was about all I knew of them. The Attorney-General explained to me that he was in great trouble to get some person who could prepare indictments in those cases. He said he did not know whom to apply to, and that he had sent for me to know if I would undertake the work. I told the Attorney-General that I was a Democrat and I did not know how I would be situated if I accepted a position of that kind under a Republican. He told me that it was not a question of politics, but one of the administration of justice; that he was glad that I was a Democrat; that he knew the fact very well; that he was all the more confident that I would do my duty, and that there would be less reason to complain about any action that might be taken in the cases. I asked him how long a time would be required to prepare the indictments. He said he did not know; that I knew better about that than he did. After talking the matter over I consented to undertake the preparation of the indictments. The Attorney-General called his chief clerk and directed him to make out a commission for me, which he did, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
WASHINGTON, January 21, 1882.

WILLIAM W. KER, Esq.,
Washington, D. C.:

SIR: You are hereby appointed special assistant United States attorney for the District of Columbia to aid in the prosecution of certain persons, charged with being concerned in frauds on the United States, in connection with what is as known the star-route investigation; at a compensation to be determined by the Attorney-General when the suits are ended. You will take the oath prescribed for district attorneys and transmit the same to this Department.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

I took the oath. The Attorney-General directed me to see Colonel Bliss, who, he said, had charge of the cases and would give me all the information that I required. The Attorney-General gave orders to have an office prepared and stationery and everything of that kind that I would need in the preparation of the indictments, and directed me, above all things, to say nothing at all about what I was doing, because he did not wish it known until the indictments were ready to go before the grand jury, but he told me that Colonel Bliss would have entire charge of that matter. I went down to the Post-Office Department with Mr. Brewster Cameron and was introduced to Colonel Bliss. I had a few minutes' conversation with Colonel Bliss and then left, telling him that I would be back in a day or two and would see him and learn further what was to be done. I went back to Philadelphia, saw different members of the bar with whom I had cases then pending, and arranged with them to continue the cases for me until I should return from Washington. I wrote letters to the judges of the courts asking that cases of mine which were on the list should not be called and disposed of in my absence, and in that way I made arrangements by which my business would run along for a period of about a month or six weeks. I then returned to Washington and had a conversation with Colonel Bliss about the star-route cases. He told me that there were other attorneys in the cases along with himself; that there was Mr. William A. Cook for one, and, from what Colonel Bliss said about Mr. Cook, I was under the impression, and in point of fact I was told directly, that I was to be especially careful not to converse with Mr. Cook or have anything whatever to say to him about the cases; not to tell him what I was engaged upon and not to let him see any of the indictments.

By Mr. HEMPHILL:

Q. Who told you that?—A. Colonel Bliss.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. At what time was it that he told you that?—A. It must have been some time about the 23d of January—about two days after I had been commissioned. He told me also that Mr. A. M. Gibson was engaged in the case, and that Mr. Gibson was another person I must not converse with, because he had done something which I did not then clearly understand, but, from what Colonel Bliss said, I came to the conclusion that it was some improper conduct. I want to say that at that time I knew neither Mr. Cook nor Mr. Gibson. I never have spoken to Mr. Cook in my life, that I know of. Mr. Gibson I have spoken to on a number of occasions. I was also informed by Colonel Bliss that Mr. Corkhill, who was the United States attorney here, was another gentleman with whom I was not to hold any communication. Of course, I wanted to ascertain who were in the cases, and the persons from whom I could obtain information about them. Colonel Bliss sat down and gave me a short general outline of the cases. He explained to me that there were two kinds of cases; one was the cases in which there had been expedition and increase of service; the other, the straw-bond cases, in which parties had put in bogus securities and worthless bonds. He gave me some papers that he called "abstracts," and said, "Here are abstracts of these cases made by Mr. Woodward; take them and read them over; here are the papers; look over them for yourself and see what you can make out of them." I glanced over the pile of papers without handling them and I took the abstracts (a pile probably about a foot thick) and put them by themselves where I could get at them again. I then went back to the Department of Justice and made up my mind that I would have to begin the case the wrong way, that is, that I must commence by studying the law. The first thing I found was that there were several kinds of laws in force in the District of Columbia. I found in the first place that the laws of Maryland which were enacted prior to the 27th day of February, 1801, were in force here in so far as they had not been repealed by act of Congress; and those laws were in force here notwithstanding they were no longer in force in Maryland. The next species of laws were laws that pertained specially to this District, special acts of Congress relating to the District of Columbia; and next there were the general laws of Congress which, unless otherwise inapplicable, applied to the District of Columbia. Having ascertained these points as to the laws in force, I found there was a great deal of difficulty and complication attending the correct interpretation of the law. They had their own law and their own practice here, and I felt at a loss for want of somebody to consult who knew from experience something about the law and the practice of the courts here. But of course my instructions were to have nothing to say to anybody, and I had to do the best I could under those instructions. After looking into the matter somewhat, I found that, as a general rule, the common law prevailed here to a great extent. I then commenced to study the facts of the case so as to apply the law to the facts and see just where the case was. I had to go into the Post-Office Department and make a study of the mode in which they made their contracts, how they arranged them, what was required to be done in connection with the contracts, and an additional complication here arose owing to the fact that the rules and regulations of the Post-Office Department, made by the Postmaster-General, under the law of Congress have the same force and effect as laws. Of course there are no legal penalties attached to the violation of these regulations, but still in these matters they have the force and effect of laws. I managed to become acquainted with the manner in which the business was done in the Post-Office Department, and then I made an attack upon the papers in the star-route cases. In the mean time Colonel Bliss had taken certain cases before Judge Snell in the police court, as they call it, and every day the cases were being heard there. So of course I had to wait until the papers were returned from the police court before I could get an opportunity to do anything with them. When I got the papers I made a synopsis of every paper belonging to the Post-Office Department relating to these cases, and I found that the synopsis was of great use to me afterwards. I then began to see that the work was a much greater one than I had anticipated. Colonel Bliss told me that most of the cases would be outlawed by the 4th of March; that the grand jury then sitting would go out of existence on that day, and that unless I had the indictments ready by that time the defendants would escape punishment. When I had made my arrangements I applied to the Department for assistance. Two gentlemen who were stenographers were detailed, and I afterwards employed four other clerks, making six in all. Colonel Bliss talked to me about the framing of the bill. He said he thought the charge ought to be conspiracy. I went over all the papers carefully, to ascertain whether I could make out a separate charge against any one of the defendants. I found that many of the papers that had been filed in the Post-Office Department showed, and they evidently were forgeries. That is, I found on different routes papers of the same character, signed with the same names, and from that there could be but one inference, namely, that one or the other set of papers were forgeries. I studied that matter out very carefully, and came to the conclusion that if every one of these people, Dorsey, Brady, and the others who were afterwards indicted, had done any one of these acts separately they would undoubtedly have been able to escape punishment, because there was no United States statute that met the case—nothing even at common law.

Therefore we were driven to the charge of conspiracy. When we decided that we must charge conspiracy, another question arose. It seems that in 1879, Congress amended section 5440 of the Revised Statutes. Now, as some of these acts had been done prior to that date, the question arose whether the new section as amended had abrogated the old one—whether the old offense was wiped out by the amendment of the statute. Section 5440 is what is called the conspiracy section. We found also that a number of the acts done dated later than the time of the amendment of the section, and of course they would be covered by the new law.

Then the next point to be determined was how the overt acts were to be set out. It seemed that section 5440 had never undergone judicial examination and interpretation. We could find no decision anywhere by which any of the questions arising under that section had been decided. We had to look at the point whether the overt act might be a mere innocent act, or whether it must necessarily be a criminal act. The section says that "if two or more persons conspire either to commit any offense against the United States, or to defraud the United States in any manner or for any purpose, and one or more of such persons do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, all the parties to such conspiracy shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000, and imprisonment," and so on.

Now, if two or more persons conspire to commit any offense against the United States, of course under that statute you would have to set out not only conspiracy but the overt act done in pursuance of it. That led to the conclusion, in my mind at least, that Congress had determined that the act itself need not be a criminal act, but that any act committed, showing that the parties intended to commit the offense, would be sufficient to bind all the parties to the conspiracy.

The next point in the statute is, "or to defraud the United States in any manner or for any purpose." It appears that there is no section in the Revised Statutes which provides for a fraud against the United States except in the revenue department. You can defraud any other department as much as you please; the revenue department is the only one around which any protection is thrown by statute.

Then the next point was to find out the meaning of conspire "to defraud." Of course there are common-law frauds and cheats, but the question was whether they existed in the District of Columbia. It occurred to me that Congress had created a new offense, a "conspiracy to defraud the United States," and that under that head would come any fraud which was made such at common law; and upon that theory the indictment was prepared. I stated that view to Colonel Bliss, and he agreed with me. He said it was a case of conspiracy or nothing.

The next point requiring attention was the names of the people who were to be included in the indictment—I speak now especially of the indictment against Dorsey. Colonel Bliss gave me the names of the people that were to be put into that indictment. He said, "My judgment is that these people [handing me a list] should be put in the indictment." I took the list that he gave me and examined the papers very carefully to ascertain how far they bore out what Colonel Bliss had stated. I found that the names he then gave me were all mentioned in the papers in the case in one way or another. In addition to that, I was given the names of the different people who were to be indicted in the straw-bond cases.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Do you remember the names that Mr. Bliss gave you?—A. Yes, sir; I do. I dreamed of them for two years, so I ought to know them.

Q. Please state them.—A. I will come to them in the regular order. Colonel Bliss furnished me with the names of the people that he said ought to be included in the straw-bond indictments. In the Dorsey case the names that were furnished me were, John W. Dorsey, Stephen W.

Dorsey, John R. Miner, John M. Peck, Henry M. Vaile, M. C. Rerdell, J. L. Sanderson, and William H. Turner. I found that Sanderson figured on only one route, and I did not pay much attention to him, from the fact that he did appear only in that one route, but it was concluded that it would be better to put him in the indictment, because a good deal might depend upon the oral testimony as to how he should figure in the other routes. I went to Colonel Bliss and told him that I would like to have the Christian names of the people that were given me to be included in the indictment, because in some localities the courts were very particular about the Christian names, while in others they were not, and I desired to get the Christian names of these parties so as to put the indictments in such a shape that it would be impossible for them to demur to it, or to move to quash, or to put in a plea in abatement. I told Colonel Bliss that I must have Rerdell's name, and Sanderson's. I want to call attention particularly to the fact that I had been furnished with the name Henry M. Vaile because it turned out that Mr. Vaile's name was not Henry, but Harvey. That, however, was no concern of mine. I was not responsible for that, because the names were furnished to me. Colonel Bliss told me that he did not know what Rerdell's Christian name was. I said that the Government ought to be able to get it. He said it was impossible to get it; that they had tried to get it, but could not succeed. I went to Mr. Woodward and asked him the same question. He told me that Rerdell was an adventurer, and that nobody here knew his name. I went to Mr. Shallcross, a post-office inspector. He told me he did not know Rerdell's name and could not find it out. I went to Captain Tidball, who was then a post-office inspector, and he told me he did not know anything about it. Now, you will remember that all these gentlemen had been for some time connected with the star-route cases before I came in. I went back and told Colonel Bliss that I had failed to get Rerdell's name, and that I feared there might be trouble about it. "Well," said he, "What can we do? We cannot find it out." We talked the matter over and I said to him that it might be that the court would sustain the indictment without the Christian names, but that at all events the worst that could happen to us would be that Rerdell would be compelled to come in with a plea in abatement and give us his full name. Of course that would compel us to write out a new indictment, but the mere manual labor of writing out the indictment would not be a very great matter. As for Sanderson, they said they did not know at that time what his name was, and as I did not know whether Sanderson was a great contractor or was merely a letter-carrier, or something of that sort, and as his name appeared to be connected with only one route, I concluded that I would pass him by. I then set to work to prepare the indictment.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you mean that you dropped Sanderson's name out from the indictment, or that you put it in "J. L. Sanderson"?—A. His name was put in as "J. L. Sanderson," and Rerdell was put in as "M. C. Rerdell." As I have stated, I had six clerks employed in the work of preparing the indictments, two of them being stenographers. I would dictate to the stenographers for an hour or so on separate indictments, and then I would be compelled to prepare the copy for the other clerks. To do that, of course, I had to sit up all night, and in that way I kept the six men employed steadily from the 1st of February to the 4th of March writing indictments—each one writing a separate indictment upon a separate subject. I worked sometimes all night. Generally I got back to the hotel about 4 or 5 o'clock in the morning, took an hour or two of sleep and a bath, and went back to the office; because I had to keep my assistants supplied with copy. I had been told, you will remember, that if I did not get those indictments done by the 4th of March the parties would go free. By the 4th of March I had the indictments all complete. As fast as I got them ready I sent them in to the grand jury in order to get rid of them. They were completed in the following order:

- 14240. John N. Minnix: Perjury, February 28, 1882.
- 14241. Charles H. Dickson: Perjury, February 28, 1882.
- 14242. Samuel G. Cabell, John N. Minnix, Charles H. Dickson: Conspiracy, February 28, 1882.
- 14247. John W. Dorsey: Perjury, March 1, 1882.
- 14248. John W. Dorsey: Perjury, March 1, 1882.
- 14249. John R. Miner: Perjury, March 1, 1882.
- 14250. K. M. Armstrong, James W. Donohoe, Wm. W. Jackson, Albert E. Boone, Samuel G. Cabell: Conspiracy, March 1, 1882.
- 14251. James B. Henderson, James W. Donohoe, Wm. W. Jackson, Albert E. Boone, Samuel G. Cabell: Conspiracy, March 3, 1882.
- 14252. William W. Jackson: Perjury, March 3, 1883.
- 14253. James W. Donohoe: Perjury, March 3, 82.
- 14254. Samuel G. Cabell: Subornation of perjury, March 3, 1882.
- 14255. Albert E. Boone: Subornation of perjury, March 3, 1882.
- 14256. Albert E. Boone, Wm. S. Barringer, Alvin O. Buck: Conspiracy, March 3, 1882.
- 14257. Albert E. Boone, Edwin J. Sweet: Conspiracy, March 3, 1882.
- 14260. Alvin O. Buck, Wm. S. Barringer, Albert E. Boone: Conspiracy, March 4, 82.
- 14261. K. M. Armstrong: Perjury, March 4, 1882.
- 14262. John W. Dorsey, John R. Miner, John M. Peck, Stephen W. Dorsey, Henry M. Vaile, M. C. Rerdell, J. L. Sanderson, Thomas J. Brady, William H. Turner: Conspiracy, March 4, 1882.
- 14336. John W. Dorsey, John R. Miner, John M. Peck, Stephen W. Dorsey, Harvey M. Vaile alias H. M. Vaile, Monfort C. Rerdell alias M. C. Rerdell alias Montfort C. Ruddell, Thomas J. Brady, Wm. H. Turner: Conspiracy, May 20, 1882.

These are all of that lot.

Q. How long were you preparing those indictments?—A. I received my commission on the 21st day of January, 1882, and I finished that work on the 4th of March. The grand jury made their presentments on the 4th of March, 1882.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. What were the indictments for perjury based upon?—A. They were based upon the affidavits that had been put into the Post-Office Department in connection with the applications for increase and expedition. There is no special United States statute by which they could be indicted. That is a question that the courts should determine, or Congress should pass a law to that effect. If the statutes are broad enough to cover the offense, very well; if not, they should be made so.

Q. Was it a question of deliberation among the counsel for the Government whether indictments would be for perjury for affidavits made under the rules and regulations of the Department?—A. Yes, sir. We had some talk about that. I think some gentleman of this committee wanted to know at some time in the course of this investigation why we did not prepare indictments for perjury. We did. We wanted to test that question. There are seven indictments for perjury, two for subornation of perjury, and seven for conspiracy.

Q. What was done with the perjury indictments?—A. They have never been tried. There are three of those that relate to that class of cases in which affidavits were filed in order to get expedition; but in the other cases there is not a shadow of doubt of the ability of the Government to convict the parties who were indicted. They swore that the property which they claimed to own was worth a certain amount of money, when, in point of fact, it was worth nothing of the kind. They went security upon bonds to the amount of millions—a man making oath that he owned certain property and that it was worth so much, when, in point of fact, he did not own it and it was not worth anything like the amount he swore to.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Were the defendants arraigned on those indictments?—A. No. The indictments were all demurred to and motions were made to quash, and all that sort of thing, but the court sustained the indictments.

By Mr. HEMPHILL:

Q. But the parties have never been brought to trial on those indictments?—A. They have never been brought to trial.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Have those parties been arrested and brought into court?—A. They may have been. I cannot answer that.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Is it your opinion as a lawyer that convictions could be obtained on those indictments for perjury?—A. It is my opinion that convictions ought to be obtained. Whether they would be or not is another question.

By Mr. HEMPHILL:

Q. As a question of law, do you think the parties ought to be convicted on those indictments?—A. Most undoubtedly they ought to be, and they could be convicted before any fair court and jury. Here is a specimen case: Charles H. Dickson swore that he owned a piece of property of the value of $25,000. In the point of fact he did not own that property; it was conveyed to him by a relative of his simply that he might become surety on this bond. One day he swore that the property was worth $25,000 and a few days afterwards he swore that it was worth $50,000; and I forget how many hundred thousand dollars he became surety for. And Charles H. Dickson to-day is holding a confidential position in the Department of the Interior.

Q. What position does he hold?—A. I only know that he is in the Department and that he has lately been promoted.

Q. Is the indictment against him still pending?—A. Here it is. It is as bad a case as ever was brought. A man was sent to jail in Philadelphia not long ago who was not one one-hundredth part as guilty as this man Dickson.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Is the Dickson who is employed in the Interior Department the same man who took this false oath as to his property?—A. Certainly he is.

Q. Do you make any distinction in the opinion you have given between the straw-bond cases and indictments for perjury based upon the affidavits made in connection with the applications for expedition and increase of service?—A. Oh, yes; there is a great distinction.

Q. Is it your opinion as a lawyer that indictments can be sustained under the United States laws upon, for instance, John W. Dorsey's affidavits in relation to expedition?—A. It is a very close shave. I think if I were on the bench I should say no; although I felt it to be my duty to prepare three of the strongest cases of that kind as a test.

By Mr. HEMPHILL:

Q. Those were upon the affidavits made to procure expedition?—A. Yes, sir.

The cases that you think can undoubtedly be sustained are those where false affidavits were made by parties as to the value of their property and other matters of that kind?—A. Oh, yes; there is a general law, you know, that if a person comes before a United States commissioner or a notary public, and takes a false oath in any matter that is required to be sworn to, it is perjury. These parties are required by law to swear to the value of their property, and their affidavits are filed in the Department, and upon the strength of them the contracts are awarded to the lowest bidders.

The CHAIRMAN. The Attorney-General has recommended the passage of a law which will make the swearing to an oath prescribed by the regulations of the Departments perjury.

The WITNESS. There was one other indictment, but for some cause the grand jury did not act upon it. For some reason or other it was not sent to the grand jury. That indictment I tore up, and with the others it made eighteen of these indictments altogether that I prepared.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Who were the defendants in that indictment?—A. I cannot remember now. I was pretty badly used up at that time, and I did not pay very much attention to it. I was acting under orders. I simply did the work, and did not pay any attention to what they were doing with the indictments.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Would not an indictment have lain against Brady, independently of the conspiracy charged, for receiving a bribe as a Government officer?—A. No, sir. There is no law that meets what he did except for conspiracy.

Q. Do you say that he was not indictable for such an offense as that?—A. Of course an indictment would lie for bribery if the evidence warranted it.

Q. So that, so far as Brady was concerned, it was not necessary that he should be indicted for conspiracy; he might have been indicted alone?—A. Provided we could have found the evidence to sustain the charge.

Q. Well, it seems that you did find it afterwards.—A. No. If we could have got such evidence there would have been no trouble.

Q. Mr. Price swore to that, didn't he?—A. I knew nothing about Price at that time. Later I did. Brady was afterwards indicted for that.

Q. Then, at that time there was no direct evidence known to the officers of the Government to show that Mr. Brady had received a bribe?—A. At that time I knew nothing about the facts of the case other than as they were given to me.

Q. You were simply employed to draw the indictments?—A. That was all; but I did not know anything of the evidence except as it was given to me.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What attorney went before the grand jury when those indictments were found?—A. I presume that Colonel Bliss did. My commission was made out in such a way that I could go if necessary.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. What measures did you take before you drew that indictment to ascertain the full name of Sanderson?—A. I have told you that I went to Colonel Bliss, and also to Mr. Woodward and to Mr. Shallcross.

Q. I thought that was in relation to Rerdell's name?—A. It was in relation to all of them.

Q. The answers you received referred to Rerdell, as I understood you. I understood you to say that they told you that he was an unknown man—an adventurer?—A. As to Rerdell, the answer that Woodward gave me was that he was an adventurer.

Q. Did Woodward say that he did not know what Sanderson's name was?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did not the name appear anywhere on the files of the Post-Office Department?—A. No, sir; nowhere except by the initials. I did not know at that time that Sanderson was the head and front of a great combination. I knew nothing about that. I depended upon my instructions and the advice and guidance that I got from Colonel Bliss.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Can you state why none of these cases, except the one known as the Dorsey-Brady case, went to trial?—A. That I could not tell you without drawing upon my imagination, which I do not want to do. As far as I personally know, the case of Dorsey and Brady was forced to trial by reason of the position that the defendants took. They went into the court and demanded a trial.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Suppose you go on with your recital of the history of the cases from the 4th of March?—A. Well, when the grand jury adjourned on the 4th of March there were still other indictments to be prepared in cases in which the statutory period would not expire at that date. Let me state at this point that there are three terms in the District of Columbia. One begins on the first Monday in December and winds up before the first Monday in March. The March term begins on the first Monday in March and winds up before the third Monday of June. The June term begins on the third Monday of June and lasts clean through until December.

On the 6th of March, 1882, the new grand jury came in. I was told to prepare indictments in the other cases in which the time had not expired, and I set to work to do it. I was told also to go ahead and prepare indictments against Salisbury and others, the Parkers, and the other great combinations, in whose cases the time would not expire until some date in June. I began to look a little into the facts of those cases to see where they stood, but Colonel Bliss told me that he would give them to me when he was done with them, and, as I understand from Colonel Bliss, he went before the grand jury with those cases. During the month of March there were some changes made in the Government counsel. On the 4th of March, the day the grand jury made these presentments, Mr. Gibson resigned his position as special counsel.

On the 17th of March William A. Cook resigned his position, and on the 29th of March Richard T. Merrick was appointed special assistant attorney-general. On the 31st of March we were called into court to meet the different motions that were made by the counsel for Dorsey and Brady and the people in the different cases. There were demurrers, motions to quash, applications for bills of particulars, and pleas in abatement, and it looked as if we had plenty of work before us. There were quite a number of indictments, and in relation to every one of them there was a motion of some sort. We began and took up the motions one after another. The principal case, of course, was that of the Dorsey-Brady indictment. In that case they filed motions to quash and demurrers—some demurrers and some motions to quash. They were all argued and were disposed of by the court one after another, and finally we had the case in such a situation that the court fixed the 4th day of May, 1882, for the beginning of the trial of that case. On that day, May 4, we went into court. You will remember, gentlemen, that in these cases you might fitly designate the residences of some of the witnesses by saying that they lived a month's distance from this city; some of them lived away off in Oregon; they had to come over the mountains on snow-shoes, and around to San Francisco in order to take the train to come here. During the month of March we had sent for the witnesses, so as to be ready to try the case when the time came. As soon as the court fixed upon the 4th of May as the day for the beginning of the trial, we sent for the witnesses who lived farthest off, and made arrangements for them to come in details, so as not to have them all here at once. As I have told you, I had started into these cases simply for the purpose of preparing the indictments, and I had no idea that I was ever to participate in the trial of them; I did not think of such a thing; I had never been spoken to about it. But after Mr. Merrick was appointed, the Attorney-General sent for and said, "Mr. Ker, I want you to take part in the trial of the cases." I said, "Very well." I thought the trial would last about a month, and I agreed to go into it. The Attorney-General said, "I want you to see Colonel Bliss and tell him that you will take the witnesses and examine them privately and quietly to ascertain what they can testify to; write out a brief of what you find they will testify to, and hand it to Colonel Bliss, so that at the trial he may know just what the witnesses are going to say, and in that way he will be relieved of a great deal of trouble. I want you," said the Attorney-General, "to attend particularly to that branch of the case." I went to Colonel Bliss and told him what the Attorney-General had said, and the colonel told me to never mind that; he said he would attend to that himself, that he did not want anybody to interfere in that business. I said no more.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did he give any reason for declining your assistance?—A. No, sir; he seldom gave any reason for anything. Colonel Bliss is a gentleman who is very quick and nervous, and when he is present nobody but himself can do anything. He is willing to shoulder more than he is able to carry.

Q. Did you have any conversation with him about the matter?—A. Colonel Bliss and myself very seldom had any conversation. He was a gentleman that—well, we had nothing in common. I had very little to say to Colonel Bliss. His manner was that of a very nervous gentleman—a person who could hardly control himself. I do not speak unkindly at all of him when I say that he was willing to shoulder more than he could carry. I simply mean that that is his nature. If another counsel was examining a witness Colonel Bliss could not keep out of that examination. I suppose that members of the committee who are members of the bar have met just such gentlemen. He does not mean anything wrong by it at all, but he is of that disposition; he wants to be into everything that comes along. The court fixed the 4th of May for the trial of the case, but on that day one of the Dorseys was absent, and the court gave him a week to come in. That brought it to the 11th of May. On the 11th of May Dorsey was present in court again, and the court then fixed the 22d day of May for the trial.

Q. At whose instance was that continuance had?—A. That was had because the court was crowded with business. It seems they had some other cases that they wanted to try in the meantime. On the 11th, after the court had announced the continuance until the 22d, Rerdell's counsel filed a plea in abatement, alleging that we had used Rerdell's initials in the indictment. We immediately joined issue on this plea, setting up that he was known as well by "M. C." as by "Montfort C." The matter was to be decided on the following Tuesday, or a day or two afterwards. We went into court prepared to go on with the trial of this plea in abatement, but the judge took the bit in his teeth and said he would decide the question himself, and he quashed the indictment as to Rerdell, on the ground that the Christian name must be given. I tried to convince the court that the rule could not be of universal application, because a Chinaman or a Mohammedan had not a Christian name, and therefore could not be so indicted; but it was no use. The judge said that every man in the District of Columbia must be indicted, if indicted at all, by his Christian name. After we wound up that part of the case I found that I had to prepare another indictment. If Rerdell had not given us his proper name in his plea, we would have been as badly off as before. I set to work to prepare a new indictment and to have it ready before the case should be called on the 22d. In the meantime, witnesses were constantly arriving. I prepared the new indictment and sent it to the grand jury, and they presented it on the 20th, two days before the case was called for trial.

Q. What became of Sanderson's name?—A. At that time Mr. Merrick was in the case, and when the court quashed the indictment as to Rerdell he wanted to have inserted in the indictment some of the overt acts, allegations that the parties had made false claims for money. He said he considered that it would strengthen the indictment, and I thought so, too. Then, again, we found that Vaile's name was not correctly given—that his name was "Harvey M.," instead of "Henry M.," so we held a meeting in the Department of Justice, where we went over the matter and considered the question of who should be put in the new indictment. There was some discussion as to whether Vaile's name should be put in. I said yes; that he appeared in so many of the papers—in almost two-thirds of them—that his name should be put in the indictment, and that point was settled in that way. The next question was as to Sanderson. Colonel Bliss said that he ought to be dropped. Mr. Merrick said he did not know anything at all about that, and would leave it entirely to me; he suggested to Colonel Bliss that the whole of that matter should be left to me, and Colonel Bliss acquiesced in the suggestion. I think it was the same day, or the next day, that Colonel Bliss came to see me and spoke about Sanderson's name being in the indictment. He said that Sanderson had met him at the hotel (at the Arlington, I think), and had said that he did not mind so much being indicted, but that he objected to having his name mixed up with such a crowd as that. I think I made some jocular remark to the effect that he need not give himself any trouble about that. You see, Sanderson's name occurred on only one route, and I did not think there was enough in the case against him to put his name in the indictment.

Q. Did Colonel Bliss say that he had had a conversation with Sanderson about it?—A. He said he had met Sanderson, or that Sanderson had met him, at the hotel, and had said that he did not mind so much being indicted as being mixed up with such a crowd.

Q. Did you ask Mr. Bliss whether he had taken that occasion to ask Sanderson what his first name was?—A. We did not want Sanderson's name then. I had concluded to drop him out of the indictment.

Q. Did you know at that time that he was at the head of one of the largest combinations of mail contractors?—A. Oh, yes; but I understood that his turn was to come next. I understood that during the March session he was to be brought in with his combination, and therefore I felt perfectly willing to leave him out of this case. Now, I have heard it reported that Sanderson paid some money for that. Colonel Bliss has said that he did not receive any, and I now say that I never saw any of Sanderson's money; never got a cent of it, or anything whatever from him; never met Mr. Sanderson or any of his friends, and if he was induced to pay any money to have his name omitted from that indictment, why it was a great outrage upon him.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. I understood you to say that you omitted Mr. Sanderson's name from that indictment because you thought the evidence was not sufficient to justify you in inserting it?—A. That was it exactly; but beyond that I was under the impression that he and his combination would come up before the next grand jury. That was my understanding of the matter.

By Mr. HEMPHILL:

Q. With whom did you have that understanding?—A. Well, I had that understanding from Colonel Bliss. I had no understanding with him. You will remember that I was only doing as I was directed.

Q. You understood, you say, from Colonel Bliss, that an indictment against the Sanderson combination would be presented later?—A. Oh, yes. Colonel Bliss told me that all the other combinations would be brought before the coming grand jury.

Q. And that he desired to have Sanderson put in the crowd in which he belonged?—A. That was it exactly. I understood that Sanderson's case was then before the grand jury. Colonel Bliss at that time was going before the grand jury in, from what he told me, the Salisbury cases, the Parker cases, the Roots & Kerens cases, and also the cases of the Sanderson combination. I understood that all the other great combinations were to be brought before that grand jury, and that in point of fact they were before it. Colonel Bliss was managing that. He was going before the grand jury. Now, you will remember that it was in May the Attorney-General had told me that I was to assist in the trial, and therefore I felt that I had more to say than I had had previously, when I was simply directed to prepare the indictments. I dropped Sanderson's name out of the indictment, and I think it was right that that should be done, and that it would have been wrong to have included him in that indictment. On the morning of the 22d, the day fixed for the trial, the new indictment was ready. The defendants were called to plead to it, and they filed demurrers and motions to quash and motions for bills of particulars, but the court summarily overruled them all. By the time we got through with these motions it must have been about the 24th or the 25th of the month. Colonel Corkhill, the district attorney, said that he had a lot of cases that he would like to dispose of, and he asked the court if it would not dispose of them before taking up these long star-route cases. The judge said he would do so, and he fixed June 1 for the trial of the Dorsey case, and said he would hear no more dilatory motions and no more applications. Therefore the trial began on the 1st of June, 1882.

Now, I do not think there is anything further that you want to hear from me about that trial.

Q. The trial continued from day to day until what time?—A. The trial was concluded on the 15th day of September, 1882. After I had applied to Colonel Bliss and told him of the directions I had received from the Attorney-General about the examination of witnesses, I ventured to ask him about the witness Walsh, who was then figuring considerably in the newspapers, as, from what I could understand of his probable testimony, I thought he might be of some use to us in the case. Colonel Bliss told me that Walsh was a man of bad character, that nobody would believe him, and that it was not worth while to have anything to do with him. There was another gentleman named Moore, who was supposed to be a valuable witness, but Colonel Bliss said that Moore was a bad man, that nobody would believe him, and that there was no use in paying any attention to him. Of course, therefore, I paid no further attention to that testimony. During the trial Mr. Merrick got into communication with Boone. Boone has been indicted a number of times in the straw-bond cases. He is a member of the bar of this city, a very smart fellow, and, I guess, about as honest as any of these mail contractors, and he is certainly the brightest of the lot. He could buy and sell the whole of them. Boone did not put himself in a position where they could attack him personally without going through some other people. Although he is included in these indictments, still you could conveniently convict every other man there without harming Boone, and I do not doubt that he would come out all right and make out a very good case for himself. When Mr. Merrick got hold of Boone it was discovered that Moore would be a very valuable witness, a witness of immense value in connecting Stephen W. Dorsey with these transactions, and Mr. Merrick was very angry that Moore had not been subpœnæd. Then, when he found what Walsh could testify to, he was angry also because Walsh had not been subpœnæd, and because there had not been more attention paid to him. Some time during the middle of the trial—I cannot tell the exact point—we stopped at the Post-Office Department one day and talked a little over the evidence that had been put into the case. I went out to one of the rooms and was waiting for Mr. Merrick to come out. I think I was writing some memoranda when he came out. Mr. Merrick was very much excited, and he said, “Are you going up?”—meaning up toward the hotel. I said, “Yes.” I walked with him out through the corridor, and he said to me in a very excited manner, “What do you suppose that man wants?” I said, “Who?” He said, “Bliss.” I said, “I don’t know; what does he want?” “Well,” said he, “he wants me to let Dorsey go.” Said I, “What does he mean by that?” “Why,” said Mr. Merrick, “he wants to let Dorsey escape. He says we can convict the rest, but he wants to let Dorsey go.” I said that probably Colonel Bliss had only thrown that out as a suggestion as to what would be expedient. “No,” said Mr. Merrick, “he means it.” “Oh, well,” said I,

"he cannot have meant it as seriously as you take it." "Yes," said he, "he did mean it. Now, look here; just think of the Salisbury cases, and think of this matter of Walsh's, and these other cases, and then look at the Kellogg matter, and put them all together. I tell you it is my conviction that he wants to let Dorsey go." I told Mr. Merrick that he ought not to think that way, that probably Colonel Bliss did not mean any harm, or did not mean anything wrong by the suggestions; but Mr. Merrick was very firm in his conviction that Colonel Bliss did mean something wrong. He said to me, "I will tell you what he wanted me to do. He wanted me to go to the Attorney-General and tell him that three were too many in the case, and that the Attorney-General had better dismiss you and let him and myself [meaning Colonel Bliss and Mr. Merrick] run the case." I told Mr. Merrick to go to the Attorney-General and tell him; that probably Colonel Bliss was actuated by a proper motive; that I had no doubt that he was; that I saw nothing in his conduct to indicate otherwise; that he probably wanted to save the Government expenses, and I was very willing to go at any time, and, in point of fact, that I would like to go. Mr. Merrick said, "No;" that if I went out of the case he would go, too; that he wanted me to remain in the case and help him to watch Bliss. I told him that was a very unpleasant thing to do. "Well," said he, "we are going right ahead, and you must keep watch and see that everything goes on all right."

Q. Did you tell the Attorney-General of the facts which you have now stated?—A. Mr. Springer, you always anticipate me. No, sir; I did not tell him. The Attorney-General said to me not long ago, when I had to give an explanation of these matters, that my not telling him before was a dereliction of duty on my part; but I did not think it was, and I would not have told it to him then, nor would I tell it to you gentlemen now, only that it is absolutely necessary in order to explain some matters that followed. What Colonel Bliss said was not said to me, it was said to Mr. Merrick; and if it was the duty of anybody to tell the Attorney-General of it, it was Mr. Merrick's duty. At the time I did not put any faith in the thing. I did not think that Colonel Bliss was acting improperly; I had no such idea.

Q. Do you know when the Attorney-General first learned of Mr. Bliss's conduct in that respect?—A. The Attorney-General first learned of that during the month of April of this year.

Q. Did he not learn of it from some newspaper publication at the time?—A. No; he learned of it from me, and when he did he got up and walked the floor and accused me of a want of friendship and a dereliction of duty, and all that sort of thing. I have very great respect for the Attorney-General, but I would not have told him of that if I had not been compelled to do so.

Q. Was there not a publication in the New York Herald about that time of a purported interview with Mr. Bliss, in which he expressed doubt as to the strength of the case against Dorsey?—A. I do not know. I could not undertake to keep the run of Colonel Bliss's interviews, unless they came within the scope of the case.

Well, the trial went on during the summer, and we arranged the order of speaking in the summing up. I was to speak first, as I had a complete list of the papers. I ought to have said that the mode which we marked out for conducting the business in court was that Colonel Bliss was to offer the papers to the jury and to examine the Government witnesses; Mr. Merrick was to argue the points of law and to cross-examine the witnesses, and I was to do whatever I was directed to do, especially to see that the papers all went into the case—that there was no mistake made about that. Colonel Bliss had the papers, and he put in what he thought were necessary. At that time Mr. Merrick, of course, did not fully understand the case. It would have been utterly impossible for him to have understood it fully, and he learned it in detail only as the trial progressed. By saying that he learned it only in that way, I mean that there were some portions of it that he only became familiar with in that way. Of course he had a general knowledge of the case, because he had gone over the papers very patiently and elaborately, but as the case progressed there was more or less development of matters that none of us had anticipated. In the final argument, I opened the case and Colonel Bliss followed. Then the defendants' counsel followed Colonel Bliss, and it was arranged that the Attorney-General was to close the case, but between Mr. Merrick and the Attorney-General there were to be a couple of speeches by Colonel Ingersoll and Mr. Jeremiah Wilson. After I had spoken and after Colonel Bliss had spoken, he went to New York, and while he was there he was interviewed. The interview appeared in the New York Herald of Friday, August 12, 1882. Here is an extract from that interview, which is dated at Clayton, N. Y., August 24 :

* * * * *

Dropping politics, the conversation glided to the star-route trials, and Colonel Bliss was asked what he thought of Colonel Bob Ingersoll's claim that the Government had no case.

"Mr. Ingersoll, I think," he replied, "will find out before the trials are over that the cases contained a good deal of meat for the Government. The one against Mr. Dorsey, defended by the brilliant colonel, is admitted to be the weakest of the lot, but in all the others a verdict for the prosecution is confidently looked for, and even that may be decided in the same way."

This interview was the subject of an editorial in the New York Herald of August 26, 1882, which is as follows :

MR. MERRICK'S ARGUMENT.

Mr. Merrick evidently does not share the views expressed by his colleague, Mr. Bliss, in yesterday's Herald, that the case against ex-Senator Dorsey is "the weakest of the lot." Mr. Bliss apparently proceeded on this theory in his argument before the jury, which is noticeable for the lack of stress laid upon Dorsey's connection with the conspiracy. Mr. Merrick, on the other hand, finds in both the law and the evidence abundant materials for making an arraignment of Dorsey, which is as masterly as it is fearless. He declares that while Brady was the central figure, ex-Senator Dorsey was the life of the conspiracy; that it was Dorsey "who led them all, who stood in the van like Satan among his fallen hosts," and that the evidence shows "enough ill-gotten gains in Dorsey's pockets to weigh him down before any honest jury in any honest country." Mr. Merrick's sincerity in reaching these conclusions is as manifest as his ability in maintaining them. When the case is given to the jury, no more earnest and effective argument than his will have been made on either side. As to the question of ex-Senator Dorsey's guilt, the public will wait with keen interest to see whether, in closing the case for the Government, Attorney-General Brewster will take the view of Mr. Merrick or that of Mr. Bliss.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Chairman, I object to either of those extracts going into our record.

The CHAIRMAN. I think you will find that the publication of this interview and this editorial entered into the case materially before the end came.

Mr. STEWART. It is no evidence against Mr. Bliss, what some newspaper reporter attributed to him, and certainly the comments of a newspaper are not evidence of anything which this committee ought to consider.

The CHAIRMAN. I think you will find that the appearance of these articles in the newspapers affected materially the subsequent course of the Government counsel, and is admissible as evidence bearing upon the good faith of Mr. Bliss in the prosecution.

Mr. STEWART. But I do not think that, upon any principle of law, what somebody says Mr. Bliss said in an interview is evidence either as against Mr. Bliss or the prosecution generally, or anybody else. It is a mere piece of gossip. Then, as to this editorial, the comment of a newspaper is, of course, of no particular consequence any way, so far as we are concerned; but beyond that, this particular comment is based upon some supposed state of facts which is not proved.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the next paper to be offered, a letter signed by Mr. Bliss himself, which was published in the New York Herald, refers to this very article.

The WITNESS. I was going to state that.

The CHAIRMAN (to Mr. Stewart). Let the witness make his statement, and we will see afterwards what effect it will have.

Mr. STEWART. Very well; let the testimony stand for the present, subject to objection.

The CHAIRMAN (to the witness). Proceed.

The WITNESS. That was followed by a telegram from Mr. Bliss to the Herald, dated Alexandria Bay, New York, August 26, 1882, and reading as follows:

To the Editor of the Herald:

I have not at hand the Herald containing the interview with me, but your editorial of to-day indicates either that you misapprehend its purport or your reporter has failed to report me accurately. I have never by word or thought questioned ex-Senator Dorsey's prominence in the route conspiracy. I have only said that, owing to the exclusion of testimony by the court, the case proved was not as strong against Dorsey as against others.

GEORGE BLISS.

The Attorney-General was very angry about the publication in the Herald, and gave directions that there should be all the greater effort made to show that Mr. Dorsey was connected with the star-route cases. It seems that in Colonel Bliss's speech he had hardly mentioned Dorsey's name, and the Attorney-General himself, or Mr. Merrick, can tell you what conversation they had about it, but I know that the Attorney-General was very much exercised in mind about this interview with Mr. Bliss, more especially as during the argument of the case Mr. McSweeney, a gentleman from Ohio, who was employed as one of the counsel for the defendants, pulled out of his pocket a little book, which proved to be the bill of fare of the complimentary dinner that had been given by Dorsey (or ostensibly given to him, though it was said that he paid for it himself), at which Mr. Arthur, who is now President, and Colonel Bliss had attended; the dinner being given right after the close of the Presidential campaign. This bill of fare was exhibited by Mr. McSweeney to show that the President and prominent men had favored Dorsey in the days of his influence. Of course Mr. McSweeney was not permitted to get the book into the case, but he made the attempt. It turned out that the book had been given to him by Mr. Bliss.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Was Mr. McSweeney counsel for one of the defendants?—A. He was one of the counsel for Dorsey, and he pulled this book, which belonged to Colonel Bliss, out of his pocket to show the jury that Colonel Bliss and these other gentlemen had attended this dinner that had been given to Dorsey.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was that in the argument of the case before the jury?—A. Yes.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. He did not show the book to the jury, did he?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he allude to it in his argument?—A. Yes. He was talking as rapidly as he could about Dorsey and about this dinner, and he just pulled out the book and showed it.

Q. That was entirely irregular, of course?—A. Yes, of course it was irregular, but he was simply practicing what is often seen at the bar, where a lawyer can sometimes shove in a dozen words or more before he can be stopped. The matter was published in the papers, especially in the Critic here, and I understand that copies of the paper were served at the houses of the jurors, so they all knew what Mr. McSweeney produced the book for.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. The point here, as I understand it, is that Mr. McSweeney, representing Dorsey, attempted to bring to the attention of the jury a matter which was not in evidence at all, for the purpose of showing Dorsey's good character and standing before these proceedings were begun, and that this book, which he produced for this purpose, was furnished to him by Colonel Bliss, one of the counsel for the Government.—A. No; I think that is stating it too broadly.

Q. Well, state, then, what was done.—A. The effect that Mr. McSweeney wanted to produce, or the idea that he wanted to convey to the minds of the jury, was—and being a red-hot Democrat he could do it in that case a good deal better than a Republican could—the idea he wanted to convey was that the higher powers did not want Dorsey convicted.

Q. And Colonel Bliss had furnished that book to Mr. McSweeney?—A. Well, it had Mr. Bliss's name on it——

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. What do you say about that? Don't avoid the question. Did Colonel Bliss furnish the book, or not? If he did, say so.—A. I did not see him do that. I cannot say that he did, but the book had his name on it. He asked for it afterwards, but somebody had stolen it.

By Mr. HEMPHILL:

Q. Who asked for it?—A. Colonel Bliss. I did not see him give it to Mr. McSweeney. I know, however, that he spoke about it afterwards. That was one of the little things that occurred at that stage of the case. I don't want to dwell upon it, but I mention it to show one among a number of incidents that occurred at that time which led to a different arrangement of the work in the case.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. State what was the course of the counsel for the Government in the subsequent proceedings, in order to bring out clearly Dorsey's connection with the case.—A. Mr. McSweeney had made use of this book as I have stated, and when Mr. Wilson got up to address the jury he proceeded with great rapidity to read to the jury Colonel Bliss's interview, which I have quoted here; and also the editorial in the Herald. Of course the Attorney-General jumped up at once and protested against that being read to the jury. Mr. Wilson argued the point to the court. Of course that is another thing which you gentlemen very well understand, that when the court stops a lawyer who is offering something that ought not to go to the jury, the lawyer can argue the matter with the court, and tell the court what it was that he was going to tell the jury, so that the jury will get the benefit of it just as much as if he were talking to them. In this case Mr. Wilson said in a very innocent way, "I only wanted to show that Colonel Bliss, one of the Government counsel, does not believe that Mr. Dorsey is guilty, and for that purpose I was reading from this interview with him in the New York Herald." That made the Attorney-General object, and he protested against either the reading of the interview or any argument or statement about it, and the court decided that Mr. Wilson could not be allowed to argue that question before the jury. The Attorney-General had at that time prepared a lot of material showing how Mr. Dorsey's name occurred in connection with the star-route business. As he was preparing himself to make the closing argument, he sent for me, and got me to verify his facts, and I think he modified his speech considerably from what occurred, because he resolved to drop most of the outside points, and to devote his whole time and attention to Dorsey. He found in his investigation of the papers that the name of Stephen W. Dorsey occurred ninety-six times in the transactions connected with the nineteen routes included in the case, and he devoted the best portion of his time to impressing that fact upon the jury in order to show that Stephen W. Dorsey was the head and front of the whole thing.

Q. Did these transactions to which you refer appear in evidence in that case?—A. Yes, sir; in the evidence in that first case, Dorsey's name appeared ninety-six times; but if it had not been for the Attorney-General having the last speech, I don't know where we would have been with the case. We would have had the statement going to the jury uncontradicted that Dorsey did not appear in the transactions at all. We had never dreamt that there was to be any such tactics as that—any attempt to show that Dorsey had nothing to do with the case—because he was the head and front of the whole affair.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. What had you been doing in your presentation of the case? When you opened the case, did you not bring out the fact that Dorsey was connected with it?—A. Oh, yes.

Q. Then what do you mean by saying that but for the Attorney-General having the closing speech Dorsey's connection would not have been brought out before the jury?—A. It was brought out before, but the attention of the jury was not called to it particularly. You may state a fact, but unless you direct particular attention to it, it simply appears along with the rest of the evidence and receives no special notice. In presenting the case, I said to the jury, "Here is a paper," and went on to explain what the paper was, but I did not particularize Dorsey more than any of the others.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. You made a statement of what you expected to prove, and when Mr. Bliss came to sum up he forgot all about it so far as Dorsey was concerned. Is that it?—A. Colonel Bliss opened the case in the beginning, but I made the opening speech in the closing arguments, and I did not particularize Stephen W. Dorsey more than any of the other defendants.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Did you not call the attention of the jury to the fact that he was one of the defendants?—A. Yes, of course; to the fact that he was one of them; but there was a desperate effort made to save Dorsey and to show that he had really nothing to do with the case or with these star-route transactions, except as a Senator trying to benefit his brother and his friends; that he had simply signed his name to these papers without having any special interest in them, or anything particular to do with the transactions. The defense bent everything to making that impression upon the minds of the jury, and, therefore, it became a necessity on our side to take Dorsey alone and dwell upon his connection with the case and show that he was as deep in as the rest, and the result was that we found that his name appeared in a questionable light ninety-six times in the papers in connection with these star-route operations.

The CHAIRMAN. I suppose, Mr. Stewart, that you see no further objection to the introduction of this interview and the comment upon it?

Mr. STEWART. No. Mr. Bliss' letter makes that evidence admissible.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; and also the attempt to get it into the trial.

Mr. STEWART. Yes. It was a very improper thing to say anything about it on the trial.

The WITNESS. After the conclusion of the first trial, on the 15th of September, the judge fixed the 4th of the following December for the retrial of the case, the jury having disagreed.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Was Walsh a witness in the first trial?—A. Yes, sir; and so was Boone.

Q. Was Moore a witness in the first trial?—A. No; he was not here at all.

Q. Was Walsh impeached on that trial? Did they attempt to impeach him?—A. Oh, no. I do not think it would have been possible for them to have impeached Walsh. I made that a special study when it was determined that he was to be a witness, and I found that he could bring just as good men as any in this city to vouch for him and testify to his good character—bankers, brokers, and merchants. I was all prepared for any attempt to impeach him.

Now, as I was about to say, after the first trial had ended by the disagreement of the jury, the Attorney-General wrote us a letter directing us to go on with the case and make every preparation to begin the second trial. Mr. Merrick came to me at that time and said that I must take charge of getting the witnesses and examining them before they went upon the stand—that that business must be put entirely in my charge. Colonel Bliss acquiesced in that, and Mr. Merrick said, that in order to do the work properly, it would be necessary for me to have a room some place, where the witnesses could come and be examined without the other side knowing what was going on. We talked the matter over and it was suggested that if I went to the Department of Justice and brought the witnesses there, the defendants, who had all or nearly all the detective force in Washington at their command—because the detectives here were in league with the defendants and against the Government—it was suggested, I say, and we all agreed, that if I brought the witnesses to the Department of Justice, these detectives who were watching our every movement would know all about it and would be able to report to the defendants the name of every witness that we had. We concluded, therefore, that the Department of Justice would be too public a place. On the other hand, I could not go to a private boarding house because they would not be willing to allow that rabble of witnesses to come to a boarding house. The only available place, therefore, was a hotel. I could not go to Willard's, because that was too prominent a place, and there were too many of the defendant's friends congregating there; and finally Mr. Merrick suggested that he would engage a room for me at the Ebbitt House where it would be quieter; he said he would engage a bedroom with a parlor attached, where the witnesses could come, and I could examine them quietly without attracting much attention. The idea was to have the witnesses come there one by one, to question them and write out their testimony and have it all ready so that they could be properly examined when they appeared in court. Mr. Merrick carried out that suggestion by making an arrangement with the proprietor of the Ebbitt House for a room, which was occupied and used as I have stated. I make this explanation because it has been said that I paid an exorbitant price for board, and that I ought not to have paid any such price, and one of the papers here and a paper in New York have insinuated that I had my wife at the hotel and charged her board to the Government. I want to say, gentlemen, that I never did anything of the kind, and I don't think anybody but a contemptible, cowardly scoundrel would mix up a lady's name with such a transaction as that. As I have stated, Mr. Merrick engaged the room and fixed the price, and it was all done upon consultation with the other Government counsel.

We arranged that Boone should send out to bring on Moore for the second trial, and after a great deal of persuasion Mr. Boone agreed to allow his step-son to go out to get Moore. The young man went out, and somewhere in Montana hunted up Moore and brought him on for the trial. I took the witnesses as they arrived, and examined them. I took them separately and talked to them about the case. It occupied a good deal of time. You cannot get out of a witness what he knows about a case like that in five or ten minutes' examination. You have to talk to him and allow him to talk in order to find out just what he knows and what testimony you can get from him. As the witnesses came here they were sent to me, and I examined them one after another, and took their statements, and in many cases I found that the witnesses had not testified at the former trial to all they could testify to. In some instances I was surprised to find that they had not told one-half of what they knew, or not more than one-half. I was surprised, also, to find that they had never been examined by Colonel Bliss in advance as I was examining them for the second trial. It appeared that Colonel Bliss simply called them in and asked them about their route. The witnesses would say yes or no, as the case might be, and that was the end of the examination. I examined them much more fully, and, when there was too large a crowd of them, I would sometimes take them up to the Department of Justice, or direct them to meet me there, and I would ascertain from those present what persons were most likely to be able to supply the missing link of information in regard to any particular route. Then I would either telegraph or send out a messenger to hunt up those witnesses that were suggested in that way. I found that the United States marshals were not to be trusted in the matter of getting the Government witnesses; that it was impossible for the Government counsel in conducting this trial to depend upon the marshals, because in most instances they were either in sympathy with the defendants or were people that could not be depended upon to do as they were directed. For that reason I was compelled to employ a young lawyer (whose name I do not wish to mention unless the committee insist upon it) to go out and hunt up the witnesses and subpoena them. Of course in order to do that he had to be deputized as a marshal. In that way we collected the Government witnesses and secured their attendance. In the first trial we had 77 witnesses for the Government that were examined and 13 that were not examined. I don't know just why they were not examined; it may have been all right; I do not know anything about it, except that it was perhaps supposed that they did not know enough to make it worth while to put them on the stand. On the second trial, by sending out and getting witnesses in the way I have mentioned, we a got a good many more, and the total number on our side on the second trial was 150. On the 4th of December the second trial of the cases began.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Before you proceed to that, please state what was the nature of the additional evidence which you obtained, and which you had not had at the first trial.—A. It was principally implicating the Dorseys. The strongest part of the evidence was against the Dorseys, showing that they were in the case—Senator Dorsey, especially—as deeply as anybody.

Q. Did you find that there had been any special omission in the first trial of evidence that implicated Senator Dorsey?—A. Oh, yes. The case was made a great deal stronger against Dorsey at the second trial. It was made so strong that there could not be a shadow of doubt about it in the mind of any intelligent person.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. And from the mouths of witnesses who had been on the stand in the first trial?—A. Some of it was from those witnesses. But the witnesses Moore and Boone, when their testimony was properly brought out, threw a great deal of light upon matters that seemed dark before. With the testimony that was given by those witnesses, the case was lighted up considerably. Then, of course, Rerdell told a good many things that showed Stephen W. Dorsey's connection with the matter. The oral testimony of the witnesses from a distance was of such a character that the Dorseys were implicated much more clearly and strongly than they had been at the first trial.

By Mr. HEMPHILL:

Q. You obtained knowledge of these additional witnesses from the others who were already here?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. From the witnesses who had been examined on the first trial?—A. Yes, sir. Some of them had been examined in the first trial, but had not told all they knew. They had omitted some portions of their knowledge that would have been of great benefit to the Government in the case.

Q. And at the second trial those witnesses also told you of others, and you sent for those others?—A. Yes, sir. In the course of the examination of some of the witnesses I found out that there were others whose testimony would be material, and I took a witness, Joseph Pennell, and sent him back with a lot of subpoenas, with directions to find out these other people and subpoena them. I selected him for that service because you know you cannot always get a man who will go out into that wild country and bring in witnesses. It is not every man that they will come for, nor is it every man that will have the grit to travel over the mountains on snow-shoes and hunt up people in that way.

Q. Did the additional evidence which you obtained as to the Dorseys strengthen your case against them on the last trial?—A. Oh, very much.

Mr. STEWART. That does not appear from the result.

The WITNESS. Mr. Stewart, I have nothing to do with results. The first jury would have convicted if it had not been for the foreman. The second jury did not have nearly the intelligence of the first.

Q. Who was the foreman of the first jury? Was it Mr. Dickson?—

A. Yes, sir. You cannot expect people who don't know how to read or write to determine a case of forgery; neither can you challenge such people and keep them off the jury.

Q. How many men were there on the panel that could not read or write?—A. I think there were about three. I know that, however, only by hearsay.

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed with your statement.

The WITNESS. Well, do you want to know anything about the second trial?

The CHAIRMAN. If there is any important fact in relation to it that you have not yet mentioned, you may state it.

The WITNESS. As I have told you, there were 77 witnesses examined for the Government at the first trial and 13 that were not examined. We offered in evidence 2,300 papers. The testimony covered 3,286 printed pages. At the second trial we examined 150 witnesses; there were 2,761 papers offered in evidence; there were 4,481 pages of testimony, and, including speeches, there were 5,876 pages of the record. The second trial closed on the 14th of June, 1883. There was no disagreement between the counsel for the Government in any way during the second trial. Colonel Bliss, I think, had made up his mind that he was going for Dorsey, and he did go for him. Whatever he had lacked in the first trial he made up in the second. He went for Stephen Dorsey as vigorously and viciously as any of us.

Now, during the time of the first trial, there were other indictments that I prepared in addition to those I have mentioned. There were indictments presented by the grand jury as follows: 14355, against John H. Wallace, for perjury; 14356, against Marshall G. Candee, for perjury; 14357, against George V. Meserole, for conspiracy; 14358, against Meserole and Brady, for conspiracy; 14359, against Price and Brady, for conspiracy.

The total number of indictments that we prepared was 26. There was one that I prepared during the December term that was not used, and one that I started to prepare, in either the Salisbury or the Parker cases, I cannot tell which, but I prepared one indictment of that batch before the cases were taken away from the grand jury. That made 28 indictments that I prepared altogether in the star-route cases. Then I prepared, also, other indictments in the bribery cases, relating to the bribing of the jury. I think there were 8 of these indictments prepared.

Q. State what indictments were prepared in regard to attempts to bribe the jury.—A. Well, there were eight people who were implicated in attempts to bribe the first jury, and indictments were prepared against them.

Q. In whose interest was that tampering with the jury?—A. In the interest of the defendants.

Q. What was the nature of the charge in those indictments?—A. We charged the parties with attempting to influence the jury improperly.

Q. Just explain the facts as they came to your knowledge.—A. Well, I did not pay so much attention to the facts of the cases. Mr. H. H. Wells was employed as special counsel in those cases and he could give you a statement of the testimony. It would be useless for me to attempt to do so, because I simply prepared the indictments and did not give a great deal of attention to the facts. I don't know what has been done in the cases. I had nothing to do with them beyond the preparation of the indictments.

Examination suspended.

Adjourned.

WASHINGTON, May 27, 1884.

WILLIAM W. KER resumed the stand and was further examined.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed with your statement, Mr. Ker, in your own way.

The WITNESS. I want to say to the committee before I proceed that I am not indulging in any personal criticism here. I am not stating anything that I do not know either by it being told to me, or from my personal knowledge. I am content to state facts. I want somebody else to do the criticising. I do not propose to criticise here the conduct of any gentleman. I am sworn to tell the truth, and I simply want to state facts and let whoever feels competent to criticise do so.

Now, I have stated a conversation which took place between Mr. Merrick and myself in relation to Colonel Bliss desiring to let Mr. Dorsey go, and Colonel Bliss's subsequent action in producing the bill of fare of the New York dinner and his newspaper interview, to show the ground upon which certain hotel expenses were incurred in order to find a place where the witnesses could be brought quietly and examined. That is the reason why that expense was incurred and the reason why Mr. Merrick, I suppose upon consultation with the Attorney-General, arranged that plan of proceeding.

I want to make one statement here for the benefit of the members of the bar, some of whom have asked me about the quashing of that indictment. The court quashed the indictment as to M. C. Rerdell only. It did not quash the entire indictment, but only the indictment as to one of the persons named, Rerdell; and the court did that of its own motion. There was no application made to the court to quash the indictment. The judge assumed that he should take judicial notice of the indictment of Rerdell by his initials as an inaccuracy, and he called upon us for an explanation and an argument, and we made the argument. After nine years' experience in my own State, in this business, I am able to say that we use initials there in indicting without any question whatever, and I know that the same practice prevails in a number of other States, because I have made inquiry on that point. That is, the old common law rule requiring the Christian name of the party to be set out in the indictment is no longer in force, because the reason for it has ceased. In old times a man was best known by his Christian name. He acquired his surname by reputation; for example, a man was known as "John," or "Thomas," or "James" of such a place. It is like the "mystery." In former times it was regarded as necessary to set out the mystery, or craft or condition in life of the party, to state that a man was a yeoman or laborer, or that a woman was a spinster or a married woman; this was one means of identification, but it was only necessary where the process of outlawry was resorted to. So with regard to the Christian name. There seems to be no longer any necessity for setting it out in full in an indictment for the purpose of identification. In many places it is held that the initials are sufficient, but the judge held that in this district it is an absolute necessity to set out a Christian name in full.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Why was no notice taken of the fact that "J. L." Sanderson was indicted only by his initials?—A. I think that Sanderson was not brought in.

Q. He was in the indictment?—A. Yes, but there was no warrant for his arrest.

Now, after these indictments were found on the 4th of March, as I have stated, I went on preparing other indictments. The grand jury came into office after the 4th of March. The 4th day of March, 1882, was Saturday, and they came in on the following Monday, the 6th. Mr. Merrick came into the case on the 29th of March. At that time I had no idea that I was to take any part in the trial. I was told that the cases of Sanderson, Salisbury, the Parkers, Roots & Kerens, and others were before the grand jury; whether they were or not I cannot tell, because I had no personal knowledge of the matter other than the fact that Colonel Bliss told me that he was investigating those cases and had brought the witnesses on. I understood that Colonel Bliss, in order to throw the defendants off the scent and keep them from knowing what he was doing, had the witnesses sworn as of the Dorsey case. That is, the witnesses that were to be used in the Salisbury and Parker cases were sworn by the court to give testimony in the Dorsey case. That I know nothing about except from what he has testified to. Mr. Merrick, of course, knew nothing about those cases. He had lately come into the cases and he was not familiar with the facts. He was attending to getting this Dorsey case ready for trial, and the other matter was left entirely to Colonel Bliss. Some time before the grand jury of March, 1882, adjourned finally, Colonel Bliss came to me and told me that there was no use in bothering any further with the indictments as to the Parkers, Salisburys, and those people, because he said he had agreed to arbitrate the cases. I told him he could not do it. He said, "Why not?" Well there was no use in my discussing that question with him. I did not think he could do it, but he said he could. Of course that was an intimation to me that I was to stop my work on the indictments, and I stopped. Afterwards I was told that Colonel Bliss had entered into some sort of agreement to arbitrate those cases and had withdrawn them from the grand jury. Now, I do not know what the testimony was in regard to those routes generally, but there were several of them in which the testimony struck me as remarkably strong. There was a route from Pembina to Fargo in which the testimony was as strong as in any of the cases that I had an opportunity to judge of. However, the whole matter was taken away from the grand jury.

Q. Who was the foreman of that grand jury?—A. Mr. Mitchell, I suppose. I never went before that grand jury.

Q. What time in the term was it that Mr. Bliss told you that those cases were to be arbitrated?—A. It was somewhere about the close. They closed, you know, prior to the third Monday in June. It was somewhere just preceding the close of the term, and of course I knew that the statute of limitations would bar the offenses after that adjournment.

Q. Just state in detail the conversation that took place at that time between you and Mr. Bliss with regard to that arbitration.—A. Colonel Bliss came up to the room where I was in the Department of Justice and said: "Well, Ker, you need not bother yourself any more about those indictments." I said, "What is the matter?" He said, "I have agreed to arbitrate them; to take them away from the grand jury." I replied, "You can't do it." He said, "Why, not?" That was the end of it.

Q. Was the Mitchell grand jury still in session at that time?—A. I think so. That was the end of the conversation. I had no disposition to argue the matter with him, as he was the person who was responsible for it.

Q. You were proceeding to prepare indictments on those routes, and had got some of them ready?—A. Yes; I had some of them ready and I tore them up.

Q. In what cases had you prepared the indictments, as far as your recollection now goes?—A. There were so many indictments that I do not remember which ones I had almost ready. I think I had some entirely prepared. I think I had a couple of cases against Parker ready, but I cannot exactly recall the cases, because I tore the indictments up and that was the end of it.

Q. Were those routes in the Parker, Salisbury, and Sanderson combinations?—A. They were, some of those. I cannot tell exactly which ones I had ready, or nearly ready. I was pushing the indictments along in order to have them ready when the grand jury should make the presentments. I wish to state to the committee now what may not be generally understood, that the mode of procedure in this district is entirely different from anything that I have ever known before. The supreme court of the district has no original criminal jurisdiction. It only obtains jurisdiction over a criminal case by a presentment from the grand jury. The grand jury hears the witnesses, comes into court and hands in a paper saying that they present so and so for such an offense, and that the witnesses are so and so. The court then orders the district attorney to send the grand jury an indictment upon that presentment. The grand jury made no presentments that I am aware of in any of these cases.

Mr. Merrick spoke to me about this arbitration matter some time afterwards, and asked me if I knew anything about it. I told him I did not, except that Colonel Bliss had told me that he was going to arbitrate the cases. Mr. Merrick said, "It is a singular thing that Colonel Bliss has not informed me of it." I asked him if Colonel Bliss had not done so, and Mr. Merrick said, "I remember that he did say something about being going to arbitrate the cases, but I supposed that he was coming back to have a talk with me about it, and I have never heard anything more of it." Mr. Merrick would, of course, be able to tell you about this better than I can; I am only giving you what he told me. In November, 1882, the Attorney-General sent a circular letter to the counsel in the case, which I will read to the committee:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, November 4, 1882.

GENTLEMEN: Some time since, in correspondence with Mr. Bliss, I called his attention to the other star-route cases that were yet unrepresented to the grand jury. Special notice has been made in the public prints, charging that those against Salisbury and others were purposely withheld from the grand jury, and that they were to enjoy immunity. I desire that you give those cases your especial attention. If there are any, let them be proceeded with at once, as soon as your convenience will permit.

I do not write this because I think you need to be spurred, for I know you do your duty with ability and earnestness and strict integrity, but I write because I wish in a formal way to call your attention to them, and to depute you to act in the premises with earnestness and energy; and do not under any circumstances allow the statute of limitations to protect any of these parties from prosecution.

I am, with great respect, yours,

BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

MESSRS. BLISS, MERRICK, AND KER.

I asked Mr. Woodward about these cases, but as I have already stated, the statute of limitations had barred the cases because they had not been presented in June, and of course I could not do anything with them. I do not think I made any written communication on the subject to the Attorney-General, but I told him verbally that the matter was entirely in the hands of Colonel Bliss, who had assumed the responsibility and had agreed to arbitrate the cases. I do not recall exactly what the Attorney-General said, but it was something to the effect that he wanted no arbitration—that he wanted the guilty punished. However, it was too late then to talk about punishing them.

In the summer of 1883 the Attorney-General sent an order to me to give him a report upon the status of those cases. In order to make that report, to ascertain what witnesses had been examined before the grand jury and what the grand jury had done, I went to the office of the district attorney and called for the grand jury minute-book. Each grand jury keeps a minute of its proceedings. At every session of the grand jury they enter in a book provided for the purpose the names of the witnesses who appear before them and what disposition they make of each case that is submitted to them. The grand juries in the District of Columbia have evidently kept minutes of their proceedings from the time the grand jury was formed. When I called for this book I was told that there was no minute of the March grand jury. I asked for the minute book; this one was handed to me, and I was extremely surprised to find that that grand jury had kept no minute whatever of its proceedings. I asked the clerk in the district attorney's office, who was responsible for that omission, and he said he did not know. I asked Mr. Taggart, the gentleman in the district attorney's office who usually attends the grand jury, how it was that this grand jury had kept no minutes of their proceedings. Mr. Taggart said that he had had nothing at all to do with that grand jury; that it was all taken out of his hands. Mr. Corkhill, who was then District Attorney, is responsible, I suppose, for the omission to keep any minutes of the proceedings of that grand jury. There is not a scratch of a pen to show that there was a grand jury in session here during March, 1882.

Q. Please look at this book which I now hand you, and say whether it is one of the grand jury minute-books kept in the District of Columbia.—A. (After inspecting it.) Yes; this is the grand jury minute-book.

The CHAIRMAN. I will state to the committee that yesterday I addressed a note to Mr. Worthington, the district attorney, asking him to send me the grand jury minute-book, and he transmitted me the book which I have now shown the witness, and which he identifies as the grand jury minute-book kept in this District.

Q. Now, please point out the place where this omission occurs.—A. On page 81 of this book I find the date March 4, 1882. That was the grand jury that assembled in 1881, the one that found this batch of indictments. That grand jury made an entry, as you perceive, that they had found indictments against Brady, Miner, Peck, the two Dorseys, Henry M. Vaile, M. C. Rerdell, J. L. Sanderson, and William H. Turner.

Q. Those are the parties in the Dorsey-Brady case that was tried?—

A. Yes, that is the Dorsey-Brady case. They also made a record of every one of these indictments, with a list of the witnesses called to substantiate the facts.

Q. Now, please read the minute that you find there.—A. (Reading.)

The following presentments were returned to the grand jury by the special prosecuting officer of the Government, Mr. George Bliss; he having, for some reasons best known to himself, failed to prepare and submit indictments: Edwin J. Sweet, William J. Barringer, James B. Henderson, and J. L. Sanderson, for perjury.

Q. According to this minute there was an indictment ordered against each of those individuals separately for perjury?—A. It seems that the grand jury had presentments that were returned to them without being placed upon the records of the court. If the jury had gone into court and handed the presentments to the judge that would have been entered upon the minutes of the proceedings of the court for that day; but from the reading of this it appears that the grand jury handed these presentments to Colonel Bliss, who returned them to the grand jury. That is the way this reads.

Q. And failed to prepare indictments in those cases?—A. Well, I don't know anything at all about that.

Q. The record states that he failed to prepare indictments, does it not?—A. This is the record of the grand jury.

Q. It appears, does it not, from an examination of this book, that each day's session of the grand jury is entered, with the cases examined and the names of the witnesses appearing?—A. Yes, sir. The grand jury keep a record of the proceedings and the names of the witnesses for the guidance of the district attorney.

By Mr. HEMPHILL:

Q. Which grand jury was it that made those minutes in that book?—

A. The grand jury whose term extended up to the 4th of March, 1882.

Q. Which one was it that made no minutes at all?—A. The grand jury of March, 1882. There are three terms, you know; one beginning on the first Monday in December, another on the first Monday in March, and another on the third Monday in June.

Q. And you say the grand jury of March, 1882, made no minutes of its meeting?—A. None whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. In this book, on page 82, is the memorandum which was read by the witness showing the failure of Mr. Bliss to prepare indictments. The last day in that term was March 4, 1882. That was the grand jury of which Mr. J. B. Wilson was foreman. The next entry is on page 85, under date of October 9, 1882.

Q. What grand jury was that whose entry is made on page 85?—A. That was the grand jury that came into session on the third Monday of June, 1882.

Q. And that grand jury was in session up to October 9, 1882?—A. No. Let me explain that. Previous to that time they had heard the case of Kellogg, and adjourned, but they failed to make any minute of that case.

Q. Then there was an omission on the part of these two grand juries? There is no record, you say, of the proceedings of the grand jury in reference to the Kellogg case?—A. No. They kept that out.

Q. And there is nothing in this book, you say, in reference to the Mitchell grand jury?—A. There is no record of its proceedings.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Mitchell, the foreman, testified that they kept notes and that at the end of the session they destroyed them, burned them up before they left the grand jury room, and that he said also that it was not customary for the grand jury here to keep minutes. Now this minute-book shows very full entries of the proceedings of the grand juries all the way through, with the exceptions that have been mentioned here by Mr. Ker.

The WITNESS. Of course I had to make a report to the Attorney-General that it was impossible for me to tell him who had been examined or what had been done in the cases, because no record had been kept and nobody could tell anything about it. Now, whoever is responsible for that omission ought to be held accountable for it.

Q. Whose duty was it to keep the minutes of the grand jury and to see that they were properly entered?—A. It was the duty of the secretary to keep the minutes. It is the duty of the district attorney to see that the grand jury perform their duty. It is the business of the district attorney to see that the minute-book is properly kept. If Mr. Taggart had been before the grand jury he would no doubt have seen that it was properly done, but his explanation is that he had nothing to do with that grand jury.

Q. Who is Mr. Taggart?—A. He is an assistant district attorney. He is at present assistant to Mr. Worthington. He was at that time assistant to Colonel Corkhill.

Q. In the ordinary business which comes before the grand jury here does Mr. Taggart look after the records of the jury?—A. Yes, sir; he takes care to see that the matters are kept straight. He is a very efficient officer.

Q. Who appeared before the grand jury for the Government during the time when no entry was made of their proceedings?—A. I cannot answer that from knowledge.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. You understood, however, that it was Mr. Bliss?—A. Well, he told me himself that he was before the grand jury with this case—the Dorsey case. There were several other indictments found at the same time. That same grand jury, at the March term, found the indictment against John W. Dorsey and others—the second indictment; also an indictment against John H. Wallace for perjury; also an indictment against Marshall G. Candee for perjury; also two indictments against George V. Meserole and Thomas J. Brady for conspiracy; also an indictment against Price and Thomas J. Brady for conspiracy. They omitted Mr. Kellogg from that indictment. I had Mr. Kellogg's name included and had to re-write the indictment with Kellogg's name omitted.

Q. How did it happen that you prepared the indictment including Mr. Kellogg's name?—A. I did it from information that I had obtained and in examining the papers. You see I had to anticipate the work somewhat; I had to get the indictments ready in advance, otherwise I would not have been able to get them ready in time for the grand jury. Therefore, when Kellogg was left out I, of course, had to re-write that indictment omitting Kellogg's name.

Q. The June grand jury was within the statute so far as the alleged offense in that case was concerned?—A. Oh, yes; and the others too. I think I had better make Mr. Kellogg's case a separate one here, and state it by itself, because in that way you will understand it better. I simply call attention now to the fact that there was no memorandum made in this grand jury minute-book, which was provided expressly for the purpose of keeping such minutes.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. I see that Sanderson's name is mentioned; was there any indictment ever found against him by the grand jury in any case except the Dorsey-Brady indictment from which he was dropped?—A. None at all. Of course, as I told you yesterday, the understanding that I had was that these different combinations would be taken up in their order, that the parties belonging to each combination would be indicted in order, and that Sanderson would come up in his own combination.

Q. And while the grand jury was in session deliberating upon that, you were preparing indictments against the parties in the other combinations, when Mr. Bliss informed you that you need not proceed any further in the matter?—A. Yes; that is what I was doing, getting the indictments ready, so that when the grand jury presented the parties I could hand in the indictments.

By Mr. HEMPHILL:

Q. Why did you cease your work on those indictments?—A. Colonel Bliss told me to stop; that he had agreed to arbitrate the matter. It did not annoy me much to stop. I was tired of it.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You are certain that that statement about the proposed arbitration was made by Colonel Bliss at that time?—A. Why, certainly; I was preparing the indictments and I stopped and tore them up, because I did not want to give them to anybody else.

Q. Then how do you account for the fact that when the grand jury did ignore those bills their action made Colonel Bliss "sick"?—A. I had nothing to do with Colonel Bliss's "sickness"; I simply tell you what I know, what was told me; Colonel Bliss certainly did not consult me about it; I told him what I thought of it.

Q. When he told you he proposed to arbitrate the matter and you said that it could not be done, what did you mean by that?—A. The worst section contained in any act of Congress is section 3469, which allows suits that the Government has instituted to be compromised. More corruption is engendered by that section than by any other that you have in your statute book; but section 3469 says explicitly that its provisions shall not extend to matters pertaining to the Post-Office Department.

Q. Did you call Colonel Bliss's attention to that?—A. No, I did not; having been a district attorney, he ought to have known it. When he said he proposed to arbitrate I told him that it could not be done. That was all. He said, "Why not?" He never entered into any explanation of the matter; he just said, in an off-hand way, "Why not?"

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. You took his remark and the manner in which he made it as a finality so far as that conversation was concerned?—A. Well, he was directing the cases; he was my superior; and beyond making an expression of opinion I had no right to interfere at that time—I felt that I had no such right.

Now, about these indictments prepared by me, you see that they are very large and voluminous. In my State I could have prepared this Dorsey indictment on about six or eight sheets of paper, but in the District of Columbia you are bound to set out everything. You cannot call a thing by its right name merely, but must set it out in words and figures—a perfect fac simile. For instance, where you propose to indict for perjury, you must give the commission of the officer before whom the perjury was committed. They have here all the ancient and antiquated law forms, many of which have come down from the time of Edward III, and some of which do not seem to have been lopped off even in England until the reign of Queen Victoria. Therefore I was compelled to make these indictments very elaborate. They were prepared to meet any objection that might be made on the ground of the want of particulars, and therefore they are a little more extensive than anything that I had ever engaged in before, or than anything I want to ever engage in again.

There have been some criticisms of my charge for my services. Some of the gentlemen who have preceded me as witnesses here have said that the charge I made for preparing these indictments was preposterous and ridiculous, and therefore I thought it was my duty to fortify myself in what I had done by testimony. With that view I applied to some members of the bar in my own city, who are recognized as leading criminal lawyers. I have here a letter from Mr. James H. Heverin, a lawyer who has an exceptionally large criminal practice, and also some letters from other gentlemen. Before presenting them I wish also to say to the committee that I do not make a practice of preparing indictments. My friends give me credit for having some ability that way, but I do not prepare indictments for everybody. Sometimes when friends are in difficulty about such matters they come to me and I help them out, and for services of that kind I usually get paid very liberally. I explained these cases and the labor that I had to undergo in them to Mr. Heverin, and showed him what I had done, and he wrote me the following letter:

PHILADELPHIA, May 22, 1884.

MY DEAR SIR: I have carefully examined the printed indictment submitted to me in case of United States vs. John W. Dorsey et al. I regard it as a model specimen of criminal pleading, and am sure that there is no other lawyer at our bar, and doubtless very few in the country, who could have acquitted themselves so creditably in this line of labor. In view of your exceptional experience and efficiency in this character of work and the vast amount of labor required, I consider your charges reasonable and moderate. I am sure you can recall many cases where I, as well as other practitioners of our bar, have paid you more in proportion for similar services.

Yours respectfully,

JAMES H. HEVERIN.

Hon. W. W. KER.

I have also a letter from Mr. William B. Mann, who was prosecuting officer in Philadelphia for twenty-five years. He is a Republican, and therefore not politically favorable to me. While he was in office he frequently sent for me and requested me to assist him in preparing indictments, and for such service I have been paid quite large amounts. For example, for an indictment that I could write in about two hours he would pay me $150; because it is difficult to get people to do that kind of work. Mr. Mann examined the indictment in the Dorsey case and it was his opinion that a charge of $1,000 for preparing it would not be out of the way. This is the letter that I have received from Mr. Mann:

PROTHONOTARY'S OFFICE,
COURTS OF COMMON PLEAS FOR THE COUNTY OF PHILADELPHIA,
Philadelphia, May 24, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I have carefully looked over the indictment against Dorsey and others, and in view of the labor necessarily involved in the examination that was required before the actual drawing of the paper, as well as the care and engrossing attention displayed throughout such a prolonged arraignment, I am very clear in my mind that a charge for the drawing of it of $1,000 would not be excessive—particularly as the magnitude and character of the case called for the exercise of a high degree of professional skill.

In cases where private interests have required such service, it has been our practice to pay very liberal fees, and under the circumstances I regard the sum named by me as moderate.

Truly yours, &c.,

WILLIAM B. MANN.

W. W. KER, Esq.

And here is a letter I received from Mr. Sheppard, a leading member of our bar, who was district attorney for six years:

PHILADELPHIA, May 23, 1884.

MY DEAR SIR: I am really astonished at the amount of labor stated by you to have been performed in preparing the Star-route indictments, and I may say that I think there are few, if any, now in the profession, who have the capacity for labor, the industry, and the intelligence to enable them to go successfully through such an amount of labor. It must be understood at the outset that indictments for conspiracy are difficult to draw. Each one varies from all others in its special facts. Forms and precedents are of comparatively subordinate use. The framework has to be constructed, and the details have to be filled in by the pleader, as the result of his own thought, after determining upon the general theory of the indictment. Then he must keep constantly before his mind the difference between indictments for common law and for statutory offenses. So also in selecting and setting forth the overt acts; and in determining when such a setting forth is necessary, and where it may be dispensed with, the utmost caution must be exercised. If the pleader slips or fails in any of these things, he will be exposed in the microscopic examination of his work, made on a demurrer, or on a motion to quash, or in arrest of judgment, and then the entire trial and all the other work and expense and labor in the case pass for naught, and it tumbles to pieces, like a great and costly structure built upon sand. Hence, in important cases, especially in a great public or governmental prosecution, the indictment is always amplified and extended, and the counts are multiplied so as to anticipate, and, if possible, cover every conceivable objection which may be suggested, in any stage of the case, by the ingenuity or desperation of the defendants, or by the wisdom of the court. Thus, as an example, I have before me in the printed report of a case in the court of exchequer in England, an "information," much in the nature and form of an indictment, filed by the Attorney-General, which contains ninety-eight lengthy and elaborate counts, exhibiting the alleged offense, in manifold forms, the variations between many of the counts being such as are discoverable only by the sharpest legal acumen.

You state, as one illustration of your labors, that you had to examine about nine or ten thousand documents or writings. The mere mechanical labor of reading these papers is very great, but it is to be considered that each paper presented a number of collateral inquiries, and that the whole mass of them had to be arranged and classified, and their connections and relations with each other studied, and that this bulk of raw material, so to speak, had to be intellectually digested. When these things are properly considered, it will be seen, I think, that the mechanical labor, extraordinary as it is, is surpassed by the labor of a higher quality required. In fact, without going further into details, these exceed in collective magnitude, and in the multiplicity of details, any litigation, so far as I can recollect, which has been before either the English or American courts for very many years. Your work, certainly the most critical, and perhaps the most important, was unprecedented in its character and requirements. It was well done. It was tried, as by fire, but passed safely through the ordeal.

While the compensation asked by you might at first sight appear to a layman, and even to some lawyers, to be too large, I do not think any one will be of that opinion who by official or professional connection with important criminal trials is capable of fully appreciating all the circumstances. The sum is by no means an unusual one, even in civil proceedings, between private individuals; and I cannot conceive why it should be thought extravagant when a great Government is fighting against the most stupendous, the best armed, and most desperate conspiracy of bad men that has yet appeared in the history of the country.

It is, however, due to you personally that I should state a reason for belief in your qualification for the special sort of work you were called upon to perform. For six years you were connected with the office of district attorney of this city when I occupied the position of district attorney. During that period you had exclusive charge of the pleadings arising in the office. These bills were diversified in their nature, many of them difficult and complicated, and they covered every department of the criminal law. I presume you must have drawn many thousands of bills of indictment of all kinds during that time, and I cannot now particularize any one which was successfully demurred to. After this training and practice, it is not surprising that you were called upon suddenly, and in emergency, by the Attorney-General to render this service. He knew, as a citizen and lawyer of Philadelphia, that your fitness and the schooling, so to speak, which you had received were universally recognized here by the bench and bar, and that on short notice you were thoroughly prepared for work which required a practiced hand for its immediate performance. I do not know any other person in the profession who could have undertaken this work on sight so thoroughly equipped for its performance without requiring time for a preliminary study of the law before commencing a study of the facts. You seem to have been in all respects just the man for such an emergency, for emergency it really was. It was an "occasion sudden," to which no one less familiar, practically as well as theoretically, with the nature of the demand could have responded with equal promptness and success.

I am, very respectfully, yours, &c.,

FURMAN SHEPPARD.

W. W. KER, Esq.

I showed this letter to Mr. Cassidy, the Attorney-General of the State of Pennsylvania, who has a reputation which extends far beyond the State borders. He read it over and put the following indorsement upon it:

I have carefully read the above letter of Mr. Sheppard, and my knowledge, now covering a number of years, of Mr. Ker as assistant district-attorney of this county, as well as a draughtsman of pleadings in criminal cases, enables me to thoroughly and most cordially indorse all that is therein said in relation to the indictments in the star-route cases.

LEWIS C. CASSIDY

I have prepared indictments for Mr. Cassidy when he has required my services in that line and he has always paid me very liberally.

By the CHAIRMAN.

Q. Did Judge Wiley make any statement in regard to the magnitude of the work involved in the preparation of those indictments?—A. He spoke of it in a complimentary way. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact, that these indictments have not an interlineation in them. Some courts, you know, will quash an indictment that is interlined, and these were written without interlineations. There is not in Washington to-day a man who can take these indictments just as they are, open them up and make a correct copy of them in the time in which they were prepared—from the 1st day in February when I began, until the 4th of March. It would be an utter physical impossibility for any man to do it, and I never could have prepared them in that time but for the fact that I dictated them to stenographers and had six assistants employed to do the writing.

By Mr. HEMPHILL.

Q. Was there a separate charge made for drawing the indictments?—

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How much?—A. Ten thousand dollars. Now, Mr. Gibson, I think, and Mr. Cook, have testified here that such a charge was ridiculous, and on account of their testimony I wanted to get the opinion of gentlemen—lawyers who are competent to judge whether it was or was not a ridiculous charge. I would not do the same work again for the same amount of money. I would not want the job. It was the hardest work I ever engaged in. I had no idea that it would amount to so much. I do not mean to say that the Attorney-General allowed me the full amount of the bill that I presented for that labor. My entire pay was about $31,000, which covered all my services for two years, excepting about one month, and included the preparation of these indictments. And these, you will remember, are not all. I prepared indictments in a number of other cases that arose out of the first trial.

Q. You were paid $31,000 altogether?—A. Yes; altogether.

Q. Was that the amount of your bill?—A. No. The Attorney-General cut it down.

Q. What was the amount of your bill altogether?—A. Well, I do not remember exactly; but I thought I was entitled to somewhere from $15,000 to $20,000 a year.

Q. Did you give the business your whole attention during the time you were engaged in it?—A. Yes—my whole attention. I abandoned my private business entirely. I left all my cases, turned them over to other attorneys. I lost all the business I had. When I undertook this work, I supposed that it would last a couple of months, but instead of that, I was two years all but a month engaged in the star-route cases. I was employed in the cases about three months less time than Colonel Bliss, and about three months longer than Mr. Merrick.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Can you state now what was done by you and the other counsel to your knowledge with reference to prosecuting indictments against William Pitt Kellogg, Thomas J. Brady, and Price?—A. I have already stated as to Brady and Price, that the indictment was found by the grand jury in March, 1882. That was the Mitchell grand jury.

Q. State the facts in reference to those cases, so far as you know them?—A. I do not know how the case came to be brought against Brady and Price. I have no personal knowledge how the case originated or why it was first started, but my general impression is that Mr. Merrick had opened up communication with John A. Walsh, and in taking Mr. Walsh's statements Mr. Merrick saw that there was a case against Price, Brady, and Kellogg. At all events the case against those three people for conspiracy was taken before the grand jury in March, 1882, I think, by Colonel Bliss. I am pretty sure of that, from the fact that he told me so. I have told you that I had prepared an indictment against those three parties—Price, Brady, and Kellogg—but that subsequently I had to have the indictment rewritten, with Kellogg's name omitted. When the grand jury had adjourned in June without indicting Kellogg, we were proceeding with the trial of the case against Dorsey. Walsh, after he had been before the grand jury, made some statements in the newspapers as to what had taken place before the grand jury, and Mr. Merrick spoke to me about the case, and said that there ought to be an indictment found against Kellogg, that he was a public official, and that consequently he should not be permitted to escape. The matter was brought to the attention of Colonel Bliss, and we talked it over. Mr. Merrick said that while an indictment ought to be found against Mr. Kellogg, he did not think that there should be any proceeding taken to bring him to trial while he was still a member of the Senate, because if he were convicted he would be disqualified from holding office, and that that would upset the Republican majority in the Senate.

Q. Who stated that?—A. I am telling you now what took place between the counsel for the Government in regard to the indictment of Kellogg.

Q. Who were present at that consultation?—A. Mr. Merrick, Colonel Bliss, and myself. Mr. Merrick said that Mr. Kellogg ought to be indicted because he was a public official, but that he (Merrick) was not in favor of taking any proceeding to bring Kellogg to trial immediately because he was then a Senator, and if he were tried and convicted he would be disqualified from holding office, and that would upset the Republican majority in the Senate.

By Mr. STEPHENSON:

Q. Mr. Merrick said that?—A. Mr. Merrick said that in this talk among the counsel.

Q. Not Mr. Bliss?—A. No; Mr. Merrick.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did Mr. Bliss make any response to that suggestion?—A. Oh, of course we discussed it in all its bearings. We knew that if Mr. Kellogg was indicted and convicted that would wind up the Senate for the Republican party, and Mr. Merrick suggested, as I have stated, that it would not be proper to proceed against Mr. Kellogg to bring him to trial while he was a member of the Senate, but that, as the statute of limitations would soon bar the offense, it was an absolute necessity to get an indictment against him. Colonel Bliss did not appear to agree with that view. I cannot recall exactly what he said, but he showed no disposition to try to get the indictment. Finally the matter was taken up by the newspapers and discussed editorially, and some severe reflections were made upon the counsel.

Q. Do you mean that Colonel Bliss did not agree to the suggestion in regard to getting the indictment, or that he did not agree to the suggestion in regard to postponing the trial?—A. He did not agree to the suggestion in regard to getting the indictment. You know that the grand jury of the June term had adjourned without finding an indictment against Mr. Kellogg. They had adjourned just previous to the third Monday in June. The newspapers took the matter up and Walsh commenced to ventilate himself in the newspapers and we saw that we would be chargeable with a dereliction of duty by reason of our neglect to indict. The statute of limitations would bar the offense after the 18th of July. That was the date which we supposed was the only date that we could safely take. We had the meeting in the room back of the court room, where we had lunch. Mr. Merrick had spoken to me about the matter previously. In the conversation in that room Mr. Merrick said to Colonel Bliss that this would be a reflection upon him, that Colonel Bliss's honor was at stake in the matter, and that he should go and ask the judge to recall the grand jury for the June term and bring the Kellogg case before them. In the mean time, as I have said, the grand jury for the June term had been convened, but the judge had told them that there was no business and that he would dismiss them until October, and they had been dismissed. Mr. Merrick insisted that Colonel Bliss should go to the judge and get him to reconvene that grand jury and lay the Kellogg case before them. He said that Colonel Bliss's honor was at stake in the matter, and, in fact, the honor of all of us. Well, the colonel hesitated about it, but finally Mr. Merrick induced him to go to Judge Wiley. I think Mr. Merrick had spoken to the judge about it before Colonel Bliss went to him. At all events, both Mr. Merrick and Colonel Bliss went in and saw Judge Wiley and stated the case to him and asked him to have the grand jury for June term reassembled in order to hear the case against Kellogg, which otherwise would be barred on the 18th of July. Judge Wiley said something about making the application in open court. I was not present and did not hear what was said, but when the court reconvened after recess there was an open application made to the judge to reconvene the grand jury, and he directed that the grand jury should be recalled; and on the 5th of July, 1883, the grand jury again assembled in court. After the members of the jury had answered to their names it was found that there were some who were to be excused, and the jury had to be filled up. The judge had that done, and I think it took the 6th of July to do it. Then, if my memory serves me right, on the 7th the grand jury retired to their room to hear the case, and Colonel Bliss went before them to present it. There was some discussion among the counsel as to who should go before the grand jury. Mr. Merrick insisted that Colonel Bliss ought to do it in order to vindicate himself. Mr. Merrick told Colonel Bliss that he was subjected to newspaper criticism in the matter, and that people would imagine that he had not acted honestly or properly. Colonel Bliss said that he did not care for newspaper criticism, did not mind it, did not care what anybody said; or something of that kind. But Mr. Merrick insisted that it was his duty to go before the grand jury, and finally he consented to go.

The grand jury was in session I think one day, and then, much to my surprise, they came in and stated that they had nothing to present. The judge looked at them and said, "Well, you are dismissed until October." Now, the proceedings of the grand jury at that time, whatever they were, are not entered in this minute-book at all. As this same grand jury that had just announced that they had nothing to present were to serve until the following December, of course it would have been quite useless to try them a second time, and it was decided to let the matter go.

Q. Do you know what was done by Colonel Bliss in reference to procuring indictments at that time? Did he inform his associate counsel in regard to the failure, as to how it happened?—A. We talked over the matter. Mr. Walsh accused Colonel Bliss of having stated to the grand jury that it was a serious matter to indict a Senator of the United States, and I think Colonel Bliss made some comment upon that. I think he said that it was.

Q. How soon after this grand jury came in and announced that they had no presentment to make was it that there was any consultation between the counsel for the Government in regard to the matter?—A. We were then trying the case, and of course we met every day.

Q. What was said in regard to the failure of the grand jury to indict?—A. Well, we considered it a mistake. I don't know that there was much said one way or the other.

Q. Did Colonel Bliss make any comment on the failure, or any explanation of it?—A. No. I think he did say that if he had been a grand juror he would have found a bill. The Kellogg matter went over, for of course we could not do anything until we got a new grand jury. We were busy at that time in the second trial of the Brady-Dorsey case, and were devoting all our time to that. In the mean time Mr. Merrick had got into communication with James B. Price. We wanted to get Price's testimony in order to use it against Brady. We were under the impression that Price could give us some instance of the payment of money so as to connect Brady with the improper receipt of money. There was not anything, however, in Price's testimony that would assist us in that case, but we found that his testimony was very strong in relation to Kellogg's connection with the star-route business, and we talked over the subject of having Kellogg brought before a subsequent grand jury. Colonel Bliss was opposed to bringing the matter up, but Mr. Merrick insisted that it should be done. There was some application made to the Attorney-General, and he directed the three of us to come to his house at a certain time, saying that he wanted to see us about the matter of indicting Kellogg. We went to his house one evening and the Attorney-General asked each one of us for an expression of opinion about the Kellogg case. Colonel Bliss expressed the opinion that Kellogg should not be indicted. Mr. Merrick said that he should be. It resulted in the discussion assuming a sort of political aspect, Colonel Bliss accusing Mr. Merrick of being prejudiced on account of his politics. The Attorney-General called upon me for my opinion and I gave it. It was that Price should be used as a witness to indict Kellogg. The Attorney-General said he would look over the testimony and would tell us in a few days what was to be done, and that in the mean time he would send for Mr. Woodward and see what Price's testimony was. Of course the Attorney-General silenced Colonel Bliss on the political aspect of the matter by telling him that he did not want any politics to enter into it; that the law knew no man; that if Kellogg was guilty he should be punished the same as anybody else, and that if, on the other hand, he was innocent, he should not be proceeded against.

By Mr. HEMPHILL:

Q. Did Colonel Bliss assign any reason why Mr. Kellogg should not be indicted?—A. None other than Mr. Merrick's political prejudices.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did he say whether the evidence against Kellogg was sufficient or not?—A. Oh, no. Of course, though, he denounced Walsh. He said Walsh was not to be believed. After we received orders from the Attorney-General to proceed with the indictment against Kellogg, Mr. Merrick directed me to go before the grand jury in order to have the indictment found. I sent for the witnesses and took the case before the grand jury at the March term of 1883. They examined Mr. Walsh and Mr. Price and the other witnesses and ordered a presentment, which was made to the court, and afterward when I got time I prepared the indictment against Kellogg (which is here), and also an indictment against Brady and another one. Before going to the grand jury the question was to be settled as to whether this offense was barred by the statute of limitations. It appeared from the testimony which was before us and upon which we would have to rely in finding an indictment that about the 18th of July, 1879, Price had gone to Kellogg and asked him to get expedition on two routes which Price held as a contractor, and that Price promised to give $20,000 to Kellogg for getting that expedition. In a day or two afterwards Price handed Mr. Kellogg one promissory note for $5,000, due in four months from that date, and five post-office drafts each for a payment of $3,000. Those drafts were drawn upon the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department. The first one was to be paid out of any money due Price on the San Antonio and Corpus Christi route for the quarter ending March 31, 1881. The next was for the quarter following, and so on for five different quarters; the last one falling due in 1882. The question arose whether the statute applied to the receipt of the promissory note and the drafts, or whether it applied to the receipt of the money, the proceeds of the note and the drafts. In the first place, a post-office draft is not what is known in mercantile circles as a "draft." It reads:

The Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department will please pay to myself or order the sum of $3,000, out of any moneys due me on route 31148, San Antonio to Corpus Christi, &c.

Now, these drafts are not negotiable. They are filed in the Post-Office Department at some time prior to the money becoming due, but they are revocable at any time. The statute (section 1782) provides that if any Senator or Representative shall receive or agree to receive, either directly or indirectly, any money or valuable thing as compensation for service rendered in relation to any Government contract, he shall be guilty, and so on. Now, in the first place, "agree to receive" is one term and "receive" is another, and it is generally conceded that the agreement to receive would be merged in the act of receiving. Therefore, if Mr. Kellogg had agreed to receive this money in July, 1879, the agreement would have been merged in the act of receiving the money; and our construction of the statute was that, while we would have had a great advantage in indicting him inside of the statute of limitations, yet we were not debarred from indicting for the actual receipt of the money, the proceeds of these drafts. That is, we contended that the money, the proceeds of every one of these drafts was "received" within the statutory period of three years.

By Mr. MILLIKEN :

Q. Do you say that the drafts were received, or that the money was received on the drafts, within the statutory period?—A. Now you are asking me for evidence. The drafts were said to have been received by Mr. Kellogg about the 18th of July, 1879, and the subsequent testimony that we proposed to offer was——

Q. (Interposing.) I am not asking you anything about the testimony. I am simply asking you whether you say that the drafts were received within the statutory period, or that the money was so received?—A. I say the drafts were put into the hands of Mr. Kellogg, according to the testimony, about the 18th of July, 1879. The money was paid subsequently, the first payments being in February or March, 1880.

Q. Did the time when the drafts were put into his hands bring the indictment within the statutory period?

The CHAIRMAN. (Interposing.) The date upon which the drafts were received was barred by the statute.

The WITNESS. Oh, yes. This indictment was found on the 18th of April, 1883, and of course at that time all acts done in 1879 were barred. But our theory was that the receiving of the drafts was not the offense; that the drafts were not the compensation; that the compensation was the money, and that the drafts were only the means by which the actual compensation, the money, was to be collected. Therefore we held that every time the money was collected on those drafts and paid to Kellogg, that act made a separate offense under the statute.

By Mr. MILLIKEN :

Q. Then, Mr. Ker, your opinion as to the running of the statute of limitations differed from that which was given by the court when the case was tried?—A. Well, sir, the court and I agreed upon it at first, but the court differed with me at last.

Q. Very well; it is a difference of opinion between you and the court?—A. Yes. The court agreed with me at first but concluded against me at last. Of course I have not anything to do with that opinion, whether it is right or wrong. A lawyer may have his own opinion of the law, and if he stands on his own opinion he ought to be able to explain it satisfactorily. But in this case I did not propose to stand upon my own opinion.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What are we to understand by your statement that the court agreed with you at first?—A. On the 31st of December, 1883, we went into court. Mr. Walsh was absent, we could not go to trial, and we filed some affidavits asking for a continuance. Mr. J. M. Wilson, one of the counsel for the defense, arose and said to the court: "What is the use of continuing this case? The court has before it everything upon which it can pass, and I now call the attention of the court to the facts of the case and ask the court to decide."

By referring to page 17 of the record you will see that Mr. Wilson used this language:

Now, mark this language: "Shall receive or agree to receive any compensation whatever, directly or indirectly, for any service rendered or to be rendered." The defendant, Kellogg, took the papers and requested Price to return in a couple of days. Price returned at the time fixed and the defendant Kellogg informed Price that he had seen the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and that orders would be made to expedite the service on each of the routes and to allow increased pay therefor. Remember, that none of this do they say they propose to prove by this witness Walsh. They say they have every other witness present in court to-day. If any such state of facts as that ever existed, if they have anybody who is willing to swear to any such state of facts as that, they have that man in court to-day.

"On the 18th day of July, 1879, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General caused two orders to be made to expedite the service on each of said routes, and to allow increased compensation to said Price therefor. Thereupon Price made and signed one promissory note for the payment of the sum of five thousand dollars."

Does that leave any doubt anywhere that if any such agreement as this was ever made that agreement had then been performed so far as the payment for services rendered is concerned, and the offense was then and there complete?

The COURT. No; the payment was made when the note was paid, I suppose.

Mr. MERRICK. That is the point. The payment was made when the drafts were paid and the note was paid.

Mr. J. M. WILSON. The agreement was made and was complete.

The COURT. The statute covers both agreement and payment.

Further, on page 18, Mr. Wilson says:

Now, I submit that after this thing had been finally consummated, after all had been done that had been agreed to be done on the part of the defendant and on the part of Price, then Walsh, according to their statement, collected money which belonged to Kellogg and paid it over to him.

The COURT. Is not the whole effect of filing these orders in the Department simply a notice to the Department that the contractor's money is to be paid as the order directs?

Mr. J. M. WILSON. No, sir; I think not. I think the legal effect of it is this: That as between the two parties it is an appropriation of the money, just like giving a bank check. It is an appropriation of the account of the party in that bank.

The COURT. A bank check is not an appropriation until the money is paid.

Mr. J. M. WILSON. Oh, yes; I think it is.

The COURT. The money rests to the credit of the drawer of the check until it is paid. It is the drawer's money until the check is paid.

Now, I think I may safely say that the court did agree with me. My view was that these drafts were only a means of collecting the money; that they did not amount to anything until he received the money; and that every time he did receive the money on the drafts it was a separate offense under the statute.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Then you drew the indictment on the theory that the offense consisted in the receipt of the money, and that act was not barred by the statute of limitations?—A. Yes, sir; that on the 18th day of July, 1879, Mr. Kellogg had agreed to receive the money; that is one offense mentioned in the act of Congress; that he then obtained the means to collect the money, that is to say, he then got the drafts; that thereafter he received the money upon the drafts, and that every time he used one of these drafts to collect the money he committed the offense of "receiving" contemplated by the statute, and that the agreement to receive was merged in the receipt. As that was a matter in regard to which I did not care to depend entirely upon my own view, I got Mr. Merrick to give me a written opinion upon it, and I think you will all concede that you cannot find a much better lawyer than Mr. Merrick. I will read his opinion.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that instead of setting forth that opinion at length, we had better simply ask Mr. Ker whether Mr. Merrick agreed with him in his view.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. I think the opinion had better go into the record in justice to Mr. Merrick and Mr. Ker, and for the education of the legal profession. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN (to the witness). What did Mr. Merrick state to you was his opinion of the law?

The WITNESS. I have Mr. Merrick's written opinion here. I obtained it before I framed the indictment. I did that as a matter of precaution.

The witness read the opinion as follows:

SEC. 1781. The original contract being to carry the mail for a certain price over the route for a specified time, is by the order of expedition and the addition of pay for such expedition so far modified as to come within the meaning of the law when it speaks of "procuring or aiding to procure any contract." Such order of expedition is a new covenant, engrafted upon the original contract it is true, but the old contract is so far merged in the new in regard to duty to be performed and the consideration to be paid therefor that from the date of the order of expedition the old contract is no longer heard of, except in its original obligations to perform the new work on the new consideration. Under this section Brady and Kellogg should be separately indicted. Kellogg for procuring the expedition on the Corpus Christi and San Antonio route, and Brady for giving the contract of expedition on the Corpus Christi and San Antonio, and also for giving the contract for temporary service on the Socorro and Silver City, unless the latter is barred by limitations.

SEC. 1782. Under this section there should be separate indictments against Brady and Kellogg for the expedition upon the Corpus Christi and San Antonio route "for services rendered in relation to a contract, * * * in which the United States is a party, the consideration being paid to them by drafts on the Corpus Christi and San Antonio route, which were delivered by Price to Kellogg and by Kellogg delivered to Walsh for the benefit of himself, Kellogg, and Brady; and the period of the actual payment of the drafts was the period of receiving the compensation, though the "agreement" to receive was at a date when the offense would be barred by the statute of limitations. There should also be another separate indictment against Brady for receiving the proceeds of the two drafts on the Indianola and Corpus Christi, and the $2,500, which was contained in the same envelope as compensation for giving Price service on the Socorro and Silver City, route, unless barred by limitations. Price's affidavit states that he informed Brady that he would pay this $5,000, if he would give him service on that route, and it further states that after service was so given he inclosed the drafts and the money in an envelope directed to Brown and laid the envelope upon Brady's table, calling his attention to it; and Walsh's testimony shows that Brady got the benefit of the drafts in his account with him, Walsh.

SEC. 5498. There might also be an indictment against Kellogg for receiving "a share of or interest in a claim," but I doubt if the indictment will hold, as the language of the section seems to contemplate at the time of the employment the existence of a money demand against the United States, and not the simple procurement of a contract.

There should be two indictments under section 1781 and two under 1782, and one against Brady under 1782 for the Socorro and Silver City route.

The point that I wanted settled was the period at which the offense was committed, and Mr. Merrick, after consultation with me, gave me this opinion upon the law, and you see it accorded with mine, that the agreement to take the drafts was simply an agreement to receive and that the time when the money was collected on the drafts was the time when the compensation was "received," and it appears from what I have read that in December the court agreed with us upon that point.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. And, acting upon that opinion which you obtained from Mr. Merrick and upon your own judgment, you proceeded to draw the indictment?—A. Yes, sir. The indictment sets out the actual dates upon which the Treasury Department paid the warrants. The act of Congress, you know, says “who shall receive or agree to receive directly or indirectly,” and the question was whether Walsh was not acting as Kellogg’s agent, and whether payment to him was not an indirect payment to Kellogg. It was settled that it was. There are five counts in the indictment, each one specifying the dates on which the payments of money were made by means of these different drafts. The first payment was made on the 19th day of April, 1880, and this indictment was found on the 18th day of April, 1883, one day previous to the time when the first payment would be barred by the statute.

Q. So that none of the payments were barred when this indictment was found?—A. No, sir; none of the payments were barred.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Then the misfortune of your indictment was that the court found the law to be different from what you had held it to be yourself?—A. Well, that I suppose would be about a fair statement of it. The court decided that receiving the drafts was the offense and that that was barred by the statute of limitations.

Q. That is the whole of it, is it not?—A. That is about the whole of it.

Q. Who appeared for the prosecution?—A. Mr. Reynolds, Mr. Worthington, the district attorney, and myself.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. I understood you to say some little time since that prior to the finding of this indictment you had drawn an indictment in which the name of Kellogg was included?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that his name was stricken out of that indictment?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. That indictment was before the grand jury which was organized March 6, 1882?—A. It was.

Q. At the time that indictment was framed were the officers of the Department of Justice engaged in the prosecution in possession of the same line of facts upon which the indictment which was subsequently found against Kellogg was predicated?—A. Not precisely; because we had not Price’s testimony.

Q. Did you have knowledge of the facts outside of Price’s testimony?—A. Oh, yes.

Q. Do you know why Kellogg’s name was taken out of that indictment, and by whose direction?—A. I only know that I was told that the grand jury did not present him, and therefore, they having failed to present him, of course I had to make the indictment apply only to Price and Brady.

Q. So far as you have any knowledge of the facts, was there any difference between the bearing of the evidence in possession of the prosecution upon Brady and the others against whom the bill was found and its bearing upon Kellogg?—A. Oh, if you want me to give an opinion about the facts——

Mr. MILLIKEN (interposing). We don’t want your opinion; we want your testimony.

The WITNESS. Well, what am I to do? There seems to be a difference of opinion here, and I want to know which one of you gentlemen I am to answer.

(The question was read by the stenographer, and Mr. Milliken withdrew his objection.)

A. From my knowledge of the evidence the case was as strong, if not stronger, against Kellogg than against the others; from the fact that, so far as I knew, the testimony of Walsh would be before the grand jury.

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed with your statement.

The WITNESS. While I was preparing the indictment against Kellogg Colonel Bliss came to me and said that he had been requested to come and ask me—I don't remember now whether he said he had been requested by Kellogg himself or by a particular friend of Kellogg—but he said that he had been requested to come to me and ask me to put the true dates in the indictment. I told him I never did anything else; that I would certainly do that, and I did put the true date of each payment in that indictment—the date upon which the money was paid by the Treasury Department upon the draft. Those were the dates that I inserted in the indictment for each case.

Q. That request did not influence your judgment at all? You intended to put in those dates anyway?—A. Certainly. After that indictment was found and was presented to the court Colonel Bliss left and went to New York. He said he was not coming back again. He was indignant at the indictment being found. We coaxed him to come back, told him that he was not running the case; that the Attorney-General controlled it; that the Attorney-General wanted the indictment found, and that we were proceeding under his direction, and finally Colonel Bliss agreed to go on with the case.

Q. You appeared before the grand jury?—A. Mr. Merrick sent me before the grand jury.

Q. Did you have a commission authorizing you to go before the grand jury?—A. I was originally commissioned with the intention that I should go before the grand jury if there was any necessity for it. But I want to say here that Colonel Corkhill rendered me very material aid in getting that indictment. There has been a good deal said about that gentleman in connection with these cases, and I wish to say that I never saw anything wrong about him. He was kind and polite, and he rendered me very material service in getting the indictment. After that indictment was found the defendant moved to quash and demurred, and the matter was heard from time to time, and finally it was decided, I think, on the last day of July——

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. You have been asked whether you were properly authorized to appear before the grand jury. Now, the indictment itself was signed by Mr. Corkhill, the regular district attorney, was it not?—A. Nobody else could sign an indictment.

Q. Therefore, there was nothing in the fact that you were before the grand jury representing him, that would invalidate or impair the validity of that indictment?—A. Well, they made that attack, you know.

Q. But it was a failure?—A. It was a failure. That was one reason why they wanted the indictment quashed. They said that I had no business before the grand jury, but I had looked into that matter very closely and was satisfied that I had a right to go before the grand jury, and the court decided that I had. Those points were all argued before the court up to the time of the trial.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Please explain the nature of the proceeding by which the court finally held that the evidence which you offered was not admissible on the trial.—A. Well, we have on record the decision of the court upon that point. The substance of it was this : We called Price, who testified to having given Kellogg the drafts and the promissory note. Colonel Ingersoll moved to strike out Price's testimony, which was a novel way of proceeding. I wanted to get them to demur, so that I could join in the demurrer and get a verdict on them if the court decided in my favor ; but the court resolved not to hear any more testimony, but to hear the counsel argue that point. We did argue it. I endeavored to show the court that the position that we had assumed in the beginning was sound ; that these drafts were simply like a check, or an order on somebody to pay money, and that the offense ought to be dated from the time when the money was actually received. The court, however, decided that the time of the taking of the drafts was the period at which the offense began, and therefore decided against us, and, of course, we had nothing to do but to submit. You know the Government has no appeal. If we had had an appeal I would have taken it, because I do not believe the decision of the court is good law. I do not say that disrespectfully to the court, because Judge Wylie is as good a criminal lawyer as I ever practiced before, and in all his multitudinous decisions in these cases, there were only two in which I thought he was wrong. One of those was the quashing of the indictment against Rerdell, on the ground that the Christian name was not given, and the other, this decision.

By Mr. MILLIKEN :

Q. Those two instances in which you differed with the judge are the two particular instances where his decisions ran against your propositions ?—A. No, sir ; not by any means. He decided a great many hundred propositions, and several of them were against me. But I don't think it is any disrespect to the court to differ with the court. We do that when we take an appeal, and it is one of our privileges and prerogatives to hold our own opinions upon the law. Of course I may be wrong, but if I had had an appeal I would have taken it in that case.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Then the decision of Judge Wylie ended the proceedings, so far as the Government was concerned. Was there any date in the indictment that was barred by the statute of limitations ?—A. None at all. You see, we had either to indict Mr. Kellogg for receiving the drafts, which would have been barred by the statute, or we had to indict him for receiving the separate sums of money. We did indict him for that, and it was the only thing that was left for us to do. We believed that we were right, and that we had a strong case, because whatever doubt might have attached to the entire transaction was dispelled by what we were told. Colonel Bliss, in discussing the case with Mr. Merrick and myself, told us that Mr. Kellogg had called to see him, and had told him that he had got the money. Colonel Bliss told us that he said to Kellogg, "What did you take it for ?" and that Kellogg answered, "Well, I took it and used it for political purposes in Louisiana." Colonel Bliss told Mr. Merrick and myself that, and that was one reason why we determined that the man should be prosecuted.

In December, after I had filed the affidavit setting forth what we expected to prove by Walsh's testimony, Mr. Kellogg was very indignant, and went around to the newspaper offices talking to the correspondents, and he went, among others, to the correspondent of the New York Times, Mr. Dunnell, and told him (and I have no doubt that it was intended to be repeated to me) that he either ought to, or that he was going to, "take a shotgun and blow" my "brains out." Well, now, I have only to say that if Mr. Kellogg will let me know the time and place when he wants to put that in practice I will be on hand. My character has never been assailed. I don't want to do Mr. Kellogg any injustice, but if he thinks that he wants that kind of satisfaction I am willing to give it to him.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I judge from the latter part of your testimony that you and Kellogg are not on terms of the warmest friendship.

The WITNESS. Don't you know that there is a divinity that hedges a member of Congress so that you cannot get at him? [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. I am glad to hear that. I feel safer now than I did before.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Is there any further statement that you desire to make?—A. I don't know of any other.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. How long were you employed by the Government in these cases?—A. One year and eleven months.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How much do you say your bill was cut down?—A. I don't remember exactly now.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. How large a bill did you render against the Government?—A. I don't remember now; I did not keep any account of it; the Attorney-General cut it down. You see I came from his own city, and he knew me, so he did not take as good care of me as he did of some of the others.

Q. You received $31,000, did you?—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. During the progress of those two trials were there not frequent adjournments for several days at a time?—A. No, sir.

Q. In neither trial?—A. No.

Q. Were there not adjournments from Friday until Monday or Tuesday?—A. Oh, yes; from Friday to Monday.

Q. And sometimes longer?—A. No; unless a legal holiday intervened.

Q. At whose instance were those adjournments?—A. By the order of the court.

Q. They were not suggested or controlled by the attorneys?—A. Oh, no; we had nothing to do with that.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What contract did you have with the Attorney-General with regard to the compensation you were to receive for your services?—A. The only contract I had was my commission. I was employed "at a compensation to be determined by the Attorney-General when the suits are ended."

Q. Your contract was made with Attorney-General Brewster?—A. We don't make contracts in our city.

Q. I mean your appointment was made by Mr. Brewster during his term as Attorney-General?—A. Yes, sir; as I have stated. I did not charge for my services by the day; we don't do that kind of business in our city; we charge what the service is worth. I never heard of a per diem charge for a lawyer before. I took my account and averaged it and made it up to what I thought I ought to receive. In doing so I kept in mind the fact that I had abandoned my private business to attend to these cases.

(Adjourned.)

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 6, 1884.

CHARLES C. COLE sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Please state your age, residence, and occupation.—Answer. I am forty-three years of age. My residence I suppose is in the District of Columbia, though I claim to be a citizen of the State of West Virginia; I have resided in Washington for the last six years. My occupation is that of a lawyer.

Q. Were you attorney at any time for any of the persons known as the defendants in the star-route cases or contractors in the star-route mail service?—A. I was attorney for a man by the name of Rerdell; I think his name is M. C. Rerdell. He was one of the defendants in the case that was tried twice in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, known as the star-route case, in which Dorsey and Brady were the principal defendants. I was his counsel during that first trial. I was not his counsel during the second trial. I was employed by him about the first of June, at all events a few days before that first trial commenced. I do not remember now what year that was; I think it was 1881, but I am not certain about the year; but it was just a few days before the trial commenced that I was employed.

Q. During the first trial?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was it during the first or the second trial that he entered a plea of guilty?—A. It was during the second trial.

Q. Were you then his counsel?—A. No, sir; I ceased to be his counsel a few days before the commencement of the second trial. I retired from the case and he employed another man to represent him (Judge Wilshire, of Arkansas) in the second trial.

Q. Then, during the time that you were counsel for Rerdell he did not enter a plea of guilty in the case?—A. No, sir; he did not actually enter it, although he had the subject under consideration.

Q. During the first trial did you represent him in court during the trial of that case?—A. Yes, sir; that is, I was there for the most of the time. I think about the first of August, after the evidence was already in and the arguments commenced, I was somewhat ill from malaria and one thing or another, and tired, and I went away for a few weeks. I think I was gone two weeks, and returned before the arguments closed, and was present when the case was finally submitted.

Q. Did you appear for him at his instance or at the instance of some of his friends?—A. At his instance.

Q. At his own instance?—A. Yes, sir; I had no negotiation with anybody else; I negotiated with him. I do not remember now that any of his friends ever spoke to me in regard to acting for him.

Q. He was not, I believe, a principal in the case, but merely a clerk?—

A. Yes, a clerk; a clerk for ex-Senator Dorsey, I think, and perhaps some of the other star-route men.

Q. Were you consulted by any other star-route contractors in a professional way or in any way?—A. Yes, sir; I was consulted by one other person who was indicted, Samuel G. Cabell. He was indicted, I think, for perjury, perhaps, in putting in straw bonds or something of that sort. I had been Mr. Cabell's counsel in other matters, and after he was indicted he came to me in relation to the matter and consulted with me somewhat, but it did not result in my being retained. I never was retained by him in that case, in the case in which he was indicted, although I had some conversation with him about it. He may have considered me as retained, or as his counsel, or one of his counsel in the case, but he never paid me any retainer, and I never considered myself retained.

Q. His case never went to trial?—A. No, sir; it never went to trial.

Q. What time were you retained in his case?—A. I am not certain, but it was about the time Rerdell retained me; whether just before or just after, I am not certain when he had his conversation with me. I know we had some discussion with regard to the fee that he was to pay me, and he mentioned the fact that he had several other attorneys. He never came around to pay the retainer, and I never considered myself as retained in that case.

Q. Were you retained in any other case of those indicted or likely to be indicted, or against whom any charges were pending, or parties who feared they might be indicted?—A. No, I do not think I was ever retained by any of the others. There were two men that talked with me, two that I remember now, in relation to it.

Q. Who were they?—A. Mr. Albert E. Boone was one. I think about the time that Rerdell retained me Mr. Boone saw me and said something about retaining me. But there was some arrangement made between him and the counsel of the Government by which I do not think he retained counsel. While he was a defendant in one of those cases and indicted, I understood that he had some arrangement with them by which he was not required to employ counsel, and so he did not retain me.

Q. Was there any other?—A. There was a man by the name of Colegrove who talked with me about star-route matters, but he never retained me in relation to anticipated prosecutions against him as a star-route man. He had some litigation in Missouri and some in Pennsylvania, growing out of his subcontracts with star-route men in those States, and some other matters; I do not remember whether they all grew out of his star-route contracts or not. But he had been sued in Missouri, and he wanted to sue some parties up in Pennsylvania, and thought that he might want to sue some of the subcontractors here in the District of Columbia, and he retained me in relation to those matters.

Q. Did he pay you any fee for your services?—A. Yes, sir; he paid me something, I do not remember now how much. A part of the money I did not receive directly from him; I received it from another attorney who was employed conjointly with me.

Q. Who was that?—A. That was Mr. C. D. Coleman. In that connection Mr. Colegrove, as I now remember, was brought to my attention by Mr. Coleman. Mr. Coleman had lived in Missouri some years ago, and so had Dr. Colegrove, as I understood it, and they were acquaintances there.

Q. How much of a fee did you receive in that case from Dr. Colegrove and Mr. Coleman together?—A. I do not remember how much, off and on. I think at the time I was retained I received somewhere in the neighborhood of $200. The matters he wanted to consult me about were not of very great importance, and required only a consultation at that time. He was anticipating that a suit would be brought against him here by some Missouri parties, and he wanted some advice about that, and some advice about a Pennsylvania matter where he wanted to sue some parties; and I think there were one or two other matters that I cannot call to mind now, but they were not of very great importance. My recollection is that I received at that time $200, or possibly $250; and then afterwards he had to bring a suit in Pennsylvania, and I took some testimony in it, and rendered him some services in relation to the conveyance of property here in Washington which belonged to his wife, and such things as that, for which he paid me small sums along from time to time, the amount I do not remember; I do not know, indeed, whether I have an account of it; possibly I have.

Q. How much in all did you get from Mr. Coleman on account of the matters which you have referred to?—A. My recollection is it was either $200 or $250, I am not quite sure which.

Q. But not exceeding $250?—A. I do not think so.

Q. And how much did you get from Mr. Colegrove?—A. I do not know exactly. I have been and am yet his counsel in some matters, quite a number of different matters, and he has handed me, down to date, possibly all told, in addition to what I got in the first place, maybe $200 more; I should think that would be the outside figure.

Q. Not exceeding that?—A. No, sir.

Q. For any purpose or for professional services?—A. Professional services or otherwise.

Q. For any service?—A. For any service. Four hundred and fifty dollars would cover every cent paid me, and more too. I think I have stated it too high.

Q. In both cases?—A. Yes, sir; in what I received from Mr. Coleman and what I received from Dr. Colegrove directly.

Q. Was Dr. Colegrove a star-route contractor?—A. Yes, sir; he is a large star-route contractor. He has a great many contracts, and has had for years, for carrying the mails over the country in the West and South, and some in New York and Pennsylvania that I have advised him about, off and on. And there was talk, along soon after the star-route investigation commenced, that he would be indicted. There was quite a piece in one of the New York papers about it, and he was a good deal stirred up over it, and some time afterwards, I do not remember just how long, after I had been retained for him through Mr. Coleman in relation to these other matters, my attention was called to that by the doctor, and he feared that he might be indicted, though he always claimed, and I thought from what he showed me, there was no ground for an indictment. And I will say further, that towards the close of the star-route investigations, amongst the very last investigations before the grand jury, they brought up this case of Colegrove's and sent witnesses before the grand jury, as I was informed by Mr. Colegrove. He came to me at that time and protested, and said that there was nothing that there ought to be an indictment against him for, and he wanted to save the scandal of it, and wanted to know what I thought of his going to the Government counsel and showing them just how the thing stood. I did not know the Government counsel, except Mr. Merrick; I was pretty well acquainted with him, and knew him to be a pretty fair sort of a man, and I told Dr. Colegrove I thought there would be nothing improper in his going to Mr. Merrick and, as he had nothing to conceal, making a full, fair, square statement of the thing just as it stood, and I thought that when Mr. Merrick saw how the thing was he would not have an indictment found. I learned from Dr. Colegrove that he went and saw Mr. Merrick, and I believe he did, from what he told me. However, no indictment was found. I know the matter was before the grand jury and no indictment was found in relation to it. That related to a route in South Carolina, I think; it was a Southern State, I remember.

Q. Did you make any efforts to prevent his indictment?—A. No, sir; not other than I have told you, with one exception, and I cannot say that that was an effort to prevent his indictment. I went to Colonel Cook while he was counsel for the United States, and inquired of him if Dr. Colegrove's name was amongst the parties who were likely to be indicted, and he informed me that he could not say how that was, but that his name was amongst those who were being investigated or who were to be investigated. I told him that I had been looking into these matters somewhat, and it did not seem to me that there was anything that he ought to be indicted for. Well, he told me that he knew nothing about the case; that it had not been reached for investigation, and would not be for some time; but when it was, I asked him if he would have any objection to seeing Dr. Colegrove and talking with him in relation to it. He said that he could not say at that time, but the policy of the Department of Justice, as he understood, was not to indict anybody who ought not to be indicted; and that so far as anything he knew then, he would be willing to see Dr. Colegrove and converse with him whenever the matter was reached, but he was too busy then to take up matters until they were reached in their regular order. That was the only conversation I ever had with Colonel Cook about it, and during the time he was representing the Government in those matters the case was not reached. At all events I heard nothing about it after that time until a year, probably, after Colonel Cook's connection with the cases ceased, and the occurrence transpired which I related to you a few moments ago, when Dr. Colegrove came to me and told me they were about to send witnesses before the grand jury, or had sent them, or something of that sort, and wanted to know what I thought about his going to the Government counsel, and I advised him as I have told you.

Q. Did he pay you any fee, directly or indirectly, for this service by yourself or others?—A. No, sir.

Q. He did not?—A. No, sir. Well, now, I do not know what he may have intended. He paid me the money, as I understood it, for the services that I rendered him. These conversations about the probability or possibility of his being indicted were simply incidental matters that he mentioned to me from time to time while I was his counsel. He certainly never paid me, nor I never demanded any pay for anything I advised him in relation to those matters as a separate matter, nor did I make, in any charges I ever made against him, any charge for anything of that sort; I considered it merely an incidental matter.

Q. What was the nature of the other business that you did for him; did you bring any suits?—A. No, sir; I cannot say that I brought any, personally. The suits that were brought up in Pennsylvania were brought under my direction and upon my advice, but I did not prepare the papers, because I did not have knowledge of their practice up there which was sufficient; he employed local counsel there to act in connection with me.

Q. Did you give a written opinion in the case?—A. Yes, sir; I gave a written opinion in the case, and corresponded with his counsel in Pennsylvania in relation to it, and there was considerable testimony to be taken here in Washington.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Who was his counsel; who were the suits brought by?—A. I am not able to give you the names here; I can get them at my office.

Q. In what county were they brought?—A. I cannot remember the county.

Q. Who brought suits against him in Missouri?—A. I cannot give you the names of the parties, but they obtained judgment in Missouri.

Q. In the United States or the State courts?—A. I think it was brought originally in the State court and removed to the United States court. There was a judgment obtained against him there, and Senator Vest has charge of it now. I had a letter from Senator Vest a few days ago, calling my attention to it and threatening suit against Mr. Colegrove here unless he paid it.

Q. How did he get service or attachment?—A. Dr. Colegrove used to live there and had some business matters there, and I think on one occasion when he was there they served him with the papers, or possibly they attached his property, and then he made a personal appearance there.

Q. Has he got property there?—A. I understood that he had.

Q. Where?—A. I do not know. I understood that he had property there at that time; whether he has any there or not I do not know.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you know the names of the parties?—A. I do not know the names of the parties, though I have papers in my office that I think would show the names of the parties there, and the court in which it was obtained. Senator Vest represents the parties who got the judgment against Dr. Colegrove.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Who made application for the change of venue—Dr. Colegrove?—A. I do not know anything about that.

Q. He got the change because of non-residence, because he was a resident of another State?—A. Yes, if he got it. Mind you, I do not say that he did.

Q. I understood you to say that he did.—A. I say I have a sort of general impression that the suit was brought in the State court and then removed to the United States court, but I may be in error about that; that was only the impression I got from Dr. Colegrove. I had nothing to do with the suit there, but I learned from Dr. Colegrove that judgment was obtained against him there very much to his surprise; he did not expect they would succeed. But the judgment was obtained for a sum much larger than he supposed he was liable for.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How much was the amount of the judgment against him?—A. I think it was about $1,800; that is my recollection.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. What were these suits for; was he the original contractor or subcontractor; were they brought by contractors or citizens; what were they about?—A. The suit in Missouri, as I understand (I have not seen the record, and all I know about it is information I derived from Dr.

Colegrove in talking with him about it), was brought by some subcontractors of his who claimed that he was liable to them in damages for services in carrying the mails there. There was a controversy between them in relation to it.

Q. These suits that were brought in Pennsylvania, were they against contractors?—A. The suits that he brought in Pennsylvania were against his subcontractors, who had undertaken to carry the mail on certain routes for certain sums and had failed to do it.

Q. Had they sublet them to the Missouri men?—A. Oh, no; they had no connection with each other; the Pennsylvania and the Missouri suits had no connection with each other at all. I may be in error about the suits being in Pennsylvania. Since I began to speak about it, it seems to me they were in Northern New York instead of Pennsylvania. But I have memoranda at my office by which I can find out in what courts they are there, and whether in Pennsylvania or New York; I am not quite certain in relation to it. It has been some two years since the suits were brought, or three years, I think, since they were brought, in Pennsylvania or New York, and I do not remember distinctly which State they are in. The Missouri case was an earlier one even than the New York cases. It was pending there, as I understand, in Missouri, when I first became acquainted with Dr. Colegrove. That was among the first things he ever consulted with me about.

Q. What part of Missouri did he live in?—A. I do not remember. It is some years ago since he left there. He has been living here in Washington ever since I knew him, and, I understand, some years before.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you give a written opinion in the Missouri case too, as to Dr. Colegrove's rights and liabilities?—A. I do not remember; I do not think I did, for when he first consulted me that suit was then pending; he was then defending it, and I think his consultation with me was in regard to some points of the defense, as to what witnesses he would need at the trial, and what facts he would wish to prove. I think that my only connection with that case was first to advise with him about what he would need at the trial, and secondly as to a defense to be made against the suit that should be brought here upon the Missouri judgment, if one should be brought.

Q. Your entire services, then, to him were in matters of consultation and not in regard to the bringing of suits?—A. It was something more than consultation, for I did a good deal of work for him in the way of corresponding with counsel who brought the Pennsylvania or New York suits. I have done considerable work for him in the way of corresponding with his subcontractors in the West, some of them. I remember an instance now, where a subcontractor threatened to sue him here, and sent his claims to a firm of lawyers in this city, and he was written to and came to me, and I had to write West and investigate the matter. I had several consultations and considerable correspondence, and finally advised him that he was not liable to pay the demand, and to stand suit. I so advised the lawyers here who had charge of the matter and they did not risk the suit; at all events they never sued him.

Q. These were all merely civil suits?—A. Yes, sir; they were civil suits.

Q. In which you were engaged for Dr. Colegrove?—A. Yes, sir; and Dr. Colegrove's wife has a separate estate of her own, and some years ago, some of the first business I ever did for him when I was introduced to him by Mr. Coleman, was to advise him in relation to her rights in that property and how she could transfer it. She desired to make a transfer or exchange of it and to sell that property, and I drew the papers, and some of the contracts between her and the parties who built her house; and, as I go on to talk, I remember that there were twenty, twenty-five, or thirty matters that I advised Dr. Colegrove about, from first to last.

Q. In the matter of services to his wife you have received your compensation in the fees that you have stated that you received from him?—A. Yes, sir; I never received anything directly from his wife. He always came directly to me in relation to those matters, and I only saw her when it was necessary to have her execute the papers, and so on.

Q. When were these payments made for services in the Pennsylvania, Missouri, and New York cases?—A. The $200 or $250, which was first paid, was understood to be a sort of general retainer for me to look after his business, and when I thought I had rendered services enough to cover that he would pay me more.

Q. When was that first retainer paid?—A. As I tell you, I cannot fix the date now; I might, possibly, if I were at my office. But it was not far from the time that I was retained by Mr. Rerdell.

Q. It was during the trial of the first star-route case?—A. No, sir; it was prior to the trial, because Mr. Rerdell employed me a few days prior to the trial, and I think Dr. Colegrove employed me a few days before Mr. Rerdell did. But it may have been a considerable time before; I am not positive about the time. That original employment by Dr. Colegrove, and indeed all matters connected with Dr. Colegrove, was entirely out of my mind when I came here this morning. I had not thought of him at all, and therefore what I have said is purely from recollection of matters that occurred, some of them, three or four years ago, without any data to go by or anything to refresh my recollection.

Q. Are you in partnership now with any one, or were you at that time?—A. I have a sort of partnership with Colonel Cook, and have had ever since the 1st day of January, 1880.

Q. What do you mean by "a sort of partnership"?—A. I will explain to you just what our arrangement is. When I first came to Washington I went into the office with Colonel Cook without any understanding between him and myself about it, except that he had a large practice, a great many cases on hand, and he was in failing health at that time, and not able to devote much time to the cases. He permitted me to go into court and take charge of his cases precisely as if they were mine, introduced me to his clients, and I took charge pretty largely of the civil cases. I had nothing to do, and never had anything to do, with Colonel Cook's criminal practice. That is very considerable here at this bar, and I have had nothing to do with it. I never have been associated with him in a criminal case, and have never received any part of the fee that he has ever had in a criminal case, whether he appeared for the Government or against it.

Q. Did you divide with him the fees that you had in these cases?—A. I will tell you in a moment, if you will let me go along in my own way, just what the arrangement was. I continued in that way to do a great deal of the work, most of the work of preparation, and always participated in the trial, or took part in the trial, of important civil cases in court up until, as I remember now, the 1st of January, 1880. We had no arrangement as to fees or what I was to receive at all, but whenever a case was settled and the fees realized out of it he would suggest that I ought to have such a part of the fee, and we divided the fee in each case along in that way and never had any difficulty about it. We understood each other, and I was always satisfied with what he suggested I might keep out of the case. My main point was to become acquainted with the bar and with clients, and to familiarize myself with the practice in the District of Columbia rather than to consider the matter of fees for these first few years.

Q. Was that in civil and criminal cases both?—A. It was only civil cases. As I said before, and I repeat again, from the time I first came to Washington to the present time I never have had any interest in any criminal case that Colonel Cook has ever been interested in or tried, whether he appeared for the Government or against it. And I have none of his criminal practice to day. I believe it is safe for me to say that I have not appeared as counsel in more than half a dozen criminal cases since I have been in Washington, and in those I have been employed entirely separate from Colonel Cook. His clients understand that they do not secure my services when they employ him in criminal cases.

Q. But they do in civil cases?—A. Yes. On the 1st of January, 1880, Colonel Cook and I made a permanent agreement or arrangement that has continued down to the present time, that as to all new business from that time, new cases, actual cases in court, I was to have one half and he one-half of the fees.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. While Colonel Cook was employed as Government counsel——

A. (Interposing.) If you will allow me to get through with my statement I will be glad to answer that?

Mr. FYAN. I beg pardon; I thought you were through.

The WITNESS. That arrangement applied only to civil cases where suits were actually brought or defended in court. In criminal cases where he was retained I was to perform no services unless I saw fit to do so, and was to have no part of the fees. In all office business that came to me, in business that I did that did not result in actually bringing suits in the courts of the District of Columbia I kept all the fees, and he did the same thing. That was our arrangement, and it has continued down to the present time. Now I would be glad to answer any questions.

Q. While Colonel Cook was acting as counsel for the Government did you defend any of the parties against whom indictments were found or were likely to be found?—A. No, sir.

Q. Were you employed by any of the defendants?—A. No, sir; not while he was Government counsel. He resigned in March, 1882, I think it was, and I was employed the latter part of May or the first of June following. I do not remember the year, whether it was 1881 or 1882.

Q. You were employed by whom?—A. By Mr. Rerdell.

Q. How much did Mr. Rerdell pay you?—A. He paid me $2,500.

Q. He was not indicted was he?—A. Yes, sir; he was indicted at that time, and it was understood then that the trial would come on in a few days.

Q. Did you divide any portion of your fee with Colonel Cook?—A. No, sir; I did not.

Q. Did you consult with him about that case?—A. No, sir; I did not consult with him about it; but after I had been employed, I knew that he had been counsel some years ago in General Babcock's case where the charge was conspiracy, and I knew he had investigated the subject pretty closely, and I asked him if he had a brief or anything to give me, or a reference to some authorities, and he furnished me his brief that he made in General Babcock's case.

Q. Do you mean the Saint Louis whisky case?—A. Yes, sir; the Saint Louis case. He did not appear there in that case to argue it, but General Babcock was indicted here also, as you will remember, and he tried the case here and made a brief, or he and Mr. Storrs did together; I think Mr. Storrs's name is on the brief also.

Q. Who paid you that $2,500?—A. Mr. Rerdell. It was paid in this way: Mr. Rerdell brought me a sight draft drawn by Stephen W. Dorsey on Mr. Bosler for $2,500.

Q. Who employed you?—A. Mr. Rerdell.

Q. In person?—A. Yes.

Q. Who was with him at that time?—A. I am not certain that anybody was, and yet I have a sort of impression that Mr. Boone was with him at the time.

Q. Were you acquainted with Mr. Bosler?—A. I never saw Mr. Bosler in my life, and would not have known him if I had seen him.

Q. And the $2,500 was a draft drawn by Mr. Dorsey on Mr. Bosler?—A. Yes.

Q. Who cashed it?—A. It was cashed by Mr. Bosler, I imagine. I put it in bank and collected it through the bank.

Q. What bank?—A. I sent it to a friend of mine in New York, and he collected it through the bank. I do not know what bank he collected it through.

Q. Mr. Bosler lived at Carlisle, Pa.?—A. Yes, sir; at Carlisle, Pa.

Q. What is the name of your friend in New York?—A. Storrs.

Q. Do you know his address?—A. Yes; Samuel J. Storrs. He has an office in the Equitable Building, at No. 120 Broadway, New York. I had some financial transactions with him, and I sent him the draft and requested him to collect it through the bank and send me his check for it, and he did so.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did not Rerdell tell you that ex-Senator Dorsey was furnishing money for his defense?—A. Yes, sir; I so understood it. I understood from Mr. Rerdell that ex-Senator Dorsey owed him a large sum of money, and that he had been trying to get him to pay it and had not been able to get it out of him, and that this money that was paid to me was a partial payment by Dorsey to Rerdell of money that he owed him. Rerdell also claimed that Bosler was largely indebted to him for services rendered that he had not paid him for. I know nothing about the facts myself.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. What was the date of that draft?—A. I do not know.

Q. Well, approximate it.—A. It was some time in the latter part of May or the early part of June of that year that the star-route case was first tried, and my recollection is that was 1882.

Q. Do you mean when you were employed?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. It was before you appeared for him in court?—A. Yes, sir; I would not have appeared until I had my retainer or had it secured. I told him I must either have the money or have it secured, and he brought me this draft.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Can you tell why it was that he went outside of the attorneys employed by Mr. Dorsey for his own defense?—A. I can tell you the reason that he gave me, though I do not know whether I ought to; whether it would be disclosing things that counsel ought to disclose or not. I submit that to you, gentlemen. If you say that it is not improper, I have no objection to telling it.

The CHAIRMAN. We do not know what it is until you state it. It is for you to determine whether it is or not.

The WITNESS. It does not seem to me that there can be any objection to it; I certainly have none myself. I would much prefer however, before I tell it, that Mr. Rerdell should say that he had no objection. I do not know where he is, however. I think the reason he gave me was a proper one and a commendable one. He seemed to be laboring under the impression that possibly when they got into the trial of the case and developments were made, that if he was not represented by counsel who were not employed by somebody else, an effort might be made to clear others at his expense, and for that reason he said to me that he wanted somebody in the case who would represent him and nobody else, to look out for his interests and see that he was properly treated through the trial by other defendants.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. He was convicted, was he not?—A. Yes; the first verdict convicted him and a man by the name of Minor.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you make an argument in his behalf before the jury?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did he desire to let the matter go by default?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Had he made up his mind, then, to plead guilty?—A. No, sir.

Q. Why did he allow the matter, then, to go without a contest?—A. It was determined in a consultation where Rerdell and I think pretty much all the other defendants were present, and the counsel of all parties, that in view of the fact that Rerdell had at one time made what was said to be a confession, that the more he was kept in the background during the trial the better it would be; not to make his part of the defense conspicuous.

Q. Were you present at that consultation?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you agree to it?—A. Yes; it seemed to me to be the true policy.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Did Rerdell say that he had made this confession with any hope or promise of immunity on the part of Government counsel?—A. He said to me that at the time he made it he had reason to believe that if he did make it it would not only stop everything as against him, but all the balance of the parties.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. To whom did he refer, to all the parties?—A. To the other persons who were indicted with him.

Q. Do you mean Dorsey, Brady, and Vaile?—A. That is what I understood him to say.

Q. Will you repeat that again? I did not exactly catch the force of it.—A. The statement that he made was that he hoped by making the statement, and had reason to believe, that the making of it would stop all further proceedings against him and the others.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Did he say that the parties who made it held out that inducement?—A. No, sir; I do not think he did.

Q. Or left that impression on his mind?—A. He left the impression on my mind that some person that he supposed had the power and authority to do so had made him that promise, but he did not tell me who it was.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did Rerdell consent to this arrangement by which he was not to have his case presented to the jury in the first trial?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Why was it that you agreed to go in and consult with the other counsel when he had employed you for the purpose of having his case separately defended; for fear the other people would sacrifice him?—A. It was understood from the beginning that we would all consult together and would all act together for the good of all. His object in employing separate counsel, as I understood, was to have some person that he could rely upon that he knew was not interested for anybody else, and whose judgment in relation to the matter should not be biased by having any other person's interest in charge. I did not understand that Rerdell had any suspicions against the other defendants or their counsel, but that the other counsel having other interests at stake, their judgment might be biased by that fact, and he wanted some person who should not be interested for any other defendant, so that he might have the unbiased judgment of that man.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. When was this trial?—A. It began early in June.

Q. When was this consultation?—A. Oh, the consultation was after the evidence was all in; that is the consultation that resulted in determining that no speech should be made to the jury for Rerdell.

Q. As I understand you, when he employed you it was in May, you think?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. It was either in May or June, and he paid you $2,500, and he did that because he was fearful lest the others would throw off on him?—A. That they might.

Q. And then immediately after he had paid you that $2,500 he came to the conclusion that he did not want to be represented at all, but would rely upon this promise that had been held out?—A. Oh, no; you are mistaken about that. It was months from the time that he employed me before the consultation I speak of. We were all the months of June, July, and a part of the month of August putting the evidence in in that case, before we got to the point where we came to consider the question of the argument to address to the jury.

Q. Then in the month of August, after the evidence was in, he changed his mind?—A. No; he did not change his mind. Rerdell was present at the consultation, and we determined what would be the best course, and who should make speeches to the jury and who should not, and it was determined there that certain counsel should speak and certain others of them should not.

Q. He concurred in that?—A. Yes, sir; he concurred in that.

Q. He did not want to be specially represented, then, by counsel in the argument?—A. Not in the argument he did not, particularly. In the argument on the law and the instructions to the jury I participated.

Q. Were you present when the evidence was taken in court?—A. Yes, sir; I was there every day while the evidence was being taken; every hour.

Q. Did you ask any questions?—A. I do not remember whether I cross-examined any witness or not; I think I did; two or three of them whose evidence was specially aimed against Rerdell; but I am not positive about that.

Q. Did you make any argument on legal propositions?—A. Yes, sir; on several, and I prepared a somewhat elaborate argument upon what I considered to be the leading proposition in the case, and was ready to deliver it, but the judge shut off discussion upon that subject by saying that he had determined to submit certain evidence to the jury, and there were no arguments delivered upon that point. Perhaps I ought to explain that a little more fully. In the early part of the trial they offered that confession of Rerdell's. Colonel Ingersoll, who appeared for some of the other defendants, made a short argument against its admission as evidence, and the judge who was presiding sustained the objection, saying if it was evidence at all it would not be until a foundation had been laid for it, until a conspiracy had been proven. The Government hereupon withdrew it, and gave notice that at a future stage of the trial, when they got further along, they would offer it again. Well, it seemed to me that that was the turning point in the case. As the evidence went along I digested it, and I digested the law and prepared what seemed to me, of course, a conclusive argument upon the law and the facts, to show that the facts did not tend sufficiently strong to prove a conspiracy to justify the court in admitting that confession. I had great confidence in getting the court so to hold.

Q. Now, right there, Mr. Cole, do you mean to say that, as a lawyer, you came to the conclusion that that confession was not admissible as against Rerdell?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Or do you mean to say that that declaration or confession would not be admissible as against the co-conspirators until a prima facie case of conspiracy was established?—A. I say both.

Q. On what ground do you say it was not admissible as against him?—A. I will tell you. I will show you that the court and the Government counsel in that very case, before they got through with it, supported that position and came around to it. That was a trial for a conspiracy and there must be more than one in a conspiracy. In order to convict of a conspiracy you must show that more than one person conspired. Rerdell confessed what they said amounted to a conspiracy between himself and certain other individuals named. Now, you cannot convict Rerdell of that conspiracy unless you prove that some of the other persons mentioned by him in his confession conspired with him. That is the position I took. And I took the position further, that the evidence introduced failed to show conspiracy on the part of any of those persons mentioned in Rerdell's confession, with him, and that, therefore, his confession was not admissible against them, and therefore not admissible against him, because he could not conspire with himself. As I said before, I had very great confidence in convincing the court that that was the law, and I believe to-day that if the court had listened, I will not say to my argument, but if the court had listened to the counsel on that point, I believe the case would have gone off on that point; and I believe if there had been a conviction and the case had been finally taken to the court in banc, that the court in banc would, of necessity, have sustained that position. There was not evidence enough in that case, when you take it altogether with its explanations and details, I say there was not evidence enough to justify any court in saying that it was sufficient to prove a conspiracy. I do not pretend to know or say whether anybody stole money from the Government or got it improperly, or whether there was extravagance, I do not know about that. But I do undertake to say, as a lawyer, that there never was evidence enough in that case to go to the jury upon the question of a conspiracy.

Q. Colonel Cook did not appear in the court as counsel for the Government in this case?—A. No, sir; he had resigned before that time. Now, at the second trial, to illustrate what I state as the law, and as the court and the Government counsel finally understood it, Rerdell on the second trial confessed, he plead guilty of conspiracy, and it stands there of record, and the jury went on and tried the case and they brought in a verdict of not guilty as to the others. So that the jury found there was no conspiracy. Thereupon the Government counsel said, "Why, of course, we cannot let this confession stand here against Rerdell," and upon their motion—the motion of the Government counsel—Rerdell was allowed to withdraw his plea of "guilty," and plead "not guilty;" and then they entered a nolle as to him, sustaining the original position which I took in the case, and which was taken by other counsel too. I do not say I originated it, by any means; but I did prepare an argument on which I spent more time than on any other argument I ever presented to a court, and, for a wonder, I was pretty well satisfied with it myself, and I did want a chance to get it to the court, but I could not, and it will have to go down to my posterity among my archives.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How can you reconcile the verdict of the first jury with the facts as proven before the jury?—A. I think the first verdict was entirely erroneous, that Rerdell and Minor were guilty——

Q. And the men with whom they conspired not guilty?—A. Yes, the verdict was inconsistent. There has been a good deal said about the juries of the District of Columbia, and I do not desire to be understood as reflecting upon those men. Take that mass of testimony put in before that jury, and the confusing arguments of counsel and the charge of the court, and it is a wonder to me that a set of men could make anything at all out of it. I do not think that the jury ought to be reflected upon because they found a verdict which to a lawyer must certainly seem to be inconsistent.

Q. Did you divide the fees in civil cases that you attended to with Colonel Cook?—A. I did.

Q. The fees that you received from Dr. Colegrove and Mr. Coleman?—A. No, sir; not the fees I received from them, because they were not in cases in the District of Columbia, and were not embraced in our arrangement.

Q. Did you make any division of those fees with Colonel Cook?—A. No, sir; he got none of them. That was for advice and office business I did, and that belonged to me.

Q. Did you say to Mr. Coleman that any portion of it would also secure the services of Colonel Cook?—A. No, sir; I did not.

Q. Or that you would divide any portion of your fee with him?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know whether any efforts were made to influence the jury in the first or second star-route cases other than through the efforts of counsel in open court?—A. No, sir; not of my own knowledge. Of course I heard a good deal said about attempts to influence the jury, both on the part of the Government and on the part of the defendants.

Q. You refer to what was current in the newspapers?—A. Yes, sir; that is all.

Q. Anything specially besides that?—A. No, sir; nothing more than what was heard by everybody on the streets. No one ever suggested anything to me about attempting to influence the jury in any way, shape, or manner.

Q. Do you know whether any of the papers in relation to the star-route trial, while in the custody of Colonel Cook, reached the possession of any of the defendants or their friends?—A. Not to my knowledge; but that question gives me opportunity to say something in relation to what I have seen insinuated here in the testimony of some of the witnesses who have testified before this committee to the effect that the defendants got papers and information in relation to the cases through me out of Colonel Cook. I want to enter the most positive denial of that. I never saw a paper, or copy of a paper, relating to these star-route cases, any of them, whether they were those connected with the indictment or otherwise, until I saw them at the trial table on the trial of that case. I never saw any any place else. If Colonel Cook ever had any in his possession, I never saw them. I do not know whether he ever did or not. I never received any information from him in relation to the facts in the cases at all in one way or the other. I never asked him for any and he never volunteered any.

Q. Was ever any fee or money received by you, directly or indirectly, from persons who had contracts in the star-route service, divided with Colonel Cook in your settlement with him?—A. No, sir.

Q. Or in any way accounted for to him?—A. No, sir; the only money I ever have received from any of those men who were connected with the star-route matters was that I received from Rerdell and Dr. Colegrove. Mr. Cook never received, directly or indirectly, in any way, shape, or manner, the benefit of a cent of that money.

Q. In either case?—A. In either case.

Q. Or in any other case?—A. No, sir; it was my own, under our arrangement, and there was no reason why he should have a cent of it, and he never did have.

Q. And the star-route defendants, I understand you to say, received no papers through you out of his office at any time?—A. No, sir; they never received any papers from me relating to those cases. I never had one in my possession, either an original or a copy, except as I took it in my hands as I was sitting at the trial table and examined it.

Q. Did you render ex-Senator Dorsey any service during this time from the fact that you knew that he was furnishing Rerdell the money with which he was making his defense?—A. No, sir; I never rendered ex-Senator Dorsey any service of any kind or character in these or any other cases, nor any other man who was indicted except Rerdell.

Q. Were you engaged in the defense of the Kellogg case?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was Colonel Cook, do you know?—A. No, sir; he was not to my knowledge. I know before Colonel Cook was Government counsel in these star-route cases, that he was Senator Kellogg's counsel generally, and did all his business for him pretty much, except in his election contest here, when I think Shellabarger & Wilson represented him. I will add that after Colonel Cook had been in these star-route cases, and Mr. Kellogg was indicted, while I of course cannot say positively that that is the fact, my decided belief is that he was not retained by Mr. Kellogg in that indictment at all. Of course it might have been done without my knowing it, but my understanding was that he was not his counsel in that case.

Q. Were you informed that Colonel Cook was offered a large retainer to act in behalf of the defendants in the star-route cases?—A. I was so informed; I do not know anything about it.

Q. So informed by him or other parties?—A. I am not certain whether Colonel Cook ever informed me that he was offered a large retainer by them prior to being engaged by the Government or not, but I know that several other parties told me that Colonel Cook had been offered a very large retainer after they learned that he was about to be employed by the Government, if he would reject the offer of the Government and take their cases. Colonel Cook may have said that to me himself, but I will not say that he did. I have no present recollection that he did tell me so, but I heard it from other sources.

The committee then adjourned until Saturday morning, June 7, 1884, at 10 o'clock a. m.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 9, 1884.

CHARLES D. COLMAN sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Please state your age, residence, and occupation.—Answer. I am sixty-seven years of age; my occupation is that of an attorney and counselor at law, and my residence at present is Plymouth, Mich. I came to Washington upon a telegram from this committee.

Q. Were you at any time attorney for Dr. Colegrove?—A. I have been his attorney, but not recently.

Q. When were you his attorney?—A. A good many years ago I was, when we, both of us, lived in Saint Louis. But I acted as a friend of his in a matter here.

Q. State what that matter was, and in what capacity you acted; what was done. First, I believe he was a contractor in the star-route mail service, was he not?—A. He was said to be a contractor; I understood so from him, and I understood so otherwise, that he was a contractor in the mail service.

Q. He was one of the persons about whom there was a probability of an indictment being found, was he not?—A. Well, there was some apprehension of that kind, that he might perhaps be proceeded against, and he desired to avoid that, and came to me as an old acquaintance and friend, and I interceded for him.

Q. State what you did in that way, and what he did.—A. I went to Mr. C. C. Cole and desired him to see what he could do.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Mr. Cole is an attorney-at-law?—A. Yes, sir; he is an attorney-at-law in this city, and was the law partner of William A. Cook, whom I knew at the time was engaged as counsel for the Government in the prosecution of these cases. I went to him for reasons which I thought would be effective.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What were those reasons?—A. I thought Mr. Cole might influence Mr. Cook.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. To prevent the indictment?—A. Yes, sir; prevent the indictment.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. State what you did in the premises.—A. In the first place, Dr.

Colegrove came to me, as I have before stated, as a friend, and wanted to know if I could do anything for him, and I told him I thought I could; that I knew Mr. Cole, and knew that he was an associate of Colonel Cook's, and that I thought that I could aid him, but that it would require money, probably. I went to Mr. Cole and conferred with him upon the subject. He told me that he thought he could aid him, and I saw him go from the room in which we were into the adjoining room and have a conference with Mr. Cook. He came back and informed me that he would be able to help the doctor, and that he would want, in the first place, so much money—$500 was the amount first spoken of, but he afterwards got, I think, more than that; I think he got $750.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. In addition, or all told?—A. All told, so far as I know.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Who paid him this money?—A. Dr. Colegrove, as I learned from both of them. I did not see the payment, as I recollect.

Q. Mr. Cole told you that he got that money?—A. Yes, sir; Mr. Cole told me that he got that money, and he also told me that he divided with Mr. Cook.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What time was this; can you give the date of it?—A. I cannot precisely, but it was just about the time these indictments were being predicted.

Q. Was it at the time when Mr. Cook was in the Government service?—A. Yes, sir; it was at the time when Mr. Cook was in the Government service.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. It was previous to the death of President Garfield, was it?—A. It was previous to the death of President Garfield. I know Colonel Cook went to New York, for he told me he was going there; it was during President Garfield's sickness at Elberon.

Q. He told you that during this interview?—A. I had several interviews. There is a man named Moore whom I think you gentlemen ought to get hold of. He was a confidential man, I apprehend, of William A. Cook's.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What is his first name?—A. I cannot tell. He was a detective, and is an employé now in the Government service somewhere, so I am told. I know that he and Colonel Cook went off together.

Q. Where?—A. To New York, and I think to Elberon. I know they started to go. Of course, I did not see them go, but I understood they went.

Q. When do you say that Dr. Colegrove called upon you, having refreshed your memory?—A. I think it must have been before the death of President Garfield that he called upon me; I am very firmly convinced of that.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. When was the money paid?—A. Five hundred dollars of it was paid at once. I know that Mr. Cole told me that he let Colonel Cook have $250 out of that $500 when Colonel Cook was going to New York.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. And that was before President Garfield died?—A. That was before President Garfield's death, according to my recollection, but after his assassination—after his wound.

Q. It was in the summer, then?—A. Yes, sir; it was in the summer of 1881, after the 2d of July. I know that on the 2d day of July, the day of his assassination, I was at Parkersburg, W. Va., attending the Federal court there when the news came, and of course it was a matter of astonishment to us all. I am not entirely certain whether Dr. Colegrove ever spoke to me before President Garfield's assassination or not; but I know it was during President Garfield's sickness that some of these matters transpired.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. You went to Mr. Cole because he was a partner of Colonel Cook's?—A. I cannot help but say that, gentlemen.

Q. And at that time you knew that Colonel Cook was in the Government service?—A. I knew that Colonel Cook was in the Government service.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. And Mr. Cole went from your presence into the room where Colonel Cook was, and asked him about it?—A. Yes, sir; and came back and reported to me.

Q. Did he state how much he desired to be paid down, and what would be paid thereafter?—A. He demanded then $500.

Q. Did he say then that he had to divide part of it with Colonel Cook?—A. I cannot say that he said at that time that he had to divide with Colonel Cook, but he said that he had to use money other ways than what he would retain himself. But he subsequently told me —

Q. (Interposing.) When did he subsequently tell you?—A. During that summer and fall certainly, because I had a good many interviews. I was here at that time, and I had interviews with him almost daily.

Q. What did he tell you?—A. That he had to divide with Colonel Cook, and that he had paid Colonel Cook money, a part of that received from Dr. Colegrove. I think he told me that he paid more than half.

Q. What did Dr. Colegrove tell you about it?—A. I do not think Dr. Colegrove ever told me anything about how the money was divided. I have no recollection of his ever having told me so. I saw Dr. Colegrove there at the office several times. He went there with me at first, and then afterwards I met him there, sometimes by appointment and sometimes accidentally.

Q. Do you know whether Dr. Colegrove was indicted or not?—A. He was not indicted, as I understand, and I do not believe he ought to have been. If I had supposed he deserved indictment I would not have interceded for him.

Q. He told you that he was a contractor, did he?—A. Yes, sir; he told me that he was a contractor, and he told me that he did not want the notoriety of an indictment, and would rather give something than to have the notoriety of it, although he said he could defend himself successfully. I had known him a good many years. We occupied an office together in Saint Louis for a year and a half or two years, and I suppose it was for that reason that he came to me, probably.

Q. Do you know what routes he was interested in?—A. I do not; I never inquired into that matter.

Q. Did he tell you?—A. I do not think he did. He may have told me some of his routes. He had a large number of routes; that I recollect very distinctly, but the numbers of them I am unable to give you.

Q. He said he would rather pay to keep from being indicted than to pay for the defense?—A. Yes, sir; that he did not want the notoriety of it.

Q. He did not want to be published as having been indicted?—A. No, sir; he did not want it published.

Q. Did he tell you that he paid that money for this purpose?—A. I cannot say that he ever told me that in so many words.

Q. What did he tell you?—A. He told me that he had paid money, and I knew it was for that purpose, because I made the arrangement.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. At this first interview with Mr. Cole, did you tell him it was your object to prevent his being indicted?—A. Yes, sir; that is what I told him.

Q. What other conversation occurred?—A. Why, I asked him if he could not prevent it through the instrumentality of Colonel Cook.

Q. What did he say?—A. He said he thought he could, and went and conferred with Colonel Cook, and came back and informed me that he could.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What did you do then; did you inform Dr. Colegrove?—A. Yes, sir; I informed Dr. Colegrove, and we made an appointment and had a conference together.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. You told him at this first interview that Mr. Cole required the payment of $500 down as a retainer.—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And he subsequently told you that he paid that?—A. Yes, sir; and Mr. Cole told me the same thing, and I think told me he got $250 more. I would not say affirmatively that Mr. Cole ever told me that, or I would not say affirmatively that he ever did get $250 more; but such is my present recollection.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. And he told you in addition to that, that Colonel Cook got the larger portion of what he got before?—A. That is my recollection of it. He certainly told me that he divided with Colonel Cook.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. When you came back with Dr. Colegrove, what took place in that conversation?—A. They had a conference, and Mr. Cole told Dr. Colegrove that he would protect him. I am very much of the impression that I was present when the money was paid over—such is my present recollection—when the $500 was paid.

Q. He came there for the purpose of fixing it up?—A. He came there for the purpose of perfecting the arrangement. I went preliminarily and made the preliminary arrangement, and then Dr. Colegrove and myself went there together.

Q. That was at the office of Cook & Cole?—A. Yes, sir; at the office of Cook & Cole.

Q. Was Colonel Cook in the office at the time?—A. Colonel Cook was about. I know he was in the office when I had my first interview with Mr. Cole, because he went from his room into Colonel Cook's room, and had a conference. I saw him go, and saw him conferring with Colonel Cook through the door, and he came back and reported to me. Of course, I did not hear what Mr. Cole said to Colonel Cook. I was not within hearing distance, but I was where I saw them.

Q. He came back and reported what?—A. That he could protect Dr. Colegrove.

Q. And then you went to Dr. Colegrove and had a consultation?—A. We made an appointment, I think, for the next morning.

Q. Did you stay with Dr. Colegrove until the arrangement was completed?—A. I have the impression that I was there until the money was paid over.

Q. Was anything said about Mr. Cole's having transacted other business for Dr. Colegrove?—A. Dr. Colegrove did not know him up to that time.

Q. Did you introduce him?—A. Yes, sir; I introduced him. Dr. Colegrove did not know him up to that time. I think he has transacted business for him since; I have so understood.

Q. Did this payment have any relation to any legal services rendered him in regard to suits in Missouri, Pennsylvania, New York, or anywhere else?—A. Not at all; it was for that, and for that exclusively.

Q. Was any other subject mentioned?—A. No other subject was mentioned at that time in my presence, nor was there as between me and Mr. Cole.

Q. When have you last seen Dr. Colegrove?—A. I have not seen Dr. Colegrove since prior to a year ago in March. I left here a year ago March, the 3d of March, I think, and I have been back here but once since until now. I was back here about the 1st of May or a little before the 1st of May. Other than that I have not been here since the first days of March, 1883.

By Mr. FYAN :

Q. That is all you know in relation to the matter?—A. Yes, sir; that is all I know in regard to it.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Have you any written memoranda or diary which you kept at the time, by which you can refresh your memory as to the dates of the transactions about which you testify?—A. I think I have. I have always been accustomed to keeping a diary, and I think I kept one at that time, and that by referring to my diary I can give the dates of these transactions.

Q. Please then refer to your diary and state any matters which you find therein which will throw light upon the transactions referred to.—A. I will do so whenever the copy of this evidence comes to me for my inspection. What I did in this matter was done for a friend. I received no fee or compensation whatever for what I did.

The committee then adjourned until Tuesday, June 10, 1884, at 10 o'clock a. m.

H. Mis. 38, pt. 2—38*

WASHINGTON, June 13, 1884.

RICHARD T. MERRICK sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Please state your occupation and residence.—Answer. I reside in Washington; I have been practicing law thirty years.

Q. Have you at any time been engaged in the service of the United States, and, if so, in what capacity?—A. I was commissioned as assistant attorney-general, charged with the duty of trying the star-route cases in, I think, the latter part of March, 1882. I think the date of the commission was the 31st of March, 1882.

Q. What was the purport of that commission?—A. It was a commission to me as special assistant attorney-general.

Q. When did you enter upon the discharge of your duties under that commission?—A. My impression is that I entered immediately upon the discharge of the duties. By reference to the printed record containing the arguments upon the questions of law preliminary to the trial of the indictment before a jury I find that I was in court on March 31. Before the issuing of that commission I had been, for some week or two probably, engaged in consultations with the counsel previously employed; it being then understood at the Department of Justice that I would accept the tender of the position that had theretofore been made to me.

Q. Was there any contract made between you and the Attorney-General with regard to your compensation, and, if so, what was it?—A. There was no special contract whatever with regard to the amount. My impression is that the commission said "at a compensation to be determined by the Attorney-General," and in the course of conversations with the Attorney-General upon that subject it was understood that he was himself to determine the amount, and I submitted to him at that time that I would, with great pleasure, accept his judgment in the premises, and hoped that if he did not entirely concur with me when any account of mine was rendered he would reduce or enlarge it, as the case might be, according to his judgment of the value of the services.

Q. At what amount did he fix your compensation after the services had been rendered?—A. The entire amount I had received at the time I retired from the cases was some $37,000 or $38,000—under $40,000.

Q. Were you paid a per diem, or according to the service rendered in special cases?—A. I charged according to my services; making the charges as moderate as I thought they could properly be made, appreciating that full and adequate compensation could not well be paid for such services under the circumstances.

Q. Was there any allowance to you for personal expenses?—A. Oh, none whatever.

Q. Have you settled in full with the Department?—A. I have settled in full with the Department, and, by a failure upon my part to present a bill before the close of the last fiscal year for services rendered during the latter portion of that year, and by combining a charge for those services with that for services subsequently rendered within the present fiscal year, I think $3,500 of my account was not paid. The Attorney-General suggested that it should go into the deficiency bill, and I told him I didn't want it so, and that if I had made a mistake, and they could not pay it, I would let it go.

Q. Have you received all you expect to receive?—A. I have received all that I expect to receive. For the amount that is yet due I shall make no demand.

Q. Please state the nature and extent of the services you rendered the Government; stating first how long you were employed.—A. I was in the service of the Government from the time indicated, that is, some few weeks before the date of my commission, down to the 31st of March, 1884, being two years. My position was, as I have stated, special assistant attorney-general, and my duty was, as designated by the Attorney-General himself, to represent him in these cases, as he could not give them the amount of personal attention which they required, particularly in the trial of the cases and as general counsel.

Q. Was it any part of your duties to decide questions as to who should be presented to the grand jury for indictment, or whether the evidence was sufficient in particular cases to justify the finding of indictments?—A. The duty of presenting the evidence to the grand jury and having the parties that were supposed to be guilty indicted belonged exclusively to Colonel Bliss; the preparation of the indictments belonged to Mr. Ker, and I was at hand to be consulted upon any subject upon which they might desire to consult me.

Q. Was it any part of your duties to examine the reports of the special agents of the Post-Office Department and to determine from them whether sufficient cases were made out against particular persons to justify an effort to have indictments found?—A. What was properly within the limits of my employment and belonged to my duty, of course the committee must determine from the statement I have made of the facts. My own judgment, concurring with that of the Attorney-General, was to the effect that I had nothing whatever to do with the preparation of the testimony to go to the grand jury, or with the presentation of that testimony to the grand jury. In fact the position which I occupied, under my commission, was one which did not justify me in appearing before the grand jury, nor would I have been allowed in their room under the law of the land; and, except in one particular, which may hereafter be developed in the course of this examination, I never went beyond the limits which I have indicated as those prescribed by my own judgment as belonging to the appointment. I will hand to the committee a copy of my commission, which was, if I recollect right, substituted for a commission which had some two weeks before been issued, but which was in some particulars erroneous.

The commission was produced, and read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
March 29, 1882.

SIR: You are hereby appointed Special Assistant Attorney-General to aid in the prosecution of certain persons charged with being concerned in frauds on the United States in connection with what is known as the star-route investigation, at a compensation to be determined by the Attorney-General when the suits are ended. You will take the oath prescribed by law for district attorneys and transmit the same to this Department.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

RICHARD T. MERRICK, Esq.,
Washington, D. C.

Q. There has been some controversy in the testimony before this committee as to how it happened that the Dorsey-Brady case, the one that was actually tried, was selected for trial instead of other cases which have been mentioned. Can you explain to the committee what you know in reference to that?—A. Immediately after my appointment by the Attorney-General Mr. Bliss called to see me and we had a consultation in reference to the subject that we had in charge. That consultation, according to my best recollection, was principally about the Dorsey cases, although it was at the same time a broad consultation about these matters generally. An indictment against Dorsey, Brady, Vaile, and others was put in my hands. It seemed as if that case was then in front and had been already selected; and after a very careful examination of that case and two trials of it, without knowing fully what might have been developed in any other case, I certainly could not have desired a better case in which to secure a conviction.

Q. Were the indictments in that case prepared before you entered the Government service?—A. The indictments had been prepared before I entered the Government service and had been found. The first indictment in that case was found March 4, 1882. That indictment was therefore necessarily on the records when I came into the case. When it was placed in my hands and I examined it, I found that there were two or three defects in it, applicable to three of the defendants, namely, Rerdell, Sanderson, and Vaile, and I concluded that as to those three defendants the indictment was not good. Before I became perfectly familiar with all of the transactions that were to be developed in the trial, I had been fully informed in reference to Rerdell's admissions and confessions to Mr. MacVeagh and Mr. James, in the presence of Mr. Woodward, at the time of the commencement of these investigations, and, deeming Mr. Rerdell's presence among the defendants very important, I directed a new indictment to be found. I told Mr. Bliss that a new indictment would be necessary, and told Mr. Ker that a new one must be prepared; for, although there might be a question in my mind in reference to the legality of that indictment, I believed that the court would not sustain it as against those parties. I deemed Rerdell essential as a defendant, for the reason that his admissions made to Mr. MacVeagh, Mr. James, and Mr. Woodward were material as evidence. Appreciating that they would necessarily, by the court, be limited to himself, I also understood, as every lawyer will, that they would aid more or less in clearing up whatever evidence might be obscure in reference to the other defendants. In accordance with these directions another indictment was prepared, which was returned to the court on the 20th of May. Between the finding of that indictment and the instructions I gave to my associates in reference to it, we had many consultations about it, and the court was called upon to determine the very questions to which I have referred. It determined those questions and determined them as I have indicated I thought it would.

Q. Do you refer to the question with regard to indicting by the initials?—A. Yes; with regard to the use in the indictment of the initials of these parties, Rerdell, Sanderson, and Vaile. There was a mistake in the naming of Vaile. He was called Henry in the indictment, but his name was Harvey. There was some mistake, too, in the initials of Sanderson, and Rerdell was indicted by his initials, and not by his name. The counsel met for the purpose of consulting in reference to the form of the new indictment, and we were several hours together conferring upon that subject in one of the rooms of the Department of Justice, where we went carefully over the whole matter, and together determined upon the form of the new indictment, adding a number of overt acts not in the previous indictment and dropping out some overt acts which had been charged in it, but against which, in the mean time, the statute of limitations had run. We dropped Sanderson out, because there was no evidence connecting him with that conspiracy.

Q. Was that the reason why Sanderson was left out?—A. I do not remember any other reason except that I believe he was shown to be interested in only a very small piece of one route among the nineteen that we intended to embrace in the indictment, and I think I found the evidence against him so entirely insufficient, and his relations to the case so unimportant, that I said to Mr. Ker, "Take it and do as you please with it," we all agreeing that Sanderson should be left out.

Q. Were you advised that Sanderson was connected with another combination, and should properly be indicted in connection with that?—

A. I do not remember any remark of that kind being made. It is possible that it might have been said that if he was indicted at all it should not be with this combination. We also had to be very careful not to embrace in the indictment for conspiracy any one that we did not certainly think to be in the conspiracy; to guard against any question on that point that might possibly arise before the court.

Q. Did you have your attention called at any subsequent time to the question whether an indictment should be found against Sanderson?—

A. I did not; I never heard the subject again referred to, nor did I ever afterwards hear Sanderson referred to in connection with the subject except incidentally in the course of the trial.

Q. Then I understand you to say that, while you do not undertake to pass upon the sufficiency of the evidence that may have been obtained in other cases, the evidence in this Brady-Dorsey case was sufficient not only to warrant an indictment, but a conviction?—A. I wish to be distinctly understood as saying that, whilst I know nothing about the evidence in other cases, I am familiar with the evidence in that case, and that it would have been a most extraordinary case indeed to which I would have given preference over that one as a strong case against the defendants. The evidence in this case satisfied me beyond all possible doubt of the guilt of all the parties, and I have seldom had occasion to try a case in court with the testimony in which I was more entirely satisfied. I speak of the Brady-Dorsey case.

Q. Are we to understand that your statement relates to the evidence that was actually adduced upon the trials?—A. It relates to the evidence that was actually adduced upon the trials; the evidence that was actually adduced upon the first trial as well as the evidence adduced upon the second; for, although the evidence for the Government was a little more elaborate upon the second than upon the first trial, the evidence on the first trial was all that any reasonable man could, in my judgment, require to convict.

Q. When you first passed upon the sufficiency of the evidence in that case to justify the Government in going to trial, had you taken into consideration the evidence of Mr. Walsh, or the fact that he was to be a witness in the case?—A. I had not.

Q. Did you deem the case sufficiently strong without his evidence?—

A. I deemed the case a perfectly good case without his evidence; but it was very important, and in view of the opinion indicated by the judge in the progress of the trial and the sentiment which seemed to pervade the public mind, his testimony assumed a degree of importance beyond that to which it was probably entitled as a mere matter of law. I may add that up to the time of the introduction of Mr. Walsh as a witness upon the stand, the judge who was presiding seemed to regard the case of the Government as quite insufficient, and it was partly demoralized. When Walsh was offered as a witness a very important argument took place upon the admissibility of his testimony, as the committee will see by referring to the record of the first trial, pages 1607 and 97, which I now have before me. We had, up to that time been putting in the records, which were so numerous and voluminous that it was very difficult for any one who did not already understand the matter to apply them without a careful explanation, and by an aggregation of the facts which they developed, to apply the conclusion to the parties charged in the indictment. On that argument the theory of the Government's case was very fully developed by myself. It had been already developed by Mr. Bliss in his opening statement to the jury, which was elaborate and able, but it was again very fully developed there, and it met the expectation of the judge, and, apparently, of others, by furnishing an answer to the inquiry, "What has Brady to do with these transactions particularly? Where is Brady's motive? How are these parties united? Here are different acts which have been done by each of them, and these acts apparently have a certain relation to each other and look as though they tended to a common result, but that has not been sufficiently shown by this mass of papers which you have thrown down before the jury. We want something further than that." Now, Walsh's testimony explained Brady's motive, by developing his rule of conduct in dealing with the contractors, and showing that it was his uniform habit to charge them a certain percentage wherever he exercised his discretionary power of expediting a route. The argument upon this question of the admissibility of Walsh's testimony enabled us to develop our entire theory at a time when the minds of the jury and of the court were asking for light upon these papers they regarded as important material, but which they did not fully understand; and from that time forth the Government's case went on prosperously up to the verdict given by the jury.

Q. How did it happen that up to that time you had overlooked the fact that Mr. Walsh's testimony was material?—A. I do not know that I was fully informed, if informed at all, as to what Walsh could prove. I may have heard previously something of what he could prove in the case but it does not occur to me now. I endeavored to bring such information to my recollection, but I have been unable to do so.

Q. When did you first learn the fact that Mr. Walsh was a material witness for the Government in that case?—A. At some time in the progress of the trial I learned it, I think from Mr. Woodward, and possibly Mr. Bliss also may have spoken to me about it. After I learned of it we had a consultation about it. I know that before Mr. Walsh testified Mr. Bliss and I had a consultation about his testimony—a very full talk. Now, just when I first learned of it I do not know, but it was after the trial began, and my impression is that it was brought to my attention by Mr. Woodward. The discussion between Mr. Bliss and myself was in regard to the admissibility of the testimony, and we agreed that the testimony was admissible in the case for the reason that Walsh would say that Brady had avowed that the rule which he sought to apply to him (Walsh) was the rule applicable to all contractors, and therefore it embraced these contractors.

Mr. BLISS. But that statement was only obtained from Walsh after the trial commenced.

The WITNESS. That may have been.

Q. Had the appearance of Walsh before the grand jury about this time anything to do with bringing to your knowledge the fact that he was a material witness for the Government in the Dorsey-Brady case?—A. I cannot say that his appearance before the grand jury during or about that time had anything to do with informing me of his materiality as a witness in the Dorsey-Brady case; but having learned from Mr. Woodward what Walsh would prove (I think it was from Mr. Woodward), and having had thereafter this consultation with Mr. Bliss, we concluded that Walsh was an important witness. Having reached that conclusion, I determined that he must be produced. I understood (although it is hardly proper for me to say what I understood and what I heard, for I desire to limit my testimony here according to the rules of law)—I understood that Walsh was reluctant to testify, and had said that he would not do so. I directed Mr. Woodward to bring about in some way an interview between Mr. Walsh and myself. Mr. Walsh was sent for, and, by what instrumentality I do not know, was brought here to the District of Columbia. Mr. Woodward informed me that Mr. Walsh was here, and at the same time I learned that there was ill-feeling between him and Mr. Bliss, or, I should say more correctly, that, for some reason or other, Mr. Walsh had some ill-feeling toward Mr. Bliss. Mr. Walsh being here, Mr. Woodward arranged for an interview between him and me, and I left the court-room in the midst of the trial to meet an appointment with Walsh at his room at the Arlington Hotel. Shall I go on?

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed, if you please.

The WITNESS (continuing). I found that I had met the gentleman before, and I immediately told him the object of my coming, which he probably knew already. I informed him that I wanted him to testify in the Dorsey-Brady case, and had come to learn from him then and there what he knew as to the case. Although I had already learned it, it was repeated by him on that occasion; but he said he would not testify in that case at all. Well, gentlemen, it is very difficult for me to go over a long interview like that in detail. It will be sufficient for me to say that, in substance, I endeavored to impress upon him the duty that he owed to the Government to testify, but what I said made very little impression upon him, apparently, and I asked the reason. He complained that he had been badly treated; he said that he had testified before the grand jury in reference to Mr. Kellogg, and that his testimony had been disregarded, that Colonel Bliss had cast reflections upon him at that time, that he felt that if he now appeared as a witness he would be unjustly dealt with, and that he would not consent to appear. I then asked him to tell me more in detail the circumstances that had given rise to his feeling in regard to Colonel Bliss, the particulars in which he had been badly treated, and what was the testimony that he had given before the grand jury which had been disregarded. He then gave me an account of what his testimony had been before the grand jury, and designated Colonel Bliss, whether justly or unjustly I do not know, as the cause why that testimony had been disregarded by the jury. I told him that what he had just said in reference to his testimony about Mr. Kellogg was new to me; that that was the first I had ever heard of it. He expressed his surprise and said that had been his testimony before the jury; that the other counsel in the case, Colonel Bliss, well knew all about it. It is possible that I may have at that time made some very harsh remarks in reference to the counsel, predicated upon the fact that he had kept this information from me. I do not recollect. I observe that Mr. Walsh has testified that I did speak harshly of Colonel Bliss. It may be that I did. I was certainly very much excited at the time, because I was extremely anxious that Walsh should testify, and I felt that if what he told me in reference to his testimony was true, a great criminal had been thus far allowed to escape punishment. I continued to urge him to testify in the Dorsey-Brady case, and said that I would see that justice was done to him; that he should have an opportunity of vindicating himself; that I would cause the grand jury to be reconvened, and that he should go before them again and give his testimony in regard to Kellogg, which would be the best vindication he could have. He said that if I would do that he would testify in the Dorsey-Brady case; that all he wanted was to be vindicated and fairly treated. I told him I would see that he was both vindicated and fairly treated, and would have the grand jury reconvened. Mr. Walsh did testify in the Dorsey-Brady case, as you are all aware.

Q. And the grand jury was reconvened?—A. The grand jury was reconvened. Mr. Walsh did go before the grand jury and he did testify in the Dorsey-Brady case, as you are all informed.

Q. Can you explain to the committee, in view of the sufficiency of the evidence as, you have stated, how it was that there was a failure on the part of the jury to meet your expectation?—A. I certainly cannot. I will say this, however, in connection with what I have already said in regard to the sufficiency—the ample sufficiency—of the evidence, that the jury was a very intelligent one, I think certainly equal to the average, if not above the average, of the juries in this or any other jurisdiction with which I am acquainted.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Do you refer to the juries on both trials?—A. No, sir; I speak now of the first trial; and in answer to the inquiry as to why there was a failure to obtain a verdict of guilty, I think that it would be proper to refer first to the verdict that was rendered.

Q. Will you please explain that?—A. A verdict was rendered finding John R. Miner and Montfort C. Rerdell guilty, the jury disagreeing as to the others. These parties had been indicted and were tried upon an indictment for a conspiracy to defraud the Government of the United States. The charge, you will observe, was conspiracy, and the burden was upon the counsel for the Government to prove a conspiracy. The court instructed the jury that, in the performance of their duty, when they retired for consultation, they should in the first instance consider the proof bearing generally upon the subject of the conspiracy—and that they should first determine whether there was a conspiracy or not, for, unless there was a conspiracy, no matter what frauds might have been perpetrated by the defendants individually, there could be no verdict against them.

“Having determined that there was no conspiracy,” said the court, in substance, “you must find the defendants not guilty; but if you determine that there was a conspiracy, then your next inquiry will be who constituted the conspirators, who were in that conspiracy; and you must find that there was more than one of the defendants, you must find that there were at least two, because there must be two at least in order to make a conspiracy. Having determined that there is a conspiracy, and having determined who were the conspirators, your verdict will be against those parties.” With that instruction the jury retired. They found Rerdell and Miner, as I have said, guilty. The finding of the verdict of guilty against Rerdell and Miner was necessarily predicated upon the finding of the existence of a conspiracy. Now, the evidence showed throughout that Rerdell and Miner had no direct and immediate relation with each other, but that their relation with each other was through Stephen Dorsey and John Dorsey and Vaile, and that Rerdell and Miner were in fact the subordinate instruments in the perpetration of these frauds, Rerdell having no interest in any contracts at all (or if in any, in one single contract in which he received his pay), but being Stephen W. Dorsey’s clerk; and Miner had been brought on here by S. W. Dorsey in conjunction with John W. Dorsey, and at S. W.

Dorsey's house, Miner, together with Rerdell and others in this conspiracy, and as their subordinates got up the whole scheme and devised the plans, the contracts, and the bids.

Q. Then the jury found the agents guilty and the principals not guilty?—A. The jury found the subordinates guilty of having conspired with each other, but they could not agree as to the principals, while the evidence showed that these subordinates had had no particular independent relation to each other, and that their sole relation to each other was one established by and through the principals. Now, when that verdict was found I regarded it as disgraceful to the records of the court and of the Government, and felt it to be my duty not to allow it to stand. It was rumored that the defendants intended to move to set it aside, and they did bring forward some insignificant motions which I did not oppose and which were overruled; but I was determined to get rid of that verdict, so I then made a suggestion to the court in regard to the matter, stating that I regarded the verdict as a disgrace, as one by which the United States could not stand, and that I did not feel justified in allowing it to stand, and I submitted as a reason for setting it aside that there had been certain irregularities in the proceedings in the jury-room. The court proceeded to inquire into the irregularities which I had indicated, and, being disposed to set the verdict aside anyhow, did set it aside.

Q. What were those irregularities?—A. A paper was said to have been read in the jury-room, prepared by one of the jurors, the reading of which, you are aware, would have been an irregularity which would have vitiated the verdict.

Q. Did you call the attention of the court to that fact?—A. I think I did.

Q. Did you produce the paper?—A. Oh, I could not produce the paper.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. This was an intelligent jury, you say?—A. It was a remarkably intelligent jury.

Q. The jurors were rather too intelligent, were they not?—A. You must draw your own inferences.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. They had more brains than virtue?—A. That the committee must determine.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What was the nature of the irregularity established?—A. I find that among other things that I said to the court in relation to this matter was this, which appears on page 3271 of the record: "The verdict is thoroughly inconsistent with any rational theory as to the guilt of those found guilty, the rich are let go and the poor punished, the masters free and the servants in jail." I do not remember the details of this irregular transaction, and it is impossible for me to tell you now what they were. They are, I think, set forth in the printed record. Suffice it to say that I would not consent to allow that verdict to stand, and I got rid of it.

Q. You moved to set it aside yourself?—A. I do not say that I moved to set it aside. I told the court that I desired it set aside.

Q. Did the court on its own motion set it aside?—A. That I cannot tell you. Look at the record.

Q. Were these irregularities in reference to alleged attempts to bribe the jury?—A. You speak of the paper that was produced in the jury-room?

Q. Yes.—A. The paper read had some reference to an attempt to bribe the jury. I think the paper is probably in the record, but I do not know.

Q. Did you make any efforts to ascertain whether attempts at bribery had been made?—A. Well, I did make such efforts as I reasonably could.

Q. Were those efforts of such a nature as to satisfy your mind as to whether the jury had been corrupted?—A. I must beg pardon, Mr. Chairman, but I would rather not express my own opinions. They are hardly competent evidence, and might do great injustice to other people. There are few subjects with which I have to deal about which I do not form opinions, and about which I have not tolerably decided convictions, but I would prefer to keep what I have to say here within the limits prescribed by the ordinary rules of evidence.

Q. As a lawyer, can you reconcile that verdict, the jury being an intelligent one, with any other hypothesis than that of venality or incompetency on the part of that jury?—A. Again that brings up an opinion, Mr. Chairman. I have given you the facts. I have stated that the jury was intelligent. I have stated what the evidence was. I have stated what the verdict was, and I have explained the verdict. Now, you are better able to draw the inference than I am.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. I suppose it is a fact that you were almost dumbfounded at finding that the jury were unable to agree in reference to the other defendants outside of the two; in other words, you were surprised at the verdict rendered?—A. Why, necessarily, greatly surprised.

Mr. STEWART. Surprise is a mild term.

The CHAIRMAN. It is unnecessary to press my question, and I withdraw it.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Now, please state how it happened that you used Rerdell as a witness in the second trial?—A. Rerdell had made an affidavit, which had been obtained from him by Mr. Woodward, which affidavit was submitted to me.

Q. Do you remember whether that is the affidavit or not [showing witness a paper]?—A. Yes, sir; I think this is the same. Rerdell's two statements are here.

The affidavits here identified were put in evidence, as follows:

Affidavit of Montfort C. Rerdell, of November 22, 1882, and supplementary statement of Rerdell of January 17, 1883.

My name is Montfort C. Rerdell. I was born in Montgomery County, Alabama, in 1841. My parents both died within two hours of each other when I was two months old. Till eleven years of age I lived with my grandmother in Richmond County, Georgia. At her death I was employed in different stores in Augusta, Ga., till I was fourteen, when I returned to Alabama to hunt for an uncle whom I never was able to find. Failing in my search I obtained employment on the steamer Tiger, on which I remained two seasons, having become second clerk. At sixteen I returned to Augusta where I remained till the outbreak of the war. I joined the Terrill Artillery, and was stationed at Savannah and vicinity till the city was captured by General Sherman, when I was made a prisoner. Within a day or two I took the oath of allegiance to the United States, and at once became a clerk to Capt. Logan H. Roots, of the commissary department. We remained in Savannah till the end of February, 1865, when Captain Roots was ordered to Morehead City, N. C. I accompanied him thither. In June, 1865, he was ordered to Washington, thence to Louisville, Ky., thence to Saint Louis, Mo., thence to Devall's Bluff, Ark. I went with him, and we reached the last-named place August 1, 1865, having meanwhile been appointed his chief clerk. We stopped at Devall's Bluff till May, 1866, when the then Lieutenant-Colonel Roots was mustered out of the service. I remained in that vicinity with no steady employment till the passage of the reconstruction acts, when I became clerk to the board of registration for Prairie County. In March, 1868, I was elected sheriff of Van Buren County, and held the office till May, 1874, when I resigned and moved to Jackson County, Missouri. I there engaged in milling and speculating. In the next twelve months I lost over $60,000 and became a bankrupt.

In August, 1875, I obtained a clerkship under the government of the District of Columbia through the influence of Senator S. W. Dorsey. My first acquaintance with Mr. Dorsey occurred at the time of his election to the United States Senate, in January, 1873, when my efforts contributed largely to his success. A part of his scheme contemplated the institution of a territorial government in the Indian Territory, wherein his special supporters were to have the choice of places.

In 1875 I also became private secretary to Senator Dorsey, without compensation, working nights and Sundays so as not to interfere with my other duties. This relation continued during his Senatorial term.

During the winter of 1877-'78 Senator Dorsey resided at 1121 I street NW. My office was in the basement of his house. At the same time John R. Miner had an office on the third floor of the same house.

My knowledge of the mail business began the night before the expiration of the period for receiving bids for the service to commence July 1, 1878. On that occasion I called as usual to write for the Senator. He had no work. On starting to leave I lingered at the door, when Miner came in from upstairs. Miner said, "Are you going off?" I answered, "Yes." He then asked me if I could not assist him about some work upstairs, without indicating its character. I hesitated, as my leisure evenings were few. Senator Dorsey then interrupted the colloquy, directing me to go upstairs and assist.

Miner and I proceeded to the back room of the third story together. Miner put me to work on what I found to be proposals for mail service. I was directed to fill in the amounts of the bids and also the spaces before the signatures of the notary or postmaster, or both, these having been affixed in blank.

According to the face of the papers the bidders were John R. Miner, John M. Peck, John W. Dorsey, J. H. Watts, and in some cases, perhaps, A. E. Boone. Boone was present a part of the time. When he left some one asked him what he was going to do. He replied, "I am going to work Texas to-night."

Senator Dorsey was in and out during the entire session. About midnight Senator Dorsey directed his house boy, Anthony Jones, to bring up wine from the cellar. Jones returned not only with the wine but also with a bottle of whisky and some slight refreshment. One of the company asked the messenger why he brought the whisky. "Because," he replied, pointing to me, "I knew that gentleman was from Arkansas." This shot at Arkansas became a sort of standing joke on me.

I have a strong impression that Mr. Dorsey did some writing on the proposals, perhaps to sign the name of Peck, but my recollection upon the point is too indistinct to justify me in speaking with more positiveness. I am absolutely certain, however, that Peck was not in Washington for six months prior or for six months subsequent to that time. I knew him well. There were present at different times during the night S. W. Dorsey, J. R. Miner, A. E. Boone, W. F. Kellogg, myself, the house boy, and no one else. Miner called off the amount of the bids on the different routes from a small book or other memoranda. It strikes me that Miner showed me the book afterwards while we were living in the same house, about the time of the rupture between him and Dorsey on account of Vaile. I learned afterward that all the writing filled in by me on that occasion should have been done before either the notary or the postmaster placed his signature upon the bids.

On my sudden introduction to the work going on in the back room of the third story I felt annoyed that Senator Dorsey, considering his obligations to me, had preferred others to myself. I had previously known that S. W. Dorsey, John R. Miner, A. E. Boone, and, for a short period, J. H. Watts, were having frequent consultations upstairs. I do not remember meeting John W. Dorsey till the spring of 1878—some weeks or months after the proposals were put in.

I had no further connection with the business till towards the end of June, 1878. About 10 or 11 o'clock one morning the house boy, Anthony Jones, came to my room in the District building on Four-and-a-half street with a message from Senator Dorsey to come to his house at once. I think this was the first time he ever sent for me. It was repeated but once afterwards. On both occasions I was struck by the unusual character of the proceeding. In response to the message I went at once to his house.

As soon as I arrived Dorsey handed me a large package of letters from the Post-Office Department, addressed, some to J. W. Dorsey, some to J. R. Miner, some to John M. Peck, and some to J. H. Watts. He inquired if I knew anything about mail matters. I answered "No." He then asked me to look over the letters and see if I could not take charge of the correspondence, as he either had or was about to take the business away from Boone.

My official duties now consumed scarcely an hour a day, and I quickly decided to comply with the request of the Senator. A day or two later he directed me to go to the house of Boone and get all the papers relating to the mail service of the above parties. Boone then lived on Second street, between Pennsylvania avenue and B street. I did as instructed, Boone not only delivering to me the papers, but also the wooden case of pigeon-holes in which they were kept. I carried the whole to the third story back room of Dorsey's house. Boone felt sour and aggrieved, but offered no obstruction. He talked savagely about the alleged perfidy of Dorsey, and swore he would have revenge. He was polite to me and during the next few days explained some of the general details of the business.

About July 6, 1878, Dorsey asked me if I could go to Dakota to aid his brother in putting service on the routes from Bismarck to Tongue River, and from Fort Buford to Tongue River. I answered "Yes, provided I could get a leave of absence." I did get a leave of absence from the Commissioners, and started west on the night of July 11, having in my pocket explicit written instructions from S. W. Dorsey, railway passes from Washington to Bismarck and return, and letters of introduction from Dorsey to Mr. Wright, president of Northern Pacific Railroad; ex-Governor Ramsey, of Minnesota; General Rosser, chief engineer Pacific Railroad; J. W. Raymond, banker at Bismarck; J. P. Kidder, the then Delegate from Dakota, and General Miles, commanding the Department. All the above parties except Raymond were urged in the communications of which I was the bearer and S. W. Dorsey the writer to send letters to the Department recommending an increase of service. All were delivered by me except the one to General Rosser, who was absent locating the line.

Before I left Washington Senator Dorsey placed to my credit in the German-American National Bank, about $8,000, to be used in stocking the route from Bismarck to Tongue River. He also gave me three notes drawn either by J. W. Dorsey & Co. or by Miner, Peck & Co., payable to the order of S. W. Dorsey, and indorsed by him, for the sums of $1,000, $1,000, and $2,500, respectively, with the understanding that the same bank would discount them whenever required. I was instructed to avoid negotiating them if possible, or if I found it necessary to use the funds to reserve the largest note till the last.

The petitions on pages 1206, 1210, and 1211 were copied substantially if not literally from forms in the handwriting of S. W. Dorsey; I either did the work or had it done. My instructions also told me what steps to take to secure the establishment of a new office north of the line, by which about 60 miles would be added to its length. Joseph Pennell testified to the facts.

While on the ground I carried out my instructions in reference to the procurement of letters and petitions for increases of service; started Joseph Pennell at the head of a construction party which was to survey the route, build stations, and dig wells; purchased grain and shipped it by water to Miles City, and paid the bills in drafts on the German-American Bank drawn through the house of J. W. Raymond.

On the way out I met J. W. Dorsey at Saint Paul, Minn. In company with Joseph Pennell, he had just arrived from Saint Louis with a car-load of horses. Mr. Dorsey and I went on together to Bismarck. He there assisted in organizing the construction train, upon the departure of which we started in company by boat for Tongue River, where I remained one day only, having returned on the same boat. Mr. Dorsey was to return across the country to meet Pennell. He remained in charge of the route during the rest of the year 1878. He assuredly was not in Washington in November, 1878, when W. F. Kellogg, notary public, pretended to take his jurat to the oath for expedition on route No. 40104. I know also that the signature is not in his hand. I did not see him again in Washington until January, 1879, when he came in from the far West and resumed work as messenger for the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post Roads.

On returning I reached Washington August 8, 1878, John W. Anderson having performed my clerical work for S. W. Dorsey during my absence. I found John R. Miner in the city, and in the course of a few days turned over to him all papers relating to the mail service. Miner and I together negotiated two and perhaps three of the notes heretofore mentioned at the German-American Bank, Miner taking charge of the proceeds.

S. W. Dorsey returned from New Mexico to the city early in December, 1878. Meanwhile the German-American Bank had failed, and the receiver, Mr. B. F. Keyser, had charged to him the notes negotiated by Miner and myself. Instead of finding a balance to his credit, he was confronted with an account overdrawn. The controversy growing out of these bank transactions began the rupture between him and his associates.

On my return in August I found Miner in great trouble about the service. He was then negotiating with Harvey M. Vaile to join him. Before consummating the arrangement the latter went to Missouri. A few days later Miner in high glee told me he was all right, as Vaile would take charge of the service. About this time Miner also explained why Boone was forced out of the company. He gave me to understand that Brady did not like him, and would grant no favors while he remained in. He likewise said that the relations between Vaile and Brady were very close.

One or two days after the expiration of my month's leave of absence I returned to my desk in the District building, having received only actual expenses for my Western trip.

For three and a half months beginning, October 1, 1878, Miner and I occupied the same house, No. 214 C street NE. In December, at his request, in a petition asking for increase of trips on route No. 40104, I interpolated the words "on a schedule of 60 hours instead of 84 hours." During the fall I transferred the small balance of funds intrusted to me by S. W. Dorsey for stocking the Tongue River route, from the German-American to the Bank of Washington, and consequently withdrew it in checks, payable to Miner and Vaile. Otherwise than as described above I had nothing further to do with the mail service till December, 1878; I then came to a verbal understanding with Vaile and Miner that I was to be employed at a "good" salary, the amount not being stated. At one of the frequent conversations held during the month between Vaile, Miner, and myself at the National Hotel, Vaile remarked, that with proper management the annual compensation ought to be increased to $600,000 or $700,000 on their routes.

January 4, 1879, under a verbal agreement with Vaile and Miner, I started for Rawlins, Wyo., to put service on route No. 38113. For my protection I took a subcontract from Miner. While there I let the route to C. F. Perkins; I also wrote and circulated petitions asking for an increase of trips, and for a reduction of the schedule from 108 to 84 hours. Letters of similar purport I caused to be sent to the Department.

Under instructions from Vaile and Miner, I proceeded from Rawlins to Ojo Caliente, N. Mex., to make permanent arrangements for route No. 38145, whereon Anthony Joseph was then doing the work at no fixed rate of compensation. The subcontract made with Joseph is a matter of record. I here prepared petitions to be circulated by Joseph asking for additional trips, and for a shorter schedule. From Ojo Caliente I hurried back to Washington, reaching here about the time that my leave of absence for thirty days from the District government expired.

February 6, 1879, I withdrew my subcontract on route No. 38113 to make place for that of C. F. Perkins.

February 8, I entered into a written contract with Vaile, Miner & Co., whereby I was to receive $2,000 per annum from route No. 38113, provided the trips upon it were increased to three per week, and expedition to the amount of 150 per cent., or thereabouts, was ordered; and I further agreed to devote my entire time to the interests of the company at an annual salary of $1,000, should they require my services.

It was understood that I was to make my headquarters at Rawlins, Cheyenne, or Denver. A letter-head was gotten up by Miner, naming me as one of the superintendents. (Copy with Woodward.) Meanwhile I continued with the District government, waiting for the expected increases on route No. 38113.

I now go back in my narrative to trace the personal and business relations between S. W. Dorsey, Vaile, and Miner.

Miner held powers of attorney from John M. Peck and J. W. Dorsey. In August, 1878, he made his first arrangement with Vaile, in the absence of the Senator, and without his knowledge, the service being about to fail. Vaile had both capital and experience. He furnished the needed money, taking subcontracts on all the routes of the above parties, except where the papers of the bona fide subcontractors had already been filed, and in the latter case drafts on the Sixth Auditor for the margins of profit. These subcontracts were mostly deposited for filing September 30, 1878, with the double object of obtaining security for advances and of cutting out the drafts given by S. W. Dorsey to the German-American Bank. The drafts held by the bank as collateral were originally signed in blank by Miner, Peck, and J. W. Dorsey, on their respective service, and delivered in bulk to the Senator. About July 1, at his dictation, I filled in the amounts to become due for the quarter ending September 30, 1878. By the trick of Vaile the bank was forced out of its collateral and made to rely on the notes. Acting on his powers of attorney Miner had agreed to give Vaile an interest amounting to 40 per cent. of the business.

On his return, in December, 1878, the Senator was angry for several reasons:

1st. The notes heretofore mentioned had been negotiated and charged to him at the German-American Bank, while his account had not been credited with the pay for service during the quarter ended September 30, as the subcontracts filed by Vaile had killed the collaterals and diverted the money into other channels.

2d. Because Miner had guaranteed so large a proportionate interest to Vaile.

Early in December the Senator wrote both to Brady and McGrew, denying the authority of Miner to act for his brother and brother-in-law, and directing them to disregard the drafts and subcontracts given to Vaile. During the winter the relations between the Senator and Vaile continued hostile, Miner, when necessary, acting as a go-between. He would not allow his brother, J. W. Dorsey, to sign any papers on the service standing in his name.

Meanwhile Vaile and Miner learning from Brady that he was ready to increase and expedite the service on route No. 38113, required an oath respecting men and animals, to measure the cost of expedition. As J. W. Dorsey was the contractor we decided to put in an affidavit from the subcontractor. We questioned at first whether Brady would accept it, but Vaile saw him, and between them the matter was satisfactorily arranged. Accordingly, March 7, 1879, I wrote to C. F. Perkins, inclosing a blank form of oath, which I requested him to sign and swear to as sent. Perkins complied. On the return of the paper I filled in the words describing the number of men and animals required, both on the original and on the proposed schedules. S. W. Dorsey filed it in the Department. It was not used, however, as a division of interests took place a few days later, before action had been taken by Brady.

On March 4, 1879, the Senatorial term of S. W. Dorsey expired, and it was no longer necessary for him to conceal his interest in the mail business. He at once began to negotiate with Vaile and Miner with a view to a division of the service, and the percentage to fall to each. Neither J. W. Dorsey nor Peck was in the city, or had any voice whatever, direct or indirect, in the settlement. About a month elapsed before a final agreement was reached. At length, on April 6, S. W. Dorsey sent his carriage to my house, No. 114 F street northeast, with a request that I come to him immediately. Previously on the same day he had sent a similar message by a boy, but I was too sick to walk.

On reaching his residence I was informed by Mr. Dorsey that the difference between him, Vaile, and Miner had been amicably adjusted and the service divided. He showed me a list of thirty-two routes which had fallen to him, and proposed that I take charge of the business as his clerk and agent. I explained my bargain with Vaile, Miner & Co., viz, that I was to receive a salary of $1,000 and $2,000 per annum out of the White River route (No. 38113). He replied, "Why, damn it, I have the White River route." I then inquired whether they had made any reservations or conditions respecting it in my behalf. He answered "No," and went on to say that I "could expect nothing from these damn scoundrels." He proceeded to say that he would give me $3,000 a year "straight" to take charge of the business. I accepted the proposition on the spot. My pay under the District government also continued till June 1. Vaile and Miner, when afterwards interrogated, contradicted the statement of Dorsey regarding their failure to reserve the $2,000.

Within two or three days from the date of my engagement Mr. Dorsey personally prepared new forms of subcontracts, in which no provision was made for paying the men who furnished the stock and did the work any extra allowance for expedition. They were required to transport the mails "upon such schedule time, and for such additional trips, as the Post-Office Department may from time to time direct," &c. He aimed to exclude from the minds of such parties all knowledge of the facts and profits of expedition.

April 18, 1879, I left Washington for Colorado under instructions from Mr. Dorsey to make new subcontracts on the new forms wherever practicable, and to get up petitions and letters asking for increase and expedition on all his service in that State. I was instructed to tell the subcontractors by way of inducement for changing the form of agreement, that the old firm had dissolved; that the service had passed into the hands of an assignee; that the pay for one, two, three, six, and seven trips per week would be definitely expressed in figures, thus preventing any doubt respecting the rate of compensation when changes in the service should be ordered; and that ex-Senator Dorsey would guarantee all payments as they became due, a clause having been printed on the reverse side for the purpose. In return they were required to refrain from putting the subcontracts on file.

I took letters of introduction from Mr. Dorsey to State officials, newspaper writers, bankers and other prominent men, all urging the parties addressed to aid in securing increased mail service. Various papers fully prepared for signatures were written in Washington before I started, e. g., No. 89, E., signed by Governor Pitkin, Secretary of State Meldrum et al., written by John A. Sibbald; 24 I, petition written by S. W. Dorsey; 25 I, petition written by W. F. Kellogg; 26 I, petition written by J. A. Sibbald. They were handed to me by Dorsey, having been prepared under his directions. He likewise furnished me with full and explicit written instructions. While on the ground I wrote the letter, 3 I, signed by Governor Pitkin; 4 I, signed by Judges Thatcher and Stone; and petitions 23 I and 27 I, besides many others, some being on routes which were not subsequently manipulated. I succeeded in substituting several of the new subcontracts in the place of the old, not one of the parties discovering the real point aimed at in the change. I returned to Washington May 2 or 3, Mr. Dorsey having attended to the business during my absence. (See correspondence by mail and telegraph with the Wilcoxes in Oregon.) During the time he prepared or caused to be prepared the following papers:

Oath on route No. 38145 (17 E), body written by Kellogg, signed by J. W. Dorsey, acknowledged before Kellogg, with the following numerals and words in the writing of S. W. Dorsey: "38145," "three," "five," "fifteen," "fifty," "three," "twelve," and "forty-two." The letter of transmittal (also 17 E) was written throughout, including signature, by J. W. Dorsey.

Petition for daily service on same route (33 E) was written by S. W. Dorsey.

Petitions for daily service on same route (92 and 93 E) were written by S. W. Dorsey; also the pencil note on 92 E.

Oath on route No. 38140 (15 K) written by and acknowledged before Kellogg, signed by J. W. Dorsey, subcontractor, has the word "subcontractor" in the writing of S. W. Dorsey. The letter transmitting the same (14 K) was written by S. W. Dorsey, inclusive of the signature.

Oath on route 38113 (13 L) written by and acknowledged before W. F. Kellogg, signed by J. W. Dorsey, contains the following words and numerals in the hand of S. W. Dorsey, viz, "38113," "three trips," "four," "twelve," "45," "three," "11," "32." The letter of transmittal (12 L) was wholly written by S. W. Dorsey.

Petition asking for daily service and fast schedule on route No. 40113 (5 S) was written by S. W. Dorsey.

On route No. 38113 the proposed schedule was altered from 84 to 45 hours because Brady had come to insist upon at least four miles an hour.

On resuming charge of the correspondence early in May, 1879, I found a number of affidavits subscribed and sworn to by John W. Dorsey with spaces for the number of men and animals left blank. Miner had previously turned over to S. W. Dorsey a large batch of affidavits similarly prepared, and signed by John M. Peck, January 22, 1879. Free use was made of both classes afterwards. We put in some that were never acted upon. In order that we might not run short, under the orders of S. W. Dorsey, I prepared additional affidavits after the same model which were sent both to Peck and J. W. Dorsey, by whom they were sworn to in blank. We used them from time to time, filling in the number of the route, and the estimates for men and stock. A package, containing perhaps half a dozen from each, was stolen from my office in September, 1882, while I was in confinement.

May 6, 1879, I met Vaile and Miner together in the Post-Office Department building. After a pleasant greeting, I remarked, "You and Dorsey having settled your business; how is mine to be settled?" Vaile answered, "What do you say?" After a moment's thought, I replied, "Give me a suit of clothes and I will call it square." To which both agreed with seeming cheerfulness. Calling to mind the opinions expressed about these men by Dorsey, I went directly to the store of Katzenstein, the tailor, and ordered the suit, but with instructions before cutting the goods to present an order for $35, which I gave him, to Mr. Vaile at the National Hotel. Later in the day Mr. Katzenstein informed me that Mr. Vaile declined to honor the order. The same evening I went to the hotel to see Mr. Vaile, and, not finding him in, left a note calling attention to my services and complaining of his treatment. On the 7th he sent me a sarcastic reply, now in the hands of Inspector Woodward. Deeply enraged, I brought suit in the circuit court to recover pay for my work.

May 29, 1879, Vaile addressed a minatory letter on the subject to S. W. Dorsey. It says: "If the action goes on it will expose to an extent our private matters in which you are interested. It will draw forth who are the real parties of Vaile, Miner & Co., and it cannot be helped," &c. This letter, now in the hands of Inspector Woodward, Mr. Dorsey turned over to me.

The complaint in my suit was filed May 29, 1879. In their answer, sworn to the 24th and the 27th of June, they denied the indebtedness but made the following admission, "True, it is the defendants Vaile and Miner, with one Stephen W. Dorsey, at one time employed him for a short time to aid in certain mail routes," &c. As Vaile and Dorsey separated from April 1, this could only refer to services rendered while the latter was in the United States Senate.

Miner subsequently testified directly to the contrary before the Blackburn committee. The case was set for trial December 27, 1880. On that day in the courtroom they proposed to pay me $200 as a compromise, which I accepted. Mr. Dorsey complimented me upon the success of my Western trip, in fact, was so well pleased that he desired me to visit the Pacific slope, which I declined to do, and hence he substituted his brother in my place, and he left for California in May, 1879. He did this reluctantly, distrusting the ability of John W. When I proposed his name for the business, Stephen asked me, "Do you suppose John can attend to it?" I answered, "I don't see why he cannot, if he has full written instructions." Stephen replied, "You know John is a man of no judgment at all."

John W., while away, got up letters and petitions for increases on all the California service of his brother. On route No. 46247, Redding to Alturas, he obtained from Major and Culverhouse a subcontract on the new form, but so blindly expressed that the Department refused to receive it; I was compelled to obtain a second one by mail. Returning, he made a trip into Southern Utah, where he procured the customary letters and petitions for increases on route No. 41119, and a subcontract on the new form from Nephi Johnson. The blank petitions, some in my handwriting, had already been sent to Johnson; but as he procrastinated, John W. was sent down expressly to hurry matters up. The letter of April 12, 1879 (29 C), was wholly prepared by S. W. Dorsey, and copied and signed by me. All the petitions asked for an expedition to forty-eight hours, but as Brady insisted on 4 miles an hour (as in the case of route No. 38113) the affidavit of Peck, sworn to January 22, was filled in for a schedule of thirty-three hours. Stephen W. was so provoked at the manner in which John W. managed matters that he ordered him home angrily and peremptorily. It should be added that the affidavit used on route No. 41119 was written by Miner, signed by Peck, and filled in by Rerdell.

The figure "7" and word "seven" in petitions marked 6 C and 7 C (pages 602-3) were interpolated by me.

See the letter of S. W. Dorsey to Nephi Johnson, dated May 5, 1879, and marked 34 C. The body of it is in the hand of W. F. Kellogg, the signature and pencil note in that of S. W. Dorsey. He alleges as ostensible reasons for offering the new form of subcontract that the firm had dissolved, and that in the first agreement the name of Peck had been used without authority "by this man" (Miner).

From the expiration of his Senatorial term till late in June or early in July, 1879, Stephen W. Dorsey remained in Washington, exercising personal supervision over the mail business, with the exception of about ten days running from May 20th to the 30th or 31st, when he made a flying trip to New Mexico, having been called thither by the sickness of Peck. Peck, or rather his wife, in point of fact, was superintendent of the ranch at Chico Springs.

Early in May, 1879, S. W. Dorsey instructed me to open a journal and ledger, giving me a pencil memorandum in his own writing, of the different accounts to be kept. It was on United States Senate note paper, and the original is with Inspector Woodward. It embraces "S. W. D.," "expense," "cash," "profit and loss," "J. H. Mitchell," "J. W. D.," "M. C. R.," "Wm. Smith," [John Smith],* "Saml. Jones."

"Wm. Smith" is charged with 18,000 and Saml. Jones, substituted for ["John Smith"]* erased, with 600.

At the time I inferred that these amounts had been already paid and to two post-office officials. I drew my conclusion from the fact that I had found in the writing of Dorsey a tabular statement of his service, giving the number of the routes, the present pay, the expedition expressed in percentages, the anticipated pay, and the "amounts to B—, 33½ per cent." All doubts on the subject were removed shortly afterwards when Dorsey asked me if I had entered a charge of $5,000 or $6,500 against Brady. I answered "No, I have opened no account with Brady." He added, "Well, against William Smith, then?" I proceeded to charge to William Smith the amount indicated by Mr. Dorsey, forgetting now which of the above sums it was, as both appeared on the books, as well as a third charge of $7,000, making a total of $36,500. At this interview he further explained that Saml. Jones stood for William H. Turner, a clerk in the contract office.

I continued to keep the books till about the 1st of August, 1879. I then attempted to balance them but failed, being confused by several items, e. g., ex-Senator J. H. Mitchell, of Oregon, was paid for "legal" services $2,500 in cash, and $2,500 in a note of hand. Besides the orders for increases and expeditions, following each rapidly, added to the complication.

About this time S. W. Dorsey instructed me to employ as book-keeper James W. Donnelly, a clerk in the Land Office division of the Interior Department, at a salary of $25 per month. Mr. Donnelly did this work after office hours, till into the spring of 1880. He had been book-keeper in the office of the United States marshal at Fort Smith, Ark., under both William A. Britton and Logan H. Roots, and was known to be an expert. He is now chief of the accounting division of the Land Office, and has always been a warm friend of Dorsey. It should be added that he knew nothing about "the true inwardness" of the mail business, as he merely made entries from memoranda furnished by me.

About March 1, 1880, I employed Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Gibbs, of Washington, to make exact duplicates of the journal and ledger, for the use of Dorsey in New York City. I have read their statement and find they are mistaken in regard to finding the names of Brady and Turner, and in calling the original a "cash" book. Otherwise it is correct.

After the copies had been sent I received a letter from T. W. Torrey—the New York bookkeeper of Dorsey—inclosing a trial balance-sheet, which showed a variance of $24.75. Upon examination I found he had called an item of $25, twenty-five cents. With this correction the transcript balanced.

* In pencil and erased in original.

During the Congressional investigation of 1880, into the star service, I was subpoenaed to appear before the committee with all the books and papers of S. W. Dorsey, relating to the mail service. I telegraphed to Dorsey, who was then absent from the city, but could get no reply. Acting under instructions from James W. Bosler, who had become a partner of Dorsey, I directed James W. Donnelly to make out a new set of books leaving out the accounts with Wm. Smith and Saml. Jones, and possibly that with J. H. Mitchell and sundry items in the expense account. These new books were to be submitted to the Blackburn committee in lieu of the originals. I marked in pencil the items to be omitted. I happened to be under medical treatment when the subpoena was served, and though able to appear at once, to gain time for the preparation of the books, kept away from the committee on a certificate of disability from my physician. I testified June 2, but neither set of accounts was produced, it being near the close of the investigation. I think I was the last witness. Prior to this time, on the general balance-sheets, all accounts which showed no consideration had been closed by being charged to profit and loss. In this way the accounts with Smith & Jones were closed. Shortly afterwards I took both sets of books to New York to aid in a settlement between Dorsey and Bosler, and they were permanently left in the office of the former in the Boreel building.

I go back now to explain the connection of James W. Bosler with the business. In May, 1879, I learned from the letter-books that Dorsey had made a proposition to Bosler. The letter bears date May 13, 1879, was written by S. W. Dorsey, and an impression was taken by me in the copy-book, page 995. It showed the state of the service at the time; the amounts already paid to "T. J. B." (Thomas J. Brady); also the amounts advanced by S. W. D. (Stephen W. Dorsey); the sum, $20,000, borrowed from "P. B. P."; and an annual net profit of $54,000. It further stated that he had assurances that in a short time the service would be so increased as to yield a yearly profit of $100,000, out of which additional payments amounting to either $10,000 or $20,000, I forget which, were to be made to "T. J. B." When Dorsey left, about the 20th, to visit Peck in New Mexico, he directed me, in case Bosler came, to show him the books and explain everything. Bosler did come, but only asked for a statement of the profits, remarking that he didn't know or care anything about the books.

In (contract may have been written in May, but it was not consummated till June) June, 1879, Dorsey and Bosler entered into a written contract by the terms of which Bosler was to pay one-third of the existing indebtedness, to advance the money needed for future expenses, and in return to have a one-third interest in the profits, to begin July 1, 1879. Dorsey having already, by drafts drawn on the Sixth Auditor, pledged all the pay for the quarter ended September 30, 1879, left nothing for his partner till the close of the quarter ended December 31, when the latter received all then due, as he continued to do till the close of the contract term. After December 31, 1879, Dorsey drew his share through and from Bosler, and from the same date all subcontractors were paid by Bosler.

In March, 1880, the partners in New York city made a supplementary or new agreement whereby Bosler was to receive one-half of the profits and relieve Dorsey from all further care. I was called to New York to assist in the settlement of March, 1880, and from the dictation of Dorsey wrote the agreement. On my arrival I called about 11 o'clock a. m., at his residence on Fifth avenue. The conversation had hardly begun when a stranger to me was shown in, and I was requested to retire to the back parlor. The interview in the front room lasted perhaps half an hour, when the gentleman left and I was called back. Dorsey resumed the conversation by asking if I knew that man. I answered, "No." He then said, "That is A. M. Gibson." "Why," replied I, "he is the man that has raised this row in Congress." "Yes," answered Dorsey, "that is so, but he is all right now, and a good friend of mine."

Later in the day, after a long, private conference between Dorsey and Bosler, at which I was occasionally called in to answer questions, Mr. Dorsey gave me a memorandum in his own writing, and directed me to credit him with certain shares of mining stock disbursed, as nearly as I can remember, as follows:

J. N. Tyner, 1,500 shares	$2, 000
A. M. Gibson, 1,500 shares.....	2, 000
W. H. Turner, 1,200 shares	1, 500
X, 2,000 shares.....	2, 500
	8, 000

The above lots consisted of shares in two mining companies, one of which was "Carbonate Hill;" the other has escaped my memory.

He also required me to give him credit for house-rent for five months, July to November, inclusive, $416.66, the partnership having occupied one room in it as an office. From December 1st it was taken by other parties, the office in the basement being reserved.

In May, 1879, Col. John W. Steele, of Oberlin, Ohio, was employed by Dorsey at an annual salary of $2,000, to go wherever the exigencies of the business might require. On route No. 38145 he made the subcontracts with P. J. Jaramillo and J. L. Sanderson & Co. He also effected the final compromise with Jaramillo. His connection with the partnership ceased in December, 1880.

While John W. Dorsey, in connection with Miner, may have had a small interest in the business prior to the division of the routes, I know that he held no interest after the dissolution of April, 1879. On two occasions he was employed to travel, once to California and once to Southwestern Colorado, at a salary of $125 per month. His total compensation did not exceed $400, and he drew no dividends. When drafts or warrants as pay on any of the service required his indorsement as the nominal contractor, I sent them to him. He signed them as a matter of form and returned them to me.

The connection of John M. Peck with the partnership was also merely formal. No share of the profits ever went to him after the management fell into my hands, and I have no reason to think that he ever received one cent.

For myself I wish to say that, excepting an annual salary of $3,000, I never had any pecuniary interest in any of the routes embraced in the indictment. Where I appeared as subcontractor it was to enable my principals to hypothecate drafts for the full amount of the pay by attaching my receipts thereto. Wherever the record shows that I received either pay or remission, I accounted for the last cent to Dorsey and Bosler, holding no beneficial interest therein.

After March, 1880, I drew my pay from J. W. Bosler and reported to him, he exercising entire supervision. At that time Dorsey was engrossed in mining speculations, and later on in the Presidential contest.

In August, 1880, Dorsey passed through Washington, en route to Indiana. He, Bosler, and Brady had a meeting at Chamberlin's. Immediately afterwards Bosler directed me to make out a list of all fines and deductions, and where I had no proof to explain the failures to write to the different subcontractors to furnish it. He added, "Brady has agreed to make the remissions. We have got to pay like the devil for it, but half a loaf is better than no loaf."

In addition to $750, which went to A. S. Powers, of Oregon, nearly $4,000 were remitted. Shortly afterwards, on Bosler's books, I saw an item of $2,000 charged to expense. I knew it could refer to no other transaction. It will be seen that the remission cost about 50 per cent. of the claims.

A vigorous effort was made to secure remissions aggregating over $20,000 on route No. 40104, being deductions imposed for the gross failures of Isaac Jennings. I always understood that Brady was ready to sign the orders, but S. M. Lake, chief of the inspection division, resisted, and Brady hesitated to act over the head of his subordinate.

I now step out of the current of my narrative to mention a few illustrative facts.

On route No. 38135, Pueblo to Greenhorn, I interpolated the words "on quicker time" and "a faster schedule," after the receipt of the papers in Washington, supposing that the petitioners had neglected to ask for expedition. It was not till the trial that I discovered that some of the petitions originally asked for expedition.

On route No. 41119 Stephen W. Dorsey instructed me to fill up one of the Peck oaths, made the previous January, so as to yield an increase of about 150 per cent. for expedition. I was then a novice, and made the number of men and animals required on the existing schedule absurdly small, but observed the proportion suggested by my employer.

On route No. 38134 two affidavits, both sworn to before Rufus Wainright, April 21, 1879, were filed, one May 6 and the other May 8; both were signed J. W. Dorsey, subcontractor. In both affidavits I filled in the number of men and animals. Turner, the contract clerk, objected to the first on the ground that it claimed too large an equipment for so short a line. To meet his views I substituted the second, the percentage of increase, viz, 200, being the same in each. The word "subcontractor" was written under the name of J. W. Dorsey, though he had nothing whatever to do with the route. The same description, equally without authority, was appended to his affidavit used on route No. 38140. In the latter instance the addition was made by S. W. Dorsey; in the former, I think, by myself.

Early in 1881 Mr. Bosler asked me if I had petitions for daily service on seven specified routes. I replied on all except one, viz, No. 38113. He then directed me to lose no time in procuring them on that line. I wrote to Eugene Taylor, urging him to have petitions for daily service in Washington by March 1. One came about March 2. Upon this Col. J. W. Steele obtained the favorable indorsement of General W. T. Sherman. It was filed in the Department the 5th, and favorably acted upon the 8th. The scheme contemplated the following increases: Route No. 38113, from 3 to 7 trips per week; route No. 38135, from 3 to 7 trips per week; route No. 38140, from 3 to 7 trips per week; route No. 38145, from 3 to 7 trips per week; route No. 40113, from 3 to 7 trips per week; route No. 44140, from 3 to 7 trips per week; route No. 46247, from 6 to 7 trips per week.

The trips on Nos. 38113, 38145, and 40113 were increased from 3 to 7 per week, and one trip was added on No. 46247. No action was taken in regard to the others.

I had previously furnished Mr. Bosler a tabulated statement showing what the pay on the seven routes would be when the trips were increased to daily. At Willard's Hotel, one evening soon after the orders were made, Mr. Bosler, taking from his pocket this tabulated statement, said to me, "Supposing I had to pay $10,000 for all these increases, what per cent. would I have to pay for 38113, 38145, and 40113?" I answered, "How about the additional trip on 46247?" He replied, "That is all right, it has been settled for." I made the calculations and told him that the increases amount to 57 per cent. of the gross amount.

When the investigation began under the Garfield administration I saw from the public prints that the authorities were getting down to the substantial facts. After reflection I decided for myself to tell the truth and take the consequences, though well aware that my course would lead to the severance of long-continued business and social relations. With this end in view I sought the interview with Postmaster-General James, and the statements made by me at the Arlington Hotel to Messrs. James, Clayton, and Woodward were true. The statements subsequently made by me to Attorney-General MacVeagh were also true, though in his testimony he quoted me incorrectly on some immaterial points.

After thus committing myself I determined acting under the countenance of the Attorney-General to save ex-Senator Dorsey, if possible, as well as to furnish written proof to sustain all I had told. I accordingly went to New York City, starting at 9 o'clock p. m., June 12, 1881. I first went to the office of Dorsey and secured the journal which contained the original entries both in my writing and in that of Donnelly. I then called upon Dorsey at the Albemarle Hotel. He received me angrily, nay, furiously, having learned of my disclosures, as he alleged, from Mr. S. B. Elkins, as I believe, from A. M. Gibson. He remarked that no step was taken but what he was fully advised of it. Finding him in no frame of mind to discuss matters reasonably I soon rose to leave. He was still in his night-clothes, and, as I was about to close the door, remarked that he wished to see me again as soon as he had dressed. On reaching the street I grew more and more indignant at his treatment. Without returning to the Albemarle I started for Washington, reaching Jersey City about one hour before the departure of the afternoon train. Thence I telegraphed to Dorsey as follows:

"The affidavit story is a lie; but confidence between us is gone. I resign my position, and will turn everything over to any one you designate."

At Philadelphia two dispatches, both from Dorsey, were handed me. The first ran substantially, "Why did you leave without seeing me again? Return by first train to New York."

The second: "Will you ruin my wife and children. Return to New York and all will be made right. I will not accept your resignation."

I answered from Baltimore:

"I can do no good by returning. Will do nothing to injure you, but send some one to take my place."

The next morning I received by mail a long, pathetic, and fervent appeal from Dorsey, imploring me to do nothing to disgrace him and his family. This letter I showed at once to my brother, J. H. Rerdell. The same morning United States Senator ———, sent me a message to come at once to the National Hotel. I complied. He proceeded to say that he had left Dorsey the night before nearly crazy; that he had already been terribly punished by the scandal; that since March 4th he had fallen from a dizzy height, and that I had nothing but ruin to gain by making disclosures. By way of warning he pointed to the fate of the witnesses in the whisky cases. The interview lasted a couple of hours and left me unshaken in my purpose.

That night I telegraphed to Dorsey that I was doing all I could to save him. He replied by wire that he knew of nothing he wanted to be saved from. The next day I met James Torrans, United States marshal, for Eastern Arkansas. I said to him that this foolishness had gone far enough, that the time had come for Dorsey to make a clean breast. In this view Torrans acquiesced.

On the Sunday morning next after the above interviews, Dorsey arrived in Washington, and sent for me to come to his house, 1121 I street. He met me at the door—an unusual proceeding—shook hands cordially, and led me to the office. He made the most eloquent and effective appeals to me, dwelling particularly upon his wife and children. I replied that I would do anything in the world for him except perjure myself. He replied, "What in hell does an oath amount to when the fate of a friend is at stake. Under such circumstances I would not hesitate."

Meanwhile Mr. J. W. Bosler came in and entered into the conversation. The talk continued from about 10 o'clock a. m. till 3 p. m.

Bosler and I then left, walking down to Willard's Hotel together. Thence I went home to dinner, having promised to return immediately afterwards, which I did.

On reaching his hotel room we resumed the conversation. I then repeated to him the admissions I had made to Mr. MacVeagh. He argued that this did no essential harm, as in an Indian investigation he was once confronted by a witness to whom the had made compromising admissions, when he escaped by acknowledging the admissions, and by claiming that he was not under oath at the time, and that they were made for the expre purpose of entrapping his accuser. He added that I was now in exactly the same fix, and if I would make ad affidavit on that line Messrs. James and MacVeagh would be driven out of the Cabinet inside of ten days.

The next day I began the preparation of the affidavit, Dorsey and Bosler being present and offering frequent suggestions. The last two or three pages of manuscript were written by Dorsey and copied by me. When the paper was completed, although I was exhausted and hungry, Bosler insisted that it should be sworn to before I dined. We drove to Middleton's bank, where the notary affixed his jurat. A copy was then made by Miss Nettie White, when the original was sent to President Garfield, or rather was taken by Messrs. Ingersoll and Dorsey in person to the White House. I accompanied them and remained in the ante-room expecting to be called in. While seated there I saw Messrs. James, Cook, and Woodward enter the house. About 10 o'clock Dorsey and I left together, Ingersoll remaining. This occurred the week the President was shot, the presentation of the paper having been delayed by his absence at Long Branch.

At my first interview with Messrs. James and Woodward, I warned them not to trust either William A. Cook or A. M. Gibson, as I fully believed those men would betray the Government. I distrusted Gibson, because I had seen him at the house of Dorsey during the Congressional investigation, and because he was charged with a donation of stock on Dorsey's books. I distrusted Cook, because he was holding secret communication with Dorsey after accepting employment from the Government.

One morning I was sent to Cook with a note from Dorsey. I met him on the office stairs, when he motioned me back, saying, "You should not be seen here for reasons which I cannot explain now, but which will soon become apparent."

The same night I took a second note to Cook, going to his house and thence to his office, where I found him. On reading it he said, "All right. Tell him I will be at his house at 11 o'clock."

He came; I met him at the door. He asked if Dorsey was alone. I informed him that he was with callers, upstairs. He then said "I will step in here, as I do not wish to be seen." Thereupon I conducted him into a dark unfurnished parlor, taking in a chair from another room. As soon as the visitors went away Dorsey came down and took a seat with Cook in the unlighted room. They were still in conference when I left, about midnight.

The following day the employment of Cook by the Government was publicly announced. When I referred to the fact Dorsey said, with a smile, "That is all right."

While I was incarcerated in September, 1882, my office was entered and a large number of papers taken therefrom. Others were torn into shreds and scattered upon the floor. Among the papers stolen were the original drafts, partly in writing of Dorsey, of my affidavit addressed to President Garfield; a copy of the letter of May 13, 1879, written by Dorsey to Bosler; complete copies of the Wilcox correspondence; two balance-sheets prepared by J. W. Donnelly, one showing the charges to "Smith" and "Jones," and the other the same items carried to profit and loss; a package of blank affidavits for expeditions signed by J. W. Dorsey and John M. Peck; the memorandum showing the number of shares of mining stock donated to Tyner, Turner, and Gibson, and many others. Stephen W. Dorsey had a key to my office.

My salary, at $3,000 per annum, was continued without interruption till August 1, 1882.

On the routes where I was the nominal subcontractor I had been in the habit of filing receipts for the full amount of pay with the drafts of Mr. Bosler. Last fall drafts on blanks signed by Miner, Peck, and J. W. Dorsey were made out by me for the rest of the contract term and delivered to Mr. Bosler. By some oversight Bosler filed those for the quarter ended December 31, 1881, without attaching my receipt as subcontractor. My attention was called to the omission in January, 1882, by Deputy Auditor Crowell. Believing that indictments and prosecutions which would involve me in expense were coming, I determined not to file my receipt on route No. 41119, but to draw the pay as subcontractor. I did so, paying Nephi Johnson $2,500 and reserving for myself $2,327.83. This constituted a part of the $3,000 which I lost in an option on the Rawley mine, through overconfidence in Col. Robert G. Ingersoll.

The foregoing statement, believed to be absolutely correct, is made up largely from memory, fortified in part by the record and in part by the papers saved from the wreck.

MONTFORT C. RERDELL.

Subscribed and sworn to before me November 22, 1882.

P. H. WOODWARD,
Post-Office Inspector

Supplementary statement from Montfort C. Rerdell.

I, Rerdell, left for the West the night of July 11, 1878, and not July 6, as previously stated.

July 11, 1878, Stephen W. Dorsey placed to the credit of J. W. Dorsey & Co., in the German-American National Bank, $3,000, being the net proceeds of two notes that day discounted. The notes were drawn by J. W. Dorsey & Co., endorsed by S. W. Dorsey and by J. W. Dorsey & Co., I writing the signature of the latter under the direction of S. W. Dorsey. The money was loaned on the exclusive credit of S. W. Dorsey.

The same day at his own house the Senator gave me $1,500 in money. Of this I placed to the credit of J. W. Dorsey & Co. in the German-American Bank $500, and took the rest with me in currency. In addition to the above $4,500, Stephen W. Dorsey gave two notes for $1,000 and $2,500, respectively, drawn by J. W. Dorsey & Co., and indorsed by himself, either to J. R. Miner or to me, I do not clearly remember which. Like the previous advances the proceeds were also to be used, if necessary, in putting the service on the route from Bismarck to Tongue River.

The note for $1,000 was discounted August 8, 1878, the day of my return; and the one for $2,500 October 12, 1878. The avails of the latter had been anticipated in checks already sent to J. W. Raymond, a banker at Bismarck, Dak.

These several sums aggregate in round numbers $8,000. The entire sums was checked out by me over the firm signature of J. W. Dorsey & Co. The above notes are the ones referred to by Mr. B. U. Keyser, receiver, in his testimony at the first star-route trial.

S. W. Dorsey gave me the pencil memorandum showing what accounts to open and what charges to make immediately after my return from the West, or early in May, 1879. A number of routes were heavily manipulated in 1878 and early in 1879. It would be mere guesswork on my part to attempt to apportion, either in respect to service or dates, the $8,000 charged to William Smith, alias Thomas J. Brady.

Explanation of certain correspondence.

In April, 1878, I received the following from Senator Dorsey:

MOUNTAIN SPRING RANCH,
COLFAX COUNTY, NEW MEXICO,
April 3, 1878.

M. C. REDDELL, 1121 I street:

DEAR REDDELL: I wish you would get fullest information in regard to all the new post-office lettings and keep posted as to the schemes going on in the Department. There are certain routes we want advertised and others we do not. I shall be in Washington as soon as the 12th unless something unexpectedly happens.

Faithfully,

DORSEY.

I was then a clerk in the District government, knew nothing about the mail business, and hence was in no position to respond to the above demand. I was the private secretary of Senator Dorsey, and hence probably the call upon me.

September 27, 1878, J. W. Dorsey wrote me from Dakota:

"You have not written me anything about the prospect for the increase."

He refers to expected increases on the route from Bismarck to Tongue River.

I have a copy of a letter written by Senator Dorsey to his brother John, December 9, 1878 (page 5, letter book):

"* * * * Mr. Vaile has taken the whole business, and is to pay you for your whole interest $10,000, in payments to be strung out * * *."

He advises John as soon as relieved by Vaile, in January, to come to New Mexico and go into the cattle business. He adds that Peck gets about the same from Mr. Vaile that he does. He advises him to come back to Washington as soon as relieved, so as to draw his salary at the Senate, as there must be several hundred dollars due from the Sergeant-at-Arms.

December 25, 1878, John W. Dorsey replied from Dakota. He said:

"Your favor of the 9th is received, and I am glad that Mr. V. has bought out, though I had no doubt but this route alone will pay him or some one else $100,000 clear of all expense within the life of the contract * * *."

April 10, 1878, from the United States Senate Chamber, Senator Dorsey wrote the following:

"S. S. HUNTLEY, Esq.:

"DEAR SIR: Will you please send me annual pass for Col. James L. Hodges, and greatly oblige,

"Yours, truly,

"S. W. DORSEY."

The body is in the handwriting of J. R. Miner, but the signature is by S. W. Dorsey. Hodges wrote the petitions on routes 40104 and 40105. Both were made the basis of large increases.

After I was served with a subpœna duces tecum to appear before the Congressional investigating committee in 1880 I tore a number of leaves from my letter-press copy-book, as the contents were of a compromising character. Some of them I still have.

In the letter of December 28, 1870, to D. W. C. Wheeler, page 466, refers to a payment of $200 to A. M. Soteldo, through George H. Giddings.

"Our friend," referred to on page 457, is J. E. Reeside. He demanded $20,000 as the price of letting up on the contractors. The second clause in the list of reasons refers to A. M. Soteldo. Negotiations with Reeside were conducted by Boone. A large salary on the Pacific slope was offered him, which he declined.

Wheeler had been sent to Washington by S. W. Dorsey to look after his interests. He expected $2,500 from the company for going upon its bonds as surety. He told me that he made the arrangement with Senator Dorsey himself, who guaranteed the payment. The Senator subsequently tried to throw the obligation upon Miner. When I spoke to Miner he said he had never seen Wheeler; that it was Dorsey's own arrangement, and declined to do anything about the matter. This claim is referred in the closing paragraph.

In the letter dated January 9, 1880, to D. W. C. Wheeler, pages 468-'69-'70, the clause on page 469 running, "Now, so far as the party whose letter I return to you is concerned, we do not fear him any more, and propose to let him go to the devil," means J. E. Reeside. We had come to the conclusion not to be blackmailed by J. E. Reeside.

Letter of May 22, 1880, to J. W. Bosler, pages 358-'60:

"General B. is very much alarmed, and he and I had a long conversation to-day, during which he made several valuable suggestions, which I shall follow." (Page 360.)

May 21, 1880, I was served with a subpœna duces tecum. The next day I called on General Brady. He asked in substance, "Have Dorsey's books been kept in such a way that they can safely be carried before the committee?" I replied "No. There are some accounts showing large cash payments which will require explanation."

He then asked if the books were large, or if there was so much in them that they could not be copied. I informed him that the contents were not voluminous and that they could be copied in a short time. He then suggested, being the first person to put the thought in my mind, that new books be made, omitting the objectionable accounts. I acted at once upon his advice. He added, "Dorsey is a damn fool for keeping books."

As before stated, the account of Wm. Smith, alias Thos. J. Brady, was opened with a charge of $18,000. A few days afterwards I went to the bank of Middleton & Co., with S. W. Dorsey, who drew $7,000 in cash, in several checks—three, as I now remember. We walked down F street together to the Post-Office Department. We separated at Brady's door, he telling me to wait for him in Turner's room, which I did. After the lapse of fifteen or twenty minutes Mr. Dorsey rejoined me, when we left the Department building.

Either that or the following day Senator Dorsey asked me if I had given him credit for the amount paid to Brady. "No," answered I, "There is no account with Brady." "Well, with Wm. Smith," he continued. "It is all the same. Damn it, I supposed you knew it."

On the books I credited S. W. Dorsey with $7,000, and charged the same to Wm. Smith.

I remember going over the stubs and finding that the checks used for the purpose aggregated $7,000 also.

MONTFORD C. RERDELL.

Subscribed and sworn to at Washington, D. C., January 17, 1883, before me.

P. H. WOODWARD,
Post-Office Inspector.

Rerdell made these two affidavits. They were submitted to me; the first one probably before the trial commenced and the second one during the progress of the trial. I examined them with very great care and found that they contained a great deal of very important information, some of which was corroborated by written papers. I held the affidavits for a long time, and held the question of permitting Rerdell to become a witness under advisement up to, I think, the very day before he was put upon the stand. We consulted in regard to it at various times—Colonel Bliss and Mr. Ker and I—but the determination to allow him to become a witness was not reached, I think, until the evening before he went upon the stand. Now, my reason for using him at that time was this: As I have said, there was ample testimony in the first case to justify a conviction, and we had all of that evidence already in the second case; but on the second trial, instead of having an intelligent jury, we had the worst jury I ever saw summoned to the box. I have never in this jurisdiction or any other seen so bad a jury.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Bad in what way?—A. Bad in intelligence, bad in every respect. I will tell you, gentlemen of the committee, why it was so bad. The first trial of this case, of course, attracted the attention of the people of Washington and of the entire country. Diligent and enterprising reporters were on hand during the whole of the first trial to report everything that was said by counsel, court, or witnesses. The journals throughout the country contained a very full report of the proceedings. The papers of this District contained quite a full record of everything that had transpired on that trial. According to the law of this District and the common law, a person is not competent to serve upon a jury who has formed and expressed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the person that he is called to try. There have been some slight relaxations of the rule as to the strength of the opinion and as to whether it can be removed by testimony, and so on, but it still stands as a rule of law, that if the man has formed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, he is not a competent juror. Now, almost every intelligent man in the District of Columbia had formed and expressed an opinion in this case, and when those summoned as jurors were asked in the examination upon the voir dire as to the character of that opinion, its firmness, and the difficulty of removing it, they generally testified that their opinion was so decided that they did not think any testimony could change it; and those who, in the first instance, indicated that their opinion might possibly be changed, came to think that it would be more difficult to change it as they contemplated the prospect of sitting in that box for four or five months. [Laughter.]

So that, in point of fact, the operation of the rule excluded the intelligence of the District of Columbia from the jury-box, and the few intelligent men who were on the jury—that could be called intelligent men—were accepted, notwithstanding their opinions, and without regard to the rule. I think there were some men on that jury that could neither read nor write. The Government had three peremptory challenges, and only three, and I was obliged to exhaust one of those challenges, as the record will show you, upon a man of this description. He was a colored man; I think he came from the county, and had been laboring on a farm. He gave his name and occupation, and when asked whether he had formed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of these defendants, he said he had not. When I asked if he had ever heard of the star-route case, he said he never had heard of such a case in his life. He was so entirely innocent of any knowledge of this transaction that I was naturally led to inquire whether he could read or write. No; he could not read a word of print. I appealed to the court to say that he was an incompetent juror, because the case involved an inquiry into forgery. Some of the most material inquiries in the case were as to forgeries.

The court said that under the law he seemed to be probably the most competent juror that had been offered. [Laughter]. I endeavored to get the court by some means or other to pass him by. All that was unavailing, but I could not consent, as the representative of this Government in the trial of such a case to allow that juror to be sworn after what he had disclosed, so I was obliged to exhaust one of my peremptory challenges in order to get rid of that ignorant man. Of course, the defendants challenged every intelligent and competent man within the limits of their challenges. They did not want intelligence; and with their challenges and under the operation of this rule of law, the defendants got all they wanted, including a verdict of not guilty. Now, that being the character of the jury, I considered that, although the evidence without Rerdell's would certainly have been amply sufficient before an intelligent jury, I needed something further before such a jury as that, and as Rerdell's testimony was particularly personal to individuals and developed facts in a way that would help to explain the obscure records even to the most unintelligent mind, I deemed it all-important to put him upon the stand, and I did put him upon the stand.

Q. That was after examining the affidavit that had been submitted to you?—A. After having had that affidavit under my examination for some months.

Q. Did Rerdell set forth in his affidavit and state in his testimony before the jury the relations that had existed between him and Mr. Dorsey in star-route matters?—A. He did, fully.

Q. Did that statement show that Mr. Dorsey was a party to these star-route frauds?—A. Certainly it did, sir.

Q. Was there any question raised by his testimony as to the propriety of calling as a witness for the Government Mr. James W. Bosler, of Pennsylvania?—A. There had been a great deal of talk about Mr. Bosler in both of these trials. Bosler was regarded as a friend of the defendants, and in the first trial we did not have sufficient faith in his integrity to believe that his appreciation of duty would override the obligations of that relation. We thought, moreover, that they would call him. In the second trial Mr. Bosler was summoned to appear as a witness, and I think a subpoena duces tecum was served upon him to produce his books and certain papers. I find a passage in Rerdell's affidavit as follows:

I go back now to explain the connection of James W. Bosler with the business. In May, 1879, I learned from the letter-books that Dorsey had made a proposition to Bosler. The letter bears date May 13, 1879; was written by S. W. Dorsey, and an impression was taken by me in the copy-book, page 995. It showed the state of the service at the time; the amounts already paid to "T. J. B." (Thomas J. Brady); also the amounts advanced by S. W. D. (Stephen W. Dorsey); the sum, $20,000, borrowed from "P. B. P."; and an annual net profit of $54,000. It further stated that he had assurances that in a short time the service would be so increased as to yield a yearly profit of $100,000, out of which additional payments amounting to either $10,000 or $20,000, I forget which, were to be made to "T. J. B."

Q. Was there any effort made on your part to obtain from Bosler the letter as to which Rerdell testified that he had seen a copy of it in Dorsey's book?—A. I regarded that letter as a very important paper. I examined it with a great deal of care, as did the other counsel, and we consulted with regard to it; that is, we examined the letter-press copy, and we were resolved, if possible, to get the original letter. It was necessary, in order to introduce the letter-press copy, that we should show that there was an original, and that it had been in the possession of the party to whom it was addressed, and, of course, that it was lost. Mr. Bosler was put upon the stand and interrogated very closely by Mr. Bliss in regard to this subject. He swore positively that he had no such letter, that he never had received such a letter, and that no such letter existed so far as he knew. You will find his testimony on this subject on pages 2611 and 2612 of the record of the second trial.

Q. Was the press copy of that letter from the books of Mr. Dorsey submitted to you by Rerdell?—A. Yes, sir; we had the letter-press copy in full.

Q. And was it the opinion of the counsel for the Government before the introduction of Bosler as a witness that his testimony would establish the fact of the receipt of that letter by him?—A. I thought that it would; but I never had myself any conversation at all with Mr. Bosler. I never spoke to him in my life.

Q. You simply assumed that a letter appearing upon Mr. Dorsey's letter-book addressed to Bosler would be a copy of one actually sent, and that Bosler must have received the letter?—A. I did. I took it for granted that Bosler had received the letter.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. And you assumed that he would tell the truth about it?—A. I hoped that he would.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. It was absolutely necessary to prove the existence of the original letter before you could introduce secondary evidence, and therefore you had to put Bosler upon the stand?—A. Yes, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did Rerdell testify that an original letter of the kind found in the letter-book had been sent to Bosler by him?—A. I think he did. My impression is that he did; and the object of examining Bosler was to prove the loss of the letter.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Did he swear he never received it?—A. He swore he never received any such letter. There were two letters that had been sent to Bosler which are mentioned in Rerdell's affidavit that I wanted to get in, and it turned out, I believe, that Bosler had never seen either of them; at least, he said so.

Q. Who wrote those letters?—A. S. W. Dorsey wrote the important letter to which the chairman has just now referred, in which there is an account given of the profits of the business and the amount to be paid to Brady; and Rerdell wrote the second letter, telling Bosler of the demand of the House committee of investigation that he should go before it with the books of the company and of an interview that he had had with Brady upon that subject.

Q. I understood you to say awhile ago that there was such a letter?—A. Mr. Dorsey swore there never was any such letter. Mr. Rerdell swore that there was. Rerdell had taken the letter-press copy.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. You are speaking now of the second letter; in whose handwriting was the first one?—A. I remember very distinctly the image upon my mind of the signature of Dorsey to that letter; that is, what I supposed to be his signature.

Q. Did Bosler swear that he had never received either of the letters?—A. He swore positively that he had never received either of them.

Q. Then it was a matter of necessity for you to put Bosler upon the stand?—A. Yes, sir; he was put upon the stand for the declared purpose of proving the loss of the letter, and not for anything else.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was there any other evidence than this within his knowledge that was material, and which you desired to produce?—A. None that I know of. I am unable to say what he knew, because, as I tell you, I had no conversation with him at all.

Q. Was he served with a subpoena duces tecum to produce his books?—A. He was.

Q. Did he respond to that demand to produce his books?—A. In order that I may save you the trouble of asking various questions in the direction in which your examination is tending, I will say that I had nothing whatever to do with Bosler. Mr. Bosler came here, as I was informed by the Attorney-General, and also by Mr. Bliss with his books, and expressed a desire that I should not see his books.

Q. For what reason?—A. Because I was a Democrat and he was of a different political faith, and his books contained some political entries and some private matters which he did not desire submitted to the examination and criticism of one of the adverse political party; and the Attorney-General, speaking on the subject, indicated that that was Bosler's wish, and I think that Colonel Bliss may have indicated the same thing. I do not remember as to that; but it was then understood that Colonel Bliss should look at the books. I said at once, "I do not want to examine his private affairs; I do not want to see the books for any other purpose than to use whatever they may disclose that would be evidence in this trial, and I take it for granted that my associate will examine them just as well as I could."

Q. Where did Mr. Bosler live when at home?—A. At Carlisle, Pa.

Q. Then there were objections to your looking at his books for the reason that there were some political entries in them?—A. That I understood to be the objection, and the reason why he did not want to submit his books to my examination.

Q. You yielded that point?—A. Of course, sir, readily.

Q. But Colonel Bliss examined the books?—A. Colonel Bliss, I take for granted, did, and I believe he has so stated.

Q. How long was Bosler held here as a witness by the Government?—A. He was held here for several weeks; whether all the time in attendance upon the court I am unable to say, but he was in attendance from time to time.

Q. Did he make any request to be relieved from the subpoena?—A. He never made any such request of me, because, as I have told you, I had no conversation with him.

Q. Did he desire to be relieved from appearing before you because of the reasons given, or for any other reason?—A. I never had any communication with him.

Q. Did any other person have any communications with you in his behalf or for his benefit?—A. Well, there was a gentleman who spoke to me upon the subject.

Q. Did he desire to be relieved from appearing before the court in this trial on the ground of wishing not to disclose any of his business matters in court?—A. He desired to be released from the obligations of the subpoena which kept him in attendance here.

Q. Was that merely on account of the inconvenience, or for some other reason?—A. As I recollect, what was said was that he did not desire to have his private matters in his books made public. As to whatever related to this case there was no objection. Now, I am stating what was said, but I do not believe it is competent evidence, if you will pardon me.

Q. I asked you if he desired to be relieved from attendance in court?—

A. I do not know that Mr. Bosler sent any one to me or knew anything about it. I know nothing further than that this conversation did take place with a gentleman about Mr. Bosler.

Q. Were you advised by any one speaking for him that Mr. Bosler desired to be relieved from attendance before the court for any reason?—A. I have just answered that question by saying that he desired to be released from the obligations of a subpoena.

Q. Now, was that desire predicated upon the fact that his testimony would be such as to embarrass him because he did not desire to make public the contents of his books?—A. I did not understand that he had indicated that his testimony in reference to this case would embarrass him. I understood from the conversation to which I have referred that the only desire of the person that was talking to me was that Mr. Bosler's private affairs should not be disclosed, and that Mr. Bosler himself should be allowed to go about his business. And now, Mr. Chairman, let me say that I must ask you to excuse me from making any further statement upon this point.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Didn't it go a little further than that; was it not that his transactions with party money—political funds—rather than his private affairs, should not be disclosed?—A. That was the impression that I drew. When I said "private affairs" I meant private political affairs.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Bosler told me that his books contained evidence of political contributions, and that he did not think that ought to be brought out in public.

The WITNESS. What I desired particularly was the Dorsey letter.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You cared nothing about anything else?—A. I did not know of anything else. My associate, Mr. Bliss, was looking into the books. I hoped that he might find something else; but I was informed by him that he did not find anything except one or two items that were not very material, in my judgment.

Q. You had no acquaintance with Mr. Bosler?—A. None whatever.

Q. And the information or the suggestion which came to you came through another?—A. Came through another.

Q. At Bosler's request?—A. I do not know.

Q. Will you state to the committee who approached you upon that subject?—A. I do not think it is competent evidence. So far as I am personally concerned, Mr. Chairman, I shall state everything in relation to my own conduct, whether it is within the rules of law or not, but when it comes to referring to other people, I do not think I ought to go outside of those rules. I do not myself, Mr. Chairman, taking warning from some witnesses that have preceded me, approve of a witness, in testifying, disregarding all the limitations of law and of confidence. Whilst no law and no confidence should restrain him from stating anything whatever that affects himself, I think the limitations of the law and of confidence may, with propriety, restrain a witness to a certain extent from stating what affects others.

Q. You were a public official at that time and discharging your duty in a public capacity, were you not?—A. I was, sir.

Q. Then you were not supposed to have secrets?—A. I do not think I had many secrets except with my associates. We talked with a great deal of freedom, and all lawyers know that such consultations are to be respected as confidential.

Q. But if individuals other than your associates were to come to you to advise you as to the manner of prosecuting that case?—A. [Interposing.] If any individual were to come to me with an improper proposition he would receive instant punishment and a prompt disclosure of his conduct.

Q. You decline then to state who it was that interposed in behalf of Bosler?—A. I would prefer not to make the statement, unless you very decidedly insist.

The CHAIRMAN. I will not insist, unless the committee does.

Mr. STEWART. I think I should object to it as being incompetent, because whatever anybody said under such circumstance, to Mr. Merrick would not be evidence here against anybody. You would have to see that the man was Bosler's accredited agent.

The WITNESS. According to my best judgment there was not a single word that passed that was improper. All that I said in reply was, "If Mr. Bosler will give me those letters I don't care what becomes of him; but if he does not give me those letters I will pursue him as far as I can. I am determined to have those letters." And the answer was, "If he has those letters, or whatever letters he has, he will give them to you, of course."

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. I understood you just now to take the position in withholding the name of that gentleman that you did it upon the ground of privilege; that it was in effect a confidential communication or conversation?—A. Well, no; I cannot say that, sir; for there were no obligations of confidence imposed at the time. The transaction was entirely open; but I withheld the name for the same reason that I gave certain directions when we engaged in the case. When I came into this case I found that the atmosphere was filled with suspicion. We had at the Department a list of individuals in Congress who were supposed to have had more or less connection with these transactions, and I found that such was the condition of the public mind that wherever a name was mentioned in connection with these matters the mention was at once construed to attach suspicion; a mere suspicion soon grew into serious accusation. Therefore I directed that no man's name should be mentioned in connection with these matters unless we had evidence upon which to indict. I gave those directions because I desired that the records and the officers of the Department of Justice should not be made the instruments of originating or communicating calumnies. The public mind is still sensitive upon this subject, so that the mere mention of a name in this connection, though the man be innocent as the unfallen snow, may do harm or wrong somewhere; and it is for that reason that I prefer not to answer your question.

Q. You have made mention of a conversation with some person who said that if Mr. Bosler had certain letters which you desired he would disclose them?—A. Yes; that he would do so as a matter of course.

Q. I will not ask you to mention the name, but you do not care, I suppose, if I ask you to exclude certain persons?—A. Yes; I prefer not to do that.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Will you state why it was that Mr. Kellogg was not indicted before the statute of limitations ran, as to the passage of the drafts and notes?—A. That question I suppose is designed to draw from me a statement of the history of that transaction.

Q. Yes; state it fully.—A. After my interview with Mr. Walsh, to which I have referred, I availed myself of the first opportunity for a consultation with my associates, Messrs. Bliss and Ker (which occurred a day or two after the interview with Walsh) to bring the subject before them, and that consultation was, I am very certain, held in our lunch-room in the court-house. I informed them of what had occurred between Mr. Walsh and me, and stated that it was my intention to go to the Attorney-General, make known to him what had passed between Walsh and me, and request him to ask the court to have the grand jury reconvened. To explain my use of the word “reconvened” here. I should say that this was in the month of July, and the grand jury that had been summoned to attend upon the June term of the criminal court had been respite until the following October.

Therefore it is that I say my purpose was to have that grand jury reconvened; and my reason for having it reconvened instead of waiting until the coming October, when it would again come together, was that the important transaction in which Mr. Kellogg was guilty had its initiation about the 17th, 18th, or 19th of July, 1879, and what had transpired on the 17th, 18th, or 19th of July, 1879, would be barred by the statute on the 17th, 18th, or 19th of July, 1882, the month in which this consultation took place. It was necessary, therefore, that the grand jury should act, if they acted at all, upon the first part of that transaction prior to those dates. When I brought forward the proposition to my associates in the shape that I have indicated, Mr. Bliss, after a few moments reflection, said, “Don’t do that; I will go to the court myself and ask the judge to reconvene the grand jury.” I was greatly pleased at his taking this position, and I told him I was delighted to hear that he was willing to do that, because it was a matter which I considered closely affected his personal and official honor.

Thereupon, at the meeting of court after the recess Colonel Bliss went up to the judge and did request that he would reconvene the jury, telling him the occasion for it, and that it was a matter in which he felt a personal interest. I also went up to the judge’s desk while the colonel was still there, apprehending that he might need some assistance to induce the court to pass the order, and united with him in the request. The court thereupon said it would reconvene the grand jury. The grand jury was accordingly reconvened, and I think it came together somewhere between the 5th and 12th of July, and was organized before the 12th. Colonel Bliss went before the grand jury with Mr. Walsh as a witness, and before the day upon which a prosecution on account of this transaction of July, 1879, would have been barred by the statute the grand jury came down, having refused to indict.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was that the Mitchell grand jury?—A. No, sir; that was the Hutchinson grand jury. I observe that Mr. Hutchinson states in his testimony, which within the last few days, I have casually looked over, that they were expecting all the time that Mr. Price was to come up to supplement the testimony of Mr. Walsh, and that something had been said by Mr. Bliss upon that subject. Mr. Hutchinson must be mistaken about that, Mr. Chairman, because Mr. Price was not then available as a witness for the Government.

Q. You did not then rely upon Price at all?—A. Not at all. I relied upon Walsh and regarded his testimony as amply sufficient on which to find an indictment.

The examination was here suspended and the committee adjourned.

WASHINGTON, June 14, 1884.

RICHARD T. MERRICK recalled and further examined.

The CHAIRMAN. You may continue your statement, Mr. Merrick.

The WITNESS. Mr. Chairman, I see from the published account of my testimony that probably I ought to explain what I said in reference to the star-route juries. I presume that my statements as reported by the official stenographer need no explanation, but as published in the newspapers I think they do. My testimony in reference to the two juries referred to their average intelligence. I think I so stated. The first jury I regarded as possessed of an average intelligence, above that of ordinary juries in this or any other jurisdiction that I know of; the second jury as being very far below the average of intelligence. On the second jury there were two or three individuals who were probably more intelligent than ordinary jurors, but the average of intelligence on that jury was greatly below the ordinary average. And I will add, sir, that in my judgment the juries in this District, that I have seen in the several courts, those now serving as well as others, are equal to any juries in any jurisdiction in the United States for intelligence and for personal integrity. But I think it quite a misfortune that we have no law which, for cases such as the star-route cases and some of the cases in the criminal court, providing for the impanneling of a special jury.

Before I proceed with my testimony I am under the necessity of making also an important statement with regard to something that I said yesterday, in justice to a gentleman who had previously testified before this committee, and whose evidence as given, I undertook, for his sake, casually to correct. I refer to the testimony of Mr. Hutchinson, the foreman of the grand jury which was reconvened in July, 1882, for the purpose of considering the Kellogg case. In looking over Mr. Hutchinson's testimony very casually, I observed that he had stated that either that grand jury expected Mr. Price to appear before them and testify in connection with Mr. Walsh, or that Mr. Bliss had stated to them that Mr. Price would so appear and testify. I did not remember exactly yesterday which it was, but I thought and said that Mr. Hutchinson had undoubtedly fallen into an error in reference to that, because it was well known to everybody connected with the case that Mr. Price was not available as a Government witness at that time, and was not to be before that grand jury, and did not become available as a Government witness until the following December or January. For that reason I remarked that Mr. Hutchinson must be in error. Yesterday afternoon Mr. Hutchinson called upon me and stated that I had done him some injustice, and that he was not in error at all in the testimony he had given the committee; to which I replied that I certainly thought he was and that I had made the statement which I did to the committee as much for his benefit as for that of anybody else. He insisted that he was not in error in his testimony, and, after some conversation, I told him that it would give me great pleasure to make any reparation I could for any wrong that I had done him, and that, if he desired it, I would state to the committee to-day that he had called to see me and had informed me that in attempting to correct what I supposed was an error of his I myself had been in error; and in pursuance of that promise I make this explanation now, sir, to go upon your record.

Question. You have stated partially the conversation which occurred between you and Mr. Hutchinson; I think the committee have the right, perhaps, to know all that was said by him in reference to his testimony.—Answer. Well, he himself is a competent witness upon that subject as well as upon any other.

Q. It is true that he is a competent witness, but he has been before the committee and made a statement and he may not be recalled. As he requested you to correct the statement that you had made in regard to him, I think the committee ought to be informed of the whole conversation, if anything else passed between you—of course I do not know that there did. Was there anything further said by him with regard to his testimony?—A. There was, of course, a good deal that passed between us, but the ultimate conclusion was that I should make the statement that I have made here.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Are you satisfied now that you were mistaken?—A. Am I satisfied that I was mistaken?

Q. Yes; that you were yesterday.—A. In attempting to correct what he said?

Q. Yes.—A. I am satisfied.

Q. Did he satisfy you of that by this conversation?—A. He did, sir.

Mr. FYAN. It seems to me, then, Mr. Chairman, that we ought to have the reasons that satisfied Mr. Merrick.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was his special attention called to that part of his testimony?—A. If the committee insist upon it I will state all that was said. I feel, on reflecting about it, that having given part of the conversation at Mr. Hutchinson's own suggestion, if the committee insist I ought give the whole conversation.

Mr. FYAN. It looks this way to me, Mr. Merrick: of course you may have some delicacy about repeating what Mr. Hutchinson said, but you have given us your conclusion. Now, you reached that conclusion from the conversation, and it seems to me that we ought to have the facts, so that we may arrive at a conclusion for ourselves.

The WITNESS. I had undertaken, Mr. Fyan, to correct what I supposed to be an error that a witness had fallen into, and the witness called to see me and told me that it was not an error, and that my kindly and well meant offices had been misplaced.

Mr. STEWART. It was only with reference to Price that you undertook to correct the testimony?

The WITNESS. That was the only point.

Mr. STEWART. Well, I do not see that there is anything to be gained by going into that any further. It stands now just as it did upon Mr. Hutchinson's testimony.

The CHAIRMAN. I desire to refresh my recollection by looking at Mr. Hutchinson's testimony to see wherein Mr. Merrick's statement was different. [After consulting the record.] I will ask the witness whether he has examined Mr. Hutchinson's testimony since he was on the stand yesterday?

The WITNESS. I did examine the testimony with Mr. Hutchinson himself when he called to see me.

The CHAIRMAN. Was any part of his testimony referred to and discussed at that time?

Mr. HEMPHILL. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that we ought to have this conversation in full if it was a matter of any consequence.

Mr. STEWART. Upon what principle is it admissible in evidence?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not know. If it had been objected to originally it might have been excluded as not coming within the strict rules of law. The witness has merely made a correction of his testimony given yesterday. He said then that another witness was mistaken, and now he takes that back and says that the witness was probably correct.

The WITNESS. No, I do not say that.

Mr. STEWART. What did you say?

The WITNESS. I say that Mr. Hutchinson told me that I had been in error in my attempting to correct his testimony, and that his testimony was correct as it stands upon the record. I do not say that Mr. Hutchinson's testimony is correct. I replied to Mr. Fyan's inquiry whether Mr. Hutchinson had satisfied me, that had satisfied me.

Mr. FYAN. Satisfied you that you were mistaken?

The WITNESS. That I was mistaken.

Mr. FYAN. And that he was correct?

The WITNESS. That he was correct.

Mr. HEMPHILL. If Mr. Merrick had simply stated here that he was in error in what he said about this yesterday, that would have been merely a correction of his own testimony; but he has gone on to give a portion of a conversation with Mr. Hutchinson, and now I think we ought to have the whole of that conversation.

Mr. STEWART. He has not related any conversation. He has merely stated a conclusion.

Mr. HEMPHILL. He says that he had a conversation with Mr. Hutchinson, who told him and satisfied him that he was wrong in his testimony given yesterday. Now we want to know why Mr. Merrick was satisfied that he was wrong.

Mr. STEWART. The reason is not material. My point is this: If there is anything to this conversation at all, Mr. Hutchinson ought to be here for cross-examination.

Mr. HEMPHILL. That would be true if Mr. Hutchinson were on the stand and had made this statement, but he is not. Mr. Merrick is on the stand, and, without objection, he has undertaken to relate a portion of this conversation.

Mr. STEWART. He does not relate any conversation. He refers to a conversation and conclusion, namely, that he was mistaken in his testimony upon this point yesterday.

After further discussion the chairman remarked that the gist of the matter was what was said to the witness by Mr. Hutchinson, as to whether his (Hutchinson's) testimony should stand as originally given and recorded.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. I will read Mr. Hutchinson's statement on this point and then ask you a question about it. I read from the record, page 429:

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. After you had heard the evidence did you ask the opinion of the district attorney as to whether it was sufficient to find an indictment upon, or did he give any opinion?—A. No, sir; I did not ask him and he did not give any opinion.

Q. Did he make any suggestions as to the sufficiency of the evidence?—A. No further than his great apparent anxiety to get Mr. Price there, and his anxiety that we should consider Price's testimony. He was confident that Mr. Price would be there, and he seemed exceedingly anxious to have him there.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Did he make any remark to the effect that it would be necessary to have Mr. Price there in order to find an indictment?—A. No, sir; not as broad as that; nor I don't think he intimated that.

Q. Did he convey any intimation to you to that effect by his declaration?—A. Not that it would be necessary to have Price there, but he seemed to be exceedingly anxious that Mr. Price should be there.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did he say whether the evidence that he hoped to produce from the examination of Mr. Price was necessary to make out a case?—A. Well, I think he said it would be “a clincher,” or something like that. My impression at the time was that he wanted Mr. Price’s testimony in order to make up the case; that it was necessary. I might have drawn that inference, though, because I thought it was necessary; or I might have drawn it from the manner in which Mr. Bliss said it; I don’t know.

Q. Then you drew from his manner that it was necessary to have Price’s testimony to make out a case?—A. No; I say I believe at the time he thought it was. Whether I was influenced in that way by my own opinion, because I thought it would be necessary, or whether I was influenced by his manner, I do not know; but I certainly thought that he thought so.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Are you willing to say whether or not you submitted your views upon that subject to the balance of your associates?—A. I would not say that.

Q. That is, you are not willing to say whether you did or not?—A. No, sir.

Was that evidence called to Mr. Hutchinson’s attention by you yesterday?—A. I do not think I read to Mr. Hutchinson the part that the chairman has just read, but I read what appears on page 427, if I am not mistaken, commencing about the seventh or eighth line. I had previously looked at the testimony very superficially and had only a general idea in my mind that Mr. Hutchinson had testified that Mr. Price was expected to appear before the grand jury, and that was what I attempted to correct yesterday. When I came to look more carefully I found a great deal more in it, and had I read the testimony before I testified I would not have undertaken to correct it. I read to Mr. Hutchinson what appears on page 427, and interrogated him with reference to it with a good deal of anxiety.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. As I understand you, you based your declaration yesterday that Mr. Hutchinson was mistaken on the fact that among the counsel for the Government there was no expectation that Price was to be here at that time?—A. It was perfectly understood that he was not to be here. There is no doubt about that.

Q. And after your conversation with Mr. Hutchinson last night you changed your opinion and became satisfied that some of the counsel had informed him that they expected Mr. Price?—A. You are pressing me rather hard, Mr. Fyan, for an opinion.

Q. I want the facts. You say you changed your opinion?—A. I answered that before when you asked the question, though probably I ought not to have done so, because my opinion would hardly be matter for you to act upon. If the committee demand it I will give the conversation.

Mr. STEWART. The majority of the committee seem to so decide. I do not think it is competent, but the majority seem to think it is. I should be willing to leave the question to Mr. Merrick to decide, but he is not the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. I am willing to leave it to Mr. Merrick to decide the question whether when we are examining a witness and a portion of the conversation has been given we are not entitled to the whole conversation.

Mr. STEWART. Oh, that general rule has no application to this case. However, I will not interpose any further objection, except to say that in my judgment it is entirely incompetent and irregular.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed, Mr. Merrick.

The WITNESS. I regret that the committee require me to state the conversation, because I dislike to repeat conversations, but since it is required in this case, and the subject is before the committee, and I am testifying as a witness, I feel that I am obliged to give it. Mr. Hutchinson called upon me last evening, I think, the first time he had ever been at my house (I knew him only slightly, but esteemed him), and stated to me what I have already detailed to the committee. I replied to him: "Mr. Hutchinson, you must be mistaken." Said he, "I am not mistaken, sir." Said I, "It is impossible that you should be correct, for it was understood and well known to us all that Mr. Price was not to be here. He was not available. You misunderstood Mr. Bliss." Mr. Hutchinson insisted that he had not misunderstood him. This conversation, thus far, I think, had taken place in my parlor. I said to him, "Come into my office and let me look at the record, and see what you have said." My office adjoins my residence. We went in, and I found his testimony and read to him from page 427. I did not read from page 430; I did not have my attention called to that until afterwards, and did not know that there was any more on this subject in the record than appears on page 427, in which he says:

We were promised on Friday that Mr. Price would be there Saturday almost to a certainty, but he did not come. I suppose, however, that the Government attorneys were not to blame for that.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Who made that promise?—A. Mr. Bliss.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Do you know why Price did not come?—A. I do not.

Q. Was any reason given?—A. Simply that he did not come. We understood that he was to come, but, as a matter of fact, he did not come.

Q. Do you know where Mr. Price was at that time?—A. I do not.

Q. Was he under arrest?—A. No. My opinion is that he was in Canada at that time. I think Mr. Bliss said that he had, until recently, been in Canada, but that he (Bliss) had learned, through a respectable source, that he would be there the next day.

Q. But he was not there?—A. He was not there.

I read that and I said, "Now, Mr. Hutchinson, you are mistaken about this. Mr. Bliss stated that Price would be here on the trial of the case, not before the grand jury." Said he, "I am not mistaken, Mr. Merrick." Said I, "You must be mistaken, because Mr. Bliss told me this morning after I had testified that, in reference to this correction I had made in your testimony, I was right; that he had said that Mr. Price was to be here on the trial. You must be in error about it." Said he, "I am not in error, sir, and I want you to understand that I am not mistaken, and that what I said is so and can be proved to be so by the grand jury." Said I, "Could you not have misapprehended Mr. Bliss? You amaze me. I am convinced you must have misapprehended him." He replied that he had not misapprehended him, and could not have misapprehended him; that the grand jury had adjourned over one day for the purpose of having Mr. Price there, and waited for him next day and expected him, and that as he did not appear, they came into court and reported. I interrogated him in reference to some other matters connected with what had taken place before the grand jury, but this is substantially everything that passed in reference to the testimony that he had given here before this committee. As to the other matters that took place before the grand jury, I suppose the proper witness to testify to them would be Mr. Hutchinson himself, unless he has testified about them already.

Q. Have you stated the substance of the conversation?—A. I have stated the substance of it all. Although the conversation was much more protracted than what I have said would indicate, the questions and the answers in the rest of the conversation were but different forms of the questions and the answers that I have given here.

Q. State to the committee in this connection when it was that Mr. Price was first available to the Government as a witness, either before the grand jury or on the trial of the cases?—A. Shall I answer that question in brief, categorically?

Q. You may make any explanation in connection with your statement of the fact.—A. The affidavit of Price, which is in the Post-Office or in the Department of Justice one, will fix the precise date at which he became available. The time was about five or eight days after the date of the affidavit, and that was some time in the latter part of December, 1882, or the first part of January, 1883. After the failure of the grand jury of which we have been speaking to indict Mr. Kellogg, in view of my conversation with Mr. Walsh, to which I have already testified, and in view of the impression made upon my mind as to Mr. Kellogg's relation to this transaction for which he was afterwards indicted, I determined, if possible, to get Mr. Price for the reason that was, as I supposed, controlling the action of all the counsel for the Government, which was that, as we regarded any participation in criminality of this character by a public official as of much greater enormity than a fraud perpetrated in the same matter by private individual, wherever we could get testimony from the private individual sufficient to convict the public official, and could get it in no other way, we would accept the private individual as a Government witness in order to punish the greater criminal. In August, 1882—no, later than August—after the trial was over, in September or October, whilst I was in New York, the son of Mr. Price called to see me and told me that his father desired to be rid of this criminal prosecution which was then pending against him as a co-conspirator with Brady for fraud upon the Government in connection with the Indianola and Corpus Christi and the Corpus Christi and the San Antonio routes. I replied that his father could be rid of it, that if he would disclose to me everything that he knew in connection with the frauds upon those routes, and all that he knew that had relation to Mr. Kellogg and to Mr. Brady, I would take the matter into consideration, and that if it was sufficient, I thought he could be rid of further trouble as a defendant; for the reason, then stated to him and which I have just stated to the committee, that the counsel for the Government, in view of the obligations resting upon them, desired first to punish the greater criminals, and, if necessary, were prepared to do that by taking the testimony of criminals of lesser grade. Something further was said, and I then told him, "I want no further conversation with you now, sir, upon this subject; what I say to you can be relied upon. I must be put in communication with your father if you come from him with authority. Go back and tell him what I have said." Subsequently, in the fall of that year, the counsel of Mr. Price came on from Louisiana to see me. It is unnecessary to state what passed. These negotiations were the subject matter of the discussion. Later Mr. Celsus Price, of Missouri, a gentleman whom I learned to esteem of very high character, came on with J. B. Price, the defendant, and called upon me in reference to this subject. I repeated to him substantially what I had said to Mr. J. B. Price's son in New York, and told him that first, he must lay before me a written statement of what Mr. Price would say, and state to me all that Mr. Price knew, and that if the statement was sufficient and I concluded that it was in fact all that he knew, then the Government would probably accept him as a witness. A statement was drawn up and brought to me. I required it to be sworn to, and it was sworn to. I examined that statement with a great deal of care. I concluded that the statement was entirely sufficient and I was impressed also with the belief that it was probably, although not certainly, all that Mr. Price knew. Regarding the statement as entirely sufficient to prove beyond the possibility of a doubt the guilt of Mr. Kellogg, I called Mr. Woodward into consultation with me and showed it to him and read it to him; and I then called Mr. Bliss into consultation. That was, I think, in the middle of December. I showed him the statement in my office, which was then a few doors farther west than the office which I now occupy, as the office adjoining my residence had taken fire and was then undergoing repairs.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. That affidavit was sworn to on the 29th of December?—A. Yes, sir. It is unnecessary, at least for the present, to say what passed in that conversation with Mr. Bliss.

Q. With whom do you say that conversation was?—A. Mr. Bliss.

Q. Did it relate to the sufficiency of this testimony?—A. It related to the testimony.

Q. Was there any difference between you as to the propriety of accepting Mr. Price as a witness at that time?—A. There was a very decided difference, as Mr. Bliss has himself stated to you, gentlemen. It was very decided.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. This interview and consultation with Mr. Bliss, and of these conversations with Mr. Price's son and with Celsus Price, and the furnishing of this affidavit, were long subsequent to the action of the grand jury, were they not?—A. The action of the grand jury was prior to the 18th of July, 1882. My conversation with young Mr. Price in New York was after the close of the trial in September 12, 1882. My conversation with Celsus Price was some time in December or November, 1882. The negotiations were very protracted. I never saw Mr. J. B. Price. I refused to see him. I never spoke to him in my life, and would not know him to-day if I should see him. I preferred to deal with him through others. After the conversation with Mr. Bliss, in my office, in which we differed radically, I submitted the matter to the Attorney-General. Indeed, our conversation closed with the understanding that the radical difference between us upon this subject could only be settled by our common superior, the Attorney-General.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. I think you had better explain in what that difference consisted, and whether it related to the sufficiency of Price's testimony.—A. Perhaps I can do that better presently. Each of us saw the Attorney-General. Mr. Bliss saw him, if my memory serves me right, before I did; at any rate we did not see him together at that time. The Attorney-General determined that, in order to settle this difference and decide this very serious question properly, it was necessary that there should be a meeting of the counsel in the case with him, and accordingly, a meeting of the counsel was directed to take place at his house. Messrs. Bliss, Ker, and myself were present. I think we met at the Attorney-General's house about half past 7 or 8 o'clock in the evening, and we left not earlier than 11 o'clock, if I am not very much mistaken. At that meeting I brought forward the affidavit of Mr. Price, and stated my views. Mr. Bliss antagonized those views. He took the ground that the statute of limitations barred the indictment: that the transaction between Mr. Kellogg and Mr. Price had taken place on the 18th day of July, 1879 (I think it was the 18th; it was the 17th, 18th, or 19th), and at the time of our discussion we were in the month of December, 1882. I replied that it was true that the statute of limitations barred the transaction of the 18th of July, 1879, which transaction was, according to the affidavit I had before me, a delivery to Mr. Kellogg by Mr. Price of five drafts upon the Post-Office Department of $3,000 each, and a promissory note of $5,000. These five drafts were payable quarter by quarter as the quarter's pay should accrue due on the routes from Corpus Christi to San Antonio, and ran through the years 1880 and 1881—I do not remember exactly how far, but very far down. And these drafts and that promissory note, according to the affidavits, had been delivered to Mr. Kellogg in consideration of his getting increase and expedition upon certain routes. The order for the increase and the expedition upon these routes we regarded as fraudulent. They had been already, by the grand jury, found to be fraudulent when an indictment had been found against Brady and Price for conspiracy to defraud the Government through the instrumentality of those orders of increase. I replied to Mr. Bliss, that although that first transaction was barred by the statute of limitations, yet, the payments upon the orders came within the prohibitions of the law, and those payments were not barred. The discussion became very excited, and probably more emphatic than it would have been in our cooler moments. The Attorney-General heard us through, and called upon Mr. Ker for his opinion, and Mr. Ker's opinion coincided with mine. The Attorney-General then said, at the suggestion of somebody or of his own motion, I do not remember which, that Mr. Woodward should take the affidavit that I had and put himself in communication with Mr. Price and get a fuller affidavit. I ought to say, in that connection, that Mr. Bliss objected to the affidavit that I had, because it was not sufficiently full and complete, and because he believed Mr. Price could testify to a great deal more; he believed Price guilty, and felt that he ought to be prosecuted under the indictment pending against him. In obedience to that order of the Attorney-General, Mr. Woodward put himself in communication with Mr. Price, and subsequently produced the affidavit which the chairman has shown me here, and which bears date the 29th of December, 1882. The conference with the Attorney-General closed with the understanding that Mr. Woodward should put himself in communication with Mr. Price, get from him a statement of all that he knew, put it in the shape of an affidavit and submit it to the Attorney-General, and then if the Attorney-General thought it was sufficient, and that, under the circumstances, it was proper that Mr. Price should be subpœnaed as a Government witness, he would say so. We were done with the question. It had gone to our superior. On the 29th of December, 1882, this affidavit was made, and Mr. Woodward informed me at the time that he had given it to the Attorney-General; and a few days later, I don't know how many, probably two or three, I received a communication from Mr. Woodward, as did the other counsel, informing us that the Attorney-General had concluded to accept Mr. Price as a witness. Then, for the first time, Mr. Price became available as a witness for the Government. In this connection I may correct an error of my brother Ker. He has stated in his testimony that when the indictment was found against Mr. Kellogg, Colonel Bliss left the case in anger. The indictment against Mr. Kellogg was not found until some time in April, although the grand jury acted upon the subject in February.

Mr. KER. What do you call finding the indictment?

The WITNESS. Presenting it to the court.

Mr. KER. That is another thing. Presenting it is one thing, and finding it is another. They find the indictment when they find it.

The WITNESS. Well, I should like you to find it until it is presented.

Mr. KER. Well, at all events, that was what I meant.

The WITNESS. I am not speaking of your intention—I am speaking of the use of technical language. Mr. Ker is in error with regard to that, and I think he will admit that he is.

Mr. KER. What is that that you want me to admit?

The WITNESS. Mr. Bliss was in New York, if I am not mistaken, at the time the Attorney-General acted upon the affidavit presented by Mr. Woodward. Am I right?

Mr. BLISS. Yes; it was acted upon on Monday, and I got back Monday night.

The WITNESS. He had gone to New York on Friday, I presume, as usual, and got back on Monday night. When he returned he found that the Attorney-General had acted upon the affidavit of Mr. Price presented by Mr. Woodward, and he was met with a communication from Mr. Woodward stating that Mr. Price had been accepted as a witness. I think that communication came to us while we were at our lunch.

Mr. BLISS. I received mine at my house after I got back.

The WITNESS. I don't know how that was, but the conversation that took place between us upon the subject was on the day of Mr. Bliss's return or the day after, when we were at our lunch at recess.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Whom do you mean by "us"?—A. I refer to the consultation between counsel.

Mr. BLISS. I think you are wrong, Mr. Merrick.

The WITNESS. Colonel Bliss then said that if that was the case, if Price was to be accepted, he would retire from the star-route cases. I told him I thought that was very unwise and injudicious, and that I regarded it as a breach of duty. What else was said about it I do not remember, except this: Said he, "I will continue through the rest of the session of to-day, but I will not be in court after to-day." He did remain during that day, and that night Mr. Ker and I prepared to go on with the testimony the following day, and for the exigency of Mr. Bliss's absence; and we went into court next day and Mr. Bliss remained out.

Mr. BLISS. Have you looked at the record? I was in court next day.

The WITNESS. I do not think I can be mistaken about that.

Mr. BLISS. Look at the record.

The WITNESS. I will look at the record.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What case was being tried at that time?—A. This was the second trial of the Dorsey-Brady case.

Mr. BLISS (referring to the record). The record shows that on Tuesday, the 2d of January, I was in court; on Wednesday, I think, I was out of court; on Thursday the record shows that Mr. Bliss opened the proceedings of the court.

The WITNESS. That is all right, then. The one day that Mr. Bliss remained out of court appears by the record to have been January 3, and on Thursday, January 4, he was in court again.

Mr. BLISS. And opened the proceedings.

The WITNESS. On January 3 (my memory being refreshed by that record) I stopped at the Post-Office Department to see Mr. Bliss, and found him preparing his papers for the purpose of leaving the case. I closed the doors in order to have a private conversation with him, and I there urged upon him many considerations of public interest, as well as other considerations personal to himself, that I thought ought to induce him to remain where he was and not pursue the rash course, as I regarded it, that he contemplated. He said he felt that he had been badly treated by the Attorney-General and by the counsel, because of this matter having been acted upon in his absence. He made no complaint whatever in reference to the indictment of Mr. Kellogg. He did not give that as a part of his grievance at all, but said that he had been treated with a want of consideration and courtesy by the Attorney-General and the other counsel, in the fact that this matter had been acted upon whilst he was absent from the city. I distinctly remember my reply, which was in substance this: "At the meeting of counsel with the Attorney-General, when we discussed the subject, it was agreed that this matter should be given in charge to Mr. Woodward, who was directed to put himself into communication with Mr. Price, prepare an affidavit embodying all that Price knew, and submit it to the Attorney-General, who was then to take action upon it by himself, without the intervention of any of the counsel; and I have not since that day seen the Attorney-General, nor spoken to him upon the subject; nor would I have felt privileged to do so had I desired. Therefore, you cannot feel that you were treated with any discourtesy whatever by either the counsel or the Attorney-General. Now, return to the case and let us work on harmoniously." I regarded at that time (although I want to avoid the expression of opinions and do not intend to express any) Mr. Bliss's presence in the case as very important. It was understood by the public that he was the special representative of the administration.

Then, too, he is one of the best of workers and the most efficient man in the management of voluminous and tangled papers that I have ever met with in my life, and he was doing his work in the case with great ability.

Mr. STEWART. You converted him?

The WITNESS. He returned to the court the next morning.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Merrick, should you not say at this point, in justice to me, that I said that my understanding was different from yours as to the conclusion reached at the conference with the Attorney-General—that I supposed it was understood that after Mr. Woodward should have got a new statement from Price, I should have an opportunity to examine it in order to see whether it met the objections that I had made to the affidavit you had, and that you said that was not your understanding.

The WITNESS. I think Mr. Bliss's statement is correct, and should supplement what I have said on this point.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. At the interview between the Attorney-General and the counsel, to which you have referred, did the Attorney-General give you his conditional decision in reference to this matter, and was it understood that if the affidavit met the views suggested, then the Attorney-General was to decide the matter?—A. The Attorney-General so indicated, to the best of my recollection. The interview, as I have said, was a little heated, and the Attorney-General said to us once or twice, "Gentlemen, you must be calm," and my impression is that he said to us at that time (if I am wrong I trust that either Mr. Ker or Mr. Bliss will correct me, as they are both present) that whoever was guilty in these transactions must be punished, and he agreed with my view, that a public functionary who had been guilty, not only of criminal conduct, but also of a breach of trust, more richly deserves punishment than a mere private individual.

Mr. BLISS. He did say that; to which I replied that he must remember that by accepting Mr. Price he was relieving Brady, who was also a public official. I think, Mr. Merrick, you are right in thinking that the Attorney-General indicated that his tendency was to accept Mr. Price as a witness. I do not think he said so, but I think he indicated that tendency.

The WITNESS. I think it is probable that I replied to Mr. Bliss's statement (if such a statement was then made—I do not now recall it) that he was wrong in saying that the acceptance of Mr. Price relieved Mr. Brady, for the reason that, in my judgment, it only involved Mr. Brady the more deeply, and, in fact, Mr. Brady was subsequently indicted on Mr. Price's testimony. Was there one or were there two indictments found against Brady on Price's testimony, Mr. Ker?

Mr. KER. Only one.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was the acceptance of this affidavit of Mr. Price's in any way conditional upon the fact that it would or would not affect Mr Kellogg?—A. I do not understand the question.

Q. Was that question discussed before the Attorney-General?—A. Whether it would affect Mr. Kellogg or not?

Q. No; whether the Price affidavit should be rejected or received for the reason that it would or would not involve Kellogg. Did the Attorney-General express any opinion as to that?—A. Well, I do not know whether he expressed any opinion upon that subject at that time or not, but the subject of Mr. Kellogg being implicated in this criminality and his indictment has been frequently talked of by the Attorney-General and he has uniformly said that no matter who or what he was, if he was guilty he should be prosecuted.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. What was the object of accepting Mr. Price as a witness?—A. The object of accepting Mr. Price as a witness was to have an indictment against Mr. Kellogg. That was the only subject discussed, except the incidental consequences of accepting Price's statement; Mr. Bliss said he thought that its acceptance, while it involved Mr. Kellogg, would relieve Mr. Brady. I thought differently; I thought it would involve Mr. Kellogg, and also involve Mr. Brady more deeply.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was anything said with regard to the impropriety of indicting a Senator, owing to its effect upon the party majority in the Senate at that time?—A. I do not think that anything whatever was said upon that subject, Mr. Chairman, at that time. Something has been said upon that subject at other times by myself. Other persons may also have spoken of it, but what I have said myself I can testify to. When I got that affidavit and Mr. Price was accepted as a witness, for reasons that I deemed sufficient I directed Mr. Ker to go before the grand jury. Mr. Bliss had theretofore been before the grand jury as the representative of the Government. In this case I directed Mr. Ker to go, and directed him to qualify by getting a commission, which would justify him in getting an appointment from the district attorney.

Mr. BLISS. Which he did not do.

The WITNESS. That was my direction; and I said to Mr. Ker that I wanted it understood distinctly that I had no personal or political feeling about this matter, and that I deemed it best, as there was no possibility of any statutory bar running between the middle of January (the time when I ordered him to go before the grand jury, I think) and the 4th of March, the end of Mr. Kellogg's term as a Senator, it would be better (whilst giving the evidence at once to the grand jury, so as to let them determine upon what they would do in the matter) not to bring down the presentment until after the 4th of March. Am I right, Mr. Ker?

Mr. KER. That is correct.

The WITNESS. I had previously said, in July, I think, or in August, as I had been accused very bitterly and virulently by Mr. Kellogg and others of pursuing him out of political and personal ill-will, and of having a design as a Democrat to withdraw him as a Republican from the Senate at a time when the majority was so close that the withdrawal would embarrass his party and perhaps change the political complexion of the body, that although I intended that Kellogg should be indicted before the statute could operate as a bar, yet I did not propose that he should be tried until after he should have ceased to be a Senator. And I will say to the committee that, whilst I thought he ought to be indicted, I did not think, as the time was so short, and in view of all that had been said upon the subject and the influences that had been brought to bear upon the jury, that it was expedient to have a trial of the case until after the 4th of March, when he would retire from the Senate.

Mr. BLISS. We were engaged in the other trial, and could you have tried Kellogg?

The WITNESS. We were in the trial and could not have done it; but, independent of that, even could we have tried the case at that time, I should have said no, because the fact of his position as a Senator would have had some influence with the jury and of course others would have been interested in not having him convicted. Now, I want to say one other thing in this connection. I have said to the committee, in answer to their inquiries, that I had nothing whatever to do with the finding of these indictments by the grand jury, and that I had nothing to do with the preparation of the evidence in cases to go before the grand jury, but I stated at the same time that there was one exception which would be explained later. That exception is the Kellogg case. It is the only case in which I had anything to do with the testimony that was to be laid before the grand jury or with directing an indictment, and I had to do with that case for the reason that, in my conversation with Mr. Walsh, as I stated yesterday, the fact of Kellogg's criminality came directly before me, was immediately presented to me, and I felt that I could not, without being guilty of a serious official delinquency, fail to notice it and to have it properly passed upon by a judicial tribunal. That was the only case in which an indictment, or in which no indictment, was found, in which the guilt of an individual was brought distinctly before me, except in the case that I tried.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. State why it was that you caused Mr. Ker to appear before the grand jury in the Kellogg case?—A. Mr. Walsh was to be a witness before the grand jury. Mr. Walsh and Mr. Bliss were not friends; or rather Mr. Walsh had a very bitter prejudice against Mr. Bliss. That was one reason, and one would be enough; but there was another, which was that as Mr. Bliss and I had antagonized each other upon this Kellogg case, and I was determined that this testimony, which I thought conclusive, should be fully developed before the grand jury, I did not deem it expedient that Mr. Bliss, who was apparently the friend of Mr. Kellogg (though probably disposed and willing to do his full duty), should be charged with the unpleasant office of bringing that man to justice.

Q. At the time Mr. Ker appeared and the indictment was found, what was the decision of the counsel as to the dates that should be placed in the Kellogg indictment and the offense that should be set forth in it?—A. As I had directed Mr. Ker to go before the grand jury, and had been instrumental throughout in obtaining Mr. Price as a witness, Mr. Ker very naturally looked to me for direction in reference to the indictment. We consulted upon the subject, and in, I think, our last consultation I told him how I thought the indictment should be prepared. I told him that the indictment should contain various counts, as many as he pleased, counting upon the post-office drafts that had been given by Mr. Price to Mr. Kellogg on or about the 18th of July, 1882, and which, according to Mr. Walsh's testimony, Mr. Kellogg had placed in his hands, as his, Kellogg's agent, to collect, and out of the proceeds to pay him, Kellogg, one-half, and to pay Mr. Brady the other half; and that the indictment should charge in these respective counts that Mr. Kellogg had received the one-half of those drafts on the respective days upon which the warrants that were issued upon the drafts were paid. And in order that there might be no misunderstanding between my junior and myself, and that the responsibility might rest where it belonged, I gave Mr. Ker a written statement as to how I wanted that indictment drawn. I dictated it and gave it to him, leaving it discretionary with him as to how many indictments within a certain limit should be found, but specifically directing one or two, and the indictment is drawn, including the dates, according to my direction. A lawyer should never swear to his opinion, but, suspending for a moment the operation of the oath, I say that in my humble judgment, that is as good and solid an indictment as ever went into a court of justice.

Q. This [producing a paper] is the indictment, I believe?—A. I presume that is the indictment.

By Mr. STEWART:

The gist of the offense, as you directed the indictment to be drawn, was the receipt of the money?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Not the delivery of the drafts, but the receipt of the money when the drafts were collected?—A. The delivery of the drafts by Mr. Price to Mr. Kellogg had taken place on the 18th of July, 1879. I was extremely anxious that an indictment should be found prior to the 18th of July, 1882, for the reason that on the 18th of July, 1882, the offense of agreeing to receive the money and of receiving the drafts would be barred by the statute of limitations; but, as no indictment was found prior to the 18th July, 1882, and we were dealing with the subject in the month of January, 1883, I directed the indictment to be found under that provision of the statute which says that whoever agrees to receive or receives money shall be guilty, &c., and therefore the date that was to be put into the indictment was the date upon which Mr. Kellogg received the money by the hand of his agent appointed to collect it. I regarded the delivery of the drafts as, in law, the delivery of any other paper, a check or any other promise to pay money. The delivery of the paper in such cases is not the payment of the money; it is the transfer of the right or the possibility of getting the money at the time specified for you to get it in the paper delivered. Now, these drafts given by Mr. Price to Mr. Kellogg were drafts specifying that they were to be paid at certain dates and the payment was to be made out of the money derived from the fraud perpetrated on the Post-Office Department, probably in conjunction with Mr. Price and Mr. Kellogg, in increasing the pay upon certain routes. The drafts were drawn anterior to the date of the order of increase, I think, by two days, but they covered and specified the exact amount of the fraud which was to be perpetrated, and which was perpetrated two days after their date. Now, if you will look at the statute you will see that it provides for an agreement to receive and also for receiving money.

Q. What was the point on which the case went off?—A. I did not try the case.

Q. I thought you were present at the trial?—A. No, sir; I went into court some two or three weeks prior to the date of the trial. I was still in the cases and I went into court in response to a motion made by the defendant to have a day fixed for his trial. At that time we had been unable to find Mr. Walsh and could get no trace of him. We went into court and argued the motion. The court determined to fix a day for the trial. I thought the action of the court was not according to familiar precedent, in constraining the Government to go to trial when the Government stated it was not ready, and, immediately after the adjournment of court on that day, for reasons which I deemed sufficient, I withdrew from the case. Mr. Walsh was subsequently obtained, and the trial took place on the day fixed, but I was not present upon that trial. I withdrew from the case and from all the other star-route cases.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What is the section of the statute to which you refer?—A. The section to which I referred is section 1782, and is as follows:

No Senator, Representative or Delegate, after his election and during his continuance in office, and no head of a Department, or other officer or clerk in the employ of the Government, shall receive, or agree to receive, any compensation whatever, directly or indirectly, for any service rendered or to be rendered to any person, either by himself or another, in relation to any proceeding, contract, claim, controversy, charge, &c., in which the United States is a party.

This indictment was prepared under that alternative provision of the statute which forbids the receiving of money for the purposes specified there either directly or indirectly; and the charge was that he had received the money on the day the money was paid.

Q. Was there any motion made while you were in the case to quash this indictment or to dismiss the suit?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did that involve the question as to these drafts?—A. It did involve them to some extent. There were a variety of motions made. I think that Mr. Ker and I spent nearly the entire month of July, 1883, in attendance upon the court, not every day, but every four or five days, in the argument of some motion or other made for the purpose of getting rid of this indictment.

Mr. BLISS. The chief motions came on toward the end of June.

The WITNESS. Yes, they come on in the end of June. Almost every possible motion that could be made against an indictment was made for the purpose of getting rid of this indictment, and they were argued very fully and very elaborately within the period I have indicated and were uniformly overruled. After the court had overruled all these motions made within the time that I have mentioned, the latter part of June and July, if my recollection is right, the court fixed the case for trial on the second Monday of December.

Mr. KER. We notified them that it would be called up in October, but it was finally fixed for December.

The WITNESS. Yes, fixed for some time in December; and at that time some suggestion was made as to the insufficiency of the indictment on account of these allegations as to dates. I have not a very distinct recollection of that, but it is my remembrance that the court then indicated its opinion that the dates were correctly set forth under this act, and that the charge in the indictment was not a charge having reference to the 18th of July, 1882, when the drafts were delivered, but was a charge having relation to the dates on which the money was paid.

Mr. KER. Yes.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Assuming that Mr. Price appeared at that trial, and testified to matters which he had previously indicated in his affidavit that he would testify to, was the indictment so framed as to make his testimony admissible as a part of the res questæ of that case?—A. Mr. Chairman, you are asking me a question of law, not of fact.

Q. Yes. It seems that this case was disposed of after the hearing of Mr. Price's testimony; for the reason that that testimony did not fit the allegations in the indictment, and I want to know how that was.—A. Mr. Price's testimony, in my view of it (allow me to say that I have great respect for any opinion Judge Wylie may give), was testimony which did not go to the direct charge in the indictment of the payment of money to Mr. Kellogg, but was preliminary to that direct testimony, and was needed, in connection with Mr. Walsh's evidence, to make it a complete case. Mr. Price delivered the drafts to Mr. Kellogg on the 18th of July, 1882, and, as Mr. Price testified, those drafts were delivered in consideration of Mr. Kellogg's doing what the act of Congress that I have read, section 1782, denounces as a crime. Now, those drafts were not payments to Mr. Kellogg, but Mr. Kellogg took those drafts (Mr. Price having proved that he so received them) to Mr. Walsh and gave them to Walsh to collect for him, and when Mr. Walsh collected those drafts as Mr. Kellogg's agent and received the money and paid it to Mr. Kellogg, that was the time and that was the transaction in which the actual criminality was involved. Of that Mr. Price was necessarily not cognizant; although he of course knew when the drafts would be paid at the time he delivered them.

Mr. STEWART. I see in looking at the indictment that in at least one count (I don't know how many counts there were in the indictment) or offense is charged in this way:

To wit, on the said nineteenth day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty, at the county and District aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of the said court, did unlawfully take and receive from the said James B. Price the sum of one thousand five hundred dollars lawful money of the United States of America, of the value of one thousand five hundred dollars, of the money of the said James B. Price, as and for a fee, reward, and compensation in consideration of and payment for the said service rendered by him the said William Pitt Kellogg to him the said James B. Price, &c., &c.

Now, it appears that Price testified, not that he paid Kellogg the money, but that he had delivered him these drafts; and upon that Mr. Wilson seems to have moved to strike out the testimony, I suppose upon the ground that it did not sustain the allegation in the indictment.

The WITNESS. The testimony of Mr. Price did not go to the fact there read by you. The testimony of Mr. Price went to the fact that he had delivered a draft to Mr. Kellogg, or on a check, pretty much the same sort of a thing; for Price had control over the fund until the draft was paid. It was his money; he could have controlled it; he could have revoked those drafts or orders. Now, Mr. Kellogg takes the draft and gives it to Mr. Walsh. It is a draft upon Price's money, and Walsh gets that portion of Mr. Price's money which this draft authorized him to get, and gives it to Mr. Kellogg; therefore Mr. Kellogg received that money on the written instruction or order of Mr. Price at that date.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Then Price's testimony was relevant to prove simply the antecedent facts?—A. The antecedent facts.

Q. Then how do you account for the failure of the case after the delivery of Mr. Price's testimony?—A. I did not try the case, Mr. Chairman.

Q. I am aware of that fact; but can you account for the failure?—A. You are, gentlemen, all better lawyers than I am, and——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). Not at all. The Government selected you as its representative on account of your ability in that kind of business, and we desire to be enlightened.

The WITNESS. I am much obliged to you.

Q. Was there anything wanting in the indictment or any want of preparation by the Government which, in your judgment, caused a failure of justice at that particular place?—A. According to my best judgment, there was not. I am myself unable to account for the result of the case. I have not examined Judge Wylie's opinion. The indictment, as I have stated to you, Mr. Chairman, was prepared under my direction, and I have no doubt that Mr. Ker in the trial of the case did his duty in presenting it to the court. I do not know what he did do, but he is a faithful and a capable lawyer. A copy of one of the Price drafts, to which I have referred as having been handed by Price to Kellogg, has just been placed in my hands, and this is how it reads:

$3,000.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 16, 1879.

The Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department—

Will please pay to myself or order the sum of three thousand dollars and —— cents out of any moneys due me on route No. 31148, San Antonio to Corpus Christi, in the State of Texas, for the quarter ending March 31, 1880.

I certify that this is the only draft drawn on said route for said quarter.

J. B. PRICE,
Contractor.

Witness:

A. N. ZEVELY.

J. M. EDMUNDS,

Postmaster at Washington, Dist. of Col.

Drafts must be witnessed by a postmaster and one other responsible party.

Drafts must be properly indorsed by the payee and all subsequent holders, with their post-office addresses, before they will be placed on file.

Drafts will be filed subject to fines, deductions, collections, the amount due the subcontractor, in accordance with the act of Congress approved May 17, 1878, and any claim or demand the Post-office Department may have against the contractor.

On the back is the following:

31148; 1st qr., '80. Draft.

Ack'd November 1.

Route ——, —— quarter 187—.

For returns to ——.

J. B. Price.

J. A. Walsh.

Then there are upon this paper two stamps, one reading :

Auditor's office, P. O. D., Oct. 23, 1879, pay division.

Now, this draft was drawn before the order was passed making the expedition on the route designated in the draft, for payment out of the amount that would become due at the date mentioned in the draft, that quarter, on account of the expedition, and was indorsed by Mr. Price; and, according to Mr. Price's statement, was, on the 18th of July, 1879, delivered to Mr. Kellogg, and, according to Mr. Walsh's statement, Mr. Kellogg delivered it to him and directed him to collect the money when it became due and to pay to him, Kellogg, $1,500 of it, and to pay to Mr. Brady $1,500 of it; and, according to my theory, when this draft was delivered by Mr. Kellogg to Mr. Walsh he became the agent of both Kellogg and Price; of the latter by reason of Mr. Price's indorsements on the back, to execute the written order in the draft, supplemented by the verbal order he received from Mr. Kellogg as the holder of the draft.

Q. Then the date of the offense in this indictment which went to trial was the payment of the money, and not the passage of the draft?—A. Yes, sir; the payment of the money and not the passage of the draft.

Q. Then, why was not that issue tried in the case?—A. That is more than I can tell you, Mr. Chairman. I did not try the case.

Q. There was no controversy in the case and no pleading that raised the question as to the passage of the drafts, but the question was as to the receipt of the money?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then the testimony of Price was only a part of the case, and a very small part of it, and did not really go to the merits of the case?—A. I myself had so regarded it.

Q. Was that the opinion of the Attorney-General when he decided to accept Mr. Price's testimony?—A. I so understood it, sir.

Q. At the time you had the consultation on that subject with the Attorney-General the statute of limitations had then run, had it not as to the passage of the drafts?—A. Unquestionably; the statute of limitations, as to the passage of the drafts, had barred indictment on that ground on the 18th of July, 1882.

Q. The only matter, then, to be decided, so far as the legal effect of this evidence was concerned, was as to whether the payment of the money was not indictable, as well as the passage of the drafts?—A. That was my judgment, sir.

Q. I think that was the judgment of the Attorney-General?—A. I so understood it to be.

Q. Now, will you explain why it was that with your full knowledge of this case, and with your knowledge of this indictment, you did not continue in the case until the trial?—A. For reasons I deemed sufficient.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. I understood you to say that when the court fixed a particular day upon which this case should be called, you felt that that was not the usual course of proceeding in such cases, and I understood you to give that as your reason for withdrawing.—A. On the day the court assigned a day for the trial of this case, after the counsel for the Government, including the Attorney-General, who was present in court, had opposed the motion to fix a day, because our witnesses were not here and the Government was not ready, I deemed it expedient, for reasons which I thought ought to control me, to retire from the case.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. I think I have seen a letter from the Attorney-General to the effect that he acceded to your retirement for a different reason.—A. I have here the correspondence that passed between the Attorney-General and myself at that time, which I shall read:

WASHINGTON CITY, March 31, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to renew the request, heretofore on two or three occasions made by me, that I may be relieved from further participation in the prosecution of the star-route cases.

The most important of those cases in which it is likely any further action will be taken by the court is the case of the United States against William Pitt Kellogg, and in this case there are conditions at present existing and others likely to arise which, in my judgment, render my retirement desirable.

With a grateful appreciation of the legal and moral support I have received from you at all times throughout the progress of these cases, and with the assurance of my high regard for you personally, I remain, with great respect, your obedient servant,
R. T. MERRICK.

HON. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

To that letter I received the following reply:

WASHINGTON, April 1, 1884.

MY DEAR SIR: In conformity with your letter dated the 31st of March, I consent to your renewed request to be relieved from further participation in the prosecution of the star-route cases. This is a proper time for you to take the step you do. Hitherto I have declined, because I saw there was a necessity for your presence. Now I do not see it, and I agree with you in the reasons you have given.

I am deeply obliged to you for your handsome allusion to myself, and I must add that the Government is in debt to you for the integrity, ability, and earnestness with which you have conducted these cases ever since I confided them to you.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

HON. RICHARD T. MERRICK,
Attorney at Law, Washington.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. The Attorney-General says therefore "the reasons you have given;" what were these reasons?—A. They are in my letter, Mr. Chairman.

Q. I did not understand that they were.—A. Yes, sir; read my letter.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Did you give, orally, any other reasons than those contained in your letter?—A. There was a conversation between the Attorney-General and myself upon the subject. There was one reason which operated very strongly upon the mind of the Attorney-General, and although it was a reason affecting to some extent my sensibility, yet I did not regard it as one that would control me in the performance of a duty. That was that from the first of this Kellogg business there had been an outcry in certain quarters against me, upon the alleged ground that I was pursuing Mr. Kellogg from personal ill-will and party malice. Mr. Kellogg himself, I understood, was saying this in every possible direction; everybody, I believe, understood that the statement had been made; and I am impressed with the conviction that the Attorney-General thought that possibly my presence in the case might be ascribed to such a feeling; that I would, therefore, be open to attack from the counsel on the other side; that the jury would have heard of this thing, and that all these circumstances would tend to lessen the weight of any argument I might address to the jury, and would be calculated to place me personally in an embarrassing position.

Q. Have you had your attention called to a letter from Mr. Brewster to Mr. Bliss, printed on page 288 of our record? If not, please look at it.—A. (Looking at the letter.) I see here an expression which indicates on the part of the Attorney-General entire concurrence in what I have just stated to the committee, where he says:

Mr. Merrick will withdraw from the cases also. This is a piece of personal information that I give you. He has for some time past, by letter and orally, urged me to be permitted to withdraw. I never have intended that he would try the cases after the vehement charges made by Mr. Kellogg that Mr. Merrick was instigating the cases for malicious reasons. I thought that Mr. Merrick's own dignity of character and self-respect would forbid his taking charge of the case when he rested under such accusation from the defendant, and so Mr. Merrick thought himself.

Now, in connection with this letter of mine to the Attorney-General, I may as well say that the closing paragraph of it, which assures the Attorney-General of my appreciation of the legal and moral support that I had received from him was not a matter of form, as such things often are, even in official communications; it was a matter of substance. And, whilst I decline to express opinions generally here, there are two classes of individuals in reference to whom I think the committee have a right to an opinion from me; those are my immediate superiors and my immediate inferiors. The Attorney-General was my immediate superior. From the beginning of my relation to these cases to the end I found him to be an unfailing, firm, and resolute advocate of justice, determined, if he could accomplish it, that the ends of justice should be reached. I believe that he has never been swerved by any consideration of any kind from that line of duty. In the first trial of the Dorsey case I consulted with the Attorney-General day after day and time after time, and the instructions in that case, which are quite elaborate, were prepared by me in consultation afterwards with my brothers; I dictated them, I think, in the presence of Mr. Ker, and they were the results of repeated conferences with the Attorney-General. He kept up with the evidence, examined it, and discussed it with me from time to time and made the closing argument in the case. My immediate inferiors with whom I was brought more directly in contact than with anybody else, were Mr. Woodward, whom you have had before you, and Mr. Lyman the present Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and two more diligent, faithful, and earnest officers neither this, nor, in my judgment, any other Government ever had.

Now, in connection with this letter of resignation, I deem it proper to bring before the committee, to complete the record of that transaction, another letter which I wrote to the district attorney [reading]:

1308 F STREET, WASHINGTON CITY, March 31, 1884,

DEAR SIR: After mature consideration, and partly in view of what transpired in court on Saturday, I this morning addressed a letter to the Attorney-General repeating the request, that I had heretofore made of him on two or three occasions, to be relieved from further participation in the prosecution of the star-route cases.

I have determined that I will not in any event take part in the Kellogg case. I beg leave to say to you that it will give me pleasure at any time to give you any information I may have in regard to that case, and which will in any way aid you in conducting it.

The case has been carefully and thoroughly prepared, and after a most deliberate and conscientious examination of the evidence, in my judgment there cannot be a doubt as to the guilt of the accused.

Very truly, yours,

R. T. MERRICK.

A. S. WORTHINGTON, Esq.,
District Attorney.

To that letter I received the following reply:

[United States District Attorney's Office.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 1, 1884.

MY DEAR SIR: Your note of yesterday is just received. I also received to-day from the Attorney-General notice that you would not take further part in the Kellogg case.

I am very sorry that you have thought it best to take this course. I shall avail myself of your kind offer to give me information in regard to the case; and, for that purpose, will try to call on you at a very early day.

Yours, very truly,

A. S. WORTHINGTON,

Attorney of the United States for the District of Columbia.

Hon. R. T. MERRICK,
Washington, D. C.

That ended my connection with the star-route cases.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Mr. Kerr testified to a conversation that took place between you and Mr. Bliss with regard to the question whether a prosecution should be instituted against Senator Kellogg in which Mr. Bliss stated that Mr. Kellogg had admitted to him that he had accepted or received this money, and explained the circumstances under which he had received it. Do you remember such a conversation?—A. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that Mr. Ker has deemed it expedient to speak of what passed between counsel in their conferences. I shall not do so except where it is necessary to correct something that he has said. In those particulars in which he has spoken I suppose I am obliged to speak. There was such a conversation between Mr. Bliss and myself, and my recollection of that conversation is, that Mr. Bliss informed me that Mr. Kellogg admitted that he had received this money, but not for himself; that he had not used it for his own purposes, but that it was used for some political purpose or measure. That is my best recollection of the statement; it is possible that I may be mistaken.

Mr. BLISS. In substance you are right. I will tell you or the committee about it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that the substance of the conversation?

Mr. BLISS. Well, yes. Mr. Kellogg called upon me with a letter from the Attorney-General desiring me to see him. He stated, in the course of the conversation, that he did have certain post-office drafts from Price, and that the transaction was this: That he made an application to Mr. Price to contribute towards political expenses, and that Mr. Price said he hadn't any money. I think Mr. Kellogg gave me the impression that he thought Mr. Price was giving that as an excuse. He said that Price said he had no money, but he had some post-office drafts, and told him that if he, Kellogg, could arrange to get them cashed he would give him a certain portion of the money. I have an indefinite recollection that the amount was named as several thousand dollars—four or five thousand, I think. He said that he took the drafts; that there was an arrangement made to get them cashed, and that he got a portion of the money; but he insisted that he had had nothing to do with the origin of the drafts, or anything of that kind, and that it was merely a way of getting from a party, who was largely concerned and interested in his own State, a political contribution.

The CHAIRMAN. You have stated that you received a letter from the Attorney-General with regard to this matter.

Mr. BLISS. I received a letter from the Attorney-General asking me to see Mr. Kellogg. Mr. Kellogg brought it to me.

Q. Was that the time when the conversation with Kellogg occurred?—A. My recollection is that this was the time. The letter is not dated, and therefore I cannot absolutely fix the date, but my impression is that that conversation was at the time I received this letter. I happen to have the letter here if you want it.

The letter was read as follows :

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington.

MY DEAR MR. BLISS : See Mr. Kellogg, and oblige your friend,

B. H. BREWSTER.

I know the signature to be Mr. Brewster's, although it is not easy to recognize it. I have no doubt that Mr. Kellogg was pursuing the Attorney-General to such an extent that he was glad to get rid of him by sending him to anybody.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that statement made by Mr. Kellogg with a view to get the counsel to suspend the prosecution?

The WITNESS. What statement do you refer to?

The CHAIRMAN. That the money was used not for his personal benefit, but for political purposes?

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Chairman are you not as competent to judge of that as I am?

Examination of Mr. MERRICK continued.

By Mr. FYAN :

Q. What were the circumstances that induced Mr. Bliss to make these declarations?—A. These declarations were made by Mr. Bliss in our intercourse as counsel in the same case.

Mr. BLISS. The fact is that I told you that as indicating what I thought would be Kellogg's defense.

The WITNESS. My impression is Mr. Bliss is correct in that statement.

Q. Did he give that as one reason why Kellogg should not be indicted?—A. Oh, no, sir. Mr. Kellogg was indicted, if I am not mistaken, at the time this conversation occurred.

Mr. BLISS. I think not.

The WITNESS. Yes; he had been indicted.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. My question was whether the statement was made for the purpose of determining whether he should be indicted or not, or prosecuted.—A. I think he had been indicted at the time.

Q. Was there any disposition on the part of yourself or your associate counsel to suspend proceedings or to quash the indictments in that case on the ground of this supposed defense?—A. None whatever that I know of, upon that ground.

Q. None on your part?—A. None whatever, sir.

Q. You have spoken about the co-operation which you had from the Attorney-General and Mr. Woodward and Mr. Lyman. I see in the New York Times a report of an interview purporting to have been held with you, in which this language is attributed to you:

There are some leading men who have been in sympathy with the thieves, and who have obstructed my course, and embarrassed my action, and sought to influence the administration of justice in every way, to allow the indicted scoundrels to escape. I have heard that Kellogg threatened to tell all about the transactions of 1876 in Louisiana. I do not know that he has made this threat, but I am certain that he could tell a great deal if he would that certain persons I could name would not like to hear.

State, if you please, whether leading men in official station did use any influences, so far as you know, to obstruct the administration of justice in this case?—A. Well, Mr. Chairman, that is a difficult question for me to answer. I probably said something like what is reported there. I may have said that I had my suspicions and my beliefs, but, whatever they may have been, they are hardly competent evidence; and if I had any fact I would give it to you cheerfully. No leading man ever approached me about the matter, nor any man who was not leading—no man at all that I know of ever did so. I see that Mr. Walsh has said in his testimony, somewhere, that I stated that Mr. Chandler had been to see me about this case; that he heard it from somebody who had heard it from somebody else, probably. I never said anything of the kind; never. Mr. Chandler never opened his mouth to me upon the subject. Mr. Walsh also stated in his testimony that I had said to him (Walsh) that Mr. Bliss and Mr. Kellogg had had a meeting at Mr. Chandler's house. He is altogether mistaken. I never said anything of the kind, to the best of my recollection, and I certainly never knew of anything of the kind. The air was filled with all sorts of rumors of every kind and description, which were coming to me all along, but I had no knowledge of any fact.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Had you any reason to believe that any official connected with the Government here in Washington cast any obstruction in the way of the prosecution of these star-route cases?—A. Well, "reason" is a very broad term. There is no fact within my knowledge—within my personal knowledge—which I can state to the committee that would form the basis for such a conclusion.

Q. It is an open secret, I suppose, that Mr. Kellogg was quite busy against Mr. Arthur and his administration because he was under the impression that he had been very much persecuted, and whether any of the members of the administration were trying to help him is what I am trying to find out from you, or whether you had any reason to suspect that they were doing so?—A. Well, if I knew any fact upon the subject of course I would give it to the committee, but I know of no fact.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Then the statement in this interview, to the effect that leading men had been in sympathy with the thieves and had obstructed your course and embarrassed your action, was based upon rumors that came to you, and upon hearsay, which you do not regard as testimony?—A. Mr. Chairman, we lawyers all understand that we and other people, all mankind in fact, do take up impressions, and sometimes very erroneous impressions, and that when asked to give in detail on the witness-stand a reason for those impressions, it becomes extremely difficult to do so. At the time of the first trial of the Dorsey case, the atmosphere was filled with the belief that the administration did not desire the conviction of Mr. Dorsey. We all understood that. Colonel Bliss in his communications with me subsequent to that, frequently said that we would have a better atmosphere at the next trial.

Mr. BLISS. We did have.

The WITNESS. And when the next trial came on a number of individuals were removed from office, at Mr. Bliss's suggestion, who had been supposed to be in sympathy with these defendants. At the first trial, Mr. Helm, who held a position under the Public Printer, was also, as we understood, an editor of the Critic, which paper was most virulent, unpardonably virulent, in its attacks upon the court and upon the counsel and witnesses for the Government. I called Mr. Bliss's attention to the matter two or three times, and told him that that man ought to be removed, and in an interview in his room one evening the discussion between us became a little excited. I told him that he as a friend of the President ought to go to the President and have the man put out. Mr. Bliss said it could not well be done, and it was not done.

Mr. BLISS. It was done.

The WITNESS. It was not done during the first trial. It was done just before the second.

Q. Was there any discussion between the counsel as to the propriety of removing the district attorney, Colonel Corkhill?—A. Never with me. I do not think I ever had any discussion with any of the counsel upon that subject; none that I recollect.

Q. Did you desire, as counsel for the Government, that there should be any change in that office, so as to have a district attorney more in harmony with the prosecution than Colonel Corkhill was supposed to be?—

A. Well, I can hardly answer that. All that matter had been fully settled, as I understood, when I came into the case. I think it had been a matter of controversy before the case was first brought on for trial with the counsel then in the case—before I entered it—but when I came in I accepted the situation as I found it, and that situation was this: That the district attorney was to have nothing to do with the cases, and I think he had nothing to do with them at all. I was never brought in contact with him in the conduct of the cases, and his remaining in office or his removal was never a subject of consideration with me.

Q. Colonel Bliss, and, I think, some other witnesses, have referred to the fact that in serving the processes of the court in the star-route cases you could not rely upon the United States marshals. What do you say about that?—A. My impression is that Colonel Bliss mentioned that subject to me.

Mr. BLISS. Not the marshals here, but the marshals generally.

Q. I do not mean here in the District of Columbia, I mean throughout the country.—A. Mr. Bliss did mention that subject to me. He had charge of the business of serving the processes, and, now that you have recalled the subject to my mind by mentioning the word "marshals," I will say that there was one of the officials that I did think ought to be removed. I speak of the marshal of the District of Columbia at the time of the first trial. I thought he ought to be removed during the first trial; I thought he ought to be removed because he had been openly in sympathy with the defendants, and went out West and made a publication against Mr. Bliss, assailing him in the most violent and personally abusive manner.

Mr. BLISS. That was after the trial.

The WITNESS. No; it was not. I think it was during the trial. I thought that an attempt to demoralize the counsel was certainly an attempt to demoralize the case, and, when abuse was heaped upon one of my associates, I immediately took it up; not from any particular personal feeling for them, but because I felt that it was an attack upon my case. I did it in court and out of court.

Q. Who was this marshal?—A. Mr. Henry.

Q. Was he removed on that account?—A. I do not remember what the removal was made for.

Mr. BLISS. The postmaster and the assistant postmaster here were removed also, and the postmaster, in revenge for it, subsequently got himself appointed chairman of the State convention in Michigan and insisted that no resolutions in favor of the administration should be passed. The marshal, the foreman of the Congressional Record, and one other, whose name I do not remember, were removed on my written request.

The WITNESS. That was done after the first trial, and just before the second.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Then you did find yourself, in the particulars you have mentioned, obstructed by persons in the service of the Government of the United States in the prosecution of this case, at least so far as the influence of public sentiment against the prosecution was concerned?—A. Public sentiment in the District of Columbia was very much influenced in some way against the prosecution from the start—the atmosphere around the court-room—and it was generally thought that the administration did not desire the conviction of Mr. Dorsey or of Mr. Kellogg. I do not know whether that was true or not true, as to their desire; but that idea was abroad in the community, and the defendants tried to impress that belief upon everybody about the court-house.

Q. That the administration was against the prosecution?—A. That the administration was against the prosecution.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Against the prosecution of the two individuals you have mentioned?—A. Of the two individuals I have mentioned. I fought against that impression in my closing argument in both cases, I think. I paid tribute to the administration for the earnestness with which they were prosecuting men who were so closely identified with them in political relations. I know nothing whatever about the feelings or views upon this subject of the individuals composing the administration, except the Attorney-General, for I have never talked with any of them on the subject. I think I have probably passed a remark or two with the Secretary of State, from which I was satisfied that he was earnestly in favor of attaining the ends of justice.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. I notice that on page 456 of the record of this investigation, Mr. Walsh says that at the time of his interview with you, to which you have referred, when he told you what he knew, he puts this language into your mouth, speaking of Mr. Bliss: "He never told me of it. He has suppressed it all; and with that evidence, Mr. Walsh, the case that is now pending in court against Dorsey, Brady, and others, and which is in extremis, with that evidence we can achieve success." The point to which I wish to call your attention is, whether you told him that the case against Dorsey and Brady was in extremis?—A. I do not think I used that expression. I may have told him that the case in its then condition did not present a very favorable appearance, or something of that sort; but I used no such extreme expression as in extremis. As I told the committee on yesterday, when these various records were brought in and presented to the jury, it was very difficult for an ordinary mind to find in those records the bands that united the parties in the conspiracy. All that material was in the record, full and complete, but you will bear in mind that the conspiracy (which was the charge in the indictment) was a thing to be primarily established before you could prove any of the individuals to be conspirators. Whatever amount of fraud you might prove, whatever amount of ordinary criminality you might establish as to any of the respective individuals, or as to all of them, would have been unavailing unless you could have brought them together in harmony and in concert in the perpetration of that fraud by a common effort and for a common benefit, as co-conspirators. The general impression was that the court was extremely adverse to the prosecution, upon the ground that the evidence thus far presented was not sufficient, particularly not sufficient to involve Mr. Brady. In that condition of the case I told Mr. Woodward that I must have some further proof, and I said to him, I remember distinctly, "Now is the time, and I must have it." Then it was that Mr. Walsh came forward, and I probably explained to Mr. Walsh that condition of the case. And, as I said on yesterday, when we offered Mr. Walsh upon the stand, and offered to prove by him what he subsequently testified to, an argument arose as to its admissibility, and that argument gave us an opportunity to develop fully to the jury the relations between these several parties by the records, which therefore had been a mass of confusion, and Walsh's testimony cast a light that made the bands that bound the conspirators together visible to the dimmest eye.

Q. To the unprofessional eye?—A. Yes, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. There is one more question that I desire to ask you. Colonel Bliss testified before this committee in regard to the proposal to compromise some of these cases by an arbitration, and he said that he called upon you after the Mitchell grand jury had ignored the bills in the Parker, Salisbury, and other routes, and suggested the propriety of arbitrating those cases. Please state now what occurred between you and Colonel Bliss in regard to the matter of the arbitration of the civil suits growing out of the star-route cases.—A. The subject has been brought to my attention by one or two inquiries of late and by Colonel Bliss's testimony, and I have endeavored to recall, as well as I could, all that occurred connected with that matter. In the first place, I did not regard myself as counsel in those civil suits at all. They were matters with which I had nothing to do. In the second place, Colonel Bliss had exclusive charge of preparing the testimony in all the cases for the grand jury, as he himself has said, and of presenting that evidence to the grand jury. I remember that upon one occasion during the first trial of the Dorsey-Brady case after the adjournment of the court when Colonel Bliss and I were walking down from the court-house to the Post-Office Department (I think he had just come from the grand jury), he said to me: "In these Salisbury and Parker cases the grand jury will not indict, and I have a proposition from Mr. Ingersoll to submit"—not to arbitrate, but to submit the cases—"to submit the liability of these parties to the Government for money due to Mr. Elmer, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General (I think it was), Mr. Ingersoll, and myself." I replied, if I recollect aright, "That is a very good tribunal for the Government, and if the grand jury are not going to indict, it would be very well to obtain if possible a few hundred thousand dollars, for it will be something in case we fail to convict." "Well," said he, "they are not going to indict," and my impression is that he said that the evidence in the criminal cases was very weak. I knew nothing about the cases at all.

Q. Was the grand jury still in session?—A. The grand jury was in session. That is my decided impression, for the conversation was as to the future, as to what they would do. I see that Colonel Bliss has stated in his testimony that he came to see me afterwards upon the subject, and that we consulted and looked up authorities. I think Colonel Bliss must be mistaken.

Mr. BLISS. I don't think I said that we looked up authorities.

The WITNESS. That is the way I read your testimony.

Mr. BLISS. Well, I am very sure that we did not.

The WITNESS. Let me see what was said [referring to the testimony of Mr. Bliss on this point]. I see that Colonel Bliss also said in his testimony, pages 200 and 201, that in the Salisbury cases no sufficient papers were on file. I think that in this interview, to which I have referred as taking place when we were walking from the court-house, or at his room, Colonel Bliss stated to me that the difficulty in those cases was that the contracts were not taken in the names of the parties who were really guilty, but were taken in the names of some of their subordinates, and that there would be difficulty in showing the real beneficiaries of the contracts or the real parties in interest, the contracts having been thus taken in the names of nominal parties. He has stated here, as I have just said, that he came to my house and consulted with me upon the subject, and, as I recollect his statement, that we examined some authorities. I do not recollect any occasion when Colonel Bliss came to my house at night, or in the day either, and consulted with me upon that subject, or when we discussed it together. I think he must have been mistaken about that; he must have been thinking of some one else with whom he talked upon the subject, for I am positive he did not come to my house and consult with me about it.

Q. Was there anything said at the interview to the effect that one grand jury had ignored the bill?—A. I do not think there was, at that interview. But he subsequently informed me that one grand jury had ignored the bill. And, in view of the fact that the grand jury had failed to indict, and of what I learned from him of the case, believing that he had done his full duty in presenting it to the grand jury and had used all the evidence he could command—and have no reason to believe to the contrary—I thought the submission of the case to such a tribunal was a judicious thing, and I was afterwards extremely anxious, when we did fail to convict, that it might be carried out. Had I consulted with Colonel Bliss afterwards upon the subject I should have suggested to him what was quite familiar to me, the proper way of carrying the submission out. Mr. Ker, I believe, has said in his testimony that it could not be done, but there was an easy way of doing it. They had only to draw up an agreement that the case should be submitted to those three people; then let the defendants go into court in a suit and have an order of court under the Maryland statute (which is in force in this District), referring the case to those three men. Then their award would stand on the record of the court as a judgment. That is not an arbitration; it is a submission, under the rule of the court.

Q. But that is not what was done in this case?—A. I do not know what was done. That is the way it could have been carried out. I also, however, suggested to Colonel Bliss that he had better get a bond, and I was anxious that everything should be done to comply with whatever the court would require.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. You were not consulted as counsel in reference to that matter?—A. I had no relation to the civil cases whatever, as Colonel Bliss is perfectly aware.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Are you certain that when this matter of arbitration was first broached the cases were still pending before the grand jury?—A. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, what was before the grand jury. I can only tell you what Mr. Bliss said to me, to the best of my recollection.

Q. Did he say that the grand jury would not indict or had not indicted?—A. He said, "The grand jury are not going to indict," or "will not indict"—I think his expression was "are not going to indict." I suppose that he had come to that conclusion from being with the grand jury and seeing them. He knew what they were doing, and he could have judged what they were going to do.

Mr. BLISS. I had notice from them that they were not going to indict. They were still in session. On referring to my testimony I find that I did say that we consulted authorities on the subject at Mr. Merrick's house. I think I was wrong in that. I do not think we did consult any authorities there.

The WITNESS. You were wrong in saying that you came there to consult about it. I certainly never saw the paper which is called the arbitration paper.

Mr. BLISS. Oh, no; you never saw it, of course.

The WITNESS. Well, if we had consulted about the matter I certainly should have seen it.

Mr. BLISS. It had not been drafted at that time.

The WITNESS. Well, if we had consulted about it, it would have been drafted before we separated.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did Colonel Bliss suggest to you at any interview that the grand jury had already ignored those bills, and that the attorneys for the accused had not yet learned that fact, and that therefore before they learned it would be a good time to procure an agreement from them to submit the matter to arbitration?—A. Your question, Mr. Chairman, supposes an interview after the ignoring of the bills.

Q. Yes.—A. I have already said that I do not recollect any interview after that. I think that in this same interview which we had while casually walking down he did make the suggestion, "They are not going to indict, and I had better close it up before the other side know what has transpired."

Q. Was that the only interview at which conversation was had between you with regard to the proposed arbitration?—A. That is the only interview that I can recollect in reference to the arbitration and its organization. We had some conversations afterward about its not being proceeded under, and Mr. Bliss complained of the negligence of the Department of Justice, or the Post-Office Department, in not proceeding to do something; but it was a matter that I was not interested in at all, for I was not counsel in those cases.

Q. In the conversation that occurred upon the street as you and he were walking along, did Colonel Bliss leave the impression upon your mind that he was disappointed at the action of the grand jury, or that the evidence was so weak that it would not have justified them in finding an indictment?—A. Mr. Chairman, I have given you the fact as fully as I can recollect it; now, do not ask me for impressions; it would be very difficult to give them to you.

Q. Did he say that he was surprised that the grand jury would not indict?—A. No; he expressed no surprise, as I recollect the conversation.

By Mr. FVAN:

Q. He did say, though, that it was a weak case?—A. He said that the testimony was very weak, or insufficient, or something of that kind—pretty much as he has testified here.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Colonel Bliss was asked with regard to the Ottman case. What advice did you give, if any, as to the manner in which that case might be settled by the Government? Do you remember having had an interview with him about that?—A. What does the Colonel say about that?

Q. He says, I think, that he called upon you among others, and had some conversation with you. Do you remember that?—A. The fact is this: Colonel Bliss did speak to me about that case, and I remember the occasion and the place. It was in a parlor at the Arlington. He had the papers before him, and he said that he had that case to settle, or do something with, and asked me what I thought about it. I told him that I had been counsel for Ottman, and of course I could not say anything about it; but I did not think the Government would ever convict Ottman.

Q. Did you state anything about whether any part of the money should be returned?—A. Oh, no; not a word.

Q. Was there any statement made to the effect that the money could be recovered by the Government?—A. I do not think I had anything to say about that, at all. I do not recollect what the Colonel has stated about it, but I do not think I said anything on that subject.

Mr. BLISS. I do not remember my testimony about that; I remember my report. I remember that I said there, "Mr. Merrick says that Ottman cannot be convicted," or something of that kind, and then something to the effect that I thought that he thought the money was the money of the Government, but that he had not said anything about that.

The WITNESS. Of course I would not have said anything upon that subject, Mr. Chairman, either here or anywhere else, because I had been Ottman's counsel.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. On page 479, Mr. Walsh in his testimony, alluding to you (Mr. Merrick), says: "I regret very much that Mr. Merrick's memory is so defective." That was apropos to the statement that you had said to him, Walsh, that Mr. Bliss and Mr. Kellogg had met him at Mr. Chandler's house, and Walsh says "he did say that Mr. Bliss had betrayed the interests of the Government." You have read the testimony of Mr. Walsh on that point; please state whether you said anything of that kind.—A. My recollection is not very distinct of what may have passed in my first interview with Walsh at the Arlington, when he disclosed to me the evidence which he said he had given before the grand jury in reference to Kellogg; that is, my recollection is not very distinct as to the expressions that may have been used. I was quite surprised that I had never learned from my associate of that evidence, supposing it to have been given to the grand jury as Walsh told it to me, and in the conversation with him I accepted his statement as entirely true. It is possible, therefore, that I may have used such an expression; but if I did, it was used in this way: "If that is the case, Mr. Walsh, if your grievance is correctly stated by you, if you did say all this to the grand jury, and Mr. Bliss did not act upon it, then he certainly has betrayed the interests of the Government." If I made any such statement, it was to that effect. I do not mean to say that I did say so; but, if I did use those expressions, it was most likely in that connection.

Mr. Ker, in his statement, page 528, discusses with considerable freedom what transpired between counsel, which I thought was not evidence, and I think so still; but at the bottom of the page he says this:

Mr. Merrick was very much excited, and he said, "Are you going up?"—meaning up toward the hotel. I said, "Yes." I walked with him out through the corridor, and he said to me in a very excited manner, "What do you suppose that man wants?" I said, "Who?" He said, "Bliss." I said, "I don't know; what does he want?" "Well," said he, "he wants me to let Dorsey go." Said I, "What does he mean by that?" "Why," said Mr. Merrick, "he wants to let Dorsey escape. He says he can convict the rest, but to let Dorsey go." I said that probably Colonel Bliss had only thrown that out as a suggestion as to what would be expedient. "No," said Mr. Merrick, "he means it."

What is your recollection as to any such conversation as that having taken place?—A. I do not recollect any such conversation; and I will add that I am very confident that no such conversation as Mr. Ker there states, or as is reported there, ever took place between him and me. I may have said to him (for our relation was quite close, and I had told him that if he went out of the case I would go too), "I want you in the case." I wanted him not, as he put it, for the purpose of watching Bliss, but I wanted him in the case because I thought he was useful, and I wanted him in it because I thought it was possible that an issue might arise, as it ultimately did arise between Mr. Bliss and myself, and in such a contingency I did not want to stand alone, and I knew that Mr. Ker would in all probability go with me, as he did in the Kellogg transaction. Our intercourse was free, our conversations were free, and criticisms were passed in the confidence of that relation. Mr. Ker himself, I think, desires to correct the statement as it stands in your record, and if he will take it in his hand now and make the correction, he and I may not differ very widely about the conversation, although I regret exceedingly that these private interviews have been brought to public notice.

Mr. KER. (Referring to the record.) There is a slight inaccuracy in the statement of the conversation, and the way it should be corrected is this: From the statement "He wants me to let Dorsey go," the word "me" should be stricken out and the word "wants" is to be inserted after "but," so that the statement will read, "Why, said Mr. Merrick, he wants to let Dorsey escape; he says we can convict the rest, but wants to let Dorsey go." With that change I stand by the record.

Mr. STEWART. I do not see that that varies the statement much.

The WITNESS. Yes, sir; it varies it a good deal. Now, it is possible that some such conversation may have taken place, and I am not prepared to deny that some such conversation did take place. By "some such conversation" I mean this: Mr. Bliss and I were in consultation almost every day as to what was transpiring, and as to the progress of the case, and he remarked to me on one or two occasions that if we had Dorsey out of the case we could easily convict the rest. Now, in excuse for that expression of opinion by him, or in justification of it, I will say that a good deal of the testimony that was bearing directly upon Dorsey was ruled out by the court, and it may have been that on one occasion I did say to Mr. Ker, "Mr. Bliss wants to let Dorsey go," or "wants Dorsey out of the case," because, as I have said, this suggestion or remark that if Dorsey were out we could easily convict the rest was made to me by Mr. Bliss two or three times, probably. I had my own impressions, and had my own opinions. I knew that Mr. Bliss bore very intimate and close political, and I thought personal, relations to Mr. Dorsey—I do not know that they were personal, but very intimate political relations, as he has testified here to himself. My mind was excited also by various rumors, which I will not repeat, but which, whether they were correct or not, necessarily produced some impression. Whatever impression they were calculated to produce adverse to my associates I endeavored to fight off, for the reason that I was warned by Mr. Woodward that there was a systematic attempt on the part of the defendants to produce disturbance and discord among the counsel for the Government, and that attempt I believe took the direction principally of an effort to create in me distrust for my associates. As this matter has been opened up, I must be frank with the committee and say that, whilst I did not believe that Mr. Bliss would be delinquent in the performance of his duty at all, at the time of the interview of which I am speaking—and by that I do not mean to exclude other times, or to say that I held a contrary belief at other times—whilst I did not believe that Mr. Bliss would be delinquent in his duty, yet I believed that in his heart he did desire that Dorsey might not be convicted. That desire may have been the desire of an honest man determined to perform his full duty; yet, whilst he did perform it, still wishing that the result might not be achieved, though he put forth every effort to achieve it. I know of no testimony in relation to Dorsey that Mr. Bliss could have brought forward. I know of nothing that Mr. Bliss did in the trial, no affirmative act that he did, to protect Dorsey. He made no proposition to me that Dorsey should be allowed to escape. It is true that when the trial came to a close, and when we were in the midst of the argument, Mr. Bliss, possibly by inadvertence, in his closing argument omitted Dorsey. That was adverted to by the counsel on the other side, and, as you will see from my argument, I said, speaking of the conspirators:

We will bring you together in 1877. S. W. Dorsey, of whom my learned brother was so fond of speaking as Senator Dorsey, was there at the council board, the presiding genius of the robber band, using these lower and lesser men for his own ends, as he was obliged to use somebody, because he wore the robe of office which he could not soil without danger in the open field. He had to use other means. His pockets were open, but other hands were to be thrust into the public purse. I will not call him Senator Dorsey. He is not a Senator. He is an ex-Senator. I do not choose to use that dignified term of designation, applicable to one of the highest offices in my Government, in speaking of a man standing in the criminal dock of a criminal court. And, if Mr. Bliss did not speak of S. W. Dorsey, I will, and I will track him and follow him, and I will show you who his companions were, and who his company was, and where they met and what they did.

Q. Was that at the first trial?—A. This was at the first trial. At the same time an unfortunate incident transpired that has been developed here in the evidence. By an error of some sort, possibly whilst I was on my feet making my argument, an interview was published in a Canada paper in which Mr. Bliss was represented as saying that the testimony against Dorsey was very weak.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what the interview said.

Mr. BLISS. I think not. I think the statement attributed to him in the interview was that the case against Dorsey was not so strong as that against somebody else.

The WITNESS. The part of my argument which I have quoted appears on page 2793 of the record of the first trial. My argument closed on the 28th of August. On the 24th of August, the following had appeared in the New York Herald, as I am informed, as an account of an interview with Mr. Bliss:

Dropping politics, the conversation glided to the star-route trials, and Colonel Bliss was asked what he thought of Colonel Bob Ingersoll's claim that the Government had no case.

"Mr. Ingersoll, I think," he replied, "will find out before the trials are over that the cases contained a good deal of meat for the Government. The one against Mr. Dorsey, defended by the brilliant colonel, is admitted to be the weakest of the lot, but in all the others a verdict for the prosecution is confidently looked for, and even that may be decided in the same way."

Subsequently, on the 26th of August, according to Ker's statement here, that interview was corrected as follows:

To the Editor of the Herald:

I have not at hand the Herald containing the interview with me, but your editorial of to-day indicates either that you misapprehend its purport or your reporter has failed to report me accurately. I have never by word or thought questioned ex-Senator Dorsey's prominence in the route conspiracy. I have only said that, owing to the exclusion of testimony by the court, the case proved was not as strong against Dorsey as against others.

GEORGE BLISS.

These publications were called to my attention at the time, and to the attention of the Attorney-General. I regretted them very much indeed and they reflected back in my mind upon the impressions that I had previously had; for in my judgment was, on the first case as well as in the last, although there was some evidence against Dorsey which was excluded by the court, that the testimony against Dorsey which was in the case was as strong, or stronger, than that against any other of the defendants; and, as a taunt had been thrown out by the counsel on the other side that my associate had not made mention of Dorsey's name, I made Stephen W. Dorsey the subject-matter of my argument, and claimed then, as I have just shown you from the extract I have read, as I have claimed throughout, and as I now believe the fact to be, that he was the originator and the center of the scheme, its inspiring genius, and its master and teacher.

Mr. BLISS. Did not I in my opening describe Dorsey just in that way?

The WITNESS. I think that in Colonel Bliss's opening statement to the jury he did describe Dorsey in the same way. In that opening statement he said, if I mistake not, that he regarded Dorsey as the center of the conspiracy. That was before the evidence was taken. I only say that there was a taunt thrown out against me, or against the case, because Colonel Bliss had not mentioned Dorsey when he came to sum up before the jury. The Attorney-General was very much disturbed about the publication of this interview, and about the condition of things generally in reference to the Dorsey case, and he immediately went to work to prepare himself to make a statement of the specific instances in which Stephen W. Dorsey appeared in the star-route transactions, and I think the Attorney-General's argument collected together seventy or eighty or ninety separate occasions in which Dorsey's name was mentioned in the evidence in the case. The Attorney-General and I discussed the subject fully between ourselves, and discussed also this interview with Mr. Bliss, Mr. Bliss's relations to the transaction, and the question of the arguments that ought to be made to meet the exigency that had arisen; and Mr. Ker is wrong in saying that except for the Attorney-General's closing speech the case would have gone to the jury without their knowing anything about Stephen W. Dorsey from the arguments, because my speech was made before the Attorney-General's, and if, when next Lent comes around, you gentlemen want to do some penitential service, and will undertake to read that speech, you will see that when I got through the jury knew pretty well all there was about Dorsey.

Before I conclude, as I suppose there are no other questions which you gentlemen wish to ask me, allow me to say a single word in relation to the letter which I addressed the Attorney-General, withdrawing from the case, and in which I said: "The most important of these cases in which it is likely any further action will be taken by the Government is the case of the United States against William Pitt Kellogg." There are a number of indictments still pending. There are indictments against parties in what are called the straw-bond cases, indictments against parties for perjury, and for one thing and another of an insignificant character. As to the straw-bond cases, allow me to say that, as far as I have been able to learn, the Government sustained no actual loss by those bonds, except, possibly, in the case of Boone, and that loss, I think, was made up by deductions, and Boone was accepted as a Government witness, and is entitled to immunity as to the indictments pending against him.

Mr. BLISS. They have been nolled.

The WITNESS. Yes; they have been nolled. Colonel Bliss suggested to me in one or two communications during the past winter that we should look up those cases and be prepared to do our duty in trying them, but I told him that I did not agree with him. I had also a conference with the Attorney-General, in which I told him that I did not think it was worth while for special counsel, at a large compensation, to be trying cases of that character—cases which were within a narrow compass—and which could well be tried by the district attorney, and that I thought he had better turn them over to the district attorney, or, for the present at least, let them alone. After having used my best endeavors, and failed, to secure the ends of justice against great criminals, I did not choose to come down to the business of searching for mousing owls.

Mr. FYAN. There was a question which Mr. Merrick declined to answer yesterday, and upon which it is desirable that the committee should make some kind of ruling. Mr. Merrick was asked whether, when Mr. Bosler was here under a subpoena duces tecum, anybody approached him (Merrick) for the purpose of having Bosler discharged, and he answered that somebody did, but refused to give the name. I believe I am correct in that statement, Mr. Merrick?

The WITNESS. Yes; in substance you are. I stated what had transpired in the interview with that gentleman. I said that it was a matter of no earthly importance to anybody in the world, and contained no substance whatever except what I then stated.

Mr. FYAN. Its importance might depend upon whether that party wanted to get Mr. Bosler away from here in order to deprive you of certain information which Mr. Bosler could give you. If that was the object, then it might be of some significance.

The WITNESS. Oh, I did not understand that there was any such purpose or design whatever. Mr. Bosler was here on subpoena, and thought he was unreasonably detained, and Mr. Bosler did not desire to have the private records in his books exposed to public view. The object was to guard against a possible obtrusion into his private records, and I assured the gentleman that no private records should be interfered with in any way, and that all I wanted of Mr. Bosler was those papers. That was all there was of it.

The CHAIRMAN. In reference to the point raised by Judge Fyan, he has suggested that the question whether you should be required to give the name shall be considered by the committee in executive session. The committee will, therefore, consider the question, and, if they determine that you ought to give the name, we will inform you of that fact and ask you to do so.

The WITNESS. I have already stated that there was nothing said in the interview which indicated any desire to deprive the court of any legitimate testimony that Mr. Bosler might be able to give, nor was there anything from which I could draw that inference.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did Colonel Bliss object to Mr. Ker going before the grand jury in the Kellogg case?—A. He did not. I do not think that Colonel Bliss was aware of the fact at the time Mr. Ker did go.

Mr. BLISS. Yes; I was.

The WITNESS. Well, I never said anything to Mr. Bliss upon the subject.

Q. Did Colonel Bliss, after the indictment of Kellogg, interfere to prevent the prosecution of the case?—A. So far as I know, he did not.

Q. Did he not go into court, and earnestly take part in some of the motions after the indictment was found?—A. He did.

Mr. BLISS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make some reply to testimony that has been given here since I testified. There have been certain new statements introduced here affecting me, and the arrangement—I use the word designedly—the arrangement by which, early in the session, it was determined that an attempt should be made to unload upon me has been developed a little more. I propose to meet it. I propose to put in my own statements. I propose to put in some letters which people seem to have forgotten.

The WITNESS. I did not hear what Colonel Bliss has just said.

Mr. BLISS. There was nothing in what I said that referred to Mr. Merrick at all. I have no fault to find with the way in which Mr. Merrick has given his testimony.

The chairman informed Mr. Bliss that the committee would be prepared to hear him on Wednesday next, June 18.

During a break in the examination of Mr. Merrick, Mr. Bliss, under the impression that the examination had closed, made the following statement:

Mr. BLISS. As Mr. Ker and Mr. Merrick are both here, there is one thing that I want to call their attention to. On page 530 of this record Mr. Ker speaks of the interview with me which appeared in the New York Herald in August, 1882, and sets it forth in his testimony. Then the editorial is given, and my correction, and then Mr. Ker says (page 532):

When Mr. Wilson got up to address the jury he proceeded with great rapidity to read to the jury Colonel Bliss's interview, which I have quoted here; and also the editorial in the Herald. Of course the Attorney-General jumped up at once and protested against that being read to the jury. Mr. Wilson argued the point to the court. Of course that is another thing which you gentlemen very well understand, that when the court stops a lawyer who is offering something that ought not to go to the jury, the lawyer can argue the matter with the court, and tell the court what it was that he was going to tell the jury, so that the jury will get the benefit of it just as much as if he were talking to them. In this case Mr. Wilson said in a very innocent way, "I only wanted to show that Colonel Bliss, one of the Government counsel, does not believe that Mr. Dorsey is guilty, and for that purpose I was reading from this interview with him in the New York Herald." That made the Attorney-General very angry, and he protested against either the reading of the interview or any argument or statement about it, and the court decided that Mr. Wilson could not be allowed to argue that question before the jury.

That is Mr. Ker's testimony, and now I want you gentlemen to see what the record shows on this point. I read from the record of the star-route trial, page 2884. Mr. Wilson there says:

My brother Merrick had a great deal to say about the newspapers, and he has told you a great deal about what the newspapers have said and are saying in regard to this case. Well, the newspapers, it happens, saw this very wide difference that existed between Mr. Merrick and Mr. Bliss upon this subject, and one of them went so far as to say that they were going to watch and see whether the learned Attorney-General was going to side with Bliss in saying that this was not much of a sprinkle so far as Dorsey was concerned, or whether he was going to side with Merrick and say that it was a flood so far as Dorsey was concerned. And that brought out this [taking up a newspaper slip]: "To the Alexandria——"

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL (interposing). Wait, wait. Is that proper, your honor?

The COURT. No.

Mr. WILSON. Never mind; I will pass it over. I thought that as so much liberty had been taken as to what the press had said that it would not be out of place for me to follow in the footsteps of my illustrious predecessors.

That is the record, as contrasted with the testimony of Mr. Ker here. Let me say, further, that I have been to the original stenographer's minutes, and I find that those minutes bear out the record fully; so that the statement made by Mr. Ker here is entirely manufactured; and, further, I am authorized by Judge Wylie to say that it is so.

Adjourned.

WASHINGTON, June 17, 1884.

HOWARD KEYWORTH sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. State your age, residence, and occupation.—Answer. I am forty years of age; I was born in Washington, and I reside here; I am at present in the grocery and liquor business.

Q. Were you at any time foreman of the grand jury in the city of Washington?—A. I was the clerk of one.

Q. What jury was that?—A. The one of which Mr. Mitchell was the foreman.

Q. Did you keep the records of that jury?—A. I did, sir.

Q. When did that jury assemble?—A. We met in June and were discharged until October, but we were called together again before that for a particular case.

Q. When were you called together for that particular case?—A. That I do not remember exactly; I think some time in June, 1882.

Q. What was the particular case that was investigated by that grand jury at that special session?—A. The Kellogg case.

Q. Did Mr. Bliss appear before that grand jury as district attorney on behalf of the United States?—A. Yes, sir; he was.

Q. Was there any presentment found by the grand jury at that special session?—A. There was not.

Q. Did the jury consider the case of the United States against William Pitt Kellogg?

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. You took evidence in the case, did you not?—A. Yes, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was Mr. Walsh before that jury?—A. He was.

Q. State whether Mr. Bliss made representations to the jury with regard to obtaining the attendance of James B. Price as a witness for the Government in that case; and, if so, what were those representations?—A. (After a pause.) I do not want to violate my obligations before the grand jury.

Q. I will read you what Mr. Hutchinson, the foreman of the grand jury, testified to here. The secrecy has been removed from this matter by the foreman and by the district attorney himself, and also by Mr. Merrick.—A. I don't know that would cover my obligation.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Do you think you should have conscientious scruples about telling what happened there if it serves the ends of justice?—A. I have no conscientious scruples about telling anything that happened there beyond the obligation of my oath. I took an oath not to divulge the secrets of the grand jury, and I consider that binding upon me.

Q. You were instructed simply that you were to keep your counsel and the counsel of your fellows?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he explain to you the reason for keeping that secret?—A. He did not.

Q. Did he say anything about the possibility of the accused escaping if he was not under arrest, or about subjecting the members of the grand jury to unpleasant criticisms or violence on the part of persons accused?—A. I do not remember that he did. I do not remember anything of that kind. I do not remember whether it was the judge or the district attorney that enjoined secrecy upon us.

Mr. FYAN. It was a part of your oath to keep those secrets, but the obligation of that oath is released when you come here to testify. Mr. Hutchinson took counsel on the subject, and then came back and testified, and Mr. Bliss, the district attorney, has testified.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. You know, as a matter of fact, do you not, from what you have seen in the newspapers, that these gentlemen have given evidence here on this subject?—A. I saw something of Mr. Hutchinson's testimony, in which he said that Mr. Bliss had informed the grand jury that Mr. Price would be there; that was my understanding too.

Q. Mr. Walsh was examined before that grand jury, was he not?—A. He was.

Q. How long after the completion of Mr. Walsh's examination was it before you were relieved from further action in that case?—A. A day or two.

Q. Was anything said by anybody at the close of Mr. Walsh's testimony as to whether any additional witnesses would be summoned?—A. I do not remember what happened after Mr. Walsh's testimony was given. I do not remember now whether the remark with reference to Mr. Price was made before or after Mr. Walsh's testimony.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Did you adjourn over to wait for Mr. Price?—A. It is my recollection that we got through with the business and were dismissed.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Yes, you were dismissed after you got entirely through; but was there not an adjournment? How many cases were examined at that time?—A. I do not remember any other than this one.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Did Mr. Woodward, an inspector of the Post-Office Department, testify?—A. I do not remember any other witness but Mr. Walsh.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. You saw a lot of papers there?—A. Yes, sir; a good many.

Q. Were they notes, and checks, and post-office drafts?—A. I did not see them, but Mr. Walsh had some papers and things there.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. How many days were you in session?—A. I do not remember; only a day or two, though.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Did anybody say that the evidence of Mr. Walsh was not enough to warrant the finding of an indictment, together with the other evidence in the shape of papers? What did you do with the minutes that you kept during the time you were clerk of the grand jury?—A. I guess I tore them up.

Q. What for?—A. There was no further use for them. The proceedings of the grand jury are generally embodied in the return made.

Q. Did you not know that the grand juries here kept minutes—a regular record?—A. Not until we met the second time. I had no book to keep the minutes in the first session, or if I did they are in there. I know that as soon as I got the book I put the minutes down. At the first meeting we were all ignorant of the duties of the grand jury, and the first case we had was this case, and the minutes were kept on loose paper, and, there being no drawers or locks in the room, when we got through with the business I suppose I tore up the papers; I am quite certain I did.

Q. Did any other prosecuting attorney appear before you than Mr. Bliss?—A. I think Mr. Taggart was there.

Q. In connection with the Kellogg case?—A. I think he was. I am not certain that he was.

Q. Did Mr. Taggart have anything to do with that case?—A. I am not certain about Mr. Taggart being present. I get the two meetings mixed up.

Q. Is it not the fact that you were organized early in June and had a session, and that then you were called together specially afterwards?—A. We met and were called together in June, and were immediately discharged. I am satisfied that we did not do anything, but were discharged until October. Then we were called again in July.

Q. And this one case was presented for your consideration?—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Did you deliberate and come to a conclusion after hearing Walsh's testimony, or were you informed that there would be another witness after him? Were you told that Mr. Price would be before you? As a matter of fact did you not adjourn over that night until the next morning on the assurance of Mr. Bliss that Mr. Price would be before you as a witness in that case?—A. I really do not remember, sir.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. You haven't much recollection of what did happen, have you?—Yes; I have some recollection.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you remember that Mr. Price's name was mentioned?—A. Yes, sir; I do remember that—that he was to be there.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Who mentioned his name?—A. Mr. Bliss.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you remember that anything was said that indicated that Mr. Price was a material witness in the case?—A. It was my impression that he was so considered. I don't remember whether there was a remark made to that effect or not.

Q. But you got that impression?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know whether you adjourned, over night, to meet next morning, expecting Price to be present at that session, as stated by Mr. Hutchinson?—A. It is my impression now that we did adjourn to wait for this man, understanding that he was coming—that he was on his way, or would be there, or something of that kind.

Q. Who gave you that impression?—A. Mr. Bliss.

Q. Did Mr. Bliss give you any instruction as to the manner in which you should keep the records of that grand jury?—A. He did not, sir.

Q. Did he ask you to put them into a book?—A. He did not.

Q. Did he tell you that the minutes should be preserved?—A. He did not, sir. They would have been preserved if he had told me to preserve them.

Q. Then you had no instruction upon that subject, but you acted simply on your own judgment?—A. No instruction whatever. If I had, the minutes would be here to-day.

Q. But, having no instructions, and not knowing what to do, you tore them up?—A. I tore them up because I considered that they were matters belonging to the grand jury; that we had no place to keep them, and that the duty of the grand jury, so far as that case was concerned, was finished, by the report we made. When I got the book, I followed the way of my predecessor as well as I could. No notes were kept, merely a list of the witnesses, and the action of the grand jury—that a presentment was made, or that the case was ignored—one way or the other; that was the whole of the minutes in the book.

Adjourned.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 18, 1884.

GEORGE BLISS again appeared as a witness.

The CHAIRMAN. Before proceeding to hear Mr. Bliss's testimony, I desire to submit a letter to be incorporated as a part of the testimony of Mr. Merrick. I have just received the letter, and I presume it had better be added to his testimony, inasmuch as it is intended to modify or enlarge it.

The letter was read, as follows:

WASHINGTON CITY, June 16, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I beg leave to say that in my testimony before your committee I omitted to correct specifically one or two statements made in regard to me by witnesses, though I am quite confident that the matter is covered by general averments in regard to the subject.

At page 254 I find that Mr. Bliss says, referring to routes other than the Dorsey routes, that he "went over with him [Merrick] the evidence upon these other routes."

This is erroneous. No such thing occurred. He never went over the evidence with me in any other route than the Dorsey routes. I have nothing of this evidence except what I learned from him, and that was limited to what he told me of it in the conversation to which I have testified, when he spoke of the proposed submission and stated that the grand jury would not indict.

There are some other things that might be corrected, but I hardly think it necessary, in view of the fact that they are covered by my general testimony.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

R. T. MERRICK.

Hon. WM. M. SPRINGER.

The examination of Mr. BLISS was resumed.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee are now ready to hear whatever additional statement you desire to make, Mr. Bliss.

The WITNESS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether there went into the record on Saturday last the statement which I made here with reference to the testimony of Mr. Ker, which appears on page 530 of your record, as to the alleged attempt to get the bill of fare of the Dorsey dinner before the jury on the trial.

The CHAIRMAN. The stenographer informs me that it is in the record.

The WITNESS. Very well. In view of what the record of the trial shows on that point, the committee will see that the natural indignation of Mr. Stewart, the expression of which appears on page 532 of your record, as to the irregularity of that alleged proceeding before the court, was not called for, and that the implied reflection upon Judge Wylie, by supposing that he had allowed what Mr. Ker stated to be done, was not deserved, because in fact no such thing ever occurred as was testified to here by Mr. Ker. I have already called your attention to what the record shows on that point, and I have here the certificates of the stenographers that the record is absolutely correct in that respect, and that nothing such as is stated by Mr. Ker occurred. It is a little difficult, therefore, it seems to me, to reconcile Mr. Ker's elaborate statement, given in evidence here in great detail, with any theory that is consistent with an attempt to be accurate. We always knew, or we knew for a long while, during the trial, that it was almost impossible for Mr. Ker to be accurate as to dates, figures, or amounts. I have received a letter from Mr. Woodward, written since Mr. Ker's examination here, in which he says, "I have long known Ker to be inaccurate, perhaps from infirmity of hearing." We all knew that. There is another inaccuracy of another kind in Mr. Ker's statement here. On page 531 he says, referring to the bill of fare of the Dorsey dinner:

This bill of fare was exhibited by Mr. McSweeney to show that the President and the Attorney-General had favored Dorsey in the days of his influence. Of course Mr. McSweeney was not permitted to get the book into the case, but he made the attempt. It turned out that the book had been given to him by Mr. Bliss.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Was Mr. McSweeney counsel for one of the defendants?—A. He was one of the counsel for Dorsey, and he pulled this book, which belonged to Colonel Bliss, out of his pocket to show the jury that Colonel Bliss and these other gentlemen had attended this dinner that had been given to Dorsey.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was that in the argument of the case before the jury?—A. Yes.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. He did not show the book to the jury, did he?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he allude to it in his argument?—A. Yes. He was talking as rapidly as he could about Dorsey and about this dinner, and he just pulled out the book and showed it.

Q. That was entirely irregular, of course?—A. Yes, of course it was irregular.

Now, as to that, the answer I have to make is that Mr. Ker is again inaccurate; that that did not occur; that the record shows that in point of fact it did not occur. There is in the record, let me say, apparently a break of a line at that point, and, as it seemed a little incomplete, I took the pains to ascertain how that came about, and I found that that was the point at which one stenographer closed and another one commenced. Therefore I went and got the certificates of both the stenographers, the one who closed at that point and the one who succeeded him, that the record is correct.

As to that Dorsey dinner bill of-fare about which so much has been said, the fact about it is precisely this—that in that conversation which always occurs between counsel on a long trial, Mr. McSweeney said to me one day, “Colonel, I am going for you; you were at that Dorsey dinner, I understand, and I am going to warm you on it,” or some such expression as that, I cannot say exactly what it was, and I made some reply, I do not recall what; but I came to the conclusion that I would, as the phrase is, “copper” that reference by making a reference to the dinner myself. So I went home and got out the Dorsey dinner bill-of-fare (which the chairman now holds in his hand) and brought it down to court with me. I showed it to the counsel on our side, and then I showed it to Mr. Jere Wilson, one of the counsel on the other side, and it was passed round, and I think all the counsel on both sides saw it. Then it was taken up and showed to the judge, and there it was.

Q. Were all the guests named in this bill of fare present at the dinner?—

A. No, sir; they were not all present by a good deal. I got the book and kept it, as I supposed, in a bag in which we had all our papers, and which was brought into court every day with the papers and taken out with them; it was the bag that had performed the same service in connection with the Guiteau trial, a bag which belonged to the district attorney. I intended to make reference to the Dorsey dinner in the commencement of my closing speech, but some doubt arose in my mind as to the propriety of doing it then, and I passed it for the time, and thought the matter over, and came to the conclusion that I would do it near the close of my speech. But my close was a somewhat hurried one, because I wanted to catch the train. I think it was on Friday afternoon, and I was very desirous of catching the afternoon train, because I had just learned that my wife was very ill and that it was supposed that that she would not live a week. The knowledge of her condition had been kept from me until I got through my speech, or till they supposed I was through. They then informed me of it, and I closed very hurriedly, and did not make any reference to the Dorsey dinner. I went off and left that bill-of-fare here with the other papers. I don't know how it got into Mr. McSweeney's hands; I never gave it to him; I had nothing to do with his possession of it; it was not produced before the jury; I was hundreds of miles away when it was referred to, and when this transaction is alleged to have occurred, and there is no excuse for the insinuation made here by Mr. Ker that I gave the book to Mr. McSweeney. Mr. Ker first made the square statement that I had done so, and then toned it down into an insinuation to the same effect. All I have to say about it is that the book was here, and Mr. Ker was here, and that he is much more likely to have given it to Mr. McSweeney than I am, because he was on much more intimate terms with Mr. McSweeney than I was. I do not say that he did give Mr. McSweeney the book; I do not know how it got into Mr. McSweeney's hands; but I know that I had nothing to do with the matter.

Now, as to this alleged interview with me at Alexandria Bay, I never knew that I was being interviewed there. I did learn, however, that the son of a friend of mine, whom I remember to have met at Alexandria Bay, had talked with me about State politics, and probably there was something said about the star-route cases, and the "interview" was published, and it represented me as saying, "The one against Mr. Dorsey is admitted to be the weakest of the lot." That is the form of the statement as published in the interview. In fact, however, I never said anything of that kind; never thought anything of that kind in any manner. If it is thought necessary to produce any evidence on the question of fact as to whether the case against Dorsey was the weakest case, I think you can take Mr. Merrick's testimony upon that point. When I heard of this alleged interview, I telegraphed a dispatch to the Herald. I had then learned who had given the interview for publication, and I was disposed to be as mild with him as I could, but in my dispatch to the Herald I said:

I have never by word or thought questioned ex-Senator Dorsey's prominence in the route conspiracy. I have only said that, owing to the exclusion of testimony by the court, the case proved was not as strong against Dorsey as against others.

That undoubtedly was to a considerable extent the fact.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Who was this person who published the interview with you?—A. The son of Lieutenant-Governor Alvord, of New York.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. When did you bring that bill of fare here?—A. O, I brought that bill of fare here at least a month before the case closed.

Q. Was it after you had the conversation with Mr. McSweeney?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Not before?—A. No, sir; not before. He spoke of it in the way I have stated. This matter of the dinner and the bill of fare had been published, had been referred to in the newspapers, and had been commented upon in the Critic here from time to time, so that there was no secrecy about it at all.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was there any reference made to the fact that Kellogg was present at that dinner?—A. No, sir; and I do not think he was.

Q. I see his name on the list of guests.—A. Yes; his name is there, and so is the name of Senator Edmunds, and he certainly did not attend. That is a list, not of those who attended, but of those who were invited. A great many people were there who do not want to own up to it now; but I do not think Mr. Kellogg was at the dinner.

Q. Was Mr. Blaine there? I see his name on the list.—A. I think not.

Q. Was Mr. Logan?—A. I cannot tell you that, any more than I can tell you whether the future Democratic candidates for President and Vice-President were there.

Q. Their names are not on the list?—A. Their names were not on the list, and I have no doubt they regretted it.

Now, on page 534 of your record, Mr. Ker goes into the question of his dealing with witnesses and his getting witnesses here, and the general idea he seeks to convey is that he brought here on the second trial a good many new witnesses, and also that he drew from the old witnesses a good deal of additional information. As to that, let me say that on the 25th of September Mr. Brewster, not having then acted upon my request to be allowed to withdraw from the star-route case before the second trial, wrote me in response to a letter I had written him urging that he should act upon that question, as the preparation for the second trial ought to be made, and I have here his letter, written from Newport :

NEWPORT, N. J., September 25, 1882.

MY DEAR BLISS: Your note was handed to me at Albany by Mr. Sheppard.

In it you say that preparation should begin in order for the December trial. Pray get that on foot by giving proper directions to Mr. Ker or to some other person who can begin such preparation as is required. You know whom to direct. I do not. So do not let the case suffer for want of our preparation.

I would not on any account have us miss a trial in December. It will give great public dissatisfaction. As you may be occupied and unable to start and direct things for preparation, please to direct it to be done as soon as you think proper. I may not be in Washington for a month; I am worked out and need rest, and then, too, my own affairs, political, professional, and personal, in Pennsylvania, will require me to be in Philadelphia at least all of October.

I will be here for a week yet.

I am, truly, your friend, as ever,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER.

Colonel GEORGE BLISS,
New York.

On the 24th of October I received a letter from Mr. Ker from Washington, as follows :

MY DEAR COLONEL: The Attorney-General sent for me to come back here and assist in the bribery cases. I returned yesterday, but my assistance so far consists in looking on and waiting patiently.

I have been looking everywhere for the list of witnesses you were to leave for me. I have reached the conclusion that you took it along with you. Whenever you are ready send the list to me with the proper instructions and I will attend to it. You can send it either to the Ebbitt House or to the Department.

On the 25th of October I wrote to Mr. Ker as follows :

OCTOBER 25, 1882.

DEAR KER: I inclose you the list of witnesses. Those with an X are to be subpoenaed; those with an O definitely omitted. Post-office clerks, I presume, will not need subpoenas.

My idea would be to summon the witnesses on routes 34149, 38134, 38135, 38140, 38145, 38152, and 38156, for opening of the trial; on routes 35015, 35051, 38113, 40104, 41119, for about December 15, and rest for about December 20. As for mode of service I would to all the Colorado routes, except 38113, use James M. Semple, of Rico—

Mr. Semple, I think, must be the young lawyer Mr. Ker says he employed to get witnesses and whose name he did not care to give. If there was any other young lawyer employed I had no knowledge of it. Mr. Semple did the business and did it very well—

Ouray county, Colo., who served them before. On 38113, and 41119 Colonel Parker can doubtless arrange service for us. So in 46132 and 46247. On 35051 I would send to J. Pennell. On 34149 Grimes, the postmaster, who is himself a witness, will doubtless attend to it. So on 35015, Shaw. On 38145 Semple to serve. On 40104 Krider is a postmaster; came before on telegram and would doubtless do so again. It would be well if he could bring another witness familiar with geography, &c., with him. If there is any trouble about Krider, Tidball, the marshal, can arrange service. On the Oregon route B. B. Tuttle, who is post-office officer at Portland, served many before. Inspector Sharp in Washington knows about it. My idea would be to send all to Tuttle and authorize him to employ Fisk on 44155, McBean on 44160, if necessary, either one or both. Were there other Oregon routes? Haycock and Clendenning and Clayton, Colonel Parker can doubtless arrange for. Spencer I hope to have under arrest before trial.

Now as to funds, I don't mean to go into the business of advancing again to any extent. By President's order money should be advanced to the marshals at San Francisco, Portland, and Bismarck, and whoever serves the witnesses in these regions should be able to get from them the amounts necessary to advance to the witnesses. It appears that the post-office inspectors are bonded officers. Mulliken can tell you if there is any difficulty in advancing money to them. If there is not, Tuttle, at Portland, could receive the advance instead of the marshal, and the post-office inspector who goes to the California routes could receive the money instead of the marshal at San Francisco; and the inspector who goes to Utah and to 38113—I presume from Saint Louis—could receive the advance; otherwise the marshal at Saint Louis. Semple I “staked” before, and must probably do it again. The witnesses on 34149 and 35015 will probably need no advances, but if they do, it will easily be arranged. Krider will need no advance.

I will to-day write the Attorney-General about these money matters, and refer him to you.

I would send to Pennell some blank subpoenas, to be used in his discretion; also to Tuttle and to Semple. I would invite suggestions of other witnesses from French and Shaw.

As for witnesses not in the list, I remember that on 38156 some criticism was made because we had only three who drove in the summer, but Steinegger will probably cover that. On 38134 we tried to find Eli Hanson but failed. He had come East. My impression is we did not need him; he was the paid subcontractor. On 38135 one Ames was sought; he was a telegraph operator on Union Pacific Railroad. One of Semple's letters on file with Moore shows where. I have an impression it would be well to have him.

I left at the Arlington, addressed to you, a bundle containing the subpoenas and a copy of the record. There is another bundle of the record left there for Sloan last summer which he has not called for. Send for both.

I wrote the Attorney-General yesterday my views as to going out of the case.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE BLISS.

W. W. KER, Esq.

That contained a list of the witnesses. Mr. Ker, on page 537, makes a very incorrect statement as to the comparative number of witnesses on the first and on the second trials. He says that there were 77 witnesses examined for the Government on the first trial and 13 subpoenaed who were not examined. The record shows that there were 98 witnesses examined; the list is in the index in the third volume of the record of the trial, with the page where each witness's testimony begins. There were 98 witnesses examined instead of 77, as stated by Mr. Ker. He says that at the second trial there were 150 witnesses.

Mr. Ker makes a good deal of talk about the new witnesses that he obtained. The fact was, as I have said, that 98 witnesses were examined for the Government on the first trial and 121 on the second trial. Thirty who were examined on the first trial were not examined on the second. Thirty-three were examined on the second trial who were not examined on the first. The index shows the number of witnesses examined on both trials. As to those new witnesses who were produced on the second trial, I shall endeavor to show the committee just what the fact is. Rerdell became a witness on the second trial. There were 50 new witnesses examined on that trial who were not examined on the first, though the aggregate number of witnesses on the second trial was only 33 greater than the aggregate on the first trial. Twenty-seven of those new ones were witnesses who were made possible by Rerdell's testimony. Among them was Rerdell's wife; there was a Mrs. Cushman, there was a clerk at the Ebbitt House, there were some eight or ten Western Union Telegraph men who were brought from New York for the purpose of proving the destruction of a telegram, the substance of which we were prepared to prove, as to Dorsey. Twenty-seven of the new witnesses were made possible by Rerdell's testimony, and they were all got either by Rerdell or by myself. Eight of the new witnesses were clerks in the Department, who were called simply to produce and identify papers in the place of 12 other clerks who had been called on the former trial but were not called on this one, the Department having simply sent one clerk instead of another with the papers that we had asked for.

Of the new witnesses, one was a man who replaced a dead witness. The postmaster at Ouray, in Colorado, Dr. McDonald, had resigned and was here as a witness, but before the second trial he died, and we subpoenaed his successor. Another witness was obtained in this way: There were two men, partners in running a route out in one of the Western States or Territories, and on the first trial we subpoenaed one partner, and on the second trial the other. Another witness was a deputy postmaster, who was examined merely to prove the time of the arrival and departure of mails at the office at White River, in Colorado. His brother, who was the postmaster, had been subpoenaed on the first trial, but did not attend in consequence of sickness. Another witness was Mr. George Haycock, whom we substituted in the place of Mr. Powell Clayton. We found that the evidence of Mr. Clayton, so far as it was not supplied by that of Rerdell, we could supply by documents. We needed Clayton on the first trial because he proved the introduction to Mr. James, but after Rerdell himself came on the stand that was not necessary. Another witness was Mrs. Powers, wife of a postmaster in Oregon. She came here with her husband, and in conversation with the husband I ascertained that his wife knew some things about the mails there, and I subpoenaed her myself. Now, you will notice that in this letter of mine to Mr. Ker, which I have read, I suggested that Shaw and another one be engaged to look up additional witnesses. They were so engaged, and they brought on two additional witnesses; that being done in obedience to my request. I suggested also in that letter that Steinegger would supply the deficiency. He was a subcontractor out on the Silverton route in Colorado. We had on the former trial one of his drivers.

We were criticised a little then by the other side because that witness did not entirely fill the bill, so I substituted Steinegger in place of Carson. You will notice that Krider, on the Mineral Park route, was suggested to look up somebody who would prove the geography of the route. He brought a man named Wright here. On one of the routes we had had on the first trial no witnesses, but solely record evidence. That was a subject of criticism, and therefore, on the 26th of October, I wrote Mr. Brewster a letter, which I will not read, in which I simply asked that Marshal Tidball, who had been a post-office inspector, and was out there at the time, should be sent over that route, and should bring witnesses here; and Mr. Tidball went over that route and made a report upon it, and sent Mr. Steele here. From a route in California, in relation to which we had had one witness, the contractor, we had on the second trial a second witness, a man named Hayes. His name appeared in the papers relating to that route, but it was accompanied by such statements from the post-office inspector that on the first trial we thought he was hardly a safe witness to bring, and therefore we did not bring him. It was represented that he was in a chronic row with the people there. But on the second trial he was subpoenaed at my request. There was one route as to which we determined we would bring every subcontractor in the whole history of the route, for the purpose of showing that at no time during the existence of the route was the number of men increased at all, after expedition, over the number used before. On the first trial we had all the subcontractors but one, and we had also somebody connected with the missing subcontractor, but his wife got sick, or, at any rate, for some reason or other he was allowed to go home, and on the second trial we brought him here again. There was one additional witness who was brought to prove a letter which we had had unexpected difficulty in proving on the first trial. Forty-nine of the new witnesses who testified on the second trial, but who had not testified on the first trial, are thus accounted for.

I have here a schedule containing all the names of the witnesses, and I desire only to say that every one of these men was brought here by subpoenas issued at my suggestion, except the witnesses that were obtained here in consequence of the information given by Rerdell, such witnesses as Mrs. Rerdell, Rerdell's brother, Mrs. Cushman, the hotel clerk, and so on. As Mr. Ker boarded at the Ebbitt House it is possible he had something to do with bringing that clerk as a witness, though the suggestion came from Rerdell. There was only one single witness produced on the second trial through Mr. Ker's exertion. That witness was a man named Cabell, who was brought here from Dakota. In the middle of the trial Joe Pennell, who was a very useful man, desired to return home to attend to some business, and he also thought that he could find some additional witnesses. In the examination of the witnesses out of court Mr. Ker discovered that a man named McClellan had stated that John W. Dorsey when out there in 1879 made a statement as to the connection of his brother, Senator Dorsey, with the business, though McClellan had been examined on the first trial and had said nothing about this. It was said that the statement had been made in the presence of this man Cabell, and they sent for him and brought him here, and he so testified, and McClellan so testified. I always felt that the bringing of Cabell here injured our case, because it enabled them to say, and they did say, and pressed the point with considerable earnestness on cross-examination and elsewhere, that there had been a fixing up of this testimony; that McClellan had been examined on the first trial and had said nothing of this kind, and that now here was another witness brought from Dakota to support McClellan's manufactured statement. And another way in which it injured us was that it seemed to show that Joe Pennell, who was a very valuable witness, was appearing as a sort of partisan in the case. As I have said, I felt that the bringing here of Cabell was a mistake, and Judge Wylie has said to me within ten days that he considered it a great mistake. Mr. Ker is entitled to the credit of bringing that witness here.

Now, perhaps it is just as well to account for the witnesses who were examined on the first but who were not examined on the second trial. Twelve of them were clerks in the Department, who were replaced as witnesses on the second trial by other clerks. Four were witnesses to prove matters which were ruled out on the first trial. Four were witnesses who were exchanged for others. One was a witness called on the first trial to contradict a witness for the defense. This was Mr. Nelson, a newspaper man, but inasmuch as the defense did not produce their witness on the second trial, of course it was not necessary to call him. One was rendered unnecessary by Rerdell's testimony, and there was one who had gone back on us on the first trial. Three we found to be cumulative and not needed. Another one was not needed because of the failure of the defense to cross-examine Walsh on the second trial. The result of that failure was that an important witness who would have confirmed a valuable part of Walsh's testimony was not admissible, because Walsh was not impeached. One was a United States Senator whose testimony we did without, as it was not important, and one was postmistress at The Dalles in Oregon. She was the widow of a member of Congress. We had brought her here on the first trial, summoning her by her initials, not knowing that she was a female, and we thought it would be a pretty hard thing to bring her here again on the second trial, so we got along without her. That was the way those witnesses were disposed of.

Mr. Ker (page 528) mixes up Walsh and Moore, so far as dates are concerned, extraordinarily. He says I told him that Walsh was a man of bad character, whom no one would believe. I do not think I ever told him anything of that kind; I certainly never told him anything of the kind at that time. Mr. Walsh had not originally made the statement which rendered him admissible as a witness, or clearly admissible. He had made a written statement, and I am going to call the attention of the committee to that statement directly, as going to show how far he is to be believed. He had made a statement of dealings that he had had with Brady in connection with Route 40101. He never had said or lisped a suggestion that Brady, in any conversation, had said to him, "You must do as the other contractors do, to wit, pay such and such a percentage." Of course, the moment Walsh did make that statement he became an admissible witness in the Dorsey case. Before that we were hoping to get him in as a witness, and I had looked up, with some labor, cases about false pretense, as, for instance, cases which, in a trial on a charge of false pretense, you are allowed to prove that the accused has made similar false pretenses to somebody else. Also, where, on a trial for passing counterfeit money, you are allowed to show that the man had passed other counterfeit money. We were looking to see whether we could not get him in under that rule, and I was looking into that question when, along in the first trial, Mr. Woodward got his pumps on to him and came in one morning and told me what he had done with Walsh, and I think he showed me a statement which contained this remark of Brady's. Of course I said at once that that rendered Mr. Walsh an admissible and an important witness; and as soon as I saw Mr. Merrick on that day I said the same thing to him. He told me he had already heard of it, and that he considered that it was a very important point. But this, you will remember, was not until late in the trial. Bear in mind that I had had an interview with Mr. Walsh on the 28th of September, 1881, in which, in writing and in detail, I went over with him everything that he knew in relation to the case, and he took that statement away and corrected it in his own handwriting. Then I got it again, and went through every statement, and you will see [exhibiting the paper] that the margins are filled with changes and corrections and notes, and yet from the beginning to the end of this statement Mr. Walsh does not mention anything about this remark of Brady's. And before I get through I will show you a still more remarkable omission on the part of Mr. Walsh.

On page 535 of your record, Mr. Ker gave some testimony with reference to the witness Moore (I think there is something on that subject earlier in his testimony), but, at any rate, the implication seems to be that Mr. Moore was obtained by Mr. Ker as a witness, and brought here from Montana, and that I ought to have had him on the first trial, and also that I ought to have had him on the second trial. Let us see what the record shows in regard to that. Post-Office Inspector Sharp was sent to Oregon to look up the routes there, and all the knowledge we had of what Mr. Moore could testify to was obtained through Mr. Sharp's report. Mr. Sharp went to see Mr. Moore, and got a statement from him, which was somewhat inadequate, and he made a special report on the 4th of August, 1881. Mr. Sharp is now Chief Inspector of the Post-Office Department, and Mr. Lyman will tell you that he is as thoroughly reliable a man as exists. He made a report, in which he characterized Mr. Moore, and it was upon that record that I was asked to put in on the first trial a witness of whose possible testimony we had very inadequate knowledge, and of whom Inspector Sharp said :

He is a disreputable and unreliable rascal, about as low a specimen of humanity as I ever saw. He lives at Cascade Locks, where he has a respectable wife and several small children. He is now engaged in conducting a hurdy-gurdy house, in other words, a house of prostitution. He has a house erected on an old scow, in which he keeps a lot of prostitutes of the lowest order, and a bar, and dance hall. This scow he moves up and down the Columbia River, between the Cascades and The Dalles, according as the camp of railroad hands move, who are building a railroad on the river bank between the above points. I do not think that he would hesitate a moment at swearing a lie, or doing any dishonorable or disreputable thing. His looks, actions, and talk are alike disgusting. I do not believe that he has any letter of Senator Dorsey or any one else that is so important as he would like to have us believe. He is evidently a great blowhard and liar, for some of the statements made to me I know to be untrue. I think Dorsey and Miner were deceived in him, and soon found out that he was but a loafer and threw him overboard. He did come to The Dalles and try to sublet the contracts, but people there informed me that they soon saw that he was a loafer, and would have nothing to do with him, and he did not succeed in subletting any of the contracts. He seems to have done a great deal of talking and blowing, but that was about all.

I have a sharp, shrewd fellow working on him, and if he has any such a letter as he represents, I think he will eventually get it, but I have no confidence in his having any such letter.

Will at once notify you if anything is got out of him.

Mind you, all we knew of the witness Moore was from this report of Inspector Sharp, and the question was whether we should bring him here at an expense of five or six hundred dollars. Mr. Merrick told me, going up in the cars, after he had testified here, that he had intended to say something about Moore, and to have told you that the omission to call him upon the first trial was a matter which we had talked over, and that it had been done with the concurrence of us both. Prior to the second trial, Mr. Boone, who had Mr. Moore as a protégé, and had brought him into the service of Dorsey and those people in that connection, became more friendly to the Government, and, as the boys in the country say, he "gave down" a good deal more information, and he came and urged upon me that Moore ought to be called as a witness, and told in detail what Moore could testify to. By the way, I should have said that this report of Sharp's was filed by Mr. Woodward and indorsed by him, and in that indorsement, among other things, is this, referring to the witness: "Low and unreliable." That is the condition in which the report came into my hands. As I have said, Mr. Boone talked with me about Moore and urged that he should be brought here, and told me what he could testify to. It was a great deal more than we had ever expected; and further than that, Boone denied that Moore's character was so bad as it had been represented. Let me say, too, that Moore is the witness as to whom I have already told you that the counsel for the defense showed by their cross-examination that they had possession of our information, because when Moore was on the stand they began asking him what he was doing, and pretty soon they showed that he kept a saloon on a boat. Then they questioned him as to who was on the boat. He said there were two fellows. Then the counsel, anxious to get at the women, said, "Well, what were their names?" Said he, "One I do not know; the other was Lou Maline." The counsel thought they had a fine point, for they assumed that "Lou" must mean Louisa, so they insisted upon his telling the first name in full. "Well," said he, "I don't know, but I suppose it was Louis." It was a disappointment to the counsel that "Lou" turned out to be a man, but all through the examination of Moore it was perfectly clear to us that they had had access to this report of Inspector Sharp, and Mr. Woodward and I discussed it at the time.

The CHAIRMAN. How they obtained it is one of the mysteries of the case?

The WITNESS. Not a bit of a mystery. I do not think this committee has any doubt on the subject. Boone having talked to me about sending for Moore, I told him to go and talk to Mr. Merrick, and on the 4th of November Mr. Merrick wrote me as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 4, 1882.

MY DEAR COLONEL: Boone called to see me to-day, and has had with me the same interview, substantially, that he had with you.

It seems to me that it would be well to summon Moore, and to send Keitner, Boone's son-in-law, to bring him.

The possibilities fully justify the experiment.

Sincerely yours,

R. T. MERRICK.

On November 6 I wrote to Mr. Merrick:

NOVEMBER 6, 1882.

MY DEAR MERRICK: I have yours of the 4th. I fully assent to your views as to summoning Moore, though I shall be surprised if it produces any good results; but we must try everything. Letters on file from the Post-Office special agent, who went to find him last summer or winter, will show where he then was. He can be followed from The Dalles or from the place referred to. Colonel Parker's assistant, Maynard, has those letters, I think, though it is possible Moore has them among my files.

The Post-Office people have for some time been trying to arrest Spencer, and don't do it. What do you say to employing Pinkerton on that? If you agree, get me a duplicate warrant and send it to me. By leaving the other warrant in the Post-Office people's hands we avoid suspicion of what we are going to do. I think about November 20 means should be taken to locate Dorsey and Brady, and be prepared to meet affidavits for postponement of the trial. Of course other defendants are as good as they for this purpose, but they—especially Dorsey—are the men as to whom such application is to be feared; still, it would be well to locate all.

How about Rerdell? Has he done anything with Woodward?

I have had a very pleasant taffy letter from Brewster as to my going out of the cases and wishing me to stay in. Still I doubt. Lawrence, First Comptroller, has hung up my bill, and Brewster don't seem to assert his rights as to it. If he don't do so, out I go. I shall be in Washington soon, but not till after the bill question is disposed of. I'm not going to run after it.

Brewster has also sent me a letter addressed to you, Ker, and myself about other prosecutions. I presume you have the same. I have answered it at length and shown the situation. I would be glad to have you drop in at the Department and see it.

Yours, truly,

GEO. BLISS.

Hon. R. T. MERRICK.

The letter there referred to was Mr. Brewster's letter asking about the Salisbury cases; you will remember that that was a circular letter addressed to us all by the Attorney-General, and certainly if the responsibility for not procuring the indictment of the Salisburys had rested solely with me up to that time, from that time on Mr. Brewster placed it on all of us.

Well, we brought Moore here, and he was a very useful witness. We were a good deal alarmed at times about him, because they went into a cross-examination tending to show that he had made statements out of court to Colonel Pelham and other people contradicting his statements here. Moore had associated with those people a good deal, and they claimed that he had made such statements; but finally they did not attempt to contradict him, and he gave us a good deal of information about Dorsey, which the other side on the trial denied utterly, of course, but which, we thought, was entitled to weight. After Moore got here his wife died, and one of his children got sick of scarlet fever, and he insisted on going home. We did not dare to let him go, because of this threatened impeachment, and with the concurrence of everybody I telegraphed through the Signal Service (because there was no other telegraph up where he was) to the postmaster to advance $50 to his family, with the understanding that it was to be repaid by the other counsel. Of course we expected to get it from his witness fees if we learned of his payment in time, but we did not learn of it in time, and I have been left to be "responsible" for that $50; and, therefore, I think I have quite as much interest in that witness as Mr. Ker has. I certainly had a good deal more to do with bringing him here.

A member of the committee suggested, jocosely, that a contribution should be taken up to reimburse Mr. Bliss.

The WITNESS. I am not seeking contributions; I am seeking what I doubt considerably whether I shall get—justice.

Mr. CRISP. I do not understand what the witness means by that remark. Does he refer to this committee?

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. I do not suppose he refers to the committee.

The WITNESS. I have said "justice." The time may come when I will explain myself more fully. I do not think I shall do it now.

Mr. CRISP. Well, I object to this witness, or any other, making such a remark, if he means by it to cast any reflections on this committee.

The WITNESS. I have not reflected on this committee. I have not the remotest idea of referring to the committee.

Now, Mr. Ker says that I had not examined the witnesses on the first trial in advance, and that he examined them before the second trial, and brought out a great many new facts. In the first place, when he states that I had not examined the witnesses on the first trial in advance, he states what is not true, and what he knows is not true. As to his bringing out additional facts on the second trial, I cannot say that he did not. It would be very extraordinary if some additional facts were not brought out, but I cannot remember any. I have made a tolerably full examination of the record, comparing the testimony of the witnesses on the two trials, and I cannot see any new facts that were brought out on the second trial that amounted to anything. There may have been something, but I do not remember it, and I have been unable to find it. All I have to say about that is, that I did examine every witness that was brought here; I examined them personally, and there were some fifty of them. We had beforehand the general statements made by the witnesses to the inspectors, who had gone over the routes. The witnesses generally had made affidavits. Then those affidavits had to be worked up and criticised and compared by Mr. Woodward with the papers on the files of the Department, and then I went over the matter with each witness before he went on the stand. Every witness, before he went upon the stand, was re-examined by me to find out what he would testify to; some at greater length, and some at less. As I have already stated here, I went out of court at 4 o'clock, and I was rarely in bed before 2 o'clock in the morning; my time being almost entirely taken up in court and in examining the witnesses in advance, either for the next day, or the next but one, because I tried to keep the work a couple of days ahead, so as not to be embarrassed in case anything should break down. I examined those witnesses carefully and conscientiously.

Mr. Ker says that the oral testimony was much stronger on the second trial than on the first. It was not made so through any new witnesses that he got. It was much stronger because we had Rerdell on the second trial; it was much stronger, because we had the witnesses that Rerdell's testimony rendered admissible; it was much stronger because we had Moore. On the other hand, it was, as to some of the defendants, weaker. On the first trial only Vaile, among the defendants, went on the stand, and he made a bad showing. On the second trial, they all went on the stand, and some of them, probably, helped their cases; others, I think, did not.

Now, all through Mr. Ker's testimony, there runs the idea and the insinuation that I was not in earnest in the prosecution of Dorsey, and in that connection there are made some rather extraordinary statements, and I propose to ask the committee to hear me a few minutes on that subject. As soon as Mr. Ker had given that testimony, I addressed a letter to Mr. Merrick, which, perhaps, I may as well read here:

NEW YORK, May , 1884.

MY DEAR MR. MERRICK: The evening papers contain an abstract of some remarkable testimony given by Ker to-day. I inclose you a slip. It is so extraordinary, so beyond my comprehension, that, though it is a mere abstract, and though one of the papers says Mr. Ker has "more to come," I write you at once.

I cannot imagine what Ker refers to in the remark quoted as coming from you about my proposing to let Dorsey off. He can hardly have invented it out of the whole cloth, but as certainly you cannot have said it as he puts it, for I never made any such proposition. That I am sure of. Yet it seems to me there must be some ground or color for Ker's statement, though I cannot imagine what. I say this only because I cannot think it could be wholly manufactured. Something must have been misunderstood, something of joke taken as earnest, something put as a contingency taken as a proposition.

I cannot remember anything. What was there? Please tell me frankly if you remember anything to base this on. Your letters to me, of which I have many, and your whole treatment of me are inconsistent with any such sentiments or suspicions as Ker ascribes to you.

I knew or inferred from a remark of Ker's after the Kellogg trial that he felt ugly, though I can't imagine why, as I have always treated him well, and even before the Springer Committee praised his indictment and slid over his error as to initials. Some one has lied to him and started him off on a hostile track. You and I spoke of his not being needed in the case, but that was much later than he puts it, as one of your letters shows. Brewster coincided, as he has more than once told me and his letters show. But neither of us ever proposed to have him put out of the case.

The idea of my wishing to have Dorsey let out seems to me too absurd for belief. My opening argument on the first trial struck the keynote of him as being the brains of the conspiracy, and my closing one on the second trial stuck to the same text.

Yours truly,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. R. T. MERRICK.

Mr. Ker admits that on the second trial I was just as "vicious and vigorous" as any of the counsel. I suppose that somehow or other I had "experienced religion" in the mean time. Mr. Cook told you that I selected the weakest case. Mr. Cook told you that I showed great personal feeling against Dorsey. I suppose this committee is not governed by legal rules, for I certainly do not want to bring Mr. Cook within the rule that by citing him as a witness I claimed that he is credible, but I remind the committee that he did so testify. On page 107 of your record, Mr. Cook testified that I said that Dorsey was "the head devil," and that I showed great feeling against him.

Now, let us see what I said about Dorsey on the first trial. In that trial Mr. Ker opened, and so did I. I will read an extract from my speech on that occasion. On page 106 I say:

Now, as to the other defendants. Stephen W. Dorsey was Senator of the United States from the State of Arkansas until the 4th of March, 1879. These contracts were let early in the spring of 1878, and they took effect on the 1st of July, 1878. By a statute of the United States, Mr. Dorsey, being a Senator, had no right to be interested in any contracts with the Government. That is a fair statement of the effect of section 3739 of the Revised Statutes. Mr. Dorsey, as United States Senator, had been, or was, if I remember right, the chairman of the Post-Office Committee, and, I think, on the subcommittee in charge of the appropriations for the Post-Office Department. As such he was brought directly in connection with the Post-Office Department and its officials. Mr. John W. Dorsey was a resident of a little town in Vermont, Middleborough, where he was the agent of a manufacturing concern situated in another town, and was a tinsmith. John W. Dorsey was the brother of Stephen W. Dorsey. Mr. John M. Peck was the brother-in-law of Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey. He was in bad health, afflicted, as I understand, with consumption, and unable practically to attend to business. Mr. John R. Miner was a resident of Sandusky, Ohio, and had been for ten years the friend of Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey. Mr. Rerdell was from Arkansas, had appeared on the records of Congress in no very reputable position, was brought here and became a clerk in the office of the District Commissioners, and afterwards became Mr. Dorsey's clerk, or secretary, or something of that sort; and after the contracts were obtained he seems to have become the factotum of all the parties to the conspiracy.

And on page 107:

It is believed, gentlemen, that we shall be able to satisfy you by evidence that this conspiracy, like other things of that nature, grew gradually; that it had its origin some distance back, Stephen W. Dorsey being the chief spirit in the conspiracy; that there was in the early stages brought into the employment of the conspirators a Mr. Boone, who had both brains and knowledge of the way in which the business of the Post-Office Department was done, and was fertile in expedients by which contractors could be benefited; that Dorsey brought in also Rerdell, the general factotum; that at some time J. W. Dorsey and John M. Peck were brought in, but they were practically little more than the mere willing tools of Stephen W. Dorsey, having interest in the contracts and sharing in the fruits of the conspiracy during a considerable part of its continuance. Peck, from physical incapacity, did little but make affidavits, and John W. Dorsey appeared occasionally upon the routes in the distant States to make arrangements for carrying out their business, and usually to make admissions which we shall be able to show you, and which are, as I think, pretty damaging.

When Mr. Vaile came into this business in connection with these gentlemen is a matter I must leave to the evidence. He certainly came into it very early. The circumstances under which he became connected with it are matters which must be developed by the evidence. But Stephen W. Dorsey might scheme and get up his clerks, and his dummies and bring them all in, yet Brady was the main feature to making the proceedings in any sense profitable or successful. Money could not be made unless Mr. Brady allowed them to make it. Money could not be made unless Mr. Brady aided them in making it. According to our view, Mr. Brady bore no different or more especial relations to these conspirators than he did to various other parties connected with the postal service at that time. It was, so far as Brady was concerned, a mere mercenary question of who would make it the most beneficial to himself; he cared not whether it was Dorsey or a person of some other name. He went into office in 1876 certainly not a rich man. He came out after being there five years or less alleged to be a rich man, certainly dealing with large sums of money. It has been said that he has made large profits in a patented invention. The result of the evidence will show you that there was not in that invention any profit to him at all adequate to account for his changed circumstances.

On page 112, I refer to the bids as having been got up in Dorsey's house. I say:

We shall show you various facts, some of which I have referred to, but a large portion of which I have not time to detail, from which we shall ask you to infer that these parties conspired together, because they will show that they acted in concert to accomplish a common end, and that common end was the obtaining of money from the Treasury; and that money went, in shares, more or less distinct, into the pockets of these defendants; and that being so, we shall ask you to find that these parties were guilty of conspiracy.

In the first place, they concurred in getting up these bids. Mr. Dorsey sent a portion of them certainly to Arkansas, as I have said, for execution, or partial execution, in violation of law. The bids, gentlemen of the jury, I think we shall show you, were largely, if not entirely, got up in a third-story room in Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey's house. They were got up there by Miner, Boone, and, I think, J. W. Dorsey. I do not think that Mr. Peck was in the city at any time during the getting up of the bids. The bids, having thus been got up, were put in in the names of these different parties, and then the contracts were awarded. After the contracts were awarded, each of these parties treated them as their joint property, as to which either one of them might take any action—do anything.

Again, on page 112 I say:

On the route from Trinidad to Madison, No. 38140, Mr. John W. Dorsey did the same thing. He swore as subcontractor, though he was not subcontractor. Miner was the contractor, and Stephen W. Dorsey was the subcontractor, but by a contract not then filed.

On route No. 38145 we find John R. Miner, at the request of Stephen W. Dorsey, writing, as he says, in the absence of John W. Dorsey, to a gentleman to take a contract to carry the mail upon the route.

And on page 113:

On the route from Eugene City to Bridge Creek, No. 44140, Mr. Peck was the contractor. You will find Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey appearing in the case in rather a significant manner, to which I shall soon call your attention.

On page 65 I say:

One of the defendants here, Stephen W. Dorsey, the former United States Senator, having occasion to write to his agent in Oregon to sublet a route of which he or some one of these defendants had become the contractor, said he was willing to pay—

On page 96:

As I have said, the law passed in 1878 for the benefit of subcontractors authorized the subcontractor to put his contract on file. That was regarded as a very proper and beneficial law. It was reserved for the gentlemen who are defendants in this case, so far as I can find, to devise a way in which its beneficent effect should be avoided. They promptly proceeded to put on file subcontracts with themselves. I do not recall the combinations, but they were about like this: Mr. John W. Dorsey makes Mr. Peck subcontractor; Mr. Peck makes Mr. S. W. Dorsey subcontractor; Mr. somebody else makes Mr. Rerdell a subcontractor.

On page 104:

I think I omitted in that connection to call your attention to one significant fact, and that is that though the service under these contracts with the Dorseys referred to in this indictment commenced on the 1st of July, 1878, and though the Dorseys and their associates got one hundred and thirty-four contracts, yet, as applicable to those contracts alone, during the year 1878 Mr. Brady made sixty-six separate orders increasing the pay of these defendants, and in the year 1879 he made seventy-two additional orders increasing the pay of the defendants. In other words, he made one hundred and thirty-eight orders increasing the pay on the routes awarded in the bidding to the Dorsey combination, on which the service commenced on the 1st of July, 1878, or should have commenced, and he made that large number of orders increasing their compensation within two years after the contracts were made.

And on page 109:

Those bids and bonds, gentlemen of the jury, were sent by Stephen W. Dorsey from the Senate of the United States, and some of the letters that were written by him were written on the official letter-paper of the Senate of the United States. They were sent to postmasters, who, in his State of Arkansas, he regarded as under his control, for postmasters are generally regarded as under the control, in a great measure, of the Senator from the State. He sent them, stating that he desired to oblige a friend. But in each and all of these letters he says, and he underlines it, "Don't let anybody know that these bids come from me; have them signed; get them signed by sureties; get this surety; do this business; send back these bids with sureties on them, to the responsibility of whom you are to certify, and you are to certify to it before they are complete and filled up; you are to certify to it in violation of the law; you are to certify to it in violation of the instructions of the Post-Office Department. But send them back."

"I am doing all this for a friend!" As Shylock had his friend, so there was a reason why Dorsey had a friend. As a Senator of the United States he could not at that time be interested in mail contracts, or in any other contracts. He was doing it all for a friend. He wanted it done. He wanted them to communicate back to him. But they must, however, keep it a secret that he had anything to do with it. Mr. Dorsey found, though, that human nature was better than he supposed. Mr. Clendenning, the postmaster at Fort Smith, wrote to him refusing to do this thing, and calling his attention to the fact that he was asking him to do something that was in violation of the law, and suggested that it might be an oversight. Mr. Dorsey replied, with a good deal of feeling, and substantially told Mr. Clendenning that he thought he was altogether too particular; but, however, that he was operating for a friend, he had seen the friend, and he need not do anything more. Mr. Hadley, the postmaster at Little Rock, did something more; he procured to be executed and certified some, at least, of these bids, and those bids subsequently appeared here in this city. The name of John M. Peck was affixed to those bids subsequently, not before they went to Little Rock, and somebody was put up to personate John M. Peck, who was in New Mexico, to go before the notary and acknowledge that he executed the bond, and that he intended to perform the contract, and everything of that sort which the law requires. Those bids subsequently passed into the Post-Office Department—for the Dorsey combination put in, I think, something over a thousand bids at that letting—and were among the bids which produced the contracts in this case. The dates of acknowledgment, the dates of execution, and all the details upon those bids are utterly false and untrue beyond all dispute. They were certified by the postmaster without the names being signed to them. They were certified in violation of law, and this was done, gentlemen of the jury, at the request of Stephen W. Dorsey, a Senator of the United States, acting all the time for a friend. And yet, acting for a friend, as we shall show you, they got under those bids certain contracts of which Mr. Dorsey, having gone out of the Senate on the 4th of March, 1879, on or before the 1st of April, 1879, Mr. Dorsey appeared to the world as the avowed owner, and entitled to all that might be earned by a considerable portion thereof.

So much for what I said in the opening. Then, when Mr. McSweeney replied on the opening—they have a practice here that counsel on both sides may speak on the opening if they choose—when Mr. McSweeney replied as special counsel for Dorsey, he devoted himself largely to defending his client against the charges that I had made; and if the committee will look at his speech they will see that he refers constantly to the statements of “Bliss,” “Brother Bliss,” &c., against Dorsey, and defended Dorsey against them. Mr. McSweeney certainly seemed to think that I had said something against his client, Stephen W. Dorsey.

Mr. Ker says there was some trouble at the close of the cases because in my closing speech I did not say anything about Dorsey, and that if Mr. Brewster had not come in and given a list of ninety-six different instances in which Dorsey's name occurred in connection with star-route matters the case would have gone to the jury without any reference being made to Dorsey in the closing argument. That is about the substance of Mr. Ker's statement. Now, the facts are these: I closed on August 18; I was followed by Mr. Williams, Mr. Totten, and McSweeney, for the several defendants. Mr. Merrick commenced his closing speech on August 24 and closed on August 28, and his speech from beginning to end is an arraignment of Stephen W. Dorsey. He told you so on Saturday, and it is beyond all question so. He was followed by Mr. Henkle, Mr. Wilson, and Mr. Ingersoll, and then came the Attorney-General, as to whom I shall have something to say directly. Now, then, the committee will see that if I omitted to speak of Stephen W. Dorsey in my closing argument, I did not prevent the question of Mr. Dorsey's merits and demerits getting to the jury. I had put in all the evidence bearing against him. There is no question about that. I had opened against him in the way I have shown; and now as to my closing, the facts were these: We were a good deal embarrassed by the Attorney-General insisting upon closing the case. Of course we had to yield to him, but he had not been in court much of the time during the trial, and it is always embarrassing to have a man close a case who has not been in court throughout the trial; and, in point of fact, there was one particular thing in regard to which we labored under a good deal of disadvantage at the close. Mr. Ker, in his closing argument, took up each of the eighteen routes and grouped the evidence relating to each route. He also made some general remarks, but the body of his speech was devoted to that. By arrangement, which I supposed was an arrangement made with Mr. Merrick—it was made chiefly through Mr. Woodward—I was to take care to leave Mr. Merrick something besides threshed straw to deal with. I was not to go over the whole case. I was to leave him something fresh to talk about. It was only fair that I should do so, and I was very glad to do it. So, in my closing speech I took up the different kinds of frauds and grouped them without much reference to the particular routes. I brought the different parties before the jury in connection with the different kinds of frauds in which they had taken part, as, for instance, the making of false affidavits and various things of that sort. Now, in pursuing that course of argument, as the committee will see, Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey did not naturally come up for mention so frequently as others because he had been under cover. For the first year of the conspiracy he had been a United States Senator. In the second year he was absent from Washington the greater portion of the time, and he attended very little to details. They were left to Rerdell. For instance, Dorsey made no affidavits. He wrote letters and directed the getting up of petitions and things of that sort, and to those I carefully called attention in connection with other matters as I went along. Having gone all over that class of frauds I said, near my close (page 2646):

But, gentlemen, the evidence does not stop there. I have gone over substantially the ground that has been allotted to me. It has been allotted to me to deal with the facts in this case, and not to deal with the law and the immediate application of the law to these defendants. All that mass of detail and interesting evidence which there is in the case which will show the way in which these defendants are mingled together, and are combined together, aiding each other all the time in spite of alleged divisions, in spite of alleged conferences and separations, and all that class of evidence is so mingled with the questions of law as to conspiracy, that I pass it by, leaving it to my abler associates who are to deal with the more important questions of the law as bearing upon this case.

I did that, but I had not omitted Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey in my summing up. On page 2598 of the record of the trial, you will see that I referred to a letter which Dorsey had written to a subcontractor who was getting fined; I referred to Dorsey's statement that the man was claiming that he was not getting money enough, and I called attention to the fact that Dorsey said to him in substance, "You are a fool. It wouldn't cost any such money as that. Don't talk so." I called attention to that, and I contrasted it with the claim in the affidavits that more money was necessary.

On page 2579 I referred to another letter of Dorsey's, and on the same page I referred to—

One of these little open and shut arrangements by which Mr. Rerdell, or Mr. S. W. Dorsey, or somebody else, had a subcontract on file, and therefore the subcontractor, who was actually performing the service, could not get his subcontract on file, and consequently could not secure the payment of his money; and this man said, if he had got his money directly from the Government, $10,000 was first-rate pay.

On page 2621 I quoted in full a letter of S. W. Dorsey's, and commented upon it all the way through. On page 2642 I referred to Dorsey as having sought out Boone as a man to supervise the business and arrange it, and all that. On page 2643 I said that there was a peculiar clause in these subcontracts put in—we could not ascertain whether at the suggestion of Miner or of S. W. Dorsey or his brother—and I closed by saying to the jury that we called upon them for a verdict as against "all" of the defendants. That was the case. Now, if I had omitted S. W. Dorsey, or had not gone for him sufficiently, here was this condition of things: After, as Mr. Ker falsely says, Mr. Wilson had got before the jury that interview of mine; after, as Mr. Ker falsely says, Mr. McSweeney had got the Dorsey dinner business before the jury, after I had closed and after Mr. Wilson had closed, and after Mr. Henkle had begun (Mr. Henkle preceding Mr. Merrick). Mr. Merrick telegraphed me as follows, and I quote this merely to show that, with all this "viciousness" of mine, I had not been very effective in "protecting" anybody—Mr. Merrick telegraphed me stating that Mr. Henkle was speaking; that the Attorney-General was to be there on Tuesday, and then he closed with these words: "They are beaten and demoralized." So that it would appear that in Mr. Merrick's opinion, at least, if I had been endeavoring to protect Mr. Dorsey, I had not been very efficient.

Now, finally, on this question as to whether I was endeavoring to protect Mr. Dorsey, or to do anything in that direction, I feel at liberty to state to the committee that, meeting Judge Wylie the other day, I said to him that I would like to ask him a question which he might answer or not, just as he chose, or just as he felt at liberty, and I then asked him this question: "Did you see anywhere during that trial any disposition on my part to let up on Stephen W. Dorsey?" The judge replied promptly: "Why, the idea is a perfect absurdity!" And he then went on to express his view of my services on the trial in terms which I shall not repeat, because I trust that this committee will have Judge Wylie before them. It is sufficient to say that a man with the most unbounded vanity could not desire more than Judge Wylie said upon that subject. None of the counsel in the case ever intimated to me that there was any question of my fidelity with reference to the prosecution of Dorsey. I never dreamed of it until Mr. Ker trotted it out here, and trotted it out at the instigation and with the fixing up of Mr. Brewster Cameron.

Mr. KER. There is no truth in that at all.

The WITNESS. I know what I am saying. Of course Mr. Brewster Cameron has been very efficient in his services, but the most fruitful investigation that this committee could make would be to investigate Mr. Cameron in connection with what are known as the jury-bribery cases. That happens to be the only portion of the investigation which does not hit anybody but Democrats and Mr. Brewster Cameron. It hits Mr. Ker, and it hits other gentlemen; it does not hit me; but this committee has, somehow, managed to pass that all over, and, with Mr. Brewster Cameron in attendance here every day, there has been no move made to investigate that part of the case.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. We are pleased to have our attention called to it. We have never had it brought to our attention before.

The WITNESS. I have called your attention to it now, gentlemen.

Mr. FYAN. You ought to have done it when you were on the stand before.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What do you understand to be the facts of that matter?—A. I know nothing about that, and am not going to testify about it. The charge was made that Mr. Brewster Cameron undertook to bribe the jury on the first trial, and out of that there came a scandal that affected the whole case, and various attempts at indictments; all of which, I submit, it is desirable to investigate. Mr. Brewster Cameron went and had an interview, out of which grew a scandal.

Q. Did you have your attention as Government counsel called to the fact that there were attempts to bribe the jury on either trial?—A. No, sir; to no facts of that kind except those arising out of this matter, and the Attorney-General directed me expressly by letter to have nothing to do with anything connected with the bribery investigation, as he was attending to that himself.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE :

Q. You do not pretend to understand that affair in its full scope?—

A. I do not know anything about it. I simply know what I read in the papers, but from them I do know that there was a dirty scandal there, and that the charge was that the Department of Justice and the prosecution were endeavoring to bribe jurors on their side; and, inasmuch as you saw by Mr. Merrick's testimony that, as Mr. Stewart said, Mr. Merrick left only one inference, that that jury was corrupt, if the prosecution rested under any suggestion that they, too, had attempted to bribe the jury, why, then, it was a case of "the pot calling the kettle black."

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. What you say about it now is, that if the prosecution was engaged in any such thing you had nothing to do with it?—A. I do not mean to say that they were engaged in it; I mean to say that a scandal arose out of Brewster Cameron's interview with Dickson and some others, and that I had nothing to do with that matter.

Q. What authority have you for saying that there were none but Democrats implicated in that affair? Brewster Cameron is not a Democrat, I believe.—A. I have this authority, simply speaking from the papers, that Mr. Ker was concerned more or less, as I understand it, in advising Brewster Cameron to go and have that interview.

Q. Do you mean to intimate that Mr. Ker was a party to that?—A. I do not mean to intimate anything of the kind.

Q. Didn't you say awhile ago that this committee had failed to investigate that matter, and that an investigation would develop the fact that there was nobody implicated in it but Democrats and Brewster Cameron?—A. I think so.

Q. What was your authority for that statement?—A. My knowledge of the case.

Q. But you do not know any of the facts of that matter?—A. I don't know anything about it but what I have heard. Mr. Cameron himself testified that he went there and had the interview.

The CHAIRMAN. He has not so testified before this committee.

The WITNESS. I know that.

Q. Can you name any other Democrat than Mr. Ker that you think is implicated in that business?—A. Mr. Dickson is a prominent Democrat, and he was implicated—I do not mean to say whether guiltily or not guiltily.

Q. You understand the meaning of language, and I understand you to say, or to convey the idea, that one reason why this committee did not examine into that matter was that there were none but Democrats implicated in it, except Mr. Brewster Cameron. Is that the idea that you wished to convey?—A. I don't know whether that is the reason or not; I simply state the fact. I think that probably had some influence in my mind. That is my judgment. I think also that the services of Mr. Brewster Cameron in various ways to this committee would naturally lead to anything that led up to him not being touched. That is my judgment about it.

Q. Have you any knowledge on which to base your declarations? Do you know that this committee ever had any such information before it?—A. No; I have no knowledge that this committee ever had any such information; but, inasmuch as you have had before you the evidence of Mr. Dickson relating to his reading a paper in the jury room, and about his being approached to be bribed, and all that sort of thing, and as there was just as much in the press about that scandal and more than there was about other things which you have investigated, all I have to say is that if the knowledge of that matter now reaches this committee for the first time, why, really, the committee have not been so wide awake as I supposed they were.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee have had information brought to their knowledge that attempts were made in both directions, and have received some ex parte testimony.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Were those attempts to bribe made on the part of the Government?—A. They were alleged to have been so made. It was alleged that there were attempts on the part of Brewster Cameron and others to secure a conviction in that way; and then it was alleged that after that was exploded and it got into court there was an attempt on the part of the Government to squelch the investigation. I do not mean to say that any such charge as that was well founded, but that was the allegation.

Q. And I understand you to say that Mr. Brewster, the Attorney-General, directed you by letter to have nothing to do with that investigation?—A. Mr. Brewster did, I think by letter.

Q. Have you that letter?—A. I think I can furnish it. I have not got it here.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. So far as regards the point of none but Democrats being implicated, that allegation is not based upon the fact that the foreman of the jury was Mr. William Dickson, and that he was the person upon whom the attempt at bribery was made; and was not he the only Democrat connected with the affair?—A. I do not know that any Democrat was wrongly connected with the matter.

Q. But I ask you whether Mr. Dickson is not the only Democrat whose name was mentioned in connection with the subject?—A. I simply say that the names published in connection with that matter were Brewster Cameron, Mr. Ker, Mr. Dickson, and a man named Falls.

Q. Who was Falls?—A. Some kind of a lawyer here—not the lawyer of the same name who was formerly chief clerk of the Department of Justice.

Q. Do you not know that the only Democrat supposed to be implicated in that matter was Mr. William Dickson, unless you mean to implicate Mr. Ker?—A. I do not mean to implicate even Mr. Dickson. I simply say that the names mentioned in connection with the matter were those I have stated here, and that of those, Mr. Brewster Cameron was the only Republican. I have no reason to believe that Mr. Ker was or would be engaged in any attempt at bribery. I have no reason to believe any such thing at all, but my recollection is very distinct that Mr. Ker's name was connected first with the giving of advice to Mr. Brewster Cameron to go and have the interview at which Mr. Dickson alleges that there was an attempt made to bribe him, and, moreover, that in the investigation consequent upon the alleged attempt at bribery Mr. Ker had a good deal to do. I do not mean to say at all that there was anything improper on the part of anybody there; but there was a bad odor.

Now they say that the Attorney-General was very angry about that interview of mine which was published in August, 1882, but on August 10 he wrote me as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, August 10, 1882.

Colonel BLISS:

MY DEAR SIR:

* * * * *

It is due to your careful, unexampled, and skillful marshaling of it and the conduct of it that the case has prospered. About this I propose to say something that the public will hear of as an act of justice to you, for you have endured much on account of it.

I regret your indisposition; it gives me pain to know that you are in any way afflicted, and I hope you will soon be better.

Convey the contents of this letter to Mr. Merrick, and express to him my thanks also for all that he has done so bravely and so well.

I am, truly, with great respect, your friend,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

If, as has been intimated, I was recreant to my duty with regard to the prosecution of Mr. Dorsey, it appears that Mr. Merrick did not think I had injured the case very much, for, as I have stated, before he had spoken at all he telegraphed me that the other side was "beaten and demoralized." On the 15th of September the Attorney-General wrote me from Newport as follows:

NEWPORT, R. I.,
15th September, 1882.

DEAR SIR: Your two letters, both within the same envelope, came here to-day. Of course, your own personal convenience must rule in the matter. I can hardly entertain the idea of your leaving the case; you have been and are so essential to its safe and prosperous conduct.

Do not proclaim this proposed withdrawal in any way till we see each other, or at least until I can be back in Washington and be able to adjust matters. As to this, I must respectfully and kindly insist that you will withhold your public or private announcement of it in any way for the present.

I am, believe me, truly,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER.

GEO. BLISS, Esq.,
New York City.

That is written by the Attorney-General to a recreant counsel!

On October 7, 1882, he wrote me officially as follows:

I wish to assure you that your conduct of this important case meets with my hearty approval. Your untiring energy and persistency, and the thorough knowledge you possess of all the details in this case, are fully appreciated by me; and it is but fair that in the forthcoming trial you should not be called upon to make advances from your private purse to pay any demands that may arise. I shall give instructions hereafter so there may be no delay in making such advances as are needed for the attendance and expenses of witnesses.

I am, with respect, your obedient servant,

BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Was that written before or after the second trial?—A. Before the second trial. The allegation you know is that I did my duty in the second trial, but that I did not in the first trial. There is another letter that I ought to have read. Mr. Brewster was so overflowing with gratitude to this recreant counsel that on the 25th of October he wrote me—

In the star-route case you have done your duty faithfully, industriously, ably, and with the strictest integrity.

As to the future, my conviction is that your presence in these cases is essential, and it is my desire that you will remain in them. The good of the cases requires your presence, and every consideration of prudence would make your absence a thing to be regretted. However, we will talk further or write further about this hereafter. It is a happy thing that the health of your wife will permit you to act in them.

As to your colleagues in the case, I have not conferred with them, for Mr. Ker is away; and then I only retained Mr. Ker for a special duty, because you asked for such a person—and that was the preparation of the pleadings. He has been of value since then in many other ways; but the general charge of the case I did not confide to him. I intended that he should be detailed to act under your immediate and special direction in the preparation of the pleadings, and in such other duties as you might require him to do. Mr. Merrick was retained to fill the vacancy occasioned by my withdrawal.

Upon reflection I would prefer, as at present advised, to leave the matter of your remaining to be the subject of our consideration. It is due to your position and dignity that it should be a matter that would rest exclusively between us. The case is under my control officially, and I am responsible, no matter what is done; and that responsibility I would assume after a conference with you hereafter. At present hold yourself as being advised by me that any suggestion of withdrawal is declined.

Mr. Merrick wrote me on the 8th of November:

I have had an interview with Mr. Brewster, and stated to him that your withdrawal from the case would necessitate my withdrawing also. We had quite a long conversation on the subject.

On November 30, having written Mr. Merrick that, as Mrs. Bliss's health had improved, I could remain, but that I did not wish to be here so much of the time; that Mrs. Bliss, being an invalid, was made anxious by my being away so much, Mr. Merrick wrote me a long letter in which he referred to this, and said that he regretted that she was anxious, and then went on to object to my being absent during any considerable portion of the time, saying:

The time you propose to be absent is probably the most important period of the trial for you to be present. All of the counsel should be in attendance during the first few days of the proceedings, when the course and direction of the case are being shaped, and the views and policy of the other side are being developed. Indeed, in such a case, in view of Mr. Ker's physical disability, both the other counsel for the Government should be present whilst the prosecution is putting in its evidence; if not all the time, except during the argument.

Something was said the other day about the removal of certain persons from office here. There were removed Marshal Henry, the postmaster, Mr. Ainger, his assistant, Mr. Parker, Mr. Helm (who was connected with the Congressional Record), and some others. Those gentlemen were all removed upon my letter of recommendation; and, inasmuch as some doubt was thrown out as to the sincerity of the administration, let me say this: I wrote that letter without any consultation with either of the other counsel, and without their knowledge. I addressed it to the President. I did not let the Attorney-General know anything about it. I felt that the men ought to be removed. As to Mr. Henry, the trouble arose from the fact that he had been Mr. Garfield's particular pet and friend, and at that time to do anything that seemed to touch anybody who had been associated with Garfield was looked upon as almost a sacrilege. All through the first trial we felt that Marshal Henry was not in the interest of the Government, and yet we could not put our fingers upon anything that he had done. After the first trial, as I recollect, he went out into Ohio, and there had an interview in which he pitched into the prosecution generally. Mr. Ainger was postmaster here, and owned a paper in Michigan, and after the first trial, or during the trial, he wrote a letter in which he attacked Mr. James and the prosecution generally. The atmosphere of this city was in many respects pretty unfavorable to the Government. Mr. Spencer was another of those removed. He was a Pacific Railroad director.

I wrote this letter to the President. I said to myself that if I sent the letter officially through the Attorney-General, I might not leave the President as I desired to leave him, entirely free to act entirely on his own judgment, because if an official letter came up to him through the Attorney-General from the counsel for the Government requesting the removal of certain persons, even if the act did not commend itself to his judgment, he might feel under some sort of quasi compulsion to comply. For that reason I addressed the letter directly to the President. I inclosed it to his private secretary, saying to him that the letter expressed my views, that I wanted the President to read it and to act upon the matter entirely upon his own judgment, and to decide the question independently of any influence of the kind I have suggested; that, therefore, he was at entire liberty to treat it as an official letter on which he was required to act in some way, or to treat it as a private and personal letter (he had many such from me), of which no man would ever hear anything, unless he chose. That letter went to the President on those terms, and the President, without twenty-four hours' delay (though it was longer than that before he made the removals, because time was required for cabinet consultation), announced that the men must be removed, and that any one else who the counsel said was in the way of the prosecution in any manner should be treated in the same way.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. When did this take place?—A. Just before the second trial. I should think it was in November, about Thanksgiving, 1882.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Did you receive any advice or solicitation that favors of any kind should be extended to any of the defendants?—A. No, sir.

Q. From any one who had ever been connected with Mr. Garfield, intimately or socially?—A. No, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Ask him squarely whether he ever received any such advice from Mr. Blaine?

The WITNESS. I will say to the committee that I have not conversed with Mr. Blaine since I went into the star-route cases; I have not communicated with him, directly or indirectly, and neither he nor anybody else approached me on that subject. I think it is just as well to ask the question square out about Mr. Blaine, and a great deal better than it was for Mr. Ker to write to the chairman of this committee to have Mr. Merrick asked that question the other day. That is what he did.

The CHAIRMAN. What is that?

The WITNESS. I am speaking of Mr. Ker writing to the chairman of this committee to have Mr. Merrick asked about somebody who approached him in relation to relieving Mr. Bosler of the obligation of his subpoena.

The CHAIRMAN. What was it about?

The WITNESS. I don't remember just how it was; but you asked him whether anybody had interviewed him about Bosler. The suggestion of that question came from Mr. Ker, and you know it.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your statement on that point?

The WITNESS. My statement is that Mr. Ker put up that inquiry by a letter to you.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Did you see the letter?—A. No, sir.

Q. Who spoke to you about the letter?—A. Some reporter.

Q. Can you give his name?—A. No, sir; I don't know the name of any reporter in this city.

Q. Was it somebody who professed to have seen the letter?—A. No, sir; I don't think he did profess to have seen it.

Q. Then he was speaking from mere suspicion?—A. I understood him to say that he was speaking from Mr. Springer's statement.

Q. Did you regard that as sufficient authority for you to found your statement here on?—A. I generally regard the reporters as very reliable.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I object to the investigation of the chairman of this committee. [Laughter.]

The WITNESS. Mr. Merrick, in this letter of the 30th of November, refers to a conversation that I had with him after I had sent my letter to the President. I told Mr. Merrick that I had made the request for these removals, and he writes me here :

I had supposed from our conversation that certain parties would be removed, but as to the others, I had given them no thought. The prompt action taken in the premises, though not by any means so prompt as it might have been, has been opportune, and has created a very great change in the expressions indulged in by officials.

I was talking about the question of my relations to the Dorsey case. As to my summing up speech, I have here a letter from which I desire to read an extract. The letter is dated August 23, during the summing up, and is from a gentleman who was concerned as an assistant in the case. [Reading:]

I was with Merrick until one o'clock this morning. Your speech exceeds by far any that has been made, and all are praising it. I heard Judge Wylie commending it very highly, and Judge Carpenter is very lavish in his praises. Wylie said it was packed full, and very well arranged, and fairly delivered, and must have required much labor and study. I think the week will close with Merrick's speech, although he says he will not occupy more than three hours.

Q. Who wrote that?—A. A gentleman who was concerned in assisting us in the case. I have no objection to giving the name, if it is desired, but I am willing to leave myself in Judge Wylie's hands, if you will examine him; I will take his judgment upon this question as to my fidelity. Now, there is a single other point as to the Dorsey case to which I shall ask your attention for a moment. If I wanted Dorsey to escape, why did I select that case for prosecution? Walsh says it was a weak case; Mr. Merrick says it was not. On that point all I have to say, summing it all up, is that I never proposed or desired that Mr. Dorsey should escape. The files of this committee show you that Mr. Dorsey did not consider that I had shown him any favors. He has written the chairman of this committee a letter charging me with accepting bribes and doing other things of that sort. He did not consider that I had rendered him any service, or that I had manifested any desire that he should escape. As to my relations with Mr. Dorsey, in point of fact, until after the close of the election by which Mr. Garfield became President, Mr. Dorsey was almost a stranger to me; I had seen him but once or twice up to that time. After that I found that he had arrived at the conclusion at which I also had arrived, that Mr. Conkling and others, in their endeavor to make Mr. Morton Secretary of the Treasury, could not succeed, because Mr. Morton was a banker in active business in New York, and there was a statute which was right in the face of any such selection for Secretary of the Treasury. General Grant had failed to get that statute overridden in the case of Mr. A. T. Stewart, and I felt very well satisfied that it would not be overridden in favor of Mr. Morton, although we were very intimate friends. However, I was still anxious that that position should come to the State of New York, and was desirous that Mr. Folger should be made Secretary of the Treasury, and, to my surprise, I found that Mr. Dorsey had the same opinion. I had two or three interviews with him, but pretty soon my attention was directed to a statement of Dorsey's, in which he said that I did not amount to much politically, that I had no judgment, and a number of things of that kind. If we had had any intimacy before that it ceased, and therefore you will see that I had no such relations with Mr. Dorsey as would cause me to desire to protect him, or anything of that kind. He does not think that I had any such desire, and nobody who knows anything of the matter does think so.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. It was not he who invited you to that dinner?—A. He did not invite me to the dinner.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Inasmuch as it has been stated that you were appointed to your position in connection with these star-route cases because of your peculiar relations to the President, I will ask you to state whether the President intimated in any manner, directly or indirectly, any desire on his part to protect Mr. Dorsey?—A. No, sir; he not only never intimated any such desire, but he went so far as this: Dorsey undertook to have an interview with the President, but the President declined to see him—told him he never would see him except as he saw anybody else, with the doors wide open, and Dorsey was cursing around Washington about the treatment he had received from the President on that occasion. The President never said anything to me about Mr. Dorsey in connection with the cases. The only thing that he did say to me was this: "Be careful of your own record, so that nobody shall be able to say that you have let anybody up." I never knew why he said that, or anything about it, but that is what he said and all that he ever did say to me about the cases.

Here is a long dispatch from Mr. Merrick, which I wanted to refer to in connection with my closing argument on the second trial. It shows that on the second trial I was as "vicious and vigorous" as anybody against Dorsey; but if you gentlemen will take the pains (which you will not) to go over that speech and to compare it with my speech on the first trial you will see that I began by saying that I should speak only a very short time, as so much had already been said about the case, but that in fact I spoke nine days, and you will find that for four or five days my speech was almost identical in substance with my speech on the first trial. The arrangement was somewhat changed, but the substance was the same. After I had been speaking two or three days there developed a little intrigue apparently by which the other side were arranging to let the case go to the jury without making any reply. They thought they were going to catch us in that way, because I had covered only part of the ground, and they thought that if they made no reply the remainder of the case would not be touched in our summing up. Thereupon Mr. Merrick telegraphed me to New York that I must go over the entire ground, and, as a consequence of that suggestion, this speech of mine which was intended to be a brief one of a couple of days' length was spun out to nine days. When I got through one of the counsel on the other side said that for the first three days I did not hurt them any, but that in the last five or six days of my speech I hurt them so much that they had to change their programme and arrange to reply. Here is Mr. Merrick's telegram:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 6, 1883.

To Hon. GEORGE BLISS,
160 Broadway, N. York:

I don't see how you can finish before Tuesday afternoon. Your argument has made a deep impression, and must be deliberately concluded. The partition of the routes, and the partition at the same time of the "burglar's tools;" their subsequent use by respective parties assisting; acts done by each, distributive for one another, in accordance with the agreement of partition; the books and Rerdell's memorandum, and his evidence in connection with Kellogg and Torrey and Donnelly and Gibbs; Judge Bissell's confronting Dorsey in court-room; refusal to produce check-stubs, not on notice, but on cross-examination, when Torrey swears they were marked "mail"; Bosler's purchase; the affidavit of eighteen eighty-one, which Dorsey was forced to admit was modified by him and Ingersoll; the relation of Rerdell to the case and present relation to Government, and another review of the affidavits, which are the levers that opened the Treasury doors. All these fully gone into will take time. I will not be allowed to speak, for the defendants will submit, and you must prepare dressing for them on this, treating such conduct in such a case as an abandonment.

R. T. MERRICK,
Special Assistant Attorney-General.

From the time I got that dispatch and was free to trench upon what I had regarded as Mr. Merrick's ground, I went fully into the Dorsey business, and what I have just stated is the reason, and the only reason, why there was any difference in my treatment of the case of Dorsey on the first and on the second trial.

I have stated that the Attorney-General insisted upon making the closing speech on the first trial. He did so insist, and he did close the case. He wrote me on August 10, 1882, as follows:

Now, about another matter. It seems that some arrangements had been made with reference to the speaking in the star-route case. I was not consulted about it, and I submit perhaps it would have been better that I had been. I had an interview with Judge Wiley, and a perfect understanding with him that I would speak at the conclusion. He assented to it himself, and saw no difficulty in allowing Mr. Merrick to precede me. This I conveyed to Mr. Merrick and to Mr. Ker. Whatever complaints the defendants made I do not regard them. Of course they would complain, but it was wholly within the discretion of the court, and I have prepared myself to speak in conclusion.

I propose to make a short, concise homily, to be almost quasi judicial in its character. I will conclude the case. That is my position as the head of the case, and there I must be and there I will stand and propose to speak.

I do not desire to speak for the mere sake of speaking. It would give me great relief if I could be discharged from this duty, because I have undergone a great deal of labor this year, and I am pretty well worn out, and then, too, I feel that not having followed the case in court I might be at a disadvantage unless I had prepared myself in a certain way for a certain treatment of the case; as I have done, it will enable me to escape any criticism upon that score. I have most diligently and industriously read every atom of evidence that has been given, and read it more than once, and I have methodized and arranged the subject, both upon paper and in my own mind, and I have collated authorities which I intend to use.

I send you eleven copies of references to those authorities, some of which I will use, and all of which I may use. I do not know what your practice is here, but I do know that with us no authorities can be referred to in a concluding speech that have not either been referred to before, or which, having been cited, must be given to the other side when they begin their speeches. Now, I will have eleven copies of these references sent to you with this, and you may give one to each of the counsel on the other side, if the practice here requires it; if it do not, why keep them; but be careful that we live according to practice, for if we omit what we ought to do I might be excluded from reading these books, and then there would be some sort of contention got up in court, which I do not like to have. I want to go along smoothly without interruption; I want to conduct my part with gravity, in a temperate, straightforward, emphatic way, as I said before, with brevity, sobriety, and directly to the purpose, and with brevity enough not to disgust the jury with an oft-told tale, and yet with certainty and precision enough to bring their minds down to what I conceive to be a sober contemplation of the whole case in its proper aspect with reference to their duty to the community at large and the whole country.

Now, as to my speaking. I propose to speak last, because it is the position of the Attorney-General, and if I go into court in this case contrary to the custom I must stand where my official position places me and no where else. Then, again, if I were to speak last, and they claim to speak after me, and they were allowed to, I would certainly decline to speak if the court imposed such terms upon me, because I hold that the right of the Government to have the last word in all of these cases is so essential as a general principle that it would be a very unworthy thing for me to do to have a precedent set in this case that might be quoted hereafter to the prejudice of the Government, simply for the sake of speaking himself, so I desire it to be arranged that I may speak last, and without any human being following me except the judge. In that way I will maintain what is due to my office, my position in the case, and the practice under such circumstances, and the right of the Government to conclude.

You may believe me that I have with patient industry endured more labor in the preparation of this case than I have in any other for a long while.

Mr. Ingersoll, who had the speech immediately preceding, adopted what was to us an unexpected course; he insisted upon it that there was a variance between the proof and the statement of the overt acts in the indictment; that, even supposing the overt acts were proved, and even though the evidence might have shown some fraud or other, it did not prove the overt acts set forth in the indictment, and therefore that there was a variance. That was the first time that idea had been brought in. The point had not been made before. The Attorney-General was the only counsel on our side who was to speak after Mr. Ingersoll, and he proceeded with his speech and was just about to close when Judge Wylie interrupted him (page 3145) in this way:

The COURT. Mr. Attorney-General, before you close allow me to make a suggestion. It was contended yesterday with great confidence by Colonel Ingersoll that the overt acts in this case are not the overt acts set out in the indictment. I think he must have occupied two hours. Of course his observations upon that point could not have escaped counsel. I do not know whether you have anything to say on that subject or not. The argument might have made some impression, possibly in some quarters. You do not know what impression it may not have made upon the court.

And the Attorney-General could not answer him. He had not been in court, and he did not feel able to answer, and he said, "Really, sir, it is a puzzle to me." The court called his attention to it, saying that it was a question of variance. Mr. Merrick undertook to come to the rescue. The counsel on the other side objected, that we were not to have another close, that the arrangement was that the Attorney-General was to close, and that was the condition in which that matter was left. Ask Judge Wylie, on the stand, what has he said with reference to that condition of things, and how we were left.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Why could not one of the other counsel "coach" the Attorney-General so that he would be qualified to answer that proposition?—A. We tried to do that, but we were there in court, and could not get an opportunity. If we had had an adjournment we could have done it, of course; but if you will look at the record you will see what occurred. The court returns again to the subject in this way:

The COURT. No; but his statement was based upon the dates of the affidavits filed in the cause. I do not know that he contended that there was any variance between the face of the affidavits as filed and the averment on that subject contained in the indictment; but he did argue that there was a variance between the averment in the indictment as to the time of the filing of those affidavits and the time when they were shown to have been filed by the evidence. * * *

Mr. MERRICK. The Attorney-General asks me to make a single remark in reply to your honor, which I will do.

Mr. WILSON. And to which we will reserve the right to reply, your honor. We do not propose to have two closing arguments in this case if we can help it.

So it went on back and forth, and the way we got a reply on that point, made by Mr. Ingersoll, as I recollect, was by some discussion upon the prayers.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. What, in your judgment, was the effect upon the jury of the failure of the United States Attorney-General to answer that question?—A. Well, I don't know whether it had any effect upon the jury. My own impression is that that jury at that time was beyond being affected by talk.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. You mean to say that they had been "fixed"?—A. No, sir; I have not said that. I mean to say that at that stage, which was within ten minutes of the close of the arguments, their minds were made up, so that I do not think that any little faux pas like that would affect the result, but at the same time it did not help us any.

Now, then, something has been said about the Attorney-General having come in and shown that Dorsey was referred to in the case ninety-six times. In the first place, there are not ninety-six of those instances in the tabular statement contained in the Attorney-General's argument. Stephen W. Dorsey was in fact all over the case. I have not any doubt that he was in it as guiltily as any of them; but as to the Attorney-General's list of instances, here are some of them: Boone went to Dorsey's house and had a conversation, and everything that occurred in that conversation is treated as a separate item showing Dorsey's connection with the star-route conspiracy. Some of the instances are of this character: "Boone prepared blanks for proposals"; "Boone had blanks printed"; "Boone was directed by S. W. Dorsey to send a number of proposals to certain postmasters"; "Boone sent blanks to Postmaster Clendenning, at Fort Smith, Arkansas"; "also to postmaster at Little Rock." All these Boone transactions are set forth as evidences of S. W. Dorsey's connection with the business, and in fact the table is full of things that do not connect with Stephen W. Dorsey. Then you must bear in mind that after May 1879, Stephen W. Dorsey admitted his connection with the business. He said that he had come in by assignment, that the rascalities were before that time and that he had had nothing to do with them. That whole record of S. W. Dorsey's connection with the case is largely Dorsey's drawing the pay on those routes after May 1879, which he admitted he did; nobody made any dispute about that. Therefore, I thought that to refer to those things as proof of Dorsey's guilty connection with the matter was simply trifling with the jury.

Now is there anything else that you gentlemen desire to ask me in reference to Dorsey's connection with this star-route matter? If not, I will pass to another subject.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. I will ask you one question, which you can answer or not as you please. Mr. Merrick stated as an impression—of course it was a mere impression of his, for necessarily he could not know about it—but he stated here that, although you did your duty unqualifiedly, yet he had the idea that you in your heart desired that Dorsey should get out. You know, of course, better than Mr. Merrick or anybody else, what was in your heart on that subject, and I shall be glad to have you state it frankly if you are willing to do so?—A. I had not in my heart any such thing; and that reminds me of something that I want to say here. It was obvious all through that case that Mr. Merrick was so good a Democrat that he could not imagine a Republican administration desiring in good faith to prosecute a prominent Republican; yet when he sat down and examined what was done he was compelled to see that it was so, and he was compelled on the trial to make an eulogistic allusion to the President for what he had done in that way. But after all, the leaven of Democracy was there, and he really could not imagine that a Republican administration was prosecuting in good faith the secretary of the National Republican Committee. He was honest in that idea. It did not shape his official action at all, but I saw evidence of it throughout. It is really my honest belief that that influence so affected Mr. Merrick, that his democracy was so inborn, that he did not feel that Republicans could be in good faith prosecuting a prominent Republican.

On page 542 of your record I find that Mr. Ker read an extract from the minutes of the grand jury, as follows:

The following presentments were returned to the grand jury by the special prosecuting officer of the Government, Mr. George Bliss; he having for some reasons best known to himself, failed to prepare and submit indictments: Edwin J. Sweet, William J. Barringer, James B. Henderson, and J. L. Sanderson, for perjury.

Now, gentlemen, those people were presented. The presentments went to Mr. Ker and Mr. Ker did not draw the indictments; he declined to draw them. He drew one or two more than he expected to draw, because I insisted upon it, but the others he did not draw. And Mr. Ker was right.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What cases were those?—A. Those were the cases of Sweet, Barringer, and Sanderson. The reason was this. The grand jury presented those indictments. If you will refer to the statement made by Mr. Ker of the indictments which he drew, the list which he has given, which appears on page 521, you will find that he specifies all of these parties but one. Those indictments were for perjury. He had drawn indictments for that same grand jury against Sweet for conspiracy, against Barringer for conspiracy, against Henderson for conspiracy——

Q. But not for perjury?—A. Not for perjury. The grand jury found all those presentments. It was a physical impossibility for Mr. Ker to draw indictments in all those cases before the time when the grand jury were to adjourn; therefore the question was, which of them were to be omitted. Mr. Barringer was a poor, miserable, broken-down ink peddler, who had made a clear breast of the whole thing to the post-office inspector—he was a mere tool, and there never was any idea that he would be practically prosecuted even on the charge of conspiracy. When we found that there was not time to draw all of those indictments the cases were gone over, and, at my suggestion, one or two additional ones that Mr. Ker had intended to omit were put in and these were omitted. Sanderson was presented for perjury. I have no distinct recollection on the subject, but I have no doubt that that “perjury” was in the making of affidavits for expedition and increase. There is no statute which makes that perjury, and we had three test cases already in which the evidence was here. We should be able to prove the falsity of those affidavits in those test cases by the evidence in the Dorsey trial, and, therefore, it was considered that the question as to that being perjury could be better raised there than in the other cases. If there was any responsibility to be taken for the omission of those cases, it was Mr. Ker’s; I had nothing to do with it; but, in point of fact, the presentments all went to Mr. Ker’s room, and he failed to draw the indictments simply because there was no time for him to do it.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. From Mr. Ker’s testimony, I understood that the grand jury presented these parties, and handed the papers to you to draft the indictments, and that you failed to do it?—A. I did not draft indictments.

Q. I am not asking you that. I understand, though, that Mr. Ker says that the grand jury presented those papers to you for the purpose of having the indictments drafted; is that true?—A. I do not know, sir.

Q. That is what Mr. Ker says.—A. What Mr. Ker says is that the minutes of the grand jury read that way.

Mr. FYAN. He says:

If the jury had gone into court and handed the presentments to the judge they would have been entered upon the minutes of the proceedings of the court for that day; but from the reading of this it appears that the grand jury handed these presentments not to the court but to Colonel Bliss, who returned them to the grand jury.

The WITNESS. That is not true, sir.

Q. Then the chairman asked Mr. Ker this question, referring to you: “And [he] failed to prepare indictments in those cases?”

The WITNESS. I did not prepare any indictments in those cases.

Q. Now you say that it was the duty of Mr. Ker to prepare those indictments. If that was so, then if there was any negligence in the discharge of that duty after the grand jury had indicted parties, that negligence was on the part of Mr. Ker, and not of yourself?—A. Yes, sir, absolutely; but I do not consider that, under the circumstances of the case, there was any neglect. Mr. Ker had to do in say three days what it would have taken at least four days to do, and therefore he had to pick out the part of the work that was most urgent and that he could do in that time, and leave the rest.

Q. Then, as a matter of fact, the grand jury did present those men, but, through the neglect of somebody, or else as a result of consultation between you gentlemen, those indictments were never prepared?—A. That is true. As district attorney I have frequently taken that responsibility.

Q. But you cannot say whose was the negligence in this case?—A. I do not think it was anybody's negligence.

Q. Did you consult about it and come to the conclusion that it was advisable to prepare those indictments?—A. I found that Mr. Ker had not drawn all the indictments. I spoke with him about it, and he said he had not drawn them all and there was no necessity for drawing them all, because some of these parties were already covered by indictments. I looked them over and picked out one or two that he did not propose to draw and suggested that he had better crowd those in. He was sitting up all night at the Department, and there were one or two additional indictments that he did draw, but which I think he would not have drawn except for my suggestion.

Q. What was the reason those men were not indicted after they had been presented by the grand jury?—A. Because there was no time.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How would Mr. Ker know what cases had been presented by the grand jury unless you gave him that information?—A. Because they were given to the clerk of the court, and if the presentments were made while the court was in session, and if he was in court, he would ordinarily get the presentments from the clerk. Sometimes he took them and sometimes I took them.

Q. But the mere presentments would not give him knowledge of the facts upon which they were made?—A. No, sir.

Q. Whose duty was it to bring before him the facts upon which he could base the indictments?—A. I cannot tell you. I see that he says it was my duty. I do not think so; but that is a matter that I—

Q. (Interposing.) Well, did you bring to his knowledge the facts upon which indictments could be made, in the cases of Sanderson, Barringer and others, for perjury?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When did you bring that information to his knowledge upon which he could base indictments against Sanderson and others for perjury?—A. O, as soon as the presentments were found. He knew it all at that time; it was all a matter of discussion.

Q. He did not appear before the grand jury?—A. No; but he knew everything that was there.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Were not all the facts upon which you expected to rely in the presentation of these cases to the grand jury, and upon which you were going to ask indictments, in possession of the counsel even before the grand jury convened?—A. I do not remember when that March grand jury convened.

Q. Well, before the cases went to the grand jury at all?—A. O, yes, sir.

Q. Now, then, was it not entirely practicable to have those indictments drawn before the cases were presented?—A. No, sir; I think not.

Q. Would the result be this, that if the grand jury did not find indictments it would be simply so much work wasted?—A. The difficulty about it was that Mr. Ker was so busy during the few days when these presentments were made and before the grand jury adjourned. Mr. Ker was kept busy all the time, and very frequently he and his corps of clerks worked all night.

Q. You were district attorney for the southern district of New York for eight years?—A. Four years.

Q. Have you not known, in your office there, indictments to be drawn and perfected ready to receive the signature of the foreman before the facts were submitted to the grand jury at all?—A. I presume that has been done, but I do not recall it. I doubt whether it was done in New York; the fact is, when I was district attorney there we could not jump until we got to the fence; we could not draw indictments in advance; and more than once, as district attorney, I failed to have indictments prepared in time for the grand jury.

Q. But there would not be much trouble in drawing an indictment for perjury based on a sworn affidavit?—A. Well, an indictment for perjury in the straw-bond cases is not the little paper that you might consider it, at least not in the way that Mr. Ker would draw it.

Q. Among the persons indicted for perjury, was J. L. Sanderson one?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. He was a prominent mail contractor, was he not?—A. He was.

Q. There was some question, was there not, as to whether he should not have been indicted in other cases?—A. It was decided, as Mr. Merrick has told you, by us all that he was not properly indicted in the conspiracy cases with the Dorsey combination.

Q. That is the same Sanderson?—A. I presume it is.

Q. In selecting the more important cases, as you have said you did, how happened it that you did not include J. L. Sanderson, who was one of the largest contractors and beneficiaries of these star-route frauds?—A. For two reasons. In the first place, none of us felt any certainty that these indictments for perjury could be sustained. In the second place, we should have the witnesses available to prove perjury in the Dorsey cases, but we should not have them in the Sanderson case; we should have had to bring them from Colorado, while in the other cases we had the facts in a nutshell, and we preferred to test the question there first.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. At the same time that you were engaged before the grand jury, you were engaged before the police court also, and so had double duty?—A. I think not; I think the fact is that when we were before the police court a grand jury was sitting, but it was the grand jury that was sitting on the first Dorsey indictment, and on that indictment no district attorney went before the grand jury. I will explain that when I get a little further along. My impression would be that the grand jury was in session at the same time that the police court proceedings were going on, or during a portion of the time, but I think that no district attorney went before the grand jury at the same time the police court cases were pending. Mr. Ker had the impression that I went before the grand jury that found the first Dorsey indictment. Perhaps I may as well explain about that now. The grand jury by which the first

Dorsey indictment was found, which was afterwards quashed as to Rerdell by reason of the fact that he was indicted only by his initials, had no district attorney before it on that indictment. Mr. Woodward was sent in with the papers on a given route, and he would go through them and explain before the jury. It was alleged, and I guess truly, that Mr. Woodward used to kind of sum up the case before the grand jury on each route. He was full of the matter and he used to make a statement of his views. The strawbond cases went before the grand jury in the same way, without any district-attorney. It is not the practice here for the district-attorney to go before the grand jury, and moreover, in that particular case and at that particular time, Mr. William A. Cook was very anxious to get before the grand jury, and I did not mean that he should, but I could not well go before them and leave him out, so no district attorney went. The first indictment was found, therefore, with no district attorney before the grand jury. This is pertinent to some discussion, which was conducted at considerable length and with considerable ingenuity, with reference to Mr. Woodward going before the grand jury in connection with the Venita and Las Vegas and other routes. No district attorney went before the grand jury that found the first Dorsey indictment, and none before the one that found the strawbond indictments, so far as they were found at that same term, and I think they were all found then. Subsequently, when we found the error in that indictment and had to get a new one ready, we had to do it in a hurry, and it was announced publicly in court that I was before the grand jury trying to get another indictment. I was, and we got that through much more quickly than the other, examining only twenty-four witnesses instead of forty-nine. That was the same grand jury that did not indict in the Venita and Las Vegas case. The business was put before them in the same way upon the one route as on the other, and they indicted in the Dorsey case, but did not indict in the other case. Now, the examination here was directed to show that I put Mr. Woodward in there before that grand jury only as a witness, and did not give him a chance. That is true. The fact was that on the 11th of April there had come up a plea in abatement on the first indictment, in which the parties set out that—

At and during the time the grand jury was considering the matters charged against said defendant, as set forth in said pretended indictment, one P. H. Woodward, an inspector of the Post-Office Department, and a layman, who was not an officer of this court, without personal knowledge of the matters and things connected with, concerning, or in any wise appertaining to any of the post-routes and the alleged acts of the said defendants, about which the grand jury was inquiring, was selected and sent before the said grand jury by some person or persons to the said defendant unknown, and that the said Woodward, claiming to be regularly subpoenaed and sworn as a witness in the case of the United States against the said defendant, when, in truth and fact, he was not so subpoenaed and sworn, was permitted to, and did, enter the grand jury room while said grand jury was in session, and considering the matter as aforesaid, and was permitted to, and did, make verbal and written statements of matters and things not of his personal knowledge, but derived from writings and ex parte statements made by other persons, and did produce, use, and read various statements prepared by himself, purporting to be narratives of pretended facts, together with observations, inferences, deductions, surmises, and innuendoes of his own, skillfully blended and ingeniously arranged so as to falsely represent the lawful acts of the said defendant, for the purpose of affecting and influencing improperly the minds of the members of the said grand jury.

They came in so late to file that plea that we were able to object that they had waived their opportunity to do so. We also objected that if the grand jury, having a witness before them, received inadmissible evidence, that did not invalidate the indictment. Mr. Woodward had gone before the grand jury without any district attorney, and they had allowed him to take his own course. Now, when I went before the second grand jury, I had this matter in mind. I did not believe then, and I do not believe now, that if Mr. Woodward did these alleged things before that first grand jury, and if you could get proper evidence of that fact, the indictment could stand. At all events I thought that in a case where Mr. Woodward was sent with papers to produce them before the grand jury and identify them, if the grand jury took him up, and questioned him, and allowed him to explain and to sum up the cases, that was a very different thing from what it would be if I, being there as the district attorney with Mr. Woodward as a witness, should permit him to go on and do the same thing. I didn't think I had any right to do that, and therefore when I had him as a witness before the grand jury on the Vinita and Las Vegas case, I confined, or tried to confine, him strictly to his duty as a witness, producing papers and identifying them, and explaining the methods of the Department. He was so full of the business that he did want continually to get in other things, so that I had to stop him. There never was a word of complaint from him about it; but I think he always felt that he did not have quite so good an opportunity before that grand jury as he did before the other, and I do not think myself that he had. These were the motives that governed me in what I did in that case, and I think I was right.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. What was done with that plea in abatement?—A. It was too late. It was argued at considerable length, and the judge said he thought that even if the grand jury had taken inadmissible evidence it would not invalidate the indictment.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Did you tell Mr. Ker to cease preparing indictments, because you had agreed to arbitrate certain of these cases?—A. I am coming to that directly, if you will allow me. Now, with reference to the indictments: The Star of March 20, 1882, contains an interview with Mr. Ker, taken from the Philadelphia Times, in which he says:

“Colonel Bliss didn't supervise the bills of indictment at all; they were left entirely to me. Sometimes, coming into my office out of mere friendship, he would casually glance over the sheets as they lay on the table, but he never examined any of them. When the papers went before the grand jury no one thought there would be so much work. There was altogether too much for one grand jury. Colonel Bliss has been at the cases five or six months, and he has been working almost night and day. I have known him to continue his examination of the contracts many a time up to 4 o'clock in the morning. The cases will come up next Thursday. I expect that the court will make some peremptory order, and then I suppose I will be called to Washington to resume work.”

When questioned concerning Colonel Cook's reference to the irregular manner in which the counsel had been employed, he (Mr. Ker) said that he knew of no irregularity. On the contrary, he thought that so far as his knowledge of the law went everything had been done regularly and properly.

“There is enough documentary evidence on file now,” said Mr. Ker in conclusion, “to convict these people without the use of a single witness on the stand.”

As to the indictments, my view of Mr. Ker's relation to the business is not entirely the same as his. He states that he was expected simply to do clerical work—simply to take names that were furnished to him. I do not think that was entirely so. He had all the papers and all the evidence, and while it was suggested to him that certain names should go in, yet it was a matter of discretion with him as to what should go in. It was agreed, in general terms (and that is the way Sanderson came in) that every one who had made an affidavit on any one of the routes should be put in. As to the list of names referred to, from which Mr. Ker prepared the indictment, if my memory serves me right, and if I am correctly informed by one of the clerks who assisted him, he is wrong in supposing that the list was in my handwriting. It was in Mr. Woodward's. That, however, is unimportant. The selection was made among us all. Mr. Woodward has testified before you that he was responsible for the error in the name of Vaile, who was called "Henry" in the indictment instead of "Harvey."

Now, a word as to the question of initials. Mr. Ker says that the omission of the name and the use of the initials was right, and that I told him the name could not be found. In that he is wrong. I never was asked to find out about the name; there never was any inquiry made about the name. To show you how little inquiry there was made, M. C. Rerdell's name appeared correctly in the Washington Directory of that year, and yet they say it cannot be found. In conversation with three of the clerks who were actively engaged in assisting Mr. Ker at that time, I find that they say that he is wrong, and that there was no inquiry made in reference to this point until after the question about the initials was raised in court. The only reference there was to the initials before that was this: In looking over the indictments about 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning, before they were to go into court, I saw that the initials of Rerdell and others were there, and I suggested that it was necessary to allege that the first name was unknown, and that that would make the indictment correct. Mr. Ker said it was not, and that I was misled by a recollection of the rule that where you undertake to plead a forged instrument you must allege that cannot make a copy of it, or something of that sort, and that what I suggested was not necessary. I do not think I was entirely convinced, and yet Mr. Ker knew so much more about criminal pleading than I did that I accepted his view and let it pass. I presume the sheet might have been rewritten and a new one put in, but it passed off as a mere casual matter. I repeat that I had nothing to do with looking for the name. Mr. Ker is mistaken about that, and I cannot think that there was any serious attempt made to find it at that time, because as I have said the Washington Directory of that year had Rerdell's name in full.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Ker desires to make a statement in regard to the point of his alleged connection with this jury-bribery matter.

Mr. KER. In giving my testimony before this committee some days ago, I told them that I had no criticisms to make upon anybody else; that I desired simply to give them the facts as I knew them personally, or as they had come to my knowledge; and that is what I did. I did not criticise anybody. The facts that I stated were those that were either on record or of which I was personally cognizant. In my statement of a conversation that I had with Mr. Merrick about Mr. Bliss, I simply stated what Mr. Merrick had said to me. I did not give the conversation as embodying my own views. The subsequent matters about the use of the Dorsey dinner bill of fare on the trial, the interview with Mr. Bliss published in the New York Herald, the failure of Mr. Bliss to mention Dorsey in his summing up, all these things I stated here as the moving causes which led Mr. Merrick to go to the Ebbitt House and engage rooms for me in which to receive and examine witnesses. If it had not been necessary to make that explanation in regard to an item of expenditure that had been criticised, I should not have mentioned the matter at all.

Now, as to what Colonel Bliss calls my misstatements here about what occurred on the trial, probably when the Attorney-General comes upon the stand, he, having been in court with me at the time, will be able to tell the committee just what did occur. Certainly an attempt was made to introduce that book.

The CHAIRMAN. You desired to make some statement, I believe, in relation to the use of your name in connection with the alleged attempts to bribe the first star-route jury.

The WITNESS. Yes. It is the first time that I ever knew that my name was mentioned in connection with any attempt to bribe the jury—the first time I ever heard of it at all. The facts of the case are that I was in Mr. Merrick's office when Mr. Brewster Cameron came there and said that he had been asked by somebody to go and see Mr. William Dickson, the foreman of the jury, as Dickson wanted to talk to him. Mr. Cameron had come around to consult with the counsel to know whether it would be proper for him to go and talk with Dickson or not, as Dickson was the foreman of the jury. Mr. Merrick at once told Mr. Cameron to go. Mr. Cameron objected to going, saying that there might be some reflection cast upon him for going to see the foreman of the jury. Mr. Merrick said that he supposed that Dickson's object in desiring to see Cameron was a proper one; no doubt he intended to give him some information connected with some attempt to bribe the jury, some information that would be a benefit to the Government, and we both agreed that Mr. Cameron should go and see Mr. Dickson. That is what occurred. That is what I personally know about it, and that is all I had to do with the matter. Mr. Merrick was there with me and he will say the same thing. I know by hearsay that Mr. Cameron went to see Mr. Dickson, but I did not see him and had no conversation at all with him. I had nothing to do with that. I have stated all that I had to do with the matter. I have told the whole story so far as my connection with that business was concerned.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you say that Mr. Cameron did not see Mr. Dickson?—A. He did not see him; that is, he did not converse with him.

Q. Is that all you know about the bribery business?—A. That is all that I know or had anything to do with, except to prepare the indictments against the parties.

Q. Was there any investigation started, with your knowledge or after consulting with you, for the purpose of determining whether efforts had been made to bribe the jury; if so, what were they?—A. Yes, sir; there was some effort made to ascertain that; as I stated in my examination before, that matter was put into the hands of Mr. H. H. Wells as special counsel; there are some eight people who were indicted in connection with that matter. Mr. Falls I did not know; I never saw the man in my life that I know of; I had no connection with those people whatever, either through a detective or by a detective. I had no detective.

Q. If there were any Democrats in that jury-bribery matter, who were they?—A. Well, Mr. Dickson is reputed to be a Democrat, and he is the only one I know of that was mentioned in connection with that matter; the rest are so-called Republicans, so far as I have been able to learn, although I do not know that that is the fact; we never investigated their politics.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. So far as politics are concerned, you were a Democrat and Mr. Merrick was a Democrat?—A. Yes, sir; and I am not sorry to say that.

Q. Mr. Cameron was a Republican?—A. Yes, sir. He was the general agent of the Department of Justice, and my idea in coinciding with Mr. Merrick in advising Mr. Cameron to go and see Dickson was that as he was the head of the secret or detective service of the Department of Justice, I thought if there was anybody who ought to go to see Mr. Dickson to ascertain whether any crime had been attempted he was a fit person. We had a very high appreciation of Mr. Dickson's character at that time; believed that it was away above the ordinary, and that he would not do anything wrong, but probably desired to see Mr. Cameron to tell him about some attempt in the interest of the defendants to bribe the jury.

In regard to what Mr. Bliss has said about Mr. Cameron and myself, I desire to say here that Mr. Cameron is a high-toned gentleman whose friendship I am proud of. I have never seen anything in his character that would lead me to think him anything else, and he has never approached me as Mr. Bliss suggests, or anything of that kind. I did not know that he and Colonel Bliss were on bad terms; on the contrary, I thought they were on reasonably good terms. Mr. Cameron never suggested to me what I should say here, nor did any other person. I told the facts which led to the expenditure for the rooms which I occupied at the Ebbitt House, and I told them for the purpose of explaining that item of expenditure and without any feeling at all against Colonel Bliss.

MR. BLISS. I think I have a right to object. I don't think it is proper to have a running commentary upon my evidence until I get through with it. I may say here that my understanding of Mr. Ker's connection with the bribery business was precisely as he has stated—the sending of Mr. Cameron to Mr. Dickson. It was an extraordinary thing to do, but Mr. Merrick concurred in it, and I had nothing to say about it.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. You did not know at the time that Mr. Merrick and Mr. Ker had advised Mr. Cameron to make this visit to Mr. Dickson?—A. I did not. It was a perfect surprise to me.

Q. Did you not know that this morning, when you made your statement about it?—A. I knew that they had advised him to go, but I did not know the motives that influenced them, nor anything about them. I certainly thought it was a very extraordinary thing to do; and I mean to say now that if anybody standing less high than Mr. Merrick had done such a thing I should have felt very strongly about it, but Mr. Merrick stands so high as an honorable man, and is so honorable a man, that I do not criticise his conduct in that matter.

If Mr. Merrick believed that an attempt had been made to approach the foreman of the jury it would have been proper for him as Government counsel to have ascertained that fact, would it not, in your judgment?—A. No, sir; if you want to know my opinion. If I learn that there is an attempt made upon a jurymen in a case on trial, and I am the prosecuting officer, I have no right as a prosecuting officer to get into communication with the jury. My duty is to go to the court and tell the court that I have learned certain things, and let the court deal with the matter.

Q. But they had not learned the facts; they wanted to learn them.—A. Well, I don't think a prosecuting officer has any right to communicate with any member of the jury after the jury is empaneled on any subject connected with the case. That is the doctrine in which I have been brought up.

Q. But if a jurymen desires to communicate with the counsel, and to inform them that an improper attempt has been made—A. (Interposing.) If a jurymen should, under those circumstances, come to me, I should say to him, "You can not talk to me, sir; I will take you right to the court." That is my view of it.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE :

Q. Your idea is that it was an error of judgment, instead of any evil purpose on the part of these gentlemen?—A. Oh, certainly. I had no idea that there was any wrong intention. I would not think of reflecting on Mr. Merrick by assuming that he would do a thing of that kind from any improper purpose or motive.

Q. But you, exercising your discretion under similar circumstances, would have refused to have had any personal interview. Instead of having a personal interview with a jurymen, you would have sent him to the court?—A. Yes, sir; I would not have had anything to do with a jurymen.

Mr. MILLIKEN (to Mr. Ker). Inasmuch as you spoke, Mr. Ker, of Mr. Brewster Cameron as you did, I desire to ask you whether or not you are convinced, from your connection with these cases, that the Department of Justice prosecuted them in good faith and with the desire to convict the guilty parties?

Mr. KER. I want to say that we had the entire moral and active support of the Attorney-General and of every person connected with his Department; and I want to say further that, so far as I was able to judge, we had the active support and sympathy of the President. I, on one or two occasions, from what I saw in the newspapers, was led to what Colonel Bliss says was suspicion on that point, but I subsequently ascertained that, so far as the President was concerned, he undoubtedly desired that the cases should be prosecuted to the end.

Mr. BLISS. Inasmuch as that matter has been gone into, let me say that there is no question that the prosecution had the active and entire support of the Department of Justice. If there was any error permitted by the Department, it was in manifesting too much zeal and earnestness, which led sometimes to the overstepping of the limits.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Do you not believe, Mr. Bliss, from your connection with these cases, that the attorneys on the part of the Government, both Democrats and Republicans, acted according to the best of their judgment and ability, and prosecuted the cases faithfully and for the purpose of convicting the guilty parties?—A. I do, sir. I never saw more earnestness, more zeal, or more disregard of personal comfort manifested in any case than was exhibited by the counsel engaged in the prosecution of the star-route cases.

Without concluding the hearing of Mr. Bliss, the committee adjourned.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 19, 1884.

GEORGE BLISS, examination resumed.

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed with your statement, Mr. Bliss.

The WITNESS. I had spoken yesterday of the failure to indict certain persons. There seems to be an idea suggested in Mr. Ker's remarks that it was my duty to see that the grand jury kept minutes. I never heard that described as the duty of the district attorney, and I certainly never had anything to do with it. I doubt very much whether the district attorney has a right to interfere in that matter. I did not know whether the grand jury kept any minutes or not. It turns out that they did keep minutes, and then by arrangement destroyed them. The first I ever heard of that was from Mr. Ker's testimony.

A question was put by some member of the committee in a way that implied that there was some dereliction of duty in not having tried some of the other cases. All I have to say is that I did my best to have some of the other cases tried. On the 22d of November, 1883, I wrote to Mr. Merrick as follows:

NOVEMBER 22, 1883.

MY DEAR MERRICK: Ker has two or three times suggested the wisdom of getting some other case or cases ready for trial in case the Kellogg case cannot be tried at the time fixed. There seems to me to be some wisdom in this; but, if so, what case or cases?

There are the Boone cases and the Cabell cases; I mean the fraudulent bond cases against those who went security for Boone and Cabell. As to Boone's cases, we might be embarrassed by the fact that we entered a nolle against Boone. This would certainly be the case in the conspiracy cases where Boone was charged as a conspirator, and, from the nature of the case, the chief one, who was to be benefited by the act of the others. There are perjury charges against three or four persons as to which the Boone objection would not have the same force. As I have told you personally, the second batch of bogus bonds in the Boone bids put in after we had publicly attached the whole seem to me particularly censurable. In this case one paid for his sureties, and they came and committed open perjury, as Boone claimed, with no knowledge on his part that it was false. As to them, the evidence is in much confusion. The bond on the faith of which they justified is well defined, and not only the false value they put upon it clear, but the knowledge that it was false is clearly shown.

In the other Boone cases the property is in West Virginia and Kentucky, illy defined, disputed titles, value speculative, &c. In these cases there would, under the conspiracy indictment, be some strength derived from the fact that the Government was really defrauded, for Boone failed as a contractor. I think, but am not sure, that this would apply as to Boone's second lot of bids, in which the —— testified.

Ker seems strong for testing some of Cabell's bondsmen, chiefly because two of them are clerks in the Interior Department. One of them, Dickson, I have not thought very criminal. In Cabell case the property was moved around from one to the other, not justifying in it in terms to insure amounts. But I think Cabell never failed as a contractor, and that, therefore, the Government suffered no real loss in money. The property, too, is the West Virginia and Kentucky stuff, to which proof is long winded—a matter of opinion and expensive to get.

Besides these bond cases we have various cases against Brady. It does not occur to me that any of them are sure of success, or anything like it. There are one or two against —— much weaker than the Dorsey case, but of the same nature; a lot against F. P. Lilly, a former deputy auditor, dependent in great measure upon old man Brott, who is also indicted, and who, if alive and reliable, is superannuated, I think.

That is not correct as to Brott; it refers to a man named Fisher, I think.

I don't entirely fancy the indictments in these cases either.

There are probably other cases, but they don't occur to me now, and I have no list at hand. Think this business over and write me or telegraph to me when Spencer unites us.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE BLISS.

HON. R. T. MERRICK.

Mr. Merrick and I had some conversation, in which he took the ground that it was coming down to take such small cases, and nothing more was said or done, I think, until on the 31st of January Mr. Merrick wrote me, in reply to my letter, as follows:

As to the other cases referred to, and their trial, I will consider the matter and consult with the Attorney-General on his return. There are peculiar circumstances connected with the Kellogg and Brady cases that render it impossible for me to withdraw from them, but I am not inclined to take part in any others from which I can with propriety be relieved. This is not for the public.

I suppose there is no harm, however, in giving it to the public now Mr. Merrick subsequently to this wrote a letter to the Attorney-General, dated January 7, in which he said :

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 7, 1884.

DEAR SIR: During your absence from the city, on the occasion of your recent visit to New Orleans, I received a letter from Colonel Bliss suggesting that as neither the Kellogg case nor the Brady case could be tried at present, it would probably be expedient that we should get some of the other star-route cases, of less difficulty and importance, ready for hearing and have them disposed of.

I replied to Colonel Bliss's letter, stating that I would see you in regard to the subject as soon as you returned, and that it was my purpose to ask your permission to withdraw from all the star-route cases, except the two I have particularly indicated above; and that, whilst I would be much gratified if I could get rid also of those two, nevertheless there were circumstances connected with them, as he was aware, placing me under such professional obligations to you and to the Government, that I felt compelled to remain in them until they might be finally tried and disposed of.

There are a number of indictments pending for perjury, procuring, executing, and filing fraudulent bonds, &c., in connection with star-route matters, that should be tried; but I am inclined to the opinion that they do not require, in their management, any other special counsel than Colonel Bliss himself, and I beg that you will release me from my duty in connection with them under the appointment you did me the honor to confer upon me as special assistant Attorney-General.

Please notify me at what hour it will be convenient for you to allow me the honor of an interview upon the matter referred to.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

R. T. MERRICK,
Special Assistant Attorney-General.

HON. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER.

That was January, 1884. At or about that time, I think it was a little prior to that time, the Attorney-General notified me that he desired that nothing further should be done in any of the cases. The committee will see that Mr. Merrick was mistaken in his testimony on Saturday when he said that he took the view that the cases should be tried by the district attorney. His suggestion was that they should be tried by me.

The witness, John A. Walsh, makes various statements which I had made memoranda to refer to, but I have occupied so much time that I will pass over many of them. It seems proper, however, to refer to the statement which he made as to my interest in the National Republican. In the first place, I did not become interested in the paper until February or March, 1882. My interest in it was one seventy-sixth. I had no control over it, and I had nothing to do with it. I went into it for the purpose of seeing if I could prevent some of the attacks which were being made upon the prosecution, and from the time that the paper passed into the possession of the gentlemen who purchased it in connection with me, those attacks ceased. There were two or three occasions on which reporters got in items that had no business to be there, and I took pains to go and remonstrate, and I was assured that one or two of the reporters had been dismissed, and that that sort of thing should stop, and I think it did stop. Therefore, the statement that the Republican continued hostile to the prosecution is not true. In point of fact, however, when that paper was bought there were certain gentlemen connected with it who, from circumstances amounting to contract practically, could not be dropped from it directly, and they remained, and they undoubtedly had more or less sympathy with the defendants, especially with Brady, who had owned the paper while they were connected with it. But I am confident that the statement that there was anything in the Republican attacking the prosecution after we bought it is untrue. Mr. Walsh says that I had negotiations with Brady for the purchase of that paper. I had no negotiations with Brady. I never spoke to Brady in my life in any manner; the only time I ever saw him was when I was prosecuting him. I had no negotiations with him, and nothing to do with him.

Mr. Walsh says that I attacked him publicly. Now that is not true. He based the statement upon an interview alleged to have been published, and which I have no doubt was published, in some of the Western papers. If that interview occurred, as I think it did, it is not correctly stated, and the matter was subsequently explained to Mr. Walsh, apparently to his satisfaction. A reporter came to see me about the cases, and wanted to know about route 40101 and why it was not taken up in preference to the Dorsey case. I told him the difficulty was one not of the individual, but of the nature of the case; that the case of route 40101 depended, as I thought (and as I think I shall show the committee before I get through), upon the evidence of a single witness, and that if that witness went away, or died, or dropped out in any way, of course the case would be gone. I was particular to say to the reporter that I was speaking of a general theory—that I was speaking, not with reference to any particular individual, but upon the general theory that it is unwise to have a case depending upon a single witness, and that I intended no reflection whatever upon Mr. Walsh. In publishing the interview, I understand that that qualification was omitted. However, the matter was subsequently stated and explained to Walsh, and we were afterwards on the best of terms, and I supposed that he understood it all, and I think he did.

Instead of my attacking Mr. Walsh, Mr. Walsh certainly, as I think the committee will have no question, did attack me, and attack me very early. He did it by a letter to the Attorney-General, and by a letter to the President, and in connection with that I call your attention to some correspondence not hitherto produced. On the 12th of November, 1882, I received from Mr. Brewster a letter, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, November 12, 1882.

DEAR SIR: With this I inclose to you copy of a letter received from Mr. John Walsh, which I think should be brought to your knowledge.

Very respectfully,

BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq.,
Special Counsel, &c., 150 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

On November 30 Mr. Brewster wrote me another letter, which I now produce. After referring to transmitting certain other papers, and to a conversation with the Postmaster-General (in which the Postmaster-General, let me say, referred to the matter of the proposed arbitration—it is important only as showing one step in the progress of all that matter), he goes on to say:

I also, some week or so ago, sent to you a copy of a letter from —— Walsh transmitted to me. I have not heard from you since then. Will you please give me a reply to it. With this I also send you an interview published by Mr. Walsh in the newspaper since he sent that letter to me, and since I sent it to you. They should both go together, it seems to me. Much that is complained of by Mr. Walsh in that letter has already been disposed of. That the complaints were groundless at the time the action of this Department and of the President has since shown.

The Saulsbury matter and the Kellogg matter are both of great importance, and I desire you to give them both your attention, and furnish me with a reply that will make a proper record upon the subject for the Department and for yourself, so that hereafter if it is made the subject of public complaint or official inquiry the records of the Department will show exactly the real facts of the case, free from those clouded misrepresentations and misinterpretations of official and personal action.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq.,
*Special Counsel for the United States in the Star Route Trials,
No. 160 Broadway, New York City.*

Thereupon, on the 5th of December, I replied to Mr. Brewster by a letter, which I have here, and which I will read as going to show whether I was fair in my treatment of Mr. Walsh:

WASHINGTON, December 5, 1882.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of 30th contains the first intimation I have received that any answer was desired to your favor referring to me the letter of John A. Walsh, complaining of the action of the grand jury recently discharged. I understood it to have been referred to me—by copy—only for my information, as has been done in many other cases.

As you know, I think the grand jury should have found an indictment. At the same time, it was their right to pass upon the evidence. It was possible for them to accept as true all that Mr. Walsh said, and still to think that a link was missing, and giving to the question of indicting a Senator of the United States, sensibly or insensibly, more of scrutiny than they would have given to the case of one less prominent, to refuse to find a bill. This result might have been in a measure precipitated by the fact that Mr. Walsh made manifest his distrust of the grand jury and gave his evidence in a manner which did not secure for it the full weight it was, in my opinion, entitled to.

As to the introduction to the grand jury room of the book referred to by Mr. Walsh, I am unable to agree with him as to its legality. From what I saw while waiting in the anteroom, I am satisfied that the grand jury sent for it to the district attorney, and that the latter procured it from the Congressional Library. At any rate the copy produced bore the stamp of that library. The sending for the book undoubtedly indicated information given to or possessed by some of the jury. It probably indicated bias against Mr. Walsh, but in view of the right of the grand jury to seek its evidence within broad limits, it does not seem to me that the proceeding was illegal.

As to the interview with Mr. Walsh, of which you inclose me a copy, I can only say that I do not think it calls for answer, and if it did I should not think it wise to answer it. Mr. Walsh is an important witness for the Government, though not so important as he was. He has been made to feel the hostility of those against whom he has testified. He feels impatient, injured. In that frame of mind he says things that do injustice to others, and which he will soon be prompt to admit are unjust. Under these circumstances, I do not think it wise to have any controversy or to aggravate feelings already disturbed.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS,
Assistant Attorney.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

On December 29 Mr. Brewster sent me the letter which Mr. Walsh had written to the President. I have Mr. Brewster's letter here, in which he asked me to reply to Walsh's letter, or to make such remarks upon it as I chose. That letter to the President Mr. Walsh has produced here, I understand, though it has not yet appeared in your record. Walsh's letter is dated December 18, 1882. I have a copy of it, but of course I do not care to repeat it in your record.

The CHAIRMAN. No; that is unnecessary. It is in our record.

The WITNESS. Yes; so I understand. In reply, on the 2d of January, 1883, I wrote Mr. Brewster a letter, of which I produce a copy, as follows:

NEW YORK, January 2, 1883.

DEAR SIR: I received, just as I was leaving Washington, on Friday, your favor of the 27th ultimo, transmitting a copy of a letter from John A. Walsh to the President.

Mr. Walsh states that he addresses the President because you have not answered a letter which he addressed to you in November. This last-mentioned letter was referred by you to me, and I beg to remind you of the observations which I made upon it in a letter I addressed to you at that time.

Mr. Walsh was, at the last trial of the case of United States v. Brady and others, an important witness for the Government. He has come to regard himself, as his letter to the President shows, as an essential witness, and disposed to dictate to those in charge of the prosecution what they shall do and how they shall do it, and to set up his own views both of law and expediency as better than those of the gentlemen who are charged with the responsibility of the "star-route cases." He regards his own conduct and character as so pure that he can make charges against them, not only without evidence, but in the face of the very evidence to which he refers.

He has been subjected to much abuse from the defendants in the case on trial and their friends, and therefore some irritation on his part would be excusable, though it hardly justifies him in attacking those who have defended him. There is much in his letter which induces me to believe that he has fallen under the influence of those interested against the Government who are catering to his vanity and desire for revenge, or holding out to him the hope of pecuniary advantage. Bearing in mind these circumstances, I refrain from characterizing the letter as a whole in the terms which it would seem to deserve at my hands. While for reasons not necessary to be gone into here, the Government is not in a position where the testimony of Mr. Walsh would be as important as it undoubtedly was on the former trial, yet he is still a desirable witness, and I do not feel that I ought by any expression of my personal feelings either to tend to discredit him as a witness, or to intensify his present position of dissatisfaction with those whom he claims a desire to aid. But at the same time I reserve the right to make further reply when no possible harm can come to the prosecution by my so doing.

Mr. Walsh expresses his personal distrust of the sincerity of the prosecutors and his dissent from the judgment exercised by them in selecting the particular case to be first tried. Without pausing here to suggest that he is not in a position to judge as to either fact, and not by education or experience competent to judge, I may observe that after he testified on the last trial he voluntarily stated to me that though he had at one time doubted whether we had selected wisely, he was then thoroughly convinced that we were right.

Mr. Walsh complains that there was some conspiracy or contrivance by which a former grand jury failed to find an indictment upon his testimony. He makes a special and gratuitous fling at some unnamed member of the President's Cabinet, but does not dare to name him or to assert what he did. Indeed, he refers to the matter only as a report or rumor. The only act of any one indicated by him is the introduction into the grand jury room of a book purporting to contain evidence given before a committee of the Senate.

As to the latter, I have already expressed my views in my letter in reply to Mr. Walsh's communication to you, to which I have referred. The book was, as I infer, sent for by the grand jury. They had, as I think, a right so to do, but whether this was so or not, there is no evidence that it was anything but an error of judgment, and certainly not a transaction which should lead to a general denunciation, not only of the grand jury, but of the prosecution, and of you, because you do not proceed to investigate and indict the grand jury or others.

A brief statement of the history of matters will serve to dispose of much of what Mr. Walsh says:

Mr. Walsh was a witness before one grand jury in May or June. Upon his testimony and that of several witnesses summoned from Texas, James B. Price and Thomas J. Brady were indicted for conspiracy in connection with certain mail routes in Texas. In the course of that examination before the grand jury Mr. Walsh, in referring to certain post-office drafts, casually mentioned that they were brought to him by a Mr. Kellogg, and it was only accidentally that it was brought out whom he meant. Neither I nor any one representing the Government had up to that time ever heard the name of Mr. Kellogg in connection with the matter, and he was not then, as I understood it, mentioned as a person whose connection with it was in any sense criminal. Some days after the grand jury had adjourned I heard reports, obviously set afloat by Walsh, that the case had not been pushed before the grand jury as against Senator Kellogg. I at once stated to my associate counsel that the grand jury must be recalled. They concurred with me, though I am under the impression that they did not attach so much importance to it as I did, for the reason that it was my action or failure to act, which the rumors impugned. I applied to Judge Wylie to reconvene the grand jury. He hesitated; in fact, intimated that he should decline, whereupon I stated the facts to him in detail and begged him as a matter of personal justice, if such a thing was proper to be considered, to reconvene the grand jury. He did reconvene it. Mr. Walsh was put before it as a witness. On the first day he testified only partially, as he afterwards stated to me, because he did not mean to tell anything more than he thought was necessary to secure an indictment.

What he stated on the first day was calculated to raise suspicions against Mr. Kellogg, but not much more. For the purpose of procuring more testimony and enabling or inducing him to produce some corroborative proof, I induced the grand jury to adjourn to another day. On that day Mr. Walsh gave much more testimony. He produced some papers. I questioned him carefully and in detail, until he stated that he had told all he knew. He made a much stronger case against Mr. Kellogg than the previous day, a case in which, if I had been a grand juror, I think I should have voted to find an indictment against Mr. Kellogg. At the same time there was a gap left in the case as disclosed by his testimony, for though it showed Mr. Kellogg's connection with and possession of the postal drafts which was alleged to have been given in pursuance of the conspiracy; though Mr. Kellogg was shown to have interested himself to prevent investigation; and though there were other things indicating Mr. Kellogg's wrongful connection with the matter, still a conscientious grand juror could, I think, be of the opinion that the evidence was not sufficient as to Mr. Kellogg to show criminality.

Mr. Walsh did not on either day give his testimony in a manner to inspire entire confidence, and there were some improbabilities in some portions of it. It was a case where two men equally honest might differ. It was, moreover, a case where if an indictment had been found there could have been no conviction without further testimony. The grand jury in fact refused to find a bill. They did so, as I have been informed, by a vote substantially unanimous. Whether this conclusion was wrong or right, it is certain that the fact that the conclusion was arrived at, even in connection with the introduction into the grand jury room of the book I have referred to, does not alone constitute ground for charges of criminality against the grand jury. Nor is it necessary to assume, as Mr. Walsh does, that because the grand jury did not indict they did not believe him.

Mr. Walsh is, however, in no position to complain of the action of the Government, for he is at this moment evading the service of subpoena on him requiring him to appear and testify before a grand jury, to which the Government is prepared to present evidence to sustain Mr. Walsh, evidence procured by the Government after great trouble. Mr. Walsh knows that we desire his presence; he knows for what purpose we desire it, and he knows that the confirmatory evidence the Government has is the precise evidence he desired should be obtained, and yet he evades service, and sends word to us that we can serve him if we can find him, and that he will come to Washington only when he gets ready. For ten days we have had men watching for him in two cities. We know that he has received our letters. We know that he has seen his counsel to whom we have stated what we desired, and he refuses to appear. He prefers to write a long letter complaining of the Government for not doing the very thing it is seeking to do, and to do which it desires from him only the assistance which every good citizen owes to his Government. Judging by past experience he will soon give his entire correspondence to the public, and thereby aid them whom he claims to be seeking to punish. I trust that he may not so do in such a manner as to compel the Government to make public the real facts of the case, for that would go far to destroy the effect of the evidence we hope to obtain from him, for the human mind is so made up that a witness who so acts does not, even when he is telling the undoubted truth, receive the same credence as he would if he had come forward frankly and promptly.

I do not feel called upon here to refer in detail to Mr. Walsh's insinuations as to the charges against other persons claimed to have been implicated in the star-route frauds. The action of counsel in these cases has been fully reported to and approved to you. There is much more reason to believe that Mr. Walsh is at the present moment engaged with others formerly connected with the prosecution in a scheme to procure money from these alleged criminals than there is to distrust the sincerity or judgment of any one now concerned in the prosecution.

Mr. Walsh's statement as to what occurred on the former trial, as to my alleged neglect to urge the case against Mr. S. W. Dorsey, as to my being rebuked by other counsel, and as to the action of the court, is shown by the record to be thoroughly false.

For the reasons already suggested, you will perceive that it is very desirable that nothing that Mr. Walsh shall say or do should lead to a publication of this letter until after the pending trial is finished, unless his future course shall be such as to lead counsel to consider it unsafe to call him as a witness.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS,
Special Assistant District Attorney.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

In my previous testimony here I expressed the belief or the recollection that Mr. Walsh's testimony before the grand jury on the first day was full, and that he did not add much to it on the second day. I see by this letter, which was written when the matter was, of course, fresh in my mind, that I was wrong about that, and I see by Mr. Walsh's testimony that he states that he did not testify fully the first day. I submit that it is evident from that letter that I was sufficiently careful about not undertaking to discredit Mr. Walsh; but he says that I ought to have selected route No. 40101 for prosecution instead of the Dorsey case——

Mr. STEWART (interposing). I do not suppose that it is necessary to answer that expression of opinion.

The WITNESS. I am not going into that in detail. After the expression of opinion by Mr. Merrick on that subject, I do not think it is necessary for me to go into it in detail. What I do desire in that connection is to show something that every member of the committee will see is important. Walsh refers to the fact that Hinds was an important witness, and that Hinds could have testified in that case to important transactions with Brady, and he says that he (Walsh) would have come in simply to confirm the statements of Hinds. Now, in point of fact, as to the prosecution of Hinds, and his transactions with Brady, the statute of limitations had run against them. Then, in the second place, I have here the affidavit of Hinds, taken by Mr. Woodward, in which it appears that Hinds had no personal knowledge of the payment of money to Brady, or of any corrupt negotiations on Brady's part. There was a Mr. Brown that Hinds had negotiations with, and to whom he paid money, and part of Walsh's money went to Brown, but Hinds never was permitted to go any further than the outer door of Brady's room. Brown went in with a commission to accomplish certain things, but he did not accomplish them. He accomplished them in part, but not in full. However, the point I want to call attention to here is the statement of Hinds, to whom Walsh refers as an important witness in that case. This is an affidavit which we had before us at the time we made our decision, and I want to refer to this part of it as showing where that case would have brought us. Mr. Hinds charges distinctly in his affidavit that Walsh was a conspirator with Brady, and that the relations between Walsh and Brady were corrupt. Moreover, Mr. Hinds puts into his affidavit this passage:

After the departure of Brown, Walsh said to Hinds (who is making the affidavit), "When you have any more of the light work to do, let me know. I can do as much with Brady as any man." Hinds replied that he wanted no one's assistance in that kind of business. This occurred October 3, 1878.

Therefore, if we had gone on with that route, No. 40101, relying on Hinds, we should have had, in the first place, a witness who was accusing Walsh of conspiracy, and who was testifying that Walsh had himself used language which implied that his relations to Mr. Brady were not as innocent as he wishes you gentlemen to infer they were. Mr. Hinds made a second affidavit, which related to the route from Las Vegas to Albuquerque, which covered part of the same general ground. Therefore we did not go in on route 40101. Mr. Walsh leaves it in his testimony to be inferred, though perhaps he does not distinctly say, that his being made a witness in behalf of the Government was consequent on his bringing his civil suit against Brady. The little difficulty about that is that he did not bring his suit until a year after he was made a witness. The fact is that all through the summer of 1881, before I came into the case, I have Mr. Woodward's authority for saying that Walsh was dropping in little pieces of information, and giving advice. Mr. Woodward naturally came upon him in the case, because his name appeared on the Price drafts, indorsing them, and everybody whose name appeared on those or any of the papers was to be looked up, as far as possible.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Referring to Hinds's statement, is it to be inferred, from what you have said in regard to it, that Hinds would have testified that the transaction by which expedition was obtained on route 40101 was corrupt?—A. No, sir; he would have testified to this: He would have testified to payments to S. P. Brown, and to a statement by Brown of his dividing with Brady; and obviously the idea thrown out in the whole course of the affair indicated that the money that Brown was getting from McDonough and Kirk and Walsh was corruptly used. And there were some singular transactions; as, for instance, Mr. Brown going with Hinds to Brady's office, Hinds sitting in an outer room, and Brown going in and coming out and saying that there would be an order for expedition that afternoon, and so on. The orders, however, did not come in the precise form in which they were bargained for. Originally they were $20,000 or $30,000 less, and Brown had to go back and try to do something more; but he could not at any time get the compensation up to the point that the original arrangement with Walsh and the others had contemplated. If you ask me my opinion, assuming that Hinds's statement of what occurred with Brown is correct, I should say that if you were dealing with a man of unimpeachable integrity as Postmaster-General, or Second Assistant Postmaster-General, there was nothing in the evidence on which you could come to any other conclusion than that Brown had used his intimacy with Brady to get some money for himself, and that the orders were obtained in the proper way. But when we came to deal with the condition of things which was then and there existing in the Department, the impression on my mind was that the orders on route No. 40101 had been obtained corruptly.

Q. Those and the subsequent orders after Walsh became the contractor?—A. No, sir; I am talking now about the previous orders. As to the orders after Walsh became a contractor, Mr. Walsh originally said to us that his relations to the matter were simply those of a man who had loaned money, and that he was entirely innocent of any wrongdoing. I obtained by accident confirmatory evidence of the fact of the loan—I say by accident, but it was not by accident; it was my own doing. Walsh had stated that he had paid some money to Brady at the office of Hatch & Foote, in New York; that he had drawn the bills from Winslow, Lanier & Co., and had drawn a larger amount from which he had taken the money loaned. I subpoenaed Hatch & Foote, and required them to send their books here and to produce the account. They sent their books over with directions to the clerk who brought them not to let them be seen by anybody until they were produced on the stand. However, I got access to the books before he went on the stand, and I found on the precise day mentioned an entry in Brady's account of the $10,000 borrowed from Walsh, and a memorandum showing that it was paid in cash—not an absolute statement that it was paid in cash, but it was marked "C," and the evidence was that "C" was used to mark cases in which the money was paid in cash, as it was rather an unusual thing in a New York broker's office to have a sum of that kind paid in money. So that that evidence seemed to confirm Walsh's statement. But Walsh's testimony on the trial, particularly as to the matter which seems to have affected Governor Stewart's mind somewhat here, his story of the stealing of the notes by Brady, subjected him to considerable suspicion and criticism as to whether it was true, and if you are asking my opinion about it, my opinion is that Walsh had the money transactions with Brady that he said he had, but I believe they were not loans; I believe they were corrupt; I believe the money was paid for the purpose of securing expedition on route 40101, and probably on some other routes. Now, in that connection I desire to submit some testimony which I have in my possession. I referred to it when I was before the committee the other day, and have had it in my possession all the time, but I confess that I had not read it over with much care until the night before last. The evidence I refer to is the statement which Mr. Walsh mentions as having been made by him, and taken down by Mr. Gibson, and which I told you Mr. Gibson produced at Long Branch when we went there on the 14th of September, 1881. The paper is entirely in Mr. Gibson's handwriting, except as I shall hereafter state. The statement is a long one. It goes over Mr. Walsh's relations to route No. 40101, to Mr. Hinds, and to the other parties. Mr. Gibson, having prepared it, gave it to me, and I had Mr. Walsh come to my room at the Arlington and take up this paper and go through it with me. That is my present recollection. It may be, however, that Gibson gave it to Walsh, and that Walsh brought it to me. However, the important point here is that the paper is altered in the handwriting of Walsh himself all the way through. For instance, on page 33 this is added: "This impression is based on what Hinds has told W." That is in Walsh's handwriting.

Q. That is Walsh's statement from which you are reading?—A. It is Gibson's statement of what Walsh told him, taken down by Gibson and then given to Walsh and corrected by him.

Q. Revised?—A. Revised. But it went further than ordinary revision. After he had made these corrections he came to my room and sat down with me, and we spent several hours going over the statement. I was pretty green in post-office matters then (this was on the 28th of September, 1881), and I did not take in all the points readily. I did not understand, for instance, the matter of subcontracts. I had the whole terminology to learn. As we went along and read the paper we stopped, and I got explanations and made notes on the margin. Here, for instance, with reference to some paper, I have written on the margin "Walsh has it," and all the way through there are such memoranda made by me. Then at the end comes this: "Read to Walsh at the Arlington Hotel, and agreed to as corrected. September 28.—GEORGE BLISS." Therefore you see that Walsh went over that paper with unusual care. Now, bearing that fact in mind, I call your attention to some of the contents of the paper. The whole paper is, of course, at the committee's service, but I want to read to you Walsh's statement then and there made as to his transactions with Brady. As I read it you will see that there are no notes mentioned as having been given by Brady, and that there is no mention of the grabbing of notes by Brady—nothing of that kind—and I think it can now be shown that those notes did not exist, even in Walsh's mind, until towards the 1st of May, 1882. I read now an extract from this statement of Walsh. He says:

Previous to this Brady had borrowed at different times large sums of money from Walsh, representing to him that he was in heavy stock transactions and needed money to help him along; that he would pay him back at the proper time. Brady seemed to look upon Walsh as a veritable bonanza, from which he could take out money at any time. Walsh advanced the money to Buell.

He then goes on and gives the dates of the loans of money by him to Brady. Those dates do not correspond with his evidence given on the trial. They correspond nearly with the dates in the bill of particulars that he had put in before the trial in his suit here, and with an affidavit that he had made in New York, although those two do not entirely agree. They correspond nearly with that bill of particulars, the one he stated here that there was a correction of afterwards. I mention this merely as showing that on the 28th of September, 1881, that same error—if it was an error—in the dates and amounts advanced by Walsh to Brady existed. He goes on, after stating the amounts of money, and referring to the Congressional investigation, to recite some other matters, and then comes down to this :

After the investigation in Congress, Walsh asked Brady for a settlement. Brady remonstrated and acted very independently ; asked him if he thought all that had been done for him was for love. * * * Walsh replied that he thought he had not got anything out of the Department that had not cost him a great deal of money ; that he had got into the business by discounting the drafts of McDonough and Fisher ; * * that he had found Mr. Hinds had more influence in the Department than he had, and had given trouble and annoyance ; that Mr. Fisher had found means of so influencing the Sixth Auditor's Office that, notwithstanding the drafts which Fisher had given him, which were on file, Mr. Fisher had been enabled to draw the money. U. E. Fisher tells about this in his affidavit made June 9, 1881. * * Walsh further stated to Brady that he would have stopped long ago, before his advances to McDonough and Fisher, if Mr. Brady had not assured him that their service would be increased, and especially on 40101. And generally there was a big row between Brady and Walsh. Brady, however, at this time or about this time, gave Walsh a payment on the money borrowed, two drafts given by Price on route No. 31120, Indianola to Corpus Christi. These drafts were drawn to the order of Price, and indorsed by Price for the sum of $1,250 each.

Then comes a passage stricken out by Walsh, in his own handwriting, on page 52, and on asking him why he had struck it out he replied, according to a memorandum made by me at the time, "Struck out because only an impression." That was as to how Brady got those two Indianola drafts, but I call the attention of the committee to the fact that although it is stated that there was a row between Walsh and Brady, there is no mention of the stealing of any notes by Brady, or of the existence of any notes of Brady's to Walsh, while there is the direct and precise statement that at or about that time Mr. Brady made a payment to Walsh on account, which is certainly inconsistent with the story which Walsh has told to this committee.

There is more here that I might read, but I do not care to go into it in this connection. I will call your attention, however, to another very extraordinary fact, and that is one which had, until night before last, entirely escaped my notice, because when I read this paper originally the Price matters were not under consideration. You will see that this is important in connection with the case of Mr. Kellogg. Mr. Walsh has sworn here, and Mr. Ker says he stated before the grand jury, that the drafts on which Walsh's name appeared, on the San Antonio and Corpus Christi route, the $20,000 or the $25,000 in drafts and the $5,000 note, were brought to him by Kellogg from Price, and that Kellogg afterwards received some of the proceeds of them. Now, in this statement Walsh says that those post-office drafts and that note were received by him, not from Kellogg, but from Brady. Here is what he says :

Walsh at various times had pressed Brady for a settlement. Brady put him off from time to time, but finally on one occasion when Walsh had been more persistent than usual, Brady said that he had no money, but that he had drafts, and that he would give them to him on account, and thereupon he turned over to Walsh five drafts drawn by J. B. Price, and some Shakspeare mining stock.

As bearing upon Walsh's testimony and credibility in connection with the whole matter, and as bearing upon the evidence in the Kellogg case, this statement of Walsh's is, I submit, pretty important.

Q. Did he swear to that statement?—A. He did not swear to it, but it was all read over to him, as I have told you, and he made the corrections as we went along.

Q. That was his statement of what his evidence would be if he was called as a witness?—A. Yes. Now let me say that when I interjected into Mr. Merrick's statement something about Mr. Kellogg's admission to me, I think I probably stated it correctly, but the newspapers do not report it correctly, or at any rate it is given more briefly than I desire to give it, so I will restate it now: Mr. Kellogg came to me with the letter of the Attorney-General, which I produced here the other day, and which he told me he had obtained from the Attorney-General at Wormley's; he said he had found him in his room, and he made some other statement, which I will not go into now. But he brought me this letter:

MY DEAR Mr. BLISS:
See Mr. Kellogg, and oblige
Your friend,

B. H. BREWSTER.

Mr. Kellogg came to me at my room at the Arlington, and I think that was the only time he ever called on me, except one visit in New York which he made last winter, which also was made by direction of the Attorney-General, and which I at once reported to the Attorney-General. My recollection is that he came with this letter after the grand jury had been directed to reconvene (as the expression is), which would make it the second week in July, 1882. I was a good deal embarrassed. I did not want to be talking with a man that I was going before the grand jury against, but here was a letter from my superior, requesting me to see him, and I did, but I endeavored to get rid of him as soon as I could, and did not prolong the conversation by asking him any questions, except, possibly, a single one. In that conversation Mr. Kellogg insisted upon talking about the matter to some extent. He said, in substance, that he and Walsh had had rooms at the same hotel—I think he said they were connecting or adjoining, or at any rate rooms close by each other. I think he said that Price was going out of town, and that Walsh was out of town, and that before Price went away he brought to him (Kellogg) a large envelope for Walsh, and asked him to give it to Walsh, and that he said he would. Price, he said, brought the envelope to him, and he (Kellogg) promised to give it to Walsh, and he said he did not know what was in that envelope. That was the only point where I at all prolonged the conversation, as I recollect, by asking a question. I said to him something like this: "Why, Mr. Kellogg, you must have known what was in that envelope;" or, "Didn't he state what was in the envelope?" I may have put it negatively, one way or the other. I put that question because, before I put that question, Mr. Kellogg had gone on to say to me that he did subsequently receive from Walsh some money, which he used for political purposes, and I said to him, "Didn't you know," or, "Didn't you state" (some expression of that sort) "what was in the envelope?" He claimed that he did not; "but," said he, "Walsh says that the money was out of the proceeds of those drafts." Well, I undertook to ask him how he came to get the money, but I saw that I was prolonging a conversation that I did not want prolonged, so I stopped. In the mean time, however, he told me, in the course of the conversation, that while he (Kellogg) was governor of Louisiana, a long time prior to this, Price had contributed toward political expenses, and, as I recollect it, and as I stated it the other day, that there had been an application on his part to Price for money for politics or something of that sort. At any rate, he said to me that he took the envelope and gave it to Walsh, and that Walsh claimed that it contained the drafts, and Mr. Kellogg did not seem to have any doubt that it did contain the drafts. He claimed that in that transaction he was a mere messenger, but admitted that after that time he received money from Walsh, which Walsh said was part of the proceeds of those drafts.

By Mr. STEWART :

Q. Had you seen those drafts at the time you had this conversation with Mr. Kellogg?—A. I think I must have seen them.

Q. Does not Mr. Kellogg's name appear upon them?—A. No; his name does not appear on any draft. Kellogg's name appears on no Government paper whatever. His name does not appear upon the files of the Department anywhere, except on a recommendation of expedition. Mr. Ker will agree with me in that, I think.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. The place where Kellogg's name appears is on the checks?—A. I am going to have something to say about that directly.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE :

Q. Did Mr. Kellogg explain to you to what special political interests this money that he received was applied?—A. Not at all.

Q. He did not tell you that it was used to pay the debt that was contracted by the returning board of Louisiana in 1876?—A. I have already denied that once, and I deny it now again. He did not say anything of the kind. The fact is that Mr. Kellogg, if I had let him, would have talked all night.

Q. Why did you not let him go on?—A. Simply because I considered myself in a very embarrassing position, and I did not want to talk to him about it.

Q. There is no harm in being a reservoir, is there?—A. Yes, sir: there is harm in being a reservoir if you are liable to be tapped. Mr. Kellogg undertook to account to me for his getting that money, but I would not let him go on, and he did not go on. I confess that I believed thoroughly at that time that the money was money that he had got from the proceeds of those drafts, and I could not resist feeling that he must have known what he had in that envelope.

By Mr. MILLIKEN :

Q. Did you know anything about it, really?—A. No, sir; nothing whatever, and I got rid of that interview as quickly as I could.

Q. Was your belief founded upon any evidence, or only upon a general impression?—A. My belief was founded on the statements that I understood that Walsh had made, and on the fact that here was a case in which Mr. Kellogg substantially admitted that he carried the drafts to Walsh (he said as a messenger), and that not long afterwards he got money from Walsh.

By Mr. STEWART :

Q. Had you at that time seen the checks which Walsh gave Kellogg, and on which Kellogg's indorsement appears?—A. My impression is that I had not—that I knew of them, but had not then seen them.

Q. Is there any allusion, in Walsh's statement, to those checks?—A. No. This statement of Walsh does not go into the question of Kellogg at all.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE :

Q. Did Kellogg explain the motive of his coming to you and having that interview?—A. His idea in coming to me was to convince me that he had not done anything wrong. I remember that I said to him, "Mr. Kellogg, you need not waste your time in trying to convince me of that. I have not anything to do with that. I am directed to go on with this case, and I am going on with it; you must convince the Attorney-General, if there is to be any interference with it; and I will say further, that as the matter has become in one sense public property, I think it is wiser for you not to attempt to convince anybody out of court."

By Mr. STEWART :

Q. Do you know why the Attorney-General sent him to you. Was he sick at that time?—A. I know nothing, sir, except what was stated to me indirectly as to the circumstances under which that letter of the Attorney-General was written. I understand that there has been an interview published in a paper as to the circumstances under which it was written, and I prefer to say nothing about it.

Q. Did any messenger come to you from the Attorney-General before the interview with Mr. Kellogg, and after you received that letter?—A. No; I do not remember anything of the kind.

Q. Did Mr. Brewster Cameron come to you after the Attorney-General wrote the letter and request you not to have an interview with Kellogg?—A. No, sir.

Q. You did not receive any such request?—A. No, sir.

Q. No such request reached you before you had the interview?—A. No, sir. This is the first suggestion I ever heard of anything of the kind.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE :

Q. Did you call the Attorney-General's attention to the letter and to the fact that you had received this letter at the hands of Kellogg?—A. Yes, sir; I subsequently spoke of it to the Attorney-General.

Q. What did he say?—A. He did not say anything. He treated it as a matter of course. He knew that he had written such a letter. I told him that Kellogg had admitted to me the receipt of money from Walsh, and I said to him as I said to the other counsel when we were talking about the Kellogg case from time to time, that I thought that indicated what would be Kellogg's defense—that he would claim that he got the money from Price for political purposes.

Q. Did the Attorney-General make any explanation of the letter or of his motive in sending it?—A. None, whatever. It did not seem to call for any. I told him that I had seen Mr. Kellogg on his letter, and that was all.

Mr. STEWART. The Attorney-General can explain that.

By Mr. STEWART :

Q. I ask you whether at the time of this interview with Mr. Kellogg you had seen these checks that bear Kellogg's indorsement?—A. I think not.

Q. If so, did Mr. Kellogg offer any explanation?—A. I am quite confidant that he did not. That would only have come about by my asking him questions, and I was anxious to get him out of the room.

Q. Was this after Kellogg was indicted?—A. No, sir; it was when the grand jury was about to be reconvened.

Q. Were you present when Walsh appeared first before the grand jury? If so, state whether at that time Mr. Walsh exhibited to the grand jury or to you, or whether you knew that he had in his possession those checks.—A. As I have stated, the reference to Mr. Kellogg by Mr. Walsh before the first grand jury was entirely casual as far as I know. Mr. Walsh states in his testimony (page 478 of your record) that up to that time he had not talked to the counsel and that he had not shown them his papers. He claims that I knew the facts, but when he is asked how, he says I must have known them from Mr. MacVeagh. Now, Mr. MacVeagh never talked with me about Kellogg in any manner, and I do not know to-day what Mr. MacVeagh knows about Kellogg, except that I know from his testimony here and from prior information that he considered that Kellogg was in some way wrongly involved in these star-route matters. Mr. Walsh states (page 478) that he read to the grand jury only one paper. In his evidence he mixes up what occurred before different grand juries, because he locates before the Mitchell grand jury the alleged conversation about indicting a United States Senator, when there was no pretence that that occurred until later.

When I was here before I could not tell what papers Mr. Walsh had produced before the first grand jury, except that I was quite confident that he did not produce many. From a memorandum brief which I made at that time, similar to those that were submitted in the Venita and Las Vegas case, and which bears on the back of it the indorsement of the grand jury that a bill was found—from that brief I have ascertained what papers Mr. Walsh did produce before that first grand jury. He produced, in the first place, the letter that he has spoken of, and that has been generally spoken of, as the “ginger letter” from Brady. In the second place, he produced the letter making the appointment for the meeting with Brady, stating that there would be a fire at such a time in such a room, and proposing a meeting. Then he produced the envelope of that letter. He also produced a letter from J. B. Price, as follows. When he was asked about the Price draft, he brought this letter out:

ASTOR HOUSE, New York, May 18, 1881.

DEAR SIR: Please send me a statement showing date, amount, number of route, &c., of all notes and drafts of mine discounted by you; also the discount, or shave, taken off. I have lost or mislaid my cash book, and must rely on you to give me facts in order to remedy loss and rewrite my book.

Respectfully, yours,

J. B. PRICE,

Mr. JOHN WALSH, Washington, D. C.

Address care Real Estate Trust Company, No. 115 Bowery, N. Y.

P. S.—I must have a specific answer to questions, as I must know amounts, dates, &c.

He claimed that Price had become alarmed at the transactions by which he, Walsh, had got the drafts, and wanted to represent it as an ordinary discount, but he stated that he had never discounted any drafts for Price, and in that connection he produced this letter. I think, but will not be positive, that he produced a letter from a man named Peterson, dated Washington, D. C., September 29, 1881, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 29, 1881.

DEAR SIR: The consideration for which I gave you drafts on route No. 30162, Louisiana, having ceased, the expedition having been cut off, and the original schedule having been restored, I have to request that you will withdraw the drafts on file and return them to me.

Your obedient servant,

B. H. PETERSON.

JOHN A. WALSH, Esq.,
Washington, D. C.

My recollection is that he produced that letter, and yet I cannot see in what precise connection he did produce it. He produced no other papers—no drafts, no checks, no other papers. We had the postal drafts there, of course, but he produced nothing else. He produced nothing with Kellogg's name on it in any manner.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Was that the occasion on which Walsh first appeared before the grand jury?—A. No.

Q. You have said that you were able to tell what papers he did produce by the brief that you made at that time.—A. Yes, sir; I have got that brief here.

Q. Does that brief contain a notice of all the papers that were produced?—A. It contains a statement of what evidence Walsh gave and, in general terms, of what papers he produced. I am able to state distinctly, after reading this brief, that before the first grand jury Mr. Walsh produced no paper with Kellogg's name upon it; no check and no paper relating to Kellogg.

Q. When was that brief made?—A. The evening of the day on which Walsh was before the grand jury, and it was given to the grand jury, and they indorsed the finding of the indictment on it.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. The indictment against Brady and Price?—A. The indictment against Brady and Price. We were not seeking the indictment of Kellogg then. My impression is that that commenced, as many of them did, "Indictment sought against Thomas J. Brady and James B. Price."

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. What was the date of that first grand jury?—A. It must have been in June, 1882, I should think, because the reconvened grand jury acted on the 11th and 12th, or on the 12th and 13th of July.

Q. At that time you had no understanding from anything that was said, or from anything that he displayed, that Kellogg was implicated?—A. No, sir, I did not dream of it; and I think that down to the time of the reconvening of the second grand jury I never had seen any of the papers in that case. Consequent upon the reconvening of the grand jury I had been told by Mr. Merrick, perhaps by Mr. Ker also, about the papers, which were subsequently produced, but my impression is that I had never seen them. Walsh was irritated with me, and my impression is that I never saw the papers until I saw them for the first time in the grand jury room.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did not Walsh testify that the evidence against Kellogg was stronger before the Mitchell grand jury than before the other?—A. I do not remember whether he did or not; but, if he did, he stated what was not so. There was not any evidence presented against Kellogg before the first grand jury. The complaint which Walsh makes is that I did not bring it out. The fact is I did not know of its existence.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. The date of that statement that Gibson drew up is in the September following, is it not?—A. No, sir; the September previous.

Q. In that Walsh makes no statement about those drafts?—A. No. It is right to say, however, that in that statement he is not going into that subject; he is confining himself to route 40101 and his relations with Brady. I do not think, therefore, that any inference can be drawn from the absence of that Kellogg matter from that statement. Now, before the second grand jury, Walsh produced all the papers that I am about to specify. Let me tell you how I am able to say this. After the reconvened grand jury failed to indict, Mr. Walsh published in the New York Herald a lot of papers; I think that was on the 17th of July, 1882, and at that time I went over the statement with the papers produced, to see if he had published anything that had not gone before the grand jury, and my recollection is that I ascertained that all the papers published had gone before the grand jury, and that they were all that did go before the grand jury. On that occasion he produced first the "Ginger" letter. He produced also the letter from Brady making an appointment for a meeting. He produced the letter from Price, asking him, Walsh, to give Price a copy of his account. He produced also the letter from Peterson, I think, though as to that I have some doubt whether it was produced before the first grand jury. He produced also the following checks:

Of course these checks and drafts I do not give from my own recollection. They are copied from the Herald statement, verified at the time by me by comparison with the papers that were before the grand jury.

He produced also the following letter:

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
Washington, February 8, 1881.

MY DEAR WALSH: I called in your house both yesterday and to-day, and found that you had again left for New York. Evidently the "danger signals" don't amount to much in your estimation. P. was ready last week to see you as you desired, and to oblige you I took some pains to arrange so you could see him. As, however, you could see him best by staying away from him, of course you stayed. The world being an oyster, this is, of course, your policy.

Now, old fellow, as I have tried to serve you somewhat heretofore, you will save me some trouble by paying to Winslow, Lanier & Co., as you telegraphed me you would in "a day or so," last week, that $1,943. I would not trouble you so much were it not that I have depended upon it, as you told me I could some time since. I regret I did not see you when here.

Very sincerely yours,

W. P. KELLOGG.

He produced also a letter or slip of paper saying:

JOHN: I leave for West to-night. See P. at once and give him that statement; also relieve his mind regarding my suit against Brown and others.

CATO.

P. S.—B. says that he will see that he (P.) has indorsers on his note if need be in W.

Walsh explained that "Cato" meant Kellogg, "P.," Price, and "B.," Brady.

Then he produced what I think was a dispatch, but it may have been a letter, as follows:

NEENAH, WIS., August 5.

To JOHN A. WALSH, 3 East 27th st.:

P. writes that he has not seen you. Wants Cato meet him at W. Will you see P. immediately? Important.

He also produced the following letter from Chase Andrews:

OFFICE OF CHASE ANDREWS, ST. CLOUD BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., March 21, 1881.

MY DEAR WALSH: I have just learned that notice has been received at the Department that service on 40101 is entirely suspended, and creditors are taking off the stock. Let me hear from you at once, if I can aid you. The service is so important that much anxiety is felt at the Department to know what you propose to do about it.

Yours, truly,

ANDREWS.

Also, a dispatch saying:

WASHINGTON, June 24.

JOHN A. WALSH, New York:

Yes; I think so. W. says come.

K.

I think he said that "W." meant Mr. Jere Wilson, and that the dispatch related to his (Walsh's) coming here about a settlement with Brady. That is my recollection, but I will not be certain about it.

He produced also the following dispatch:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 2, 1881.

JOHN A. WALSH,
East 27th, New York:

Will you set to my credit with Winslow, Lanier & Co. that $1,943? Answer.
W. P. KELLOGG.

Those are the papers that Walsh produced before the second grand jury.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Do you say that he published all those?—A. Those were all published in the Herald on the 17th of July, 1882, and it is from that publication that I have had them copied.

Q. Those were produced before the grand jury that failed to indict?—
A. Yes, sir.

Q. Walsh verified those papers, I suppose?—A. He verified the papers by his oral testimony, and he says himself in his testimony here (page 487) that I drew out the facts fully. That is the grand jury before which he complains that the Kellogg-Spofford document was brought in containing his testimony in that case. As to the introduction of that book there, I have already said all that I desire to say.

Q. Did you have anything to do with getting that book before the grand jury?—A. No, sir; not the least in the world. I was kept waiting in the outer room for half an hour. I saw one of the bailiffs come out of the room with a paper (it was not unusual to see the bailiff come out, and I supposed he was going down-stairs for something), and by and by he came back with the book and went into the room, and I was kept waiting in the mean time.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE :

Q. You had no knowledge of the book being sent for?—A. No, sir ; not until I got into the room.

Q. You had not been spoken to about it by the foreman of the grand jury?—A. No, sir. Mr. Hutchinson, in one of his answers, seems to imply that I had been spoken to about it before the book went into that room. If he means to say that, he is wrong. There need be no concealment about the fact that the members of that grand jury were very restive; they had been brought together in the summer, and they wanted to go away, and it was quite clear to my mind that they did not believe Mr. Walsh. Mr. Walsh gave his testimony in a peculiar and rather offensive manner. The first day it was cork-screwing to get anything out of him, but I finally brought out the fact that he had had some books, and he said that when he had broken up his business here he had left those books at Welcker's. Upon that we got an adjournment, so that he might go and find out about the books. Next morning he came in and said that he had been to Welcker's and had found that a waiter had sold them for old paper. I remember that at that point one of the jurors said, "You were a banker, and did you leave your books round in that way to be sold by a waiter at a restaurant for old paper?" Walsh said, "Well, I broke up my business in Washington, and I had not any further interest in them, and I had not any place to store them, so they were left there." This member of the jury threw himself back in his chair, put his feet up, and looked in a manner that made it pretty clear that from that time out the proceedings interested him no more. It was quite obvious that he did not intend to believe Mr. Walsh. The Kellogg-Spofford book lay there on the table, and I saw that it was there, and that it was the book that had been brought in by the bailiff. Walsh obviously recognized the book the moment he got his eye on it, and he reached over and asked if he might take it. He took it and found the place and showed it to me, and then I took the book up and proceeded to question him about it, and the impression made upon my mind was that the grand jurors who paid attention (I think a good many of them did not pay attention to that portion of the proceedings) did not count on the book at all. I thought they had gone for the book, thinking they were going to find something in it, and that they had been disappointed. That was the impression made upon my mind. At the same time, while I was in the room some one of the jurymen (I presume it was Mr. Hutchinson, from his testimony here) asked me if it was right to bring the book into the grand jury room, and I said I did not think there was anything wrong in it. But I did not know anything about it beforehand, and, while I thought they had a right to bring the book there, yet, if I were seeking an indictment, I would not want to meet the allegation of the introduction of such a book into the grand jury room, on a motion to quash, or anything of that kind. As to the third grand jury, I was not before it, and I do not know what papers were before it at all.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Before you leave that second grand jury, state whether there was anything said there by you about Price.—A. I do not remember; I cannot reconcile at all the testimony of Mr. Hutchinson (and I understand somebody else has given similar testimony here) with facts which existed at that time. At that time there had been no arrangement with Price, and I knew there had been no arrangement with him. I never did say to that grand jury that Price would appear next day, nor anything of that kind. Mr. Hutchinson is under an extraordinary misapprehension about that. I could not have said it. The fact about the matter was this: Very soon after Price was indicted, a lawyer of this city, who was an ex-Member of Congress associated with Southern matters, came, as I understood (I was so informed by Mr. Merrick), claiming that Price would talk and would place himself at the service of the Government, and that was really what we were always after in going for Price. We believed, from information that we had, that he was into all sorts of rascality in connection with the star-route business, and also that he was a timid man and a man whom we could finally get it out of, and from that time on we always hoped to get Price. I will not undertake to say that I remember with any distinctness how the mention of Price came before that grand jury, but my recollection about it is this: That some jurymen spoke of Price coming, and that I said, "We are not seeking an indictment now against Price; Price is already indicted"; that the matter was subsequently referred to, and that, for the purpose of reinforcing my case, I said that we hoped to have Mr. Price as a witness on the trial of the case if an indictment were found; but I am as confident as I am that I sit here that I never said to that jury that Price would be produced the next day, and I know that the adjournment was not procured for that purpose, because I know that I had some little difficulty, apparently, in inducing the jury to adjourn over, and that I based my appeal for the adjournment upon the fact that it now appeared from Mr. Walsh's statement that he had left books at Welcker's, and that by adjourning we might have those next day.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Do I understand your position in regard to Price to be this: that you never, at any time, objected to receiving him as a witness in the case?—A. I am talking about this grand jury, now.

Q. I am talking about that, too.—A. If you will ask me about Price generally, I will go into that in detail.

Q. The position you assume, as I understand it, is that you never objected to receiving Price as a witness in that Kellogg case?—A. I have not said that, sir; I am talking about what happened before the grand jury.

Q. I understand that; but you do say that down to the time of the presentation of Kellogg's case to the grand jury you had not considered the acceptance of Price as a witness?—A. No; I say that we were after Price with the hope that we should get him as a witness—not as a witness against Kellogg, but Price had some 400 contracts, and, unless general report was all wrong, he had been in all sorts of multifarious rascality, and we believed that through him we could get directly at Brady. It was not a question of Price as a witness against Kellogg at that time, nor anything like that. Now, I had no knowledge at all upon the subject of Price's testimony against Kellogg at that time, so that I could not have told, and I did not tell that grand jury that Price would be before them the next day. I did not tell them anything of the sort.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you know whether Price's name was mentioned there at all by you?—A. I think I told the grand jury distinctly that we were not seeking an indictment against Price then, because he was already indicted, and I would not swear to it, but my recollection, or, rather, my impression more than my recollection, is that, to reinforce my case and to give them an idea that it did not depend entirely on the one witness, I said we had reason to believe or to expect that we should have the testimony of Price at the trial. My impression in that respect is confirmed by a very definite recollection of some one of the jurors saying something which implied: "Well, a witness who has been indicted won't help you much"; or he asked me: "Do you expect to have any witness who is not under indictment?" or something of that kind.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. You did not suggest to the grand jurors, or in the grand-jury room, that as the case stood upon the evidence submitted to them at the time Walsh was withdrawn, there was not enough to indict?—A. No, sir.

Q. Not that in substance?—A. No, sir.

Q. You made no allusion to it at all?—A. No allusion to it at all. In fact, I said in my letter to the Attorney-General directly afterwards that if I had been a grand juror I should have voted to indict. I have read that letter this morning. Now, as to Price, the position that I took with reference to him was taken a good deal later—and let me say right here that Mr. Ker, in his testimony, on page 548 of this record, disregards dates, and assigns to discussions prior to the reconvening of the grand jury a good deal that was said at the meeting at Mr. Brewster's house, and if he looks at the testimony I do not think there will be any question in his mind that that is so. As I have said, we met at Mr. Brewster's house, and we had a very lively discussion. I took the ground distinctly not that Price should not be accepted as a witness, but that Price should not upon any information that we there had be accepted as a witness and promised immunity, because all we had was a statement, defective as it was admitted to be when I pointed out the details, which bore only against Kellogg, and bore against Kellogg not as accusing him of a crime, not of fraud or conspiracy, but bore against him as guilty of a statutory crime, violating the statute forbidding a Senator to practice before a Department—though it was a matter of discussion also as to whether it might not be the basis of an indictment for conspiracy. I remember that I said at that time that I had been told, though I never had read it in the debates, that when that bill was up for consideration Reverdy Johnson, then a Senator from Maryland, had said in the Senate, objecting to the passage of the bill, that it was utterly unconstitutional, that he had always practiced before the Departments as counsel and always would, whether they passed the bill or not. I urged that, even as against Kellogg, Price's statement was not sufficient, and we went into the details of it, and it was then admitted that Price's statement was defective, and it was arranged that Mr. Woodward should put his pumps on to him and get out of him, if possible, additional matter.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Woodward was the great exhauster?—A. He was the great exhauster. Mr. Merrick stated some additional things that he understood Price could testify to, and Mr. Woodward was to undertake to get that additional testimony. I also objected that Price was not giving enough for his immunity—that our theory was that he was in all sorts of rascality; that he had some 400 routes, and that to take him as a witness for the purpose of getting at Kellogg, and as a witness who insisted that he never had done anything wrong, and that all his transactions were innocent and square, was to set Price free covered with whitewash, and was to let him off a great deal easier than he ought to be let off. I said that I did not believe he was was telling us all he knew, and that any witness who was to be treated in that way ought certainly to tell all he knew. That was my general idea on the question of accepting Price. The question came up about his relations with Kellogg, and as to whether we could convict Price with the testimony we had, and whether we could convict Kellogg with Price's testimony. Those things were talked of back and forth, I taking one view and the other counsel the other view.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Could you also use him as a witness against Dorsey and Brady on the trial?—A. I don't know how he could have been used there. I do not recall that he could have been. That was the trial that we were actually engaged in, and I do not see any way in which Price's testimony could have been pertinent.

Q. You know what his first affidavit was, and I ask you whether he could have been used as a witness on that trial?—A. Well, I don't remember what the first affidavit was.

Q. Was he used as a witness on the second trial?—A. No. He never was a witness except before the grand jury, and in the Kellogg trial the other day.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. You say you looked upon Price as one of the greatest rascals of the lot?—A. I did. It was in the air. We did not know it definitely, except that we knew he was a man that had had these large amounts of contracts. That southwestern service was all considered corrupt, and he was one of the gang.

Q. And you objected to letting the greatest rascal go, in order to convict others, unless he gave you evidence enough to do it?—A. I did not undertake to say that he was the greatest rascal, but I did undertake to say that I believed he knew a great deal more than he was willing to tell us, and that I did not believe in his posing as an innocent man.

Q. Did he tell you enough to convict either of the other parties, in your judgment?—A. I don't know. I don't remember with sufficient accuracy what his testimony was, or what his second affidavit was. My recollection would be that his testimony was such that, going to a petit jury uncontradicted, it would justify a conviction ; but I have always had the impression that as the case rested upon the payment of money to Kellogg by Walsh, it is possible there would be some explanation given of that which would show that the prima facie case was not sound.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE :

Q. That would be on the hypothesis that what Kellogg told you was true, viz, that he was a mere messenger to bear that envelope from Price to Walsh, and had no knowledge of its contents?—A. No, sir ; not necessarily on that hypothesis. It might be so, even though he knew all about it. Suppose that the money that he subsequently received from Walsh from time to time was accounted for as coming from an entirely different source, and not any part of the proceeds of those drafts. Prima facie it appeared to be a part of the proceeds of postal drafts, and of drafts which Mr. Kellogg took to Walsh, and Walsh said it was a part of the proceeds of those drafts ; but I could see that there was a possibility there of an explanation.

Q. But you had no ground to suspect anything of that sort ? Was it only a possibility, or was there any ground of suspicion at any time ?—A. I had no ground for suspecting it except Kellogg's reference to political contributions. If you ask me my opinion, the opinion I had formed from the facts was that Mr. Kellogg had committed the offense ; but I had formed that opinion simply from looking at the evidence on one side, and feeling that I was looking at the evidence on one side only, and therefore I could see where an explanation might be got in, and an explanation that would be absolutely conclusive, because by that time I had lost my faith in Walsh considerably.

Q. Yes, but if the statement of Walsh is true and the statement of Price is true, then the case is proved?—A. Yes ; but you must bear in mind that after the evidence I have produced here this morning that Mr. Walsh stated in September, 1881, that those drafts did not come to him from Kellogg but from Brady—after you got that evidence in the case, you could not take Walsh's statement as a basis for convicting anybody.

Q. But those things are all capable of explanation?—A. Not after the care with which he made this statement and revised it. I want to be frank about this matter, though ; so I will say to the committee that at the time of this discussion between counsel, of which I have been speaking, I had no recollection of that point in Walsh's statement.

By Mr. MILLIKEN :

Q. Was it the proposition of Price to testify on condition that he received immunity?—A. Well, that was the accepted idea. We all knew that the Supreme Court of the United States had held that if a witness was called by the Government and used, while there might not be any agreement with him by which he was to get off, the court would not allow him to be subsequently prosecuted. I am confident that the whole question of immunity was talked over, and it was an accepted fact all round that if Price was accepted, and if he testified, he was to have immunity.

Q. How valuable do you suppose his testimony would have been before the jury with that understanding that he was a criminal testifying on condition that he should receive immunity?—A. Well, I think that a witness of that kind testifying in a case, unless he is corroborated by papers or by other witnesses, is always looked upon with suspicion ; but my experience has been that you get a good many convictions upon the testimony of accomplices, and Price was going to claim that he was not an accomplice; at any rate you get a good many convictions upon the testimony of people in the position that Price was in.

Q. Well, if he did claim that he was not an accomplice, and the impression seemed to be so strong that he was, would his claiming that add to the weight of his testimony, or would the jury probably believe that he was lying?—A. It would not add to the weight of his testimony, but the jury perhaps might not have had the same opinion that I had as to the extent of his connection with the matter. He could pose before the jury as an entirely innocent man. To show you that I did not judge wrongly of Price, I ought perhaps to make a statement of a matter which occurred before the Kellogg trial, and which I brought to the attention of the Attorney-General. Just prior to the war a draft for mail service was issued to the order of James B. Price—a warrant for about $6,800. At the very time when Price was here negotiating to become a witness for the Government through a lawyer who, I think, is the same one I have referred to as having said to us after Price's indictment that he was ready to become a witness) there were commenced in the Post-Office Department proceedings to have a duplicate warrant issued for this $6,800 upon the allegation that the original had never been paid. The original warrant had never come to the Treasury Department; that was clear. Price made an affidavit that the original had never been paid, and that he had got no value for it—that was the idea of the affidavit. At the end of the paper he put in: "This affidavit is made in view of all the disturbing elements of a large business during the last fourteen years," or something of that sort. At the Department it was a pioneer case of that kind, and there was a good deal of trouble taken to ascertain whether the draft had been paid. A special agent of the Treasury Department went once or twice to New Orleans to investigate, as the draft had been drawn on the sub-treasury in New Orleans. The agent came back and reported that he found no evidence of payment, and a new warrant was drawn.

Mr. STEWART. I do not know that this is legitimate testimony; it seems not to be relevant to this inquiry.

The WITNESS. It bears upon the credibility of Price as a witness, and it is a matter that I called to the attention of the Attorney-General at the time.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a matter which you state as justifying you in rejecting Price as a witness?

The WITNESS. Yes, sir; it is a matter that I did not know at the time of this discussion between counsel about accepting him, but it carries out my idea that Price was a man——

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE (interposing). I do not wish to cut you off, but if you did not know it at that time, then of course it had no bearing upon your decision.

The WITNESS. Well, I am simply going to say that the result was that it was found that the original draft had been paid by the State of Louisiana after the State had seceded, had been paid with the moneys of the United States which had been seized, and which, under the ordinance of secession, were made applicable to all drafts drawn in favor of persons loyal to the Confederacy. That draft had been paid from that money, and the whole record was found, and of course the new warrant was canceled. Now, if Price had been used as a witness on the trial of the Kellogg case, this matter was known to so many people that it was pretty certain to come out on the trial, and it is not likely that there would have been a conviction after that. Let me state now how I came to know about these facts. The Attorney-General sent Mr. Kellogg to me in New York last spring to talk with me, and he told me of this whole transaction about the warrant.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE :

Q. That was before the trial?—A. Before the trial. I sat down the same afternoon that Mr. Kellogg talked to me and reported by letter all that had passed to the Attorney-General. I came on here the next week and told him of these statements, and remarked that they were very extraordinary and ought to be investigated. I went down to the Post-Office Department and saw Mr. Lyman, and saw Judge Ela, the Sixth Auditor, and went over the whole thing and wrote a report, and suggested that I did not want to judge Mr. Price, but that if we were going into court—at that time I did not know whether I was going into court or not, though the Attorney-General had required me to make an affidavit in the Kellogg case in order to arrest Walsh—I suggested that if we were going into court with those two witnesses—Walsh, who had kept away so that the judge had said he did not know what was wanted of such a witness except his papers, and Price with this record behind him—I thought there was not much chance of a conviction.

Mr. LYMAN. Price executed a bond of indemnity to secure the Government?

The WITNESS. Yes; the money did not go out of the Treasury. The original draft was not paid to Price; it was paid to the cashier or runner of a bank in New Orleans; and among his papers they found the receipt, but not the original warrant; the original warrant has never been found.

Q. Did you know of those facts at the time you objected to Price being accepted as a witness?—A. No, sir; I merely mention the facts now to show that I had the conviction that Price was in all sorts of rascality connected with the Post-Office Department, and that my idea was well founded.

By Mr. MILLIKEN :

Q. Have you changed your mind on that point?—A. No, sir. Then, beyond that, I did not think we were getting enough from Price for his immunity. We had got one man under indictment and were going to let him go, and, with the statute of limitations staring us in the face, and the other difficulties in the way, I thought we had enough to contend with. Now, as to the statute of limitations, I had looked to see if I could find any cases bearing upon the question; for instance, whether, when a note was given for an existing debt (the nearest thing to this case that I could imagine), the statute could be alleged to run from the time the overdue debt existed, or from the time when the note matured. I did not find much that amounted to anything in that connection, but I found some Western or Southern decisions which I thought bore upon the case, some one way and some the other, and it seemed to be a doubtful question as to when the statute of limitations would run. Mr. Ker says that I assigned no reason why Price should not be accepted as a witness, or why Kellogg should not be prosecuted, except Mr. Merrick's politics. Now that is not true, and I do not think Mr. Ker meant to be so understood, but that seems to be the way that I read his testimony, which appears on page 551 of your record. The reference to politics came up in this way: I said to Mr. Merrick, "Are you not allowing yourself to be warped by the fact that you have not only had an earnest and almost personal controversy with Mr. Kellogg, when you were engaged as counsel against him on the question of his right to a seat in the Senate, but also by the fact that you believe him to be a scoundrel, and the fact that your political feeling comes into the matter—are you not allowing yourself to be warped in that way?” Mr. Merrick said that he bore that all in mind and had been guarding against it, and had been very careful. I don’t know whether I said it or not, but I did not believe that Mr. Merrick could free himself from his political influence in that respect; and I was influenced in that judgment in a measure by this: Either then or subsequently the point came up that the prosecution of Mr. Kellogg would change the Republican majority in the Senate, and then there arose the suggestion: “He will be indicted, but we will not try him until after he goes out of the Senate;” and I think I said, I know I at least felt strongly, that if Mr. Kellogg was guilty enough to be indicted for violating the laws of the United States, he was too guilty to be deliberately left to make new laws for the United States during the remainder of his term. The idea of indicting him and then deliberately arranging to leave him in the Senate during his term of office seemed to me an absurdity.

Q. Did you suggest that it was a very serious thing to interfere with the safety of a United States Senator in that way?—A. No, sir.

Q. Neither to the counsel nor in the grand-jury room?—A. No, sir. A colored member of the Hutchinson grand jury said something about its being a serious thing to indict a United States Senator, and I replied that it was, but that Senators might be guilty as well as other people.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you yourself consider the political effect of his indictment?—A. No, sir; probably I did not, because I say frankly I knew perfectly well that he could not be tried or convicted before his term would expire.

Q. I mean in the sense of withholding or persuading the other counsel to withhold the prosecution?—A. No, sir. There has been some reference to Mr. Kellogg being my friend. I never knew him until he walked into my room with this letter from Mr. Brewster. I had seen him going out of Mr. Cook’s office, but I did not recall him. I never was any friend of his. I never had anything to do with him in any matter except this. Once subsequently he stopped me in the street, and once he spoke to me in the cars, and then there was this call which he made upon me in New York.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. That is, you have had five interviews with him in your lifetime?—A. Yes, sir; and never any interview except when he came to me and wanted to talk to me about this matter and I wanted to get rid of him.

Q. Did you suggest to your associates anything about the political effect of having Mr. Kellogg indicted?—A. I suggested it no further than this, that in talking with Mr. Merrick, I said to him that if Kellogg was indicted people would say it was done through him (Merrick) in consequence of his political hostility to Kellogg. This was in conversation between Mr. Merrick and myself. Do not understand that there was anything offensive about it at all. It was as pleasant and kindly as could be; no offense given or taken on either side.

Q. Did you suggest to anybody that he should consult Mr. Chandler with regard to the political effect of this indictment?—A. Not there.

Q. That did not weigh in your mind at all?—A. I did not mean that it should. I am an earnest Republican, but I did not mean that it should.

Q. At least you did not manifest it to any one?—A. No, sir. If anybody took that inference from anything I did or said, they took a wrong inference. We adjourned that conference with the understanding that Mr. Woodward's pumps were to be put on to Price. I understood and I still believe that it was part of that arrangement that when Woodward got that additional statement, we were to be again brought together and have a chance to examine it, because the views I entertained had been accepted by the others so far as to agree that the first statement of Price was not sufficient to justify his acceptance as a witness, and I considered that it was a part of our understanding that I was to have an opportunity to see the new statement after it was obtained by Mr. Woodward. I went to New York and when I came back on the 2d of January—I think, Monday—I was met by a letter from Mr. Woodward saying that he was directed by the Attorney-General to inform me that Price was accepted as a witness.

Q. Did you understand at the conference with the Attorney-General that any one of the counsel were to see him again with reference to the acceptance of Price?—A. I thought we were all to be brought together again to see him and to confer about it.

Q. You did not understand that that conference at the Attorney-General's house was a finality?—A. No, sir; I was confident that it was not, and I say that I am confident now that that was not the understanding, because there was an admission practically on the part of the other counsel that Price's first statement was not sufficient, and I understood that we were to see his new statement, which was to be obtained by Mr. Woodward.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. That might be true, and yet you might leave the final decision to the Attorney-General?—A. Certainly.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Was it not the understanding that the question, whether you should proceed further with the indictment of Kellogg was to be left entirely with the Attorney-General?—A. Of course the Attorney-General had the right to do anything he chose about it.

Q. But was not that the agreement?—A. No, sir; my understanding was that that was not the agreement; my recollection was very clear about it. When I came back and found this state of things I felt that, directly or indirectly, faith had been broken with me, and I am frank to say that I thought that Mr. Merrick had somehow or other been concerned in it, that my associates had got from the Attorney-General, in my absence, this determination to use Price, and that it had been done with a definite purpose, and I was pretty wrathful about it. I wrote a note to Mr. Merrick to say that I should not be in court that day, and intimated or stated the reason. My recollection would be that there came back a note to me from Mr. Merrick, and that I replied to that. I then went down to the Post-Office Department, and after the court adjourned Mr. Merrick came in. We had a conversation, in which I did not intimate to him that I thought there had been any underhand work, because I did not want to be offensive, but it was obvious that Mr. Merrick thought I had that idea, and therefore, in the course of the conversation, he told me distinctly that he had had nothing to do with the determination. He stated that he understood that our meeting at the Attorney-General's house was to be final so far as the counsel were concerned, and that the determination of the question was to be left to the Attorney-General alone. I said that I did not understand anything of the sort; that I did not understand that that meeting was final; that I thought we were to come together again after the new statement was obtained from Price; that I still maintained that opinion, but that, whether I did or not, if this decision had been given by the Attorney-General without any special disregard of me, why that ended the matter. So I went into court next morning, having been out of court but one day.

Q. Did you urge as one of the reasons for your view that the statute of limitations had run against the offense, as you understood it?—A. Not distinctly that the statute had run, as I understood it, but I urged that it was a question of the statute of limitations.

Q. Explain what you mean by that.—A. Well, it was very clear that the statute of limitations had run, provided you dated the offense from the time when the postal drafts were alleged to have been delivered to Kellogg. It was equally clear that it had not run if you dated from the time when the drafts had matured, and the question as to which period the statute was to be taken to cover was a question about which, as I thought, there was considerable to be said on both sides. I will be frank about it, and say that my impression was that upon an indictment properly drawn you could establish the view that the statute of limitations ran from the date of the payment of the money, provided Price's testimony was consistent with that, if Price's testimony was that he agreed with Kellogg to give him so much money, and then gave him those drafts on which the money was subsequently received; but if, on the other hand, Price's testimony was that he agreed to give Kellogg the postal drafts, and Kellogg took them with all the uncertainties hanging over them—for instance, with the contingency that the service might be cut off, and that therefore he would get nothing—if Price's testimony was to that effect, it seemed to me that the statute would run from the receipt of the drafts. There were various questions of that kind. I looked the matter up, and I think I made quite a brief upon it. My general idea was that Price would have testified so that the statute would not have barred the indictment.

The CHAIRMAN. I think if you will refer to page 209 of our record you will see that in your former testimony you took a different view.

The WITNESS. I have a memorandum here that in some portion of my previous testimony I made a mistake as to the statute of limitations; that I expressed the opinion that the statute had run. I find the memorandum here before me, referring to page 210 of the record of this committee. I was wrong in saying that it was a settled thing that the statute of limitations had run as against Kellogg at that time, but we thought it had. In point of fact, the statement was that it might be claimed that it had run, and we had more or less discussion about it; but I cannot say how much detail was gone into on that question.

Q. Then there was no question at the time the Hutchinson grand jury was in session as to whether the statute had run?—A. At that time the statute had not run on either view of it. We got that grand jury reconvened, so as to get an indictment before the statute would run. It would run on the 19th, I believe.

Q. Before it would run on any feature of the case?—A. Yes, sir. And now, as I am talking about that, let me say that Mr. Ker is mistaken in stating that he prepared any indictment for the previous grand jury in which the name of Kellogg was concerned.

Q. You mean the Hutchinson grand jury?—A. Mr. Ker says that he prepared one for the March grand jury. He says that twice over. I think that is an inadvertence on his part, because he is asked then how he got Kellogg's name, and he says he got it from the papers. Now, you will bear in mind that there never were any Government papers that contained Kellogg's name. The only papers that had it were those that Walsh produced, and Walsh's testimony is direct and affirmative that he did not produce those before the Mitchell grand jury.

By Mr. STEWART :

Q. Did not Kellogg sign a request for expedition, and did not his name appear upon that?—A. It possibly did. If there was any member of Congress from the West or Southwest who did not sign such requests, he ought to be brought out as a curiosity.

Q. Did General Logan sign any?—A. I don't remember.

Q. Did Mr. Springer?—A. I suspect that Mr. Springer's name can be found on some of the papers.

The CHAIRMAN. I think not.

The WITNESS. On the Dorsey trial we were met by the fact that these requests were brought in signed by many distinguished gentlemen, Secretary Teller and Senator Bowen and General Sherman and others. Those papers were brought in, piles of them, and part of the force of the claim made by the other side was in the fact that Brady appeared to have acted upon the strength of the requests of these legislators, whose wisdom and integrity was to be presumed.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE :

Q. What you mean is this, that when Mr. Ker says that he drew that indictment against Brady and Price and Kellogg, and submitted it to you, he is in error?—A. No; I say that he could not have drawn such an indictment for the March grand jury. Undoubtedly when the grand jury was reconvened, the time was short and the indictment was then drafted as Mr. Ker has described, and undoubtedly it was destroyed when the Hutchinson grand jury refused to indict.

Q. But at that time Brady and Price had been already indicted, and do you say you were going to couple their names again in a new indictment against them and Kellogg?—A. I do not know how that may have been, but you will see that there was no official paper that bore Kellogg's name on it from which he could have been indicted, and Walsh had not produced his papers or talked with the Government counsel at the time Mr. Ker drew his indictments for the March grand jury; so that Mr. Ker must be in error about that.

Q. Is it not a fact that your evidence upon that subject is more the result of argument in your own mind than recollection of a fact?—A. Of course I can have no personal knowledge of what Mr. Ker actually did. Mr. Ker may have drawn the indictment. I can only say that I never heard of an indictment with Kellogg's name in it being drawn for the March grand jury, and I do not believe that there was any.

Q. But you say that more as a matter of argument than as a matter of remembrance?—A. No; I remember that I never saw any such indictment, and never heard of it.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Mr. Ker requests me to ask you whether Mr. Woodward did not prepare a brief for the March grand jury, on which Brady and Price and Kellogg were to be indicted?—A. No, sir; I saw no such brief. There was never any such brief that came to my knowledge.

Q. You have stated that in discussing the propriety of accepting Price as a witness, you took the ground that if he was accepted it would let Brady off?—A. No, I did not say it would let Brady off, further than that, inasmuch as Price was indicted for conspiracy with Brady, if we accepted Price as a witness, then practically—not legally, but practically—we could not have convicted Brady on that indictment; for, although it is of course technically possible under an indictment of two conspirators to accept one of them as a witness, and go on and secure the conviction of the other, yet while that is legally possible, I do not believe that in practice it can be done. The effect of that concatenation of things upon the jury would be such that you could not get a verdict.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Were Brady and Price indicted only for conspiracy? Were they not indicted for something else?—A. In connection with these routes, only for conspiracy.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How were you to prove the conspiracy if both the conspirators were indicted?—A. We were to prove the conspiracy just as we proved it in the Dorsey case, from concurrent circumstances, and also from Walsh's testimony. That is all. But the evidence there was not so strong as it was in a case where you had an aggregation of routes.

Q. When you had accepted Price as a witness, and he had testified to those facts which you have stated in regard to the matter, would not that testimony make a stronger case against Kellogg than you would have had if you had prosecuted both Price and Brady?—A. Undoubtedly it would have made a strong case, provided you had not been troubled by the technical objection which, no matter what the ruling might be, would practically be in your way, that you had only one conspirator. I do not recall facts fully, but on that statement I should say so.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Don't you think it was a judicious thing to use Price after the indictment was filed against Brady?—A. To use him in what trial?

Q. In the trial of the case in which Brady was indicted with Price.—A. A judicious thing if the case was to be tried, certainly. But the case has not been tried, and I understand is not going to be.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. He was really accepted in the Kellogg case?—A. I suppose he was to be a witness in any case that he could testify in.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was not Price a witness before the grand jury that returned the indictment against Brady and Price?—A. I do not know.

Q. Do you know how many indictments were found on Price's testimony?—A. No; I was not before the grand jury; I had nothing to do with it.

Mr. Ker said something about my asking him to put the true date into the Kellogg indictment. He has got that a little wrong. A gentleman came to me and made a request, and I went straight to Mr. Ker; that is, I spoke to Mr. Ker about it as soon as I saw him. Mr. Nathaniel Wilson came to me and said substantially that he thought it would be fair treatment if that indictment should be so drawn as to set out the whole transaction, so as to enable them to raise the question of the statute of limitations by demurrer to the face of the indictment. I stated that to Mr. Ker, and told him that it was the request of Mr. Kellogg's counsel. Mr. Ker said that he did not see how it could be done consistently with the rules of criminal pleading. That is all there was of that transaction.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Could you frame a criminal indictment upon any other theory without making it subject to objection for variance when you put in your evidence?—A. Any other theory than what?

Q. Any other theory than that you should state the facts exactly as they were. I cannot conceive how you can set forth a state of facts inconsistent with the truth, and then expect to maintain your position by your evidence?—A. Well, my idea about the Kellogg indictment was that it should be drawn, and if I had been consulted, which I was not, I should have suggested that it be drawn—now I am not half so good a criminal pleader as Mr. Ker is, and therefore I may state it very absurdly, but I should have suggested that it should be drawn stating the agreement alleged to have been made with Kellogg, and stating the delivery to him of the postal drafts, naming them, stating it as an agreement to pay a sum of money, and alleging that the money was paid at the time fixed. Stating it in that way in general terms would have left, as I thought, a chance for the defense to raise the question of the statute of limitations upon the pleadings, claiming that they showed a transaction in which the statute of limitations ran from the beginning of the postal drafts.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. In other words, you put in an agreement to pay a certain sum in futuro?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you would claim that the giving of the postal drafts was in accordance with that agreement?—A. Yes, sir; that was my general idea, but I was entirely outside of this Kellogg case. When Mr. Wilson came to me he made some remark to the effect that the other counsel were not disposed to treat them fairly—he gave that as the reason why he came to me, and I carried his message to Mr. Ker; but I did not reflect much about it.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. My point is this: not theoretically what one might do, but every criminal indictment is based upon a state of facts, and those facts rest in proof?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, then, is it good criminal pleading, when the draftsman knows what the evidence is, to go on and frame an indictment, so that when the question comes up for trial it can possibly go off on the question of variance; is that permissible in any case, unless he has been surprised by his witnesses stating the facts differently from how they were stated before the grand jury?—A. No, sir; it is not.

Q. In other words, the indictment ought to be so framed with reference to the evidence that the question of variance cannot be raised.—A. I think it ought.

Q. In that case the question of the sufficiency of the indictment as matter of law can of course be raised upon demurrer. If it appeared on the face of the indictment that the evidence was barred by the statute of limitations upon the facts as stated a demurrer would settle it.—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, as I understand you, Mr. Wilson's request was simply this, that that indictment should present the case as it rested on the evidence and according to the facts.—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that was not done?—A. That was not done; I thought Mr. Wilson's request was a very fair and proper one, at the same time I did not consider it in any detail. Possibly Mr. Ker pointed out some difficulty in drawing the indictment in that way, at any rate, the moment he said it could not be done consistent with the rules of criminal pleading, it passed from my mind, because I felt myself out of the Kellogg case practically always.

Now let me say that on the 3d of January, when I received information that Price was to be used as a witness, I addressed this letter to the Attorney-General:

WASHINGTON, January 3, 1883.

DEAR SIR: I have received from Inspector Woodward notice given at your request that you have decided to use James B. Price as a witness in some of the star-route cases. Of course I recognize most cheerfully your authority in this matter, but as I am not convinced of the wisdom of accepting Mr. Price in the present aspect of the cases as a witness, and granting him the necessary immunity, you will allow me the privilege of recording my dissent.

There are some matters connected with this business not concerning your action which may lead me to again trouble you, but I reserve them for consideration.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS,
Special Assistant Attorney.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

There has been published here by the Attorney-General a letter of mine, dated August 16, 1883, which I will have inserted in my testimony at this point. It is as follows:

THE UNION LEAGUE CLUB,
New York, August 16, 1883.

MY DEAR SIR: Is it desired or expected that I should take part in the trial of Ex-Senator Kellogg? I ask because it is necessary for me to know with reference to engagements for the fall and winter here.

Kellogg's trial is to be some time in October, I presume, the precise time not to be fixed till the court meets on October 8. I consider that the Government has a right to my services at the trial if it wants them, but I must be able to arrange my engagements here. I have to arrange for some important trials here in October and must therefore know what the Government desires of me.

As you know, I have never had any great faith that the case would succeed. If the evidence first produced by Walsh before the last grand jury were in possession of the Government I should feel differently. I speak only from Mr. Ker's report as to those letters. But the Government has neither the letters nor copies. I fear Walsh cannot be relied upon. However this may be, I, of course, should do my best if I went into the case. Perhaps some one who feels surer of success than I do would do better. Mr. Merrick and Mr. Ker are, of course, fully competent to manage the case without any assistance from any one, but an attempt has been made to give a political turn to the case to the detriment of Mr. Merrick, and he as well as the Government ought to be protected from this. Some Republican ought to be associated with them. I am not sure I am the best man, but you have a right to my service.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. B. H. BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Thereupon the Attorney-General addressed a letter to Mr. Corkhill, asking him about the probability of being able to try the Kellogg case at that time.

MR. CORKHILL. Asking me to postpone it.

THE WITNESS. I do not know what his letter to you was. The Attorney-General sent me a copy of Mr. Corkhill's reply, stating that the case would not come up at that time, and that he would give notice when it was to come up. I remained in that perfunctory way in the Kellogg case until February, when we wanted Walsh arrested in that case, and I said to Mr. Brewster that Walsh had a feeling against me, and that the Kellogg case I did not consider as being a very good case, so that on the whole I thought I had better not appear in it. The Attorney-General then wrote to me and stated that he wanted me to make an affidavit.

I think that completes everything I know as to the Kellogg case.

I see that on page 123 of your record here Mr. Cook says that Price, in talking with him, referred to his previous political relations with Kellogg, and to his having in times past made some money contributions for political purposes. I gathered from Kellogg something of the same sort, except that I thought he was talking of a payment made when he was acting as governor in Louisiana, and when, I think, some of our Democratic friends there cut off his supplies.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Is it within your knowledge that the Attorney-General sent for Judge Wylie and expressed a desire that the whole power of the Government should be used to convict Kellogg?—A. Judge Wylie is going to be before the committee, I trust, and I would rather that you would ask him that question.

Q. I ask you to answer it if you know the fact.—A. I do not know it, not having been present at any such interview. I do not know anything on that subject; I have an opinion on the subject.

As to Walsh's claim against the Government, he says that I have acted inconsistently about it. Now, my position about that is simply this: As Mr. Lyman and Mr. Woodward relieved Walsh from the operation of the order made against him as a failing contractor, I thought that it restored his claim for a month's extra pay unless he expressly waived it, and that his written waiver did not cover that, and I told Mr. Merrick, as Mr. Walsh's friend, of that view, and Mr. Merrick wrote me on the 3d of April, 1883, saying that he had communicated that view to Mr. Walsh's counsel. The question as to whether there had been a waiver outside of that written waiver was a different matter, a separate question of fact, and when I came to see Mr. Lyman and others I learned that they had testified to facts in the case before the Court of Claims which seemed to show that there had been such a waiver.

On the 13th of April, 1883, Mr. Merrick wrote me as follows:

MERRICK & MORRIS, COUNSELORS, NO. 1306 F STREET,
Washington, D. C., April 13.

MY DEAR COLONEL: Some time since I received a letter from Walsh, as I heretofore mentioned to you. I took it with me to court three or four times to hand to you, but in the "hurly burly" of the fight forgot to do so. I send it to you with this, thinking you might see him, possibly, whilst you were in New York. I do not know what view of the letter you may take, but it seems to me that he is straining to force us to do that which is beyond our power, certainly beyond mine. I explained to Walsh's counsel in conversation a few days ago the point in his favor mentioned by you in our last conversation about this letter. * * *

Sincerely, yours,

R. T. MERRICK.

The chairman seemed to think at one time that my regarding Mr. Walsh as a co-conspirator was based upon the fact that he had a claim now against the Government. That seems to be the idea of the chairman expressed on page 471. If so, it is an entire mistake. My idea in regarding Mr. Walsh as a co-conspirator was this: That Mr. Walsh received from Brady orders made in his favor, and that, coincidently, or nearly so, or while he was deriving the benefits, he paid money to Brady. Walsh said that money was a loan, but he said that Brady himself claimed that it was a gift or bribe money. Therefore in that view of the case I thought that Walsh might be regarded as a co-conspirator. There is some question made about some bill that Walsh presented for "services." I never knew what the services were. I always believed that they consisted simply in remaining in Washington, because he could not afford to remain here for $1.25 a day. I supposed that that expense was incurred by Mr. Merrick and, perhaps, by Mr. Ker, and that probably the bill ought to be paid, but inasmuch as the law fixed $1.25 a day as the compensation for witnesses, I felt that we could not go on and undertake to pay Mr. Walsh anything beyond that—certainly could not do it for the Government, and I did not feel disposed to make any further advances, although at one time it was suggested that the counsel should advance the money.

As to Walsh's papers, some criticism was made by him upon the fact that I did not impound them. The answer to that is, that when an indictment is found the papers ought to be impounded or held by the district attorney, but when an indictment is not found of course the papers go back.

As to my meeting Walsh on an elevated train, I don't know that I was ever on the train with him; I would like some other evidence of it than his statement; at all events, I never saw him there.

Q. Now, Walsh says that I am wrong in saying that Judge Wylie ever made any derogatory references to him. I will not stop to read an extract from Judge Wylie's public designation of him, contained in the official report of the trial, which is before the committee, but I will submit it. The extract is as follows:

I have never known such audacity as this. The man avoids the process of the law, writes to the President of the United States and to the Attorney-General, prescribing the conditions upon which he is willing to appear as a witness; states that he thinks one of the counsel, Mr. Bliss, is not faithful to the Government in the performance of his duty, and that Mr. Bliss has not done what was right, or what he thought was right, in vindicating him under certain circumstances. He states that until Mr. Bliss submits to be dismissed from the service of the Government and some vindication is given him as to his character he is not going to appear as a witness before a jury. I want to see, and I am going to fix a day partly for that purpose, whether there is power enough in this Government to find that man. If there is power enough to find him, they can find him in three weeks. If the Government is so weak that one man can baffle its process successfully, then we will not delay the trial until he is found. We will take it for granted that the man will continue to have hereafter the same success he has had heretofore.

About the arbitration business, I only desire to say that it is an entire mistake to suppose that I ever proposed to arbitrate until after the grand jury had refused to indict. That grand jury adjourned on the 15th day of June. The agreement of arbitration in the Parker case was signed in court that morning and bears date that day. The notice that the grand jury had refused to indict came to me at some time prior to the 15th, I think as early as Tuesday, the 15th being Saturday, but I will not be certain of that. At all events it was after I got the official notice that the grand jury were not going to indict that I went into the arbitration business, and any conversation that I had with anybody on that subject was after that time—any conversation with Mr. Ker, or Mr. Merrick, or anybody else. I still think that I visited Mr. Merrick's house that night when I learned of the failure of the grand jury to indict, and was proposing to arbitrate, but I see that in my previous testimony I spoke of our having looked up authorities. I am satisfied that that was wrong, and that no authorities were looked up at that time. The examination of authorities was some time afterwards.

I have already answered as to the circumstances under which Mr. Woodward was not allowed to orate to the grand jury. Something in Mr. Woodward's testimony here reminds me that he mentions that somebody had got $500 for services in getting certain Senators to sign petitions for expedition. That was upon the Vinita and Las Vegas route, I remember, and I stated to the grand jury that I desired to get that witness before them the next day and more than one of the grand jurors, when told the name, said in substance: "You need not bring that man here; we should never place any reliance upon any testimony that he might give; his reputation here in Washington is such that he would not be believed."

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did not Mr. Woodward give the name?—A. I think not. There was the name of Parrish given, and the testimony of Mr. Woodward reminds me that there was a Parrish who had got up the Saint Louis petitions. He was not before the grand jury. I did not consider it important to produce him. The petitions spoke for themselves, and were as good evidence as his testimony would have been.

Now, leaving the Vinita and Las Vegas route, once for all, I want to say this: Mr. Woodward went into an elaborate statement before you giving in substance the whole brief that he had made upon that case, and if you will compare that statement with my brief which I submitted to the grand jury and which they had before them, you will find that every item in Mr. Woodward's statement is in that brief of mine submitted to the grand jury. Mr. Mitchell, the foreman, says that he does not think I ever left that paper with the jury. The paper bears on its face the evidence that I did—all those papers bear evidence that they were before the grand jury; they have the decision of the grand jury indorsed upon them. They were papers that I prepared and handed to the foreman and left with him. As to the original documents, my recollection is that the grand jury never did have any official documents left with them over night, because we were always required to take those back to the Department at the end of the day, which we did. I do not recall that occasion particularly, but I know that after we got through with presenting a case I usually went back to my office, leaving whoever was in charge of the papers in the outer room, the papers remaining with the grand jury, and when the grand jury broke up he took the papers and carried them down to the Department. That was the general rule. Whether that was done in the case of the Vinita and Las Vegas route I cannot state definitely, but I have no doubt that it was.

Mr. Mitchell seems to imply that I was in the outer room and went into the grand-jury room when they decided not to indict in that case, and got the papers. That is an error. I got those papers at my hotel in the evening, and they came to me in such a way as led me to think that the grand jury had sent them to the district attorney's office and that the district attorney had sent them to me.

Mr. CORKHILL. You were not there when the grand jury returned the papers.

The WITNESS. I think not. I have not spoken to Mr. Corkhill about this, and have not seen him for months until now.

I think I have nothing else to say at present. Although I have occupied a good deal of time I have not answered all the points that I should have liked to answer. There are certain letters from which I had intended to hand extracts to the committee, but they are probably not of sufficient importance to justify me in incumbering the record with them. One was a letter of Mr. Merrick's saying that he had received a request from the Attorney-General to attend to the Salisbury cases, and that he did not know whether he should make any reply or not.

Here is a letter from Mr. Ker, dated November 8, 1882, which bears upon the question raised here about the subpoenas and the examination of the witnesses:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, November 8, 1882.

My DEAR COLONEL: I can sympathize with you, but probably you have made up your mind to "stare fate in the face" and do not need sympathy. You have a fine lot of people in your party, just such a lot as we have in ours. Up till last Friday, Beaver was all right in Pennsylvania; but Governor Hoyt came out with his letter, and Beaver was all wrong. The people seemed to be fairly crazy to get on the winning side. Just look at Ben. Butler. What have us poor Democrats done, that we should have this affliction put upon us? My friend was elected judge in Philadelphia, and I feel correspondingly happy.

Sloan says you are coming over here next week. I am glad of that. I received your letter stating that you would advance money if you received what was due you from the Government. I understand there is some hitch in the Treasury Department, but I do not know the nature of it. I think our arrangements for the advance money will work. If it does not, we will have to try some other plan. When you come over, I will explain the details of each batch of subpoenas. The newspaper lies are as plentiful as ever; I suppose you see some of them.

Yours, truly, &c.,

WM. W. KER.

Col. GEORGE BLISS.

Here is a letter which the Attorney-General wrote me on the 16th of November, 1883:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, November 16, 1883.

SIR: You will please, in the matter of the prosecution of Kellogg, make affidavit yourself as to the matters complained of about Mr. Walsh. I ask this for reasons that are known to you and myself, that make it more advisable that you should be the person to do it.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq.,
Special Assistant United States District Attorney for the Star-route Cases, Arlington Hotel, Washington.

I have here the original affidavit of Mr. Walsh to which the Attorney-General called my attention, which was published in the New York Herald on Saturday, November 25, 1882.

I have referred to it, but I do not suppose the committee desire the affidavit for their record.

I have here, also, the brief that went before the grand jury in the San Antonio and Corpus Christi case. The committee will see that it sets forth explicitly the substance of Walsh's statements as to Brady.

San Antonio to Corpus Christi, route 31148, and Monroe to Shreveport, route 30183.
James B. Price, contractor.

Indictment desired against Price and Thomas J. Brady.

First. San Antonio to Corpus Christi. Let at $2,733 on a schedule of 40 hours; twice a week, 150 miles.

Aug. 26, 1878.—Service made 6 times a week and $5,466 additional allowed.

Aug. 2, 1879.—Time reduced to 29½ hours and $20,204 additional allowed. Total, $28,403.

John J. Ellis' subcontract, giving him absolute right to all monies, was filed Aug. 29, 1879. It was dated and made Sept. 18, 1878, but Ellis did not file it till after the expedition was ordered, nor until after, on Aug. 20. Price had applied to have the subcontract declared void because made without the consent of the Postmaster-General and because he did not begin expedition on Aug. 1.

As to the latter reason Ellis swore that he did begin on Aug. 1, and produced the certificates of the terminal postmasters to that effect.

The Department, by letter of French, refused to declare the subcontract void, and authorized it to be filed, but the next day Brady, on the last day of the quarter, suspended Ellis' pay. This brought him to terms. Though entitled by his contract to all that was allowed for expedition, he could get no pay until he made a new contract with Price by which he gave to Price $15,653 of the total pay of $28,403. This was Price's bonus for doing nothing in the way of carrying the mails.

There was no shadow of law or reason for Brady's order suspending Ellis' pay. Ellis took the contract when Price was in imminent danger of being declared a failing contractor, which would have destroyed all Price's other contracts. Price was content until after expedition, when he had influence enough of some kind with Brady to procure a suspension of pay on the last day of the quarter and thus force Ellis to his terms.

Ellis produces letters showing that he surrendered unwillingly and only because he must have money to pay his debts.

Ellis swore that in at least two conversations Price told him he got only about a third of the money paid by the Government, one of the other thirds going to Ellis, and the third one to some one in official position in the P. O. Department; Ellis inferred Brady.

John A. Walsh stated in detail a conversation with Brady in which the latter expressly told him he was paid by contractors for ordering expedition and increase, and named the percentage, and urged him, Walsh, to do the same.

Walsh confirmed his relations with Brady by producing a familiar letter from Brady, and also the letter making the appointment for the interview at which the conversation occurred.

Walsh also identified about $20,000 of drafts given by Price upon his pay on this route, and said there were $5,000 or $10,000 more given by Price on another route. All of these drafts came from Brady to Walsh; for $12,500 Brady got credit and received back a note he owed Walsh. The whole matter was discussed with Brady. The drafts produced had on them Walsh's endorsement. The drafts on San Antonio and Corpus Christi route amounted to just about the percentage of the full allowance which Brady told Walsh he got from contractors.

Walsh also swore that Price, since the present investigation commenced, had asked him, Walsh, to say he got the drafts in the way of discount; he produced a letter of Price's looking in the same direction.

Walsh swore that in fact he never had a transaction with Price.

Unless therefore Ellis and Walsh are both disbelieved Price and Brady both admitted corruption, and as to both there is corroborative evidence.

The grand jury may properly consider, also, in this case any other evidence which has come before them which has satisfied them Brady was not an honest officer.

Second. As to the expedition, it was obtained on an affidavit made by Price on July 15, 1879, that a schedule of 40 hours, 6 times a week, required 8 men, and 20 animals—28; that a schedule of 29½ hours would require 23 men and 74 animals—97, an increase of 2.46 per cent.

Ellis showed the falsity of this affidavit in both its branches, though it was chiefly false in greatly understating the number in actual use. Thomas H. Devine, who is now carrying the mail, says he employs 19 men and 64 animals, but could need 12 less animals to carry the mails alone.

Ellis used before expedition 56 animals, and added about 12 head after expedition; 6 drivers were used before expedition and 8 to 10 afterwards.

There were no petitions for expedition. The sole papers were a letter of Senator Maxey and the oath of Price, both filed on the same day.

Third. On route 30183, Monroe to Shreveport, Price was also contractor. He made a subcontract. Then came expedition. Then Price applied to have the subcontract declared void. It was done; the subcontractor was brought to terms, and then the service allowed to go in.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. That letter which you have read as having been brought to you from the Attorney-General by Mr. Kellogg, does it seem to be in a disguised handwriting?—A. (Producing the letter.) You can judge for yourself. If you want to know my opinion, I think the writer was "disguised" when he wrote it.

Q. Without reference to the fact that it was brought to you by some one representing that it came from the source from which it purported to come, would you have recognized it as in the handwriting of Mr. Brewster?—A. Well, I think I should; and yet it would have required a good deal of study to do it. I think, however, that I should have recognized it. The letter is not written or signed in the way in which Mr. Brewster ordinarily writes. I cannot recall that I ever had another pencil letter from him, either before or since, yet I may have had; he used to write me a great many letters.

Q. But this is not in the usual handwriting of Mr. Brewster?—A. Oh, no. When I first took it in my hand it did not occur to me that it was Mr. Brewster's letter. It is signed "B. H. Brewster." I never knew him to sign in that way at any other time; in fact he told me that he never did.

By Mr. MILLIKEN :

Q. Does Mr. Brewster now deny that that was his letter?—A. I never heard that he did.

Q. Have you any idea that he does?—A. Not the slightest. I talked with Mr. Brewster after I received the letter, and made reference to his having sent it to me.

Q. Did he deny it?—A. No, sir.

Q. Upon a fuller examination of that letter, are you satisfied that is in Mr. Brewster's handwriting?—A. I am. I have not any question about it at all. Allow me to say that I understand there were two people present when it was given.

Adjourned.

WASHINGTON, June 20, 1884.

GEORGE BLISS again appeared voluntarily before the committee and testified as follows :

Mr. Walsh has accused me of saying that I did not propose to protect the witnesses for the Government, and of using an expression about not feeling called upon to "fix up those fellows." Nothing of that sort ever occurred. Mr. Walsh was very earnest in his desire that Buell and Brady and everybody else who had attacked him should be prosecuted. That was during the trial, and the counsel all concurred that it was impossible to do anything of that sort while the trial was going on. However, at one time, by arrangement, Mr. Merrick went into court and called attention to the public attacks upon the witnesses for the Government, but that was all there was of it.

In connection with the question put as to Mr. Bosler, I intended to have called the attention of the committee to the fact that, upon the summing up in the first trial, the Attorney-General used this language:

Mr. Bosler is a reputable man. Perhaps that is one of the reasons he did not want to be mixed up with a disreputable transaction. If Mr. Bosler had come here, being a reputable man, and having a good feeling for some of his associates who were in trouble, he might not like to have told what certainly would not help them, or they would have had him here. He was here in this city. * * He lives in Carlisle, Pa., and is an honest, reputable man. Why is he not here? Are they afraid of his integrity? As an honest, reputable man, he has a delicate feeling for these people, because he has associated with them as other men have, although he did not know the secrets of this conspiracy. He was not trusted. Now he finds glaring him in the face these horrible charges, and can connect his crystal with the other crystals in the case, that come from the North and from the South, and then comes the truth. It will not do to bring him. He did not want to come.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. In what connection was that said?—A. The other side had stated in the summing-up that we ought to have brought Bosler here as a witness, and the Attorney-General made this statement in reply to that suggestion.

Q. As you have brought that matter in, just state what was Mr. Bosler's relation to those cases.—A. After Mr. Dorsey went out of the Senate and became openly connected with the contracts he apparently wanted more ready money than he had at his command, and he made an arrangement with Mr. Bosler by which Bosler was to take charge of carrying out the contracts. Bosler was to furnish the money and receive the pay, and was to be paid—I do not know as it ever was stated in evidence, but there was an understanding somewhere that he was to be paid 10 per cent. interest and half the profits. At any rate, in the account which I saw, I don't remember that the interest was calculated, but it was footed up, showing that Bosler was to get half of the net proceeds of the Dorsey contracts. After that time Mr. Dorsey was away from Washington a good deal, particularly the first summer, and apparently the way in which the business was done was that Rerdell staid here and attended to the post-office business, to the collecting of the drafts, and, largely, to all the details in connection with the routes. He drew the money and sent it to Bosler. The post-office warrants were issued after that time, payable to the order of Bosler, and Rerdell got from Bosler the money required to pay the expenses, and sent Bosler memoranda of the amounts necessary to be remitted to the sub-contractors. Bosler came here from time to time in connection with the business, and when Rerdell was induced to withdraw from aiding the Government, after his interviews with Mr. James and Mr. MacVeagh, and was induced to make an affidavit denying what he had stated or implied to Mr. James and Mr. MacVeagh, we always claimed that the evidence showed that Mr. Bosler had induced Rerdell to make that retraction. One of the statements alleged to have been made by Dorsey to Spencer was that he was all right now, that Bosler had sat up all night with Rerdell and got him to retract.

Q. Was there any evidence of the payment of money to Rerdell for the purpose of inducing him to retract?—A. I do not think so.

Q. You saw no evidence of anything of that kind in Bosler's books?—A. No; nothing of that sort.

Q. No payments to Rerdell?—A. Oh, there were payments, as I recollect, to Rerdell.

Q. Was he paid by Bosler for Dorsey, or on account of Bosler himself?—A. I think he was paid on account of the two; it was chargeable to the interest.

Q. To the partnership?—A. Yes, if it was a partnership. I wish you would send for that book; it is in existence, I believe, at Carlisle, Pa.

Q. Who is the executor of Mr. Bosler's estate?—A. I think it is Mr. Bosler's son or brother, Herman D. Bosler.

Q. Did you examine that book?—A. I did.

Q. Did it contain a record of any political contributions or assessments?—A. As I recollect it, it did. It had in it accounts of Mr. Bosler's interests in some other contracts not connected with the Post-Office Department.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Did it show any payments to Cook, or Gibson, or Cole?—A. I have already testified to that. It showed entries of a payment to Cook, and also to Cole.

Q. And to Gibson?—A. And to Gibson.

Q. Do you remember the amount that it showed had been paid to Gibson? He testified to having received $2,500.—A. I should say from recollection that Mr. Gibson's payment was $3,000, but it may have been only $2,500. I will not undertake to say.

WASHINGTON, June 20, 1884.

WILLIAM W. KER again appeared and testified as follows:

The WITNESS. When I appeared before this committee to testify, I understood that my testimony was to be given in relation to facts that occurred and upon which the expenditures in the Department of Justice were based, and I thought that it was my duty to testify fully before this committee, to all facts within my knowledge that in any way had relation to any such expenditure. I believe I have done so, and in doing that I was compelled to mention two or three incidents that operated upon Mr. Merrick's mind and caused Mr. Merrick, who was the senior counsel in the case, to incur an expense which has been credited to me, and of course has been criticised. I felt that it was my duty to explain to the committee how that expense was incurred, knowing that the gentlemen who were interested in the matter would be able, probably, to set it right and furnish the necessary explanation. For some reason that I cannot understand, Colonel Bliss has assumed that I made a wholesale attack upon him. In that idea he is entirely mistaken, and I do not think my testimony will bear him out. In his statement before this committee, the day before yesterday, he went over my testimony critically, and many things in it, that in no way related to Mr. Bliss, were treated by him and criticised by him as reflections upon himself. Now, I want to say for Colonel Bliss that he is a keen, bright, sharp lawyer of great ability and untiring energy. During the progress of the case he became familiar with the papers in a manner that was simply wonderful. There was no person connected with the case who had the same command of the papers that Colonel Bliss had. He seemed to know every one of them by heart, and was able to pick them out, no matter when called upon, and it is no wonder that Mr. Merrick thought that he was a very useful gentleman in the case. We relied in that respect in a great measure upon Colonel Bliss, because he had the facility of understanding these papers and handling them, and in fact there was hardly anything connected with the case that Colonel Bliss was not cognizant of. I mention that in this connection now, so that the committee may see as I go along the reasons that probably actuated Mr. Merrick in what he did, and that guided me. Now, I want to answer Colonel Bliss's statements in regard to myself—those that require answering—because I shall allow the matter in my testimony already given that he has wrongfully chosen to attribute to himself to stand, as those who may read it hereafter, or at least the committee, will see that I have in no way alluded to him there, and that therefore his criticisms or answers on those points do not require any further answer from me.

Colonel Bliss started out by saying that "Ker's inaccuracies were long known to the counsel." Now, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen, if I was inaccurate, and that was known to Colonel Bliss, it was his duty to have informed the Attorney-General of that fact, and have me dismissed from the case. If I was inaccurate, certainly Mr. Merrick would be likely to have said something of the kind, and if he has not said it I hope he will come forward and say now if he thinks there is any truth in it. Colonel Bliss says that he has received a letter from Mr. Woodward relating to that point. We have not had the pleasure of seeing Mr. Woodward's letter, but Colonel Bliss makes the statement that Mr. Woodward said "he had long known that Mr. Ker was inaccurate." Mr. Woodward is a very intelligent, upright gentleman, one who rendered great aid in this case, and a man remarkable for his intense precision; a comma out of the way would lead Mr. Woodward to think that the person was inaccurate; therefore, I do not doubt that Mr. Woodward thinks that in some minor particulars I am inaccurate, and I do not claim that in some such instances I am not inaccurate. But I do not think that Mr. Woodward would come here and deny the gist of the statements that I have made before the committee, or the facts that I have narrated to them. Colonel Bliss says that he did not furnish the bill of fare of the Dorsey dinner to Mr. McSweeney. Now, I stated in my examination that I did not see Colonel Bliss furnish it. If he had contented himself with denying that, I would have nothing further to say about it; but he has chosen to characterize my assertions as "manufactured," and as "false," and he having made that direct attack upon that portion of my testimony, it is now my duty to show that it is not manufactured and is not false. He has also insinuated that probably I furnished that bill of fare to McSweeney, and he has stated that I was intimate with Mr. McSweeney. Judge McSweeney was a stranger in Washington like myself. I met him at the hotel. I found him a very pleasant and agreeable gentleman who agreed with me politically, and, upon a number of occasions, I spoke to Mr. McSweeney, and tried to the best of my ability to make his stay here as pleasant as was in my power. Beyond that there were no other relations existing between Judge McSweeney and myself.

Having my attention called to this matter by the imputation cast upon me, I have thought over every circumstance connected with the production of that book, and I remember now that Mr. McSweeney told me, standing at the corner of Fourteenth street and the Avenue, at Willard's Hotel, that he had received that book from Colonel Bliss. Mr. McSweeney lives in Ohio; he is a well-known lawyer, and I am certain that a letter from the chairman of this committee would get from him the entire truth of the matter. I deny most emphatically that I gave the book to Mr. McSweeney, or that I ever saw it until it was thrown on the table.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Thrown on the table when?—A. During the argument of Mr. McSweeney before the jury. On page 2780 of the record of the first trial, Mr. McSweeney, in his argument says:

Dorsey has found the lines of the poet to be true, that he who ascends the mountaintops shall find the loftiest summit crowned with ice and snow: he who surpasses or subdues mankind must look down on the hate of those below. He has been stabbed in the house of his friends. Here is a little book [exhibiting a small volume] that you will look upon, inscribed "George Bliss." It is not in evidence. Scarce had the shoes grown old that stamped their loud approval of Senator Dorsey, two months, nay, not two months ago, until the roar of accusation burst out against him.

That is the incident and that is the paragraph that I referred to; that is the book that I referred to, which Mr. McSweeney exhibited, and threw upon the table, and I say now, if you will write to Mr. McSweeney he will tell you, I think, as he told me, that he got it from Colonel Bliss. Now I submit, gentlemen of this committee, whether what I testified to before you is false or whether it is true. If Colonel Bliss has any answer to make, let him make it.

Mr. BLISS. I ask the committee to compare that statement with Mr. Ker's original statement on this subject.

The WITNESS. Let me go on to another point. In speaking of the interview in the New York Herald, that I testified to as one of the things that made Mr. Merrick and the Attorney-General both angry, and a thing which at that time had a serious bearing upon the case, of course I did not assume to know, nor do I now know, whether Colonel Bliss actually stated to the reporter what was published in that interview, or not. He denied it afterwards in a card. I did not introduce that here to injure him. I introduced it as one of the moving causes that had operated on the mind of Mr. Merrick. Colonel Bliss denies that the effect of that interview was such as I have stated in my testimony. He denies that there was any such use made of that interview as I have stated. He goes so far as to say that he has conversed with Judge Wylie, and that Judge Wylie says there was nothing of the kind. Well, I don't know what he told Judge Wylie, but I do know that if Judge Wylie were brought here he would tell the truth of the matter. Now I do not want to permit this controversy to stand as a simple question of veracity between Colonel Bliss and myself. At the time Colonel Bliss was not in court; I was; I saw what took place, and I hope, Mr. Chairman, you will ask the Attorney-General, when he comes to be examined, whether he remembers this incident. Now let us see what did take place. I told you, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Wilson, one of the counsel for the defense, attempted to use this interview before the jury. He held the paper in his hand and started to read it. Now, we will stand by the record, as much as is in the record. On page 2884 of the first trial, Judge Jere. M. Wilson is addressing the jury, and he says:

As to Dorsey, my brother Merrick thought that this testimony was a very flood which was to drown him, but Brother Bliss thought it was not very much of a shower, so far as Dorsey was concerned. My brother Merrick had a great deal to say about the newspapers, and he has told you a great deal about what the newspapers have said and are saying in regard to this case. Well, the newspapers, it happens, saw this very wide difference that existed between Mr. Merrick and Mr. Bliss upon this subject, and one of them went so far as to say that they were going to watch and see whether the learned Attorney-General was going to side with Bliss in saying that this was not so much of a sprinkle, as far as Dorsey was concerned, or whether he was going to side with Merrick and say that it was a flood, so far as Dorsey was concerned; and that brought out this [taking up a newspaper slip]: "Alexandria"—

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL (interposing). Wait! wait! Is that proper, your honor?

The COURT. No.

Mr. WILSON. Never mind; I will pass that over. I thought that as so much liberty had been taken as to what the press had said, it would not be out of place for me to follow in the footsteps of my illustrious predecessors.

Such is the statement in the record of what took place there. Judge Wilson had the New York Herald interview in his hand. He referred to the editorial that I read to you here, which wanted to know whether the Attorney-General was going to take sides with Mr. Bliss or with Mr. Merrick. He stated the substance of the article. There was not a man upon that jury who hadn't it within his power, and I have no doubt they did have the curiosity, to read the article which had excited so much comment, and which was attempted to be read before them and suppressed. Now, as Colonel Bliss was not present, of course he did not know what did take place in court; but before he got on this stand and, on his solemn oath, stated that I had told a falsehood here and "manufactured" my statement, he might have read the record. That is the second instance in which I think I have shown that what I have stated before this committee is absolutely true.

Colonel Bliss says that he furnished me with a list of the witnesses. You know, gentlemen, I told you that I had subpoenaed the witnesses. Mr. Merrick told me to subpoena them, and I have told you that after they came here I took them to my room and examined them. I did not say and I do not say that Colonel Bliss had nothing to do with subpoenaing the witnesses. I said that I was to subpoena the witnesses. So I was. He was not, and I was. He sent me a list of the witnesses that he thought ought to be subpoenaed. I was thankful to get it; glad to get it. I took it and used it. There was no trouble about that. I did not say that there was anything wrong with him in relation to the subpoenaing of witnesses. I did not accuse him of anything. He read you my letter and he read his own letter to me. Nowhere in my testimony is there anything said that reflects on him about that. I have here a letter from Colonel Bliss; I went to the Department of Justice and I saw it in a drawer and opened it. I was astonished to find that one of the few letters that I received from Colonel Bliss was lying there, and probably, as he has read mine here, I may as well read his:

MY DEAR SIR: If the Government would pay my bill I would advance Semple what is needed. Otherwise, you must do the best you can. I have no faith in the Colorado marshal or any others there. They are all against us.

Yours, truly,

GEO. BLISS.

WM. W. KER, Esq.

That letter was sent to me by Colonel Bliss from 160 Broadway, New York, and by it you will see that I was engaged in the business of getting the witnesses; so that his own letter corroborates what I say. I know that I had trouble in getting the money to pay witnesses; I had to advance it to them, and Colonel Bliss here offers to advance them money if the Government will pay his bill. Well, as I had nothing to do with the Government paying his bill, I could not avail myself of that offer, and I had to pay that money myself, part of it, and part of it was obtained through an order from the Attorney-General—I believe it came from the President of the United States. Probably that was at Colonel Bliss's suggestion. If it was, I am very much obliged to him, because it aided me materially in settling with the witnesses.

Then, again, he says that he did not give me the name of M. C. Rerdell to be placed in the first indictment. You will remember that I testified that I came here a stranger. I had nothing to do with the cases until I came here to prepare the indictments. I conversed with Colonel Bliss and he furnished me the names; otherwise I should have had no way of getting them. He went over the case with me and talked about the names to be put in, and among others given to me was the name "M. C. Rerdell." Now, of course Colonel Bliss denies most emphatically that I spoke to him about the name of Rerdell, or about getting his Christian name. I made no attack upon Colonel Bliss as to M. C. Rerdell—about not getting his Christian name. If the colonel did not know the name that was a full excuse. But he was not content with that. He must indulge in reflections against me, and now I want to show who tells the truth. Colonel Bliss says that he asked three of the clerks that were assisting me at that time and that they say they never heard any question raised about the christian name. Well, that is probably true. I do not think I discussed that matter with the gentlemen who were merely copying the indictments. I do not think that I went to the clerks for information concerning these cases. I went to the gentleman who was assigned to direct me, and that was Colonel Bliss, and I got my information from Colonel Bliss, or from Mr. Woodward, or from Mr. Shallcross, or from Captain Tidball. Those were the persons who I supposed could give me information. Now, I do not doubt that Colonel Bliss did go and ask some of those clerks, but he was not kind enough to mention their names, and, therefore, I could not, in the short time that I have had, run around and hunt them up; but even if I had the time I do not think I should have done so, because, as I say, I do not recollect that I mentioned the question to them at all.

Now, if this committee are to decide who tells the truth in this matter, let them decide it on the preponderance of evidence. On page 352 of your record, in Mr. Woodward's testimony, I find this:

Q. He was indicted by his initials, as were also one or two others?—A. Yes, sir.

H. Mis. 38, pt. 2—47*

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Whom is he speaking of?—A. I do not think that is material; he was speaking, I think, about the name of Sanderson, but the material point is stated in his next answer, and which will appear, when I come to read it. Mr. Woodward goes on:

With regard to the indictment by initials, Mr. Ker asked me once or twice what the first name of M. C. Rerdell was; I never saw his name signed in any papers except "M. C. Rerdell." Afterwards the clerks hunted among the bids and they found some proposals which were signed "Mont. C. Rerdell." One or two of the grand jurors asked me about this also. I was very busy and did not pay much attention to it. I suppose I am responsible for the misnomer of Vaile. One of the jurors asked me what his name was, and I had never seen it in the papers except as H. M. Vaile; but I made some inquiries, where and how I do not recall, and as a result reported to the grand jury that his name was Henry. So that that mistake originated through me.

There is the magnanimity of the true gentleman; he takes the blame to himself of having given the wrong name of Vaile, and corroborates me in my assertion that I inquired about the Christian name of M. C. Rerdell. Colonel Bliss says the name was found in the city directory. Colonel Bliss was my superior in this case. He was the man who took the indictment to the grand jury. He says he said to me, "Ought you not to put in 'whose Christian name is to the grand jurors unknown?'" and that I said, "No; it is not necessary." He told you the day before yesterday that he made that suggestion before he took the indictment to the grand jury. Well, as a matter of law, I say again that it was unnecessary. If that averment had been put in it would not have stopped Rerdell from putting in his plea in abatement, and therefore I thought it was unnecessary, and I think so yet; but, with Colonel Bliss's attention directed to the fact that M. C. Rerdell was indicted by his initials, and with the information in his possession that Montfort C. Rerdell's name was to be found in the directory, look at the position he placed me in by refusing to give me that information.

Mr. BLISS. Gentlemen, let me say——

Mr. FYAN (interposing). I object. Mr. Bliss himself objected to interruption the other day.

The CHAIRMAN. There is objection. You can make your statement later, Mr. Bliss.

The WITNESS. If he says he did not know of the name being in the directory at that time, then it was only introduced here for the purpose of stabbing at me. I did not know it. Of course, as I say, I did not converse with the clerks, and therefore I have not thought that there would be any use in appealing to them for information. In order to substantiate his position, Colonel Bliss might just as well have gone and asked the watchman in the lobby, or the doorkeeper. I never talked to either of them about the matter.

The next thing he says is that he did not say that Mr. Walsh was a "man of bad character who could not be believed." Now, I told you that I was to examine the witnesses, by direction of the Attorney-General, but that Colonel Bliss said that he would examine them himself. He has produced before you a paper I never had the pleasure of seeing before. It purports to be the statement of Mr. Walsh, written out by A. M. Gibson, and said to have been corrected by Mr. Walsh, after having it read to him by Colonel Bliss. That I think was in 1881. Therefore, in 1882, the time I was speaking about, somewhere about April or May or June, 1882, Colonel Bliss did know Mr. Walsh, and did know something with reference to the testimony that Mr. Walsh would be likely to give. Well, I reiterate, Colonel Bliss told me that "Walsh was a man of bad character and was not to be believed." He says he did not tell me that.

It is a question of veracity between us. Somebody will have to settle that question, but in settling and deciding the question I will ask the committee to remember that Mr. Walsh claims that there were some disparaging remarks made about him by Colonel Bliss, and that he took offense at those remarks, and that that was a reason why he did not want to appear in the case. You will also remember that Mr. Merrick testified that he had to conciliate Mr. Walsh in order to get him to testify; and if Mr. Merrick had to conciliate Walsh, why, of course, the inquiry would naturally arise, upon what ground was Mr. Walsh offended and why did he have to be conciliated? It is very evident that Mr. Walsh and Colonel Bliss were not good friends. Colonel Bliss says Mr. Walsh attacked him. Mr. Walsh says Colonel Bliss began it. The evidence shows that there was bad feeling existing between the two, and I must naturally have known that. I say I did know it, and when I spoke about Mr. Walsh to Colonel Bliss I received the reply I have quoted. You will also remember, gentlemen, that throughout the cases Colonel Bliss was in the unfortunate position of quarreling with every material witness that the Government had. He opened his quarrel with Mr. Walsh. He quarreled with Mr. Boone. He quarreled with Mr. Price. He was opposed to accepting Price, and it kept Mr. Merrick busy propitiating the witnesses that Colonel Bliss had been driving off. If it had not been for the exertions of Mr. Woodward, who introduced or brought Mr. Walsh to Mr. Merrick, the Government would never, I think, have been able to have secured the testimony of Mr. Walsh at all. Taking all these facts into consideration, I think there will be little hesitation in accepting my statement that Colonel Bliss must have said something to me in regard to Mr. Walsh; but if he did not say any such thing to me, then I deserve the most severe censure for not having made some effort on my own behalf to get Mr. Walsh as a witness.

The next thing that Colonel Bliss claims is, that I reflected upon him for not sending for Mr. Moore. I did not reflect on him for that. I did not mention about his not having sent for Mr. Moore for the purpose of casting any reflection upon him. He has read to you what the post-office inspector wrote about Moore's general character. I suppose that the post-office inspector was a fair and reliable man. We found them all, with one exception, to be such. A better body of men never existed than the post-office inspectors; they are fair, honest, manly men. I presume that the post-office inspectors found out that Mr. Moore was considered a "bad man" by the people he was then living among. So he was a very bad man to attack, quick on the trigger, and a bad man—a rough customer, who was used to the mines, and thought nothing of pulling his revolver out and giving the contents of it to whoever attacked him. In that sense he was "bad." The Post-Office inspector made a report about him, and he was not brought here at the first trial. I do not say that it was any fault of Colonel Bliss in particular, but if Colonel Bliss had permitted me to have examined the witnesses, in all probability I should have taken more pains to ascertain what kind of a man Mr. Moore really was, and to get into communication with him because of the evidence that he was supposed to possess. He was alleged to have some letters written to him by Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey, and we were anxious to get those letters to use them in evidence against Mr. Dorsey. No matter how bad Moore might be, the letters would speak for themselves. Well, we might have got Moore, but, as I said, Colonel Bliss quarreled with Mr. Boone. He had indicted Boone (I had prepared the indictments), and Mr. Boone was characterized as the head and front of the great combination to put in bogus securities.

Mr. Boone was indicted and followed up, although it was Mr. Woodward's strong desire at that time to get into communication with Mr. Boone in order to get Boone's testimony, as it was supposed that he was a man who could tell a great deal if he wanted to speak. Mr. Boone would not talk to us. Mr. Woodward faithfully persisted in his efforts, and finally brought Mr. Boone into contact with Mr. Merrick. Mr. Boone naturally felt aggrieved at what had been said about him and at his having been indicted, but after a great deal of coaxing and persuasion he was induced to tell us a part of what he knew; and when he did tell us a part of what he knew we found that it was one of the most damaging pieces of testimony that could be imagined against Stephen W. Dorsey. He testified, but he did not testify to all that he might have testified to. Boone was Moore's particular friend. Mr. Moore trusted in Boone, and through Boone we could get Moore; but without Boone we could not get Moore. Therefore, if we had been in communication with Boone we could have secured Moore. Now, as I said before, I do not ascribe that failure to Colonel Bliss in particular. I merely say, in answer to what he has stated in regard to my reflections about Moore, that it is just possible that we might have been able to have secured Moore at the first trial if Colonel Bliss had allowed somebody else to have relieved him of the burden of examining the witnesses and taking charge of them. Finally, on the second trial, Mr. Moore did come here. We got Mr. Boone to send for him. It appears that in moving, Mr. Moore's papers were lost, for he was a man of a roving character. The letters that we wanted were not to be found, but he proved a very valuable witness. Of course it did not make any difference as to the final result who testified, but there were other people to be satisfied besides the jury. You, gentlemen, members of Congress, were to be satisfied, and the people were to be satisfied that there was a case made out against the parties accused, and Moore contributed his full quota of evidence to making a case against Mr. Stephen W. Dorsey. His testimony bore directly against Dorsey, as the testimony of Boone did, and even Colonel Bliss says that Moore was a valuable witness.

Next, Colonel Bliss denies that he did not bring out all the testimony in the case. If he had not denied that I would not have said a word more about it. I did not charge him with not bringing out all the testimony in the case. I did not make any such allegation against him. I said that it subsequently appeared upon my examining these witnesses that "they had not testified on the first trial to all they knew." If he had let the matter stop there, I think he would be a happier man to-day. Now, of course, I could go over this record seriatim, and read the testimony of all these witnesses. I thought I had banished the case from my mind for good and all; I hoped I had, but, in recalling these facts for my protection, I remember one instance of a man named Coll McLellan. Now, I will not tell you what I think about it; I will read it to you.

On page 2656 Mr. McLellan's examination in chief is going on.

The subject was a conversation between John W. Dorsey and the gang of laborers who were building stations along the route at a time when the service was only once a week, I think, and the pay a couple of thousand dollars, and as they were building these stations, at, I think, a cost of $6,000, the men could not see how the contractors could spend $6,000 while they received only $2,000, so they became afraid of their wages and had a row, and John W. Dorsey told the men this around the camp-fire, in order to quiet them, and the truth of the matter was that John W. Dorsey's words came out precisely true. The route was increased up to $150,000, made tri-weekly and daily, just as prophesied by him.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was that evidence brought out on the second trial and not on the first?—A. Yes, sir. Now, Colonel Bliss examined Coll McLellan at the first trial and also at the second trial, and I want to point out to you in this instance how mistaken Colonel Bliss is, and how grateful he would probably be to himself if he had omitted his attack on me.

On page 2656 of the second trial, in McLellan's examination-in-chief, he was asked whether he had any conversations with John W. Dorsey, and then the following took place:

Mr. HENKLE. I object, on account of the date, and reserve an exception.

A. Yes, sir; we had different conversations.

Q. What did he say?—A. I cannot give the exact conversation.

Q. Well, give the substance of what you remember.—A. He told us that he intended to have the service increased. In about three months, I think, he expected a tri-weekly service; and in about three months after that he expected a daily service.

Q. Did he say anything about the profits or cost of it?—A. Yes, sir; he said that while they were having a weekly service they expected to lose money on it, but when it was increased and the time expedited they expected to make a very good thing of it.

Q. Were any sums named?—A. I think he mentioned $150,000 as the sum to be realized.

Q. Did he say anything about how he expected to get it increased?—A. Yes, sir; he told us that his brother, Senator Dorsey, was chairman of the Post-Office Committee, I believe it was, and through his influence he expected to get the increase, or partly through his influence.

Q. Did he say anything as to who was interested in the route?—A. He did not say who all of the parties were.

Q. Did he name any?—A. I don't remember any except Senator Dorsey and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Then on page 2661, in the cross-examination by Mr. Wilson, McLellan was examined as follows:

Q. You were here for three months, as I understand you, during the former trial?—A. Somewhere near that; about that; I do not remember how long.

Q. You were brought here as a witness, were you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And remained here for three months?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And were constantly seeing these Government officers, were you?—A. I have seen them frequently, although I have had very little conversation with them.

Q. I am not talking about that. You have frequently seen them?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And they asked you what you knew, did they not?—A. No, sir.

Q. Before you went on the stand?—A. No, sir.

Q. They never asked you a question about what you knew?—A. No, sir; I don't think they did.

Q. Nobody?—A. I don't think they did. I may have had an interview with Woodward; I don't remember.

Q. Don't you know you did?—A. I don't remember it.

Q. Do you not know you did have an interview with Mr. Woodward in which he interrogated you as to what you knew?

Mr. DAVIDGE. Think well.

A. I do not remember it.

Q. What makes you think you might have had it, if you do not remember it?—A. He sent word to me, I think, that he wanted to have an interview with me, but I do not think that we had the interview; I don't remember.

Q. Before you came here had you had an interview with somebody, and told him what you would swear to?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. So the Government had interviewed you before you came here with reference to what your testimony would be?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you told them, did you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who was the man who interviewed you?—A. I don't remember his name; he was a post-office inspector.

Q. You told him what you have here testified to, did you?—A. I gave him all these facts.

Mr. MERRICK. Was not all that gone into?

The COURT. I will permit it.

Mr. MERRICK. Has he not been fully examined upon it?

The COURT. I shall allow it to go in.

Q. Was not that man's name Furey?—A. I don't think it was.

Q. Did he not live in Omaha?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. At all events he interrogated you as to what you knew?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you told him?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And then you came on here as a witness. You were subpoenaed, were you?—A. I was subpoenaed and came on.

Q. And you remained here three months?—A. Something about three months.

Q. And you were in that room probably twenty times, and during that number of times you never mentioned this particular conversation which you have undertaken to give in the words of John W. Dorsey, did you?—A. I did not.

Then the examination went on as to how many witnesses were congregated in the room when I examined him. What he told me I wrote out, and at the second trial Colonel Bliss asked the question. Now, Mr. Woodward has testified that there were abstracts of these cases prepared and that the post-office inspectors furnished the reports. Colonel Bliss testified that the inspectors furnished their reports of the testimony of the people to be examined, and that he examined the witnesses from those reports. That was his answer given to you here the day before yesterday, that he had examined some of the witnesses himself, that he had put them before the grand jury, and that he was guided by the testimony taken down by the post-office inspectors. If that were the case, then I suppose Colonel Bliss will tell us how it was that he failed to ask that witness that question.

Mr. BLISS. May I answer that now? It was because I had before me Mr. McLellan's sworn statement by which I examined him; which was a statement taken and transmitted by Post-Office Inspector Siebold, and in which McLellan did not state any such matter as that which he subsequently swore to on the second trial. I went all over McLellan's testimony; his statement of what he could testify to, with that affidavit before me, and he never lisped a word about that matter that he testified to on the second trial. That is my answer. There [indicating it in a printed document] is the affidavit I examined him by.

The WITNESS. (Looking at the affidavit.) I don't know how many statements he had, whether he had one or a dozen. I do know that the man was interrogated by Colonel Bliss and was examined at the second trial, that Colonel Bliss examined him and that he made this statement and said in open court that he had never been examined by Colonel Bliss on this point—told that to Colonel Bliss himself. And I mention that to show that Colonel Bliss is mistaken when he says that my testimony about the witnesses is false. I correct him from the record.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did Coll McLellan state to you that he had made this statement to Mr. Siebold, the inspector?—A. I have read his testimony given under oath in open court where he was examined by Colonel Bliss himself.

Q. Did he state to you before he went into court that he had made that particular statement to Siebold?—A. Oh, yes. He said he wondered why he had not been asked about it. He told me when I examined him privately that he was surprised, and when he gave me the names of the people that were around the fire he gave me the name of a man called Cabell, and some other names, and I sent Joe Pennell out to hunt them up, but they were scattered all over the country and Pennell was able to find only Cabell. Now, Colonel Bliss has designated this man Cabell as a bad witness, a witness as to whom Judge Wylie said it was an unfortunate thing that we examined him. I do not know whether Judge Wylie said that or not. I do not want to express an opinion about that. The judge can tell himself whether he did or not. But whether Judge Wylie said so or not is immaterial to this question. Colonel Bliss says that I deserve the credit and that he accords me the credit of bringing before the court the witness Cabell. Very well. On page 2666 of the record of the second trial Mr. Cabell gave his testimony. He corroborated all that Coll McLellan had said, gave the time and the circumstances and also another conversation that he had with John W. Dorsey; all of it bearing severely upon John W. Dorsey, Stephen W. Dorsey, and Thomas J. Brady; the purport of it being that there was a ring here in Washington by which the service was to be increased, the number of trips, the price, &c. Of course I must accept whatever Colonel Bliss gives me in the way of credit. I did not mention that matter with any idea of claiming credit, but I mentioned it with the idea of showing to this committee the amount of labor that I had to perform and what my duties were in connection with the case. But if I was wrong in bringing Mr. Cabell here, if I committed a grave mistake in that, then my superior in the case, an old, able, well-tried lawyer like Colonel Bliss, should never have put that witness on the stand and examined him. If he wanted to throw upon me the blame of bringing that witness here to testify, he might have been gracious enough to have allowed me to examine him in court and shouldered the entire responsibility. It won't do for Colonel Bliss to come to this committee and cast reflections upon me on that ground, when he himself is the man who examined this witness before the jury. And I say that Mr. Cabell's testimony never was attacked, and the colonel cannot point to a page in this record that will show that his testimony was attacked, good, bad, or indifferent, outside of the insinuations of the defendants' counsel, and of course they were welcome to these insinuations, for they made them concerning everybody.

Colonel Bliss denies that he wanted to let Mr. Dorsey escape. He has read you his letter to Mr. Merrick about my testimony upon that subject and Mr. Merrick's reply. Now, I never have said that Colonel Bliss wanted to let Mr. Dorsey escape. I only told you what Mr. Merrick narrated to me in a conversation between us; I do not wonder that it angered Colonel Bliss, but that was no reason why he should fire at me. He could have attacked the man who said it if he was not afraid. Instead of that he has attacked me, the youngest lawyer in the case; and he was not satisfied with attacking me alone; he wanted to vent his spite at everybody that had anything to do with the case. I testified in this case coolly, and without any feeling against him at all. I did not want to say anything derogatory to Colonel Bliss, but I did not want this committee or anybody else to be able to accuse me of suppressing testimony or not telling the whole truth that I was subpoenaed and sworn to tell, so I told it. Colonel Bliss says that Judge Wylie says such a charge against him was preposterous. I don't know whether Judge Wylie said that or not, but I presume if he were brought here he would say so, for how would the judge know whether Colonel Bliss wanted to let Mr. Dorsey go or not? I cannot imagine what he could know about it. He took the case that was brought before him. But did not Mr. Merrick corroborate what I said? Did not Mr. Merrick tell me what I testified to? There was no untruth in that. Mr. Merrick does not deny that he told me something of the kind. He does not deny it; therefore that part of my testimony is unchallenged. Colonel Bliss says that he never dreamed of letting Dorsey go; that he never heard of it until it was "trotted out" in my testimony before this committee under the inspiration of Brewster Cameron. And to show the feeling that actuated the colonel, he mentioned Brewster Cameron as having inspired me, and then dashed into the jury bribery cases and said repeatedly to this committee that the names he heard mentioned in connection with the bribery case were those of Brewster Cameron, Ker, and a lawyer named Falls. He repeated that to the committee, and when closely pressed after my statement, he reluctantly admitted that he heard also the name of Mr. Merrick mentioned in connection with it. Now, I don't know whether he was afraid of Mr. Merrick; but if not, I do not see why he left Mr. Merrick's name out unless it was because of his strong desire to hurt me—to stab Brewster Cameron by giving the idea that we were actuated by improper motives. As I said before, I did not know that Colonel Bliss and Mr. Brewster Cameron were enemies. I want to say this right here: neither the Attorney-General, nor any person connected with the Department of Justice, or with any Department of the Government of the United States, neither Brewster Cameron nor any living soul, ever instigated me to testify before this committee. No living soul inspired me to testify before this committee, and if anybody had inspired me he would have simply inspired me to tell what I did tell—the plain, simple truth. Now, I said I did not know what could actuate Colonel Bliss to make this attack upon Mr. Brewster Cameron, but I have thought the matter over and concluded that as Brewster Cameron is thousands of miles away from here, attending to his public duties, and as Colonel Bliss knew that he was out of the city and incapable of defending himself before this committee at present, the colonel thought it would be safe to attack him. Now, inasmuch as Colonel Bliss has said that my name was mixed up with that bribery matter, and that this committee ought to investigate the whole matter, I proposed to tell the committee what I know about it.

During the trial Mr. Cameron came to the office of Mr. Merrick, one afternoon after court, and said that a man named Bowen had come to him and told him that Mr. William Dickson, the foreman of the jury, wished to see him about something connected with the jury—some attempt to bribe them. Mr. Cameron said that the Attorney-General was away and that he did not want to go and see Mr. Dickson without advice from Mr. Merrick. Mr. Merrick, without waiting to hear all that Brewster Cameron had to say, said to him, "Go, by all means, to see Mr. Dickson." Mr. Cameron said, "He is the foreman of the jury; I do not think I have any right to talk to him, and it may be misinterpreted." Mr. Merrick was angry at Mr. Cameron's hesitation, and at some remark that Mr. Cameron made about hearing that Mr. Dickson was not a trustworthy man—I cannot recall the words, but it was some sort of a disparaging remark that excited and angered Mr. Merrick. Mr. Merrick said, "I tell you Mr. Dickson is a high-toned, honorable gentleman, and he wants to see you, no doubt, to give you some information that will be of benefit to the Government about an attempt to bribe the jury." At that time there were rumors circulating in the newspapers and around the streets that there were attempts to bribe the jury. Mr. Cameron still hesitated to go, but Mr. Merrick said, "I tell you to go and see him." I coincided with what Mr. Merrick said. Mr. Cameron again made some remark about his not wishing to go. I told Mr. Cameron that I thought it was his duty to go; that if there were any questions at all about it he could refer to Mr. Bowen, to Judge Hoover, of Arizona, to Mr. Merrick, and myself, to show that he went to Mr. Dickson with proper motives. Finally, Mr. Cameron agreed to go, and I thought he had gone. I found out afterwards, however, that Mr. Cameron did not go. At that time he was under orders to proceed to California, and had his ticket in his pocket and was to leave, I think, by the 7 o'clock train, and I found that instead of going to see Mr. Dickson he went there and called away from Mr. Dickson a man named Bowen, who was also to go west with Mr. Cameron, it being arranged that Mr. Bowen and Mr. Cameron should go out there together upon some business connected with the Department. Mr. Cameron walked in and called Mr. Bowen out, and they went down to the depot and got on the train, went out west, and were gone three or four weeks, and Mr. Cameron never really said a word to Mr. Dickson concerning the case. There is the gentleman [Mr. Dickson] sitting there now; I know he will be manly enough to say so.

Mr. DICKSON to the committee. Do you wish me to reply?

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. He is willing that you should reply. You have been sworn as a witness, have you not?

Mr. DICKSON. No, sir.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Then your reply cannot be accepted.

The WITNESS. I do not want to anticipate his reply. I had nothing to do with the matter beyond that. Mr. Merrick and I were together. He will tell you the same thing that I have told you. Why Colonel Bliss should want to mix up our names in that connection I cannot imagine, and his attack on Mr. Cameron I can only account for by one other matter, which I propose to tell you. It appears that there was a man of some notoriety and of rather an unsavory reputation, named Paul Strobach, who was a United States marshal, and after the President had nominated him for the position of marshal, and his name had gone to the Senate, there were some charges preferred against him by the Department of Justice, I think through the instrumentality of Mr. Brewster Cameron, who was pushing the Strobach case at that time, so far as I could see by the newspapers. One Friday afternoon I was going over to Philadelphia, and, before going into the car, Colonel Bliss said to me: "I want to come and have a talk with you." He was going over in the same train. He went in the parlor car, and I went in the smoking car. During the course of the journey over, Colonel Bliss came back to the smoking car, and took a seat beside me. He said to me: "Your friend Brewster Cameron is getting himself into a great deal of trouble." I wanted to know what was the matter. "Well," the colonel said, "here is this Strobach case; Brewster Cameron will get himself into trouble about that case." I said, "Why, what is the matter? Is not Strobach guilty? If he is guilty he ought to be prosecuted." "Well," said Colonel Bliss, "after the President has made the nomination and it has gone to the Senate it is no time for the Department of Justice to make an attack upon a man. If they had any attack to make they ought to have made it before he was nominated." I said, "Yes; but, colonel, suppose they didn't know it before he was nominated; what then?" "Well," said he, "after he was nominated there ought not to be an attack made upon him." "Well," I said, "he is a bad man, and I think he ought to be prosecuted." I cannot exactly recall what I said in that connection, but I said that he ought to be prosecuted. Colonel Bliss became somewhat excited and angry, and he said, "Well, it just amounts to this: Brewster Cameron will have to quit the Department of Justice. The Attorney-General will have to turn Brewster Cameron out or the Attorney-General himself will be turned out, and it is only a question of a very short time until the whole thing will be brought about. Now, I do not want to see Brewster Cameron turned out, but if this thing goes on, out he goes." Well, I hadn't been used to getting Cabinet secrets [laughter], and I was a good deal surprised. Now, let Mr. Bliss deny that if he wants to.

Mr. BLISS. I do not want to deny it, sir. There is my letter to the Attorney-General himself and the Attorney-General's answer. That states my position in the matter. I will send it to the committee. It goes over the whole matter. The general statement that I made was that Mr. Brewster Cameron had, twice in succession, preferred charges against men nominated by the President on the recommendation of the Department of Justice, which charges were based upon grounds which existed before the men had been nominated and on evidence then in the Department of Justice, and I told Mr. Brewster himself that no administration could go on in that way; that either they must make some arrangement by which, before the men were nominated, charges then in possession of the Department should be brought to the attention of the President, or that they should not, after they had neglected to make the charges known, bring them forward after the nominations had been made by the President.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Is it the custom of the Executive to communicate to his Cabinet the names of gentlemen that he proposes to nominate for certain offices?

Mr. BLISS. The practice is this. Every nomination to an office under the Department of Justice that the President makes to the Senate, comes with the recommendation of the Department of Justice to the President that so and so be nominated. All the papers as to that candidate, and all the papers as to the other candidates, are sent over from the Department.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. And your comment was made upon the theory that this nomination had been recommended beforehand by the Department of Justice, and that after it had been communicated to the Senate, the Department of Justice, through captiousness or for a wicked purpose, antagonized it?

Mr. BLISS. No, sir; not from captiousness or for a wicked purpose. My point was this: That probably when Mr. Brewster concluded to make the nomination, he did not know that this information was in the possession of Brewster Cameron, and that Brewster Cameron did not know that the nomination was to be made; and I said that they ought to put a stop to such misunderstandings.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Then, where an improper nomination was made by the President, by accident or by reason of his not possessing a knowledge of the facts, would you go to the extent of holding that an officer of the Cabinet should withhold information from the President as to the character of the nominee?

Mr. BLISS. Not at all. My correspondence will show that I said distinctly that the prosecution against Strobach should be continued, but I said that the scandal arose from the information being in the Department of Justice and yet the Department allowing the President to make the nomination without giving him that information. I had had no communication with the President on the subject, but I said, on my own judgment, that that sort of thing could not go on, and that if it did go on the result would be, first, a request for the dismissal of Brewster Cameron, that, as Mr. Brewster was quite friendly and loyal to Mr. Cameron, he would probably decline to make the removal, and that thus there would come about a break in the Cabinet, which I wished to avoid.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. (To Mr. Ker, the witness.) How do you know the fact that Mr.

Brewster Cameron did not talk to Mr. Dickson?—A. I know it from the fact that Mr. Dickson says in his affidavit that he did not, and I know it also from the fact that Mr. Cameron went away that night, for I looked for him and I found that he had left the city, and I know that he did not come back for three or four weeks after that, because he came back on a telegram from me.

Q. Did he tell you that he had not talked with Mr. Dickson?—A. Yes; and Mr. Dickson in his affidavit, which was put on file in the Department, does not say that Mr. Cameron spoke to him. He says that Bowen spoke to him.

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed with your statement, Mr. Ker.

The WITNESS. Well, it seems that this part of my statement is not false. We were sitting in the smoking-car together when this conversation took place, and I remarked to Colonel Bliss that Mr. Cameron was a good man and that the Attorney-General would stand by him and not allow him to go; that from what I knew of the Attorney-General he would be the last man to sacrifice Mr. Cameron because he was doing his duty. Mr. Bliss reiterated the statement that either Cameron or the the Attorney-General would have to go. Of course, I passed some remark about that. I think the remark that I made was that it would be a very good issue for the Attorney-General to be put out of the Cabinet on This was on Friday, and on Monday (I think it was Monday) after Colonel Bliss had returned and was engaged in the trial of the case, it seems that he went up and saw Mr. Brewster Cameron. In the meantime, I had communicated to Mr. Cameron what Colonel Bliss had said, because I, of course, felt an interest in Mr. Cameron, and I felt an interest in the Attorney-General, and I thought that what Colonel Bliss had said to me had been said to me to be told, because Colonel Bliss began his conversation by alluding to my "friend"; and if I know that a friend is going to get into any trouble I am not going to hesitate about telling him. Therefore I had communicated the matter to Mr. Brewster Cameron. Colonel Bliss saw Brewster Cameron, and it did not take Brewster Cameron many moments after hearing Colonel Bliss's statement about him—his having to be dismissed—until he walked into the room of the Attorney-General and told him the whole matter.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. How do you know that he did that? Were you present?—A. Well, Mr. Milliken, I know it because George Bliss told me so. I am telling my story on good authority. I am not stating anything I cannot prove. It seems that Brewster Cameron went in and told the Attorney-General, and that woke the Attorney-General up and the Attorney-General woke Mr. Bliss up; because Mr. Bliss came and said to me: "What do you think that foolish Cameron did?" Of course I did not know. "Why," said he, "he went right off and told Mr. Brewster the whole of that that I told you about the Strobach case, and the Attorney-General is very angry about it. Now," said he, "I did not tell it to Cameron to have him go and tell the Attorney-General of it." Then I found out that Colonel Bliss had gone and had an interview with Mr. Cameron, in which he apologized for what he had previously said. He was very much humbled and very crestfallen about it, and if that correspondence is produced (I hope it will be), and if it is such as it has been described to me, it will be mighty interesting reading.

Mr. BLISS. I will produce it.

The WITNESS. From that time out there never has been so kind a feeling existing between Colonel Bliss and Mr. Brewster Cameron. Mr.

Cameron accused Colonel Bliss of wanting to run the Department of Justice, but I did not think their enmity had gone to such an extent that Colonel Bliss would wait until Mr. Cameron got out of town to stab him. I thought he would give him a fair fighting chance. Now, there is the connection that Brewster Cameron had with that matter. I again reiterate, for fear I may not be understood, that Mr. Cameron never instigated my testifying before this committee; he did not furnish me a solitary inspiration; and there was nobody else that ever inspired me to testify in this case, and if Colonel Bliss knows of anybody I hope he will tell about it now, and not let me go away and have to come back here. Life is short and I do not want to have to come too often.

Colonel Bliss has referred to the argument of the Attorney-General as embarrassing the counsel in the case. The Attorney-General made the closing argument. I want in this connection to say that I unwittingly detracted from Mr. Merrick a little, though of course I did not mean to do it. Mr. Merrick devoted the greater portion of his speech to attacking Mr. Dorsey. The Attorney-General made the closing argument. Mr. Merrick had preceded the Attorney-General, and between Mr. Merrick and the Attorney-General, I think, there were two gentlemen who spoke. After the Attorney-General had been denouncing Dorsey, Judge Wylie interposed a question. It related to something that Mr. Ingersoll had stated about the overt acts in the indictment. The Attorney-General turned around and said, either to me or Mr. Merrick, I could not tell which, for we were both sitting together, "I want to get the correct date" or "I want to get the correct fact." He said it in a low tone of voice. Mr. Merrick, wishing to assist the Attorney-General, jumped up and wanted to make a statement. Mr. Wilson objected to Mr. Merrick making any statement while the Attorney-General was making his argument. There was a running fire between the court and the counsel as to whether Mr. Merrick should make a statement and finally it was ascertained that the Attorney-General had answered the question before. But the whole of that interruption arose from the fact that the Attorney-General desired us to give the judge correct information on the point. He did not want to make a statement without making it correctly, that was all; and why Colonel Bliss should allude to that here, in his desire to injure the Attorney-General, is something that probably he should explain; and why he should attempt to comment upon a matter which occurred, as I am told, when he was off in Canada, I do not understand. At all events whether he was in Canada or not, he was far away from Washington and knew nothing at all about it, and I think it was a very unkind thing of him to try to throw odium upon the Attorney-General in a little matter like that in which he was not interested, in regard to which he had no personal knowledge, and which he was utterly incapable of talking about intelligently. However, it is only a part and parcel of the indiscriminate and reckless attacks that he has made here upon every body, in his endeavor to answer the testimony that has been given here.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Did the Attorney-General state correctly the facts in his closing argument?—A. Of course he did, but he turned around to Mr. Merrick or myself, or to both of us, and wanted to know the correct date before making an answer to the judge's interrogatory. It is no unusual thing for a counsel in court to turn to his colleague and say, "What is that date?" or something of that kind that will bring a responsive answer from his colleague, and the Attorney-General had a perfect right to do it.

Before passing from the alleged bribery cases, I want to say to you gentlemen that the entire report of the investigation in those cases is in the hands of Mr. H. H. Wells. His office is on Louisiana avenue, opposite Fifth street. He was special counsel in the case, and he has all the papers that relate to it, the full investigation, and if you think it worth while to go into that question, upon Colonel Bliss's suggestion, I think there will be no trouble in furnishing you those papers.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Is that the Wells who has been a witness before this committee?—

A. Yes; he was before the committee.

Colonel Bliss has also denied my statement under oath here as to what took place in regard to using Mr. Price as a witness against Mr. Kellogg. I do not know how he could have the effrontery to deny that in the face of the testimony of Mr. Merrick. Mr. Merrick has testified to what took place, the reasons why Mr. Price ought to be used, and to Colonel Bliss's endeavor to give an explanation of how it was that he opposed Mr. Price being brought in; one theory of his being that the taking of Price would let Brady go, and another that Price was a bad man, in the sense that he was one of the worst of the conspirators, and that he would have to be corroborated. You know Price was indicted for conspiracy to defraud the United States. He was indicted with Thomas J. Brady, and ought to have been indicted along with Mr. Brady and Mr. Kellogg. The object in using Mr. Price as a witness against Mr. Kellogg was to show that Kellogg had violated section 1782 of the Revised Statutes, and in that offense Price would not have been a particeps criminis; there would have been no rule of law that would require Mr. Price to be corroborated. He was to testify to Mr. Kellogg's getting some drafts or some money, or making arrangements to get it, and there was no corroboration necessary there. The colonel wants to show that he did not exactly put the case upon political grounds. If he did not put it upon political grounds, then I am very greatly mistaken, but I do not think I am. I do not think that the testimony before you will show that I am mistaken; for Mr. Merrick corroborates that aspect of the case, and if you want any further corroboration, why, we can just turn to the testimony of Mr. Woodward.

On page 353 Mr. Woodward begins his testimony about the Price matter and he states that it was referred to him. On page 354, after narrating what the Attorney-General directed him to do, and stating the information that he gave to the Government counsel that the Attorney-General had accepted Mr. Price as a witness, had resolved to take his testimony, Mr. Woodward was asked about the immunity that was supposed to have been promised Price, and he says:

Of course there was nothing said about immunity, but it was always understood that if any witness was accepted that carried with it immunity. Mr. Merrick took the ground that a high officer of the United States, whether the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, or a member of Congress, or a Senator of the United States, who took bribes under such circumstances, was far more guilty than a contractor who was acting under more or less compulsion although acting voluntarily. Mr. Bliss, on the other hand, contended that the evidence against Price was strong and conclusive, that he was already indicted, and that the Government had no right to give him up to take anybody else; that he was sufficiently guilty to hold him, and that it would be wrong to give him up for the sake of taking Senator Kellogg. That was the ground of difference between them.

Now you see that Mr. Woodward also became aware of the ground of difference that existed between the counsel in this respect.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. You say that you think Mr. Bliss wanted to let Mr. Kellogg go? Do you testify to that?—A. Do you ask me for an expression of opinion upon that subject?

Q. I ask you if you have so testified; I do not ask your opinion. Have you so testified? I did not so understand you.—A. I did not testify to that; I testified to facts; and I am now establishing the facts that I testified to, and that were denied seriatim by Colonel Bliss.

Colonel Bliss also takes exception to my statement that he left the case. I did not say that he was away for a day or any number of days. I said that he left the case. I stated the mere fact that he left the case. There was no time mentioned in what I said that I have any recollection of, but I find that Mr. Woodward stated that he was away for several days. In that I think Mr. Woodward is probably mistaken; I do not think that Colonel Bliss was away so long as that, but he was away from the case. He went away because the Attorney-General directed Mr. Price to be taken as a witness, and he seemed to think that there was some affront placed upon him by the Attorney-General in so deciding. But, in fact, when we left the house of the Attorney-General upon that night when we had the conference there, we were informed distinctly that the Attorney-General would make up his mind what to do about the matter and would send us notice, and I did not understand that after that we had anything more to say about it.

In alluding to the kind of witness that Mr. Price was or would be, Colonel Bliss says, if I remember his testimony correctly, that he found that Price had been engaged in some disreputable transaction with the Post Office Department. Now Mr. Price is a sick man; I think he has a cancer in the eye; but his family, as far as I have been able to ascertain in looking into his character before he was called as a witness, are people of respectability and standing.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Is this man Price's home in Jefferson City, Mo.?—A. Yes, sir; and I find that his people stand as high there as any people in any section of the country. But, in an indirect manner, Colonel Bliss has brought this recent transaction into this case as a motive why Mr. Price should not be taken, accepted as a witness, and also as a sort of an excuse for his own conduct in the matter, and has attempted to injure Mr. Price in that way.

I have Colonel Bliss's own letters on the subject at my house in Philadelphia. I investigated the matter and I found it to be substantially in this way: Price was a mail contractor prior to the war. Just before the war he received warrants for his pay. Those warrants were drawn upon the treasurer at New Orleans. Some of the warrants had been given to people in the North and some to people in the South. They were warrants for the payment of the money due Price. Before the warrants reached the treasurer in New Orleans, Louisiana assumed to secede from the Union, and the treasurer at New Orleans conveyed the money in his possession to the Confederate States treasury. These warrants in favor of Price were then outstanding. Afterwards there was an act of the Confederate Congress passed allowing the treasurer to pay those warrants, or rather to pay the people who held the warrants, who could show that they were citizens of the Southern Confederacy. That, of course, excluded the people in the North who held the warrants. Some of the people who held them had bought them and did prove that they were loyal to the South, and got the money. Others were never paid.

Now, about the time that Price was in trouble in regard to this indictment, a certain man—I cannot recall his name, but he was a prominent man—came to Price and told him about these unpaid warrants, and told him that under the law he could have them paid, and that all it was necessary to do was to make the claim for the warrants. And among others he indicated a particular warrant and said, “Here is a warrant that has not been paid, and of course you are entitled to the money, as the books of the Post-Office Department show that you have never been paid this;” and in point of fact the books showed he never had been. Price considered the matter, and took the affidavit that was produced before him and wrote at the bottom of it a statement that he had had a number of warrants; that some of them had been paid and some had not; and that if this one had not been paid, then he believed he was entitled to receive the money from the Government. That statement is in his own handwriting at the bottom of the paper. [To Mr. Bliss, who had indicated dissent from this statement.] Oh, don’t shake your head; I have seen it at the bottom of the paper.

By Mr. FVAN:

Q. Where is that affidavit now?—A. It is in the Post-Office Department. I investigated the matter. First, let me explain that at the bottom, before signing the paper, Price states in his own handwriting that if this was one of those warrants that had not been paid, he believed he was entitled to be paid the amount. I thought so, too. I was told that the defense were going to attack Price’s character for truth and veracity by producing this affidavit; so I got the affidavit, and Mr. Worthington, the district attorney, a reputable gentleman, a good lawyer, and an earnest Republican, who was engaged in the trial of the case, agreed with me that it would be impossible to have attacked Price on the strength of that affidavit. And, inasmuch as the character of this man Price has been assailed before this committee, without any reason at all that I can see, I think the committee ought to attach, either to my testimony or that of Colonel Bliss, that affidavit, because the committee ought not to allow people to come here and stab a man without giving him a chance to defend himself.

Q. Did Price say that those warrants had never been paid to him by the Confederate Government?

Q. (Interposing.) As I understand you, the money that was due was turned over by the then United States Treasurer in New Orleans to the Confederate Government?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that Government enacted that whenever a man who held one of these warrants could prove that he was loyal to the Confederacy, and that this money was due him, he could get his pay?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And I understand you to say that some of them did get their pay?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did Mr. Price get any pay down there?—A. He may have got some pay there.

Q. Then, what you mean is, that he had not got his pay from the United States Government?—A. No; he had not got his pay from this Government, and I do not know whether he actually held the warrants or not. Some of his warrants were lost during the war. Mr. Price said that during the war, not anticipating ever receiving a dollar from the United States Government again, he had lost some of the warrants. Our object was to get into communication with Price, and to secure his testimony against Brady, and also against Kellogg. Primarily, we were after his testimony against Brady, and indeed what Price would testify to was then practically unknown to us. It was a question whether we should make overtures to him or not. Mr. Woodward says in his testimony on that point (on page 352 of your record), that about Christmas in 1882 he came and saw the Attorney-General in reference to getting the testimony of Price, and that he then took Price and examined him, taking the papers, as he said, in trust, to return them to Price if the Attorney-General would not accept his testimony. That was in the latter part of 1882; therefore, he must have examined them some time in January, 1883, when the Attorney-General decided to accept Price's testimony. Now, the Kellogg case was before two grand juries prior to that time; the first was the grand jury that met in March, 1882; the second was the grand jury that was reconvened in July, 1882, for the express purpose of indicting Kellogg. Colonel Bliss has made a statement about Mr. Walsh's testimony in regard to Mr. Kellogg before those two grand juries. Just here let me remind you, gentlemen, that there is a difficulty in the way which, if cleared up, will operate one way or the other, either to Colonel Bliss's credit, or to his discredit, and it ought to be cleared up, because of its material bearing upon this case. Before the grand jury that was convened in July, 1882, Walsh was examined as a witness. Colonel Bliss went before that grand jury. Mr. Hutchinson, the foreman of the jury, and, if I am not mistaken, another member of that grand jury, have testified that Colonel Bliss said that Price would be brought before them as a witness. Colonel Bliss has told you that he did not say so, but that he told the grand jury that Price might be produced as a witness before some other jury, but that Price himself would be tried, and that they were not seeking an indictment against him then.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Are you testifying to something that you know of your own personal knowledge?—A. I am. I am testifying to what Colonel Bliss said before this committee, and what Mr. Hutchinson said here.

Mr. FYAN. Mr. Hutchinson, the foreman of the jury, and another member of the jury, both, as I understand, swore one way upon this point, and Mr. Bliss swore the other.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I was not here when they testified upon this point. Proceed Mr. Ker.

The WITNESS. That is the testimony that was produced before this committee. Now, at that time Mr. Price was not in communication with the Government counsel. At that time no effort had been made to secure Price's testimony on behalf of the Government. We had not opened communication with Price at that time. But that matter ought to be satisfactorily cleared up before this committee in some shape, because somebody is not telling the truth.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Had you any information, directly or indirectly, to the effect that Price could be made available as a witness at the time that Hutchinson grand jury sat?—A. Of course not.

Q. Had there been any overtures made by any person representing Price, or pretending to represent him, to the effect that he could be made available as a witness?—A. Not that I heard of.

Q. Was there any indictment pending against him then?—A. Yes, sir. But just at that point, if that grand jury did not do their duty, they should be severely condemned, because when they adjourned that ended all chance of the Government to indict Kellogg for receiving the drafts from Price. That was the turning point which decided the question of the statute of limitations, and threw the Government into the position of having to indict Kellogg for receiving the money. Now, if Mr. Hutchinson's testimony can be corroborated in that respect, it would certainly show that the grand jury had been grossly deceived, and had been also grossly wronged in being charged with dereliction of duty and want of faithfulness. If, on the contrary, Colonel Bliss's statement is correct, that he did not tell that grand jury that he would produce Price before them, why then, the grand jurors are seeking to throw the responsibility upon Colonel Bliss, and they should be doubly condemned for attempting unjustly to do that. But just there, as I say, is the turning point in the history of the Kellogg case, and at that point there is an open question which will have to be settled between Colonel Bliss and that grand jury.

Colonel Bliss says there was no mention of Kellogg's name in the indictment that I prepared against Price and Brady.

Mr. MILLIKEN. At the March term, you mean?

The WITNESS. At the March term. He says that I am mistaken in saying that I included Kellogg's name in that indictment, and then had to tear up the indictment and write another, leaving out Kellogg's name. He says that Kellogg's name does not appear in the papers. I have already told you what a shrewd, sharp gentleman Mr. Bliss is, and how familiar he is with the papers in this star-route matter. Now, he knows, and he knew in his heart and soul when he made that statement, that William Pitt Kellogg's name does appear in the papers; that Kellogg's signature appears on the application for an increase on one route; and I do not think there is anybody who knows that better than Colonel Bliss. He knows, also, that Mr. Woodward prepared an abstract or brief of the testimony in all these cases. Mr. Woodward told you that he prepared an abstract in those cases; and let me read what he says, lest it should be charged that I am misquoting him:

The papers so prepared gave a brief but comprehensive history of each route by itself. In this way I examined the exceptionally bad service of the Dorseys, and, to a less extent, of the Parkers, James B. Price, Roots and Kerens, the Salisburys, and others. This work I continued till called into court in June, 1882, when, with a few slight exceptions, it was permanently suspended. The papers were placed at the disposal of Col. George Bliss, special assistant United States attorney.

Now Mr. Woodward tells the truth. It will not do to say up in Hartford where he lives that he does not tell the truth. On page 358 there is more of this testimony. Mr. Woodward is a Republican too, and, by the way, one of the fairest that I have ever met. In all my acquaintance with him he never seemed to entertain any other idea than that of doing his duty, and doing it properly and faithfully. I am sorry that there is an exception.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Do you mean by that that the Post-Office officials generally do not do their duty?—A. No, sir; I do not. They were generally very faithful men. There was only one exception that I know of. The exception I refer to was the officer who made a report upon the route from Tres Alamos to Clifton, in Arizona. He was not considered thoroughly reliable. I do not mean Captain Tidball, who made a subsequent report on that route, but the gentleman who made the first report. With that exception, I say that the Government of the United States is fortunate in possessing such a body of men as its Post-Office inspectors.

Q. Then Mr. Woodward, being one of those, is not really an exception?—A. Oh, well, there are a great many good Republicans. When I see a good Republican I am always sorry that he does not turn over and come with us. [Laughter.] I have in my connection with the Government service met some as good men as it has ever been my fortune to meet anywhere. Mr. Woodward is one of them, and Mr. Lyman, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, is another, a man of sterling character and moral worth. It is a blessing to the Government that such a man is in the office he now occupies, and I only hope that, whatever political change may occur, he will be kept in that position.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Civil service reform will do it.

The WITNESS. That, sir, I am positively opposed to. [Laughter.] Another gentleman of the same character is Mr. Cameron. A more earnest, faithful man I never met, a man who does his duty and knows nothing but his duty, whose character morally and in other respects is beyond attack.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE :

Q. Brewster Cameron?—A. Brewster Cameron. The gentlemen whom I have named are excellent men. I will not speak for those higher, but I feel at liberty to speak for these gentlemen with whom I have come in contact in the service of the Government.

Now, I was going to tell you about these papers that Colonel Bliss said I was mistaken about. I told you that I got the name of Kellogg from the papers. Well, I should have told you that I got it from Colonel Bliss, too; I got it from Mr. Woodward; I got it from different sources. But Colonel Bliss takes upon himself to say, recklessly, of course, that I could not have got it from the papers; that the papers did not show Kellogg's name. Now, I have read to you where Mr. Woodward says that he investigated the Price routes, and gave the papers to Colonel Bliss. Again, on page 358, Mr. Woodward was examined and testified as follows:

Q. Whose duty was it to see that the witnesses were summoned to appear?—A. Colonel Bliss attended to all that. He selected the witnesses to appear and had them subpoenaed.

Q. State what you did in the way of furnishing Colonel Bliss with the necessary evidence on which indictments could be found.—A. I prepared a paper giving a history of each route, and what each witness would testify to on that route so far as we knew the facts up to that time. Of course, when the witnesses came here to the trials I examined them still further, and we got some additional evidence.

Q. Then, the responsibility of procuring the necessary evidence upon which indictments could be found, and briefing it, was with you?—A. Yes, sir; with me.

Q. And the responsibility of bringing it to the attention of the grand jury was with Colonel Bliss?—A. Yes, sir; and the responsibility of preparing the indictments was with Mr. Ker, and Mr. Merrick came in to conduct the cases in court.

Now, did not Mr. Woodward furnish me with a brief of that case? I had it before me, and I prepared for the March term an indictment in which the names of Price, Brady, and Kellogg were joined together, charging them with conspiracy to defraud the Government of the United States. I prepared that indictment in anticipation that the grand jury in the March term would make a presentment to the court, and afterward find the indictment. I was getting the indictment ready beforehand, because it was a long one, and I could not wait for the presentment to be made. I wanted to have the indictment ready when they did make the presentment. Colonel Bliss says that the name of Mr. Kellogg was not mentioned before that grand jury. Walsh's testimony was all Kellogg. Walsh did not get the drafts from Price. Walsh knew very little about Price. What Walsh could testify to, and what Walsh did testify to, was that he got the drafts from Kellogg, and that he paid part of the money over to Kellogg and credited part of it to Brady.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. You are not speaking of the testimony of Walsh before the March grand jury?—A. Of course I am. That is all he could testify to.

Q. You, of course, were not before that grand jury?—A. Oh, no.

By Mr. MILLIKEN :

Q. Then, if you were not there, how do you know what Walsh testified to before that grand jury?—A. From what he told me, from what was testified to before the committee, and from what I know of the case.

Q. From what who told you?—A. Walsh.

Q. He told you himself what he had testified to?—A. Why, of course he did. I went before the grand jury on the third hearing, and of course I asked Mr. Walsh what he had testified to before, and what he had shown the jury.

Q. Yes; but what you are testifying to now is not what you know of your own personal knowledge; it is what you know from other sources—from Walsh.—A. Of course that is so. What I am talking about is the testimony that was given here before this committee as to the source from which I could have got Kellogg's name. Colonel Bliss came upon the stand and accused me of telling falsehoods. I intend to convict him of that offense by the testimony of other witnesses examined here.

By Mr. FVAN :

Q. I understand that Walsh told you this in conversation, and that afterwards when you went before the grand jury with him he told you that he had previously so testified?—A. That is it.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Did you prepare an indictment against those three parties, Price, Brady, and Kellogg, at the March term?—A. I did.

Q. Upon what data did you prepare that indictment?—A. I knew that Walsh would testify to the fact that he had received drafts from Kellogg, and that Kellogg had written to him about the matter—that Walsh had given Kellogg part of the money, and had retained part of it and credited it to Brady.

Q. You assumed that the evidence before the grand jury would be the same as that which you had in your possession?—A. Certainly.

Q. And assuming that, you prepared the indictment accordingly?—A. Certainly.

Q. Now, when did you learn that you were mistaken in preparing the indictment in that way with those three names?—A. I was not mistaken.

Q. You were as to the presentment. When did you learn that they had not presented those three parties?—A. I learned it from Colonel Bliss.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE :

Q. How many days before the 4th of March?—A. I cannot tell you that. I learned it from Colonel Bliss.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. What did you learn from him on that subject?—A. That the grand jury had failed to indict Kellogg; and instantly I went to work and prepared a new indictment with Kellogg's name omitted. Colonel Bliss in his anxiety to hurt me, and probably to protect himself, says here, recklessly, that I did not do that, and could not have done it, because Walsh did not testify about anything that implicated Kellogg before that grand jury, and that the papers did not disclose Kellogg's name; but I say most emphatically that the papers did. Kellogg's name is written at the bottom of the application for increase on one of these very routes, and his name is mentioned all through one of Mr. Woodward's reports, which Mr. Woodward says he has given to this committee. I might produce a corroborating witness here, but if I did I do not know what would become of the gentleman who would undertake to corroborate me on this point. There is only one man that I know of who knows anything at all about it, and I would not like to have him called.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. What is his name?—A. Do you want him turned out?

Q. I am not particular, but I want his name.—A. If I was sure that Colonel Bliss would not visit his vengeance upon him I would bring the man here, and I would convince you of the facts as I have stated them.

Q. This is a question of veracity between you and Colonel Bliss, and that gentleman to whom you refer, would, perhaps, turn the scale, if you would only give us his name.—A. I think I have settled the question of veracity very conclusively by the record. However, I do not know but I had better give the gentleman's name.

Q. What is it?—A. His name is Charles D. Sloan; and if Colonel Bliss would tell you the truth, he would tell you that he went and saw Mr. Sloan, and that Mr. Sloan told him what I have stated here.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Told him what?—A. That I had prepared the indictment as I have stated.

Mr. BLISS. Do you ask me to make a statement upon that point?

The WITNESS. I know that your full vengeance will be visited upon the man. I know that he will be turned out. It is easy to talk about civil service reform, but what does it amount to when a man in power has a spite against another man in office?

Mr. BLISS. Do you ask me to speak about that?

The WITNESS. Yes; I want you to answer me now. I asked you to be present when I testified to-day.

Mr. BLISS. No; you did not. As to Mr. Sloan, I met him and asked him if any indictment was prepared for the March grand jury with Mr. Kellogg's name in it, and afterwards destroyed. Mr. Sloan at first said, "Yes, I think there was." Said I, "Are you sure that it was for the March grand jury?" "No," said he, "I cannot say that; but it was prepared with the anticipation that one of the grand juries would indict; they did not do it, and the indictment was destroyed." That is the conversation I had with Mr. Sloan. Now, if it is desired to call Mr. Sloan, and if any guarantee is wanted that Mr. Sloan can come here, and tell the truth without being hurt, I am ready to enter into bonds to pay his salary if he is removed because of any testimony he may give here.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. After this March term was there any indictment drafted against those three parties?—A. No, sir; the next grand jury was called together in July, 1882.

Q. Then, if there was any such indictment, it was at the March term?—A. Oh, yes; I prepared an indictment for the three of them, and had it ready to be handed to the grand jury when those parties should be presented at March term.

Q. You never subsequently prepared an indictment against those three parties?—A. No; not at all. The next or subsequent grand jury was that which was called together in July, 1882, and was in session only two or three days.

Q. When was the next grand jury?—A. The third and last was in 1883. That grand jury presented only Kellogg for receiving the money while a member of the Senate. And in that case, of course, I prepared an indictment against him alone, because the grand jury made the presentment.

Q. You were before that grand jury and can make no mistake about that?—A. I was before that grand jury, and am making no mistake.

Q. What became of the first indictment? Who tore it up?—A. Well, it was lying in the Department of Justice for some time, and before my going away they wanted to use the room I was occupying, and they put me up in the examiner's room. All the papers went up there and were piled together on the table, and after the trial of the case, and after I thought all was over and that there would be no more trouble about it, I tore up all those papers that were piled up on the desk, because I was clearing out the surplus papers. But there can be no question about that indictment. Send for this gentleman, Mr. Sloan. He is employed in the Post-Office Department; send for him, and, if you will only protect him against Colonel Bliss's look of indignation, he will undoubtedly tell you the truth. I know what his fate will be unless he is protected.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. What place does Mr. Sloan hold?—A. He is a clerk in the Department.

Q. In what Department?—A. In the Third Assistant Postmaster-General's Office. Now, as to a question of veracity between Colonel Bliss and myself I do not think it was worth his while to have raised it. But you see he was determined to crush me in every way he could, so where the testimony did not in any way reflect upon him, he assumed that it did, and tortured it so as to get an opportunity of saying that what I had said was not true. But as to the material points on which I have answered him I have either referred you to the record, to show you that what I have said is true, or have corroborated it by other testimony. I have shown you that when Colonel Bliss said that he did not give this bill-of-fare book to Mr. McSweeney, and that Mr. McSweeney did not use it as I stated, he had failed to look at the record, and was swearing recklessly, and that he was himself stating what was not true when he accused me of testifying untruly. I have shown by the record that that book was produced, and the evidence of that appears in the record of the trial, and is uncontradicted.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think it is necessary for you to sum up your evidence, or to recapitulate it. You have gone over all those facts, and they are already in the record more fully than you are now stating them.

The WITNESS. Well, I know that, but if there is any contradiction I want it to come now. I want to meet it, and I have staid here to meet it.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Don't you think that some of these questions of veracity of which you speak are really questions of memory rather than questions of veracity?—A. That is a very ingenious question, and I will answer it, because it goes upon the record. In some aspects of the case they may be questions of memory; but when a witness undertakes, under the solemnity of his oath, to say that another witness states a falsehood and manufactures testimony, why then your question does not apply in the same way. It is then a question of veracity.

Q. The reason I asked the question is this: It seems to me that a great many of these points on which you gentlemen differ are not of enough importance to cause questions of veracity to arise between gentlemen. That is the reason I asked that question.—A. Well, I have a right to answer the question. I am very sorry, however, that you did not assume that position two or three days ago. In my previous testimony I had no idea of making an attack upon Colonel Bliss. I had no idea of raising him to the dignity of a scape-goat, or, as he popularly terms it, of “unloading” upon him. There was no occasion whatever for that. I came here and made a plain, simple statement of facts, and upon the strength of that Colonel Bliss comes here and attacks me personally, and it is that personal attack upon me that has drawn from me these statements, and the criticisms which are necessary in order to substantiate my position, and to show that I am not to be held up before the world as a perjurer.

Mr. FYAN. I understood Mr. Bliss to make the declaration publicly to this committee that there was a combination here to “unload” upon him. That is my recollection of what he said.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. I desire to ask you another question; it is not exactly in the line in which you have been testifying, but I ask it now lest the matter should escape my memory, and I ask it because I have had an intimation from you that it would not be disagreeable to you to have the question asked.—A. You had better write it first and hand it to me.

Q. No; I will ask it now. Do you not believe that the attorneys in the star-route cases acted faithfully and did the best they could, according to their best judgment, for the conviction of the defendants?—A. Mr. Milliken —

Mr. MILLIKEN (interposing). You will recollect that when I asked that question of Mr. Bliss, and he answered it, you intimated that I might ask you the same question, and I do so now because you so intimated.

The WITNESS. Well, Mr. Milliken, I did not understand the question in that way.

Q. You were present when I asked the question of Mr. Bliss, and he answered it in your presence. Did you or did you not then suggest to me that if I should ask you the same question you would answer it in the same way that Mr. Bliss had answered it?—A. I did.

Q. Very well. Now I have asked the question upon your suggestion.

The WITNESS. Very well, but I suppose I am not bound to answer it.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Of course not.

The WITNESS. Because it is a matter of opinion, and I think it is better for me not to express any opinion.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Well, I will ask you another question, and you need not answer that either, if you do not wish. I do not know but it is an improper question, and, if you think it is, you need not reply. I guess I will not ask it, though; it is about a private conversation between you and me, and I will not ask the question.

The WITNESS. I do not object to anything. I am here to be examined.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Well, I guess I will not ask the question.

The WITNESS. I want to repeat again that Colonel Bliss is a shrewd, sharp, keen lawyer of great ability and of untiring energy, and that he handled the papers and the testimony in the case in a manner that was simply wonderful. I do not pretend that I could have mastered the case and the papers as he mastered them. I think that his services in that respect were invaluable.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Now you have suggested another question by that statement. Do you think his services were worth what he was paid for them by the Government?

The CHAIRMAN. Do you introduce the witness now as an expert?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Yes.

The WITNESS. Well, I am not an expert in the matter of pay or compensation. Colonel Bliss had a right to receive all that was agreed to be paid him. I had no objection to his receiving all that he could get, or all that was due to him. Whether it was proper or improper it is not for me to say.

WASHINGTON, June 20, 1884.

GEORGE BLISS resumed the stand and testified as follows:

What I said about the initials of Rerdell appearing in the directory of the year when he was indicted is a matter that I did not know anything of until after the question in regard to Rerdell was raised by the objection taken in court. As to that, you are to have Mr. Sloan here as a witness, who is the gentleman who was immediately concerned with Mr. Ker in the preparation of the indictments, and if you will ask him he will inform you, as he informed me the other day, that no question was raised about looking for the name of Rerdell until after the question had been raised by the objection in court.

Mr. Ker says that I quarreled with Price. Not so. I never saw Price; I never knew him. I should not know him if he should come into this room to-day. I never had any connection with him direct or indirect, with either Price, J. B. Price, or Celsus Price.

The CHAIRMAN. I think Mr. Ker modified his statement on that point.

The WITNESS. May be he did. He has referred here to the evidence of Coll McLellan. It is true that McLellan gave that evidence on the second trial, but not on the first; and it had a bad effect in this way: McLellan having been examined on the first trial, and having made an affidavit before the post-office inspector which did not contain this statement which he supplied on the second trial, when he came on the stand and testified to this new matter, and when Cabell was brought here to prove the same thing, and then when it was brought out that Joe Pennell, who was one of our most important witnesses, had been taking such a personal interest in the case for the Government that he had gone off to Dakota to bring Cabell here, the effect on the jury I thought was bad, though I had no question that McLellan was telling the truth. And when McLellan testified that he had never been examined by the counsel, I was in this position: I could not discredit McLellan, my own witness, by saying to him, "Are you not wrong?" I could not do that and produce the affidavit in which he stated that he had told the whole story, and yet which did not contain the very statement that he had just made upon the witness stand. Of course it would have been out of the question for me to have done that.

Mr. Ker said that I made a remark about Mr. Brewster Cameron here, knowing that he was out of the city. I did not know it. On the contrary, a gentleman told me that Mr. Cameron told him at Chicago that he was coming back, and until Mr. Ker testified about it to-day I supposed he was in town.

Upon the question of what occurred on the summing up by the Attorney-General on the first trial of the Kellogg case and the inquiry that was put to him by Judge Wylie, the record shows the transaction, and shows that it did not occur as Mr. Ker states it, and I think that if the judge should be asked what did occur he would confirm the record. Mr. Ker does state in his evidence that I left the case and went to New York and was gone several days, and that they finally persuaded me to come back.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Are you sure that Mr. Ker says that?—A. Mr. Ker says it.

Q. Can you find where he says it?—A. If you will give me a copy of the testimony I will find it, because I do not desire that there shall be any question about it. On page 556 of your record he says:

After that indictment was found Mr. Bliss left and went to New York.

In the first place you will see that it was not after the indictment was found. The indictment was found considerably later. He should have said after the decision of the Attorney-General. Then, too, he says that I went to New York. I did not go to New York. I staid here, and was out of court one day, and appeared and opened the proceedings the next morning.

Mr. Ker goes on to say:

He said he was not coming back again. He was indignant at the indictment being found. We coaxed him to come back, told him that he was not running the thing; that the Attorney-General controlled it; that the Attorney-General wanted the indictment found, and that we were proceeding under his direction, and finally Colonel Bliss agreed to go on with the case.

Now nothing of all that occurred.

Q. As a matter of fact, did you get angry and leave the case because the Attorney-General had decided to accept Price as a witness?—A. No, sir. I have already testified that I did not. But I thought there had been bad faith shown in procuring a decision of that question from the Attorney-General without consulting me, and I thought Mr. Merrick had been concerned in it, and the moment Mr. Merrick assured me that he had had nothing to do with it, I accepted his statement and returned to the case.

Q. Had you prior to that explanation expressed a determination to go out of the star-route case?—A. Yes; I had told Mr. Merrick that if I was to be so treated by my associate counsel not having confidence in me, I could not remain in the case with self-respect, and I would not remain. I was pretty mad. I thought it was a case of bad faith. I was satisfied afterwards that I had done Mr. Merrick injustice, and that there had been no bad faith so far as he was concerned. It was simply a misunderstanding, such as will often arise, and when it was explained the matter was all over.

I never said that I ran the Department of Justice, nor did I make an apology to Mr. Brewster Cameron. I will send the committee that correspondence. I am a little different from the Department of Justice in the fact that I have got copies of all the papers on both sides. The Attorney-General has not. He is trying to get them, and he has got copies of some of them through this committee.

Now, as to the Kellogg business, Mr. Ker has read to you at some length from Mr. Woodward's statement. I never saw and I do not believe there existed at that time any report or statement of Mr. Woodward in March, 1882, which connected Mr. Kellogg as a guilty man with any of the star-route cases in any manner. I say that I never saw any such statement, and I do not think that any such existed at that time; nor that Mr. Woodward will say it did. The question turns entirely upon whether in March, 1882, I knew of Kellogg's guilty connection with the star-route business. I say that I did not, upon my honor as a man and upon my honor as a professional man, and under oath. Mr. Walsh has testified that at that time he had never talked to any of the Government counsel in the case. The pretense that because a man had signed a petition for increase of service or expedition upon a route, you could therefore infer that he had a guilty connection with that route, is ridiculous. If that is the ground that is to be taken you can have pretty much all the members of the Senate indicted. Mr. Kellogg's name may have appeared on some paper in that way, but that you could get his name from that source for the purpose of preparing an indictment against him is, of course, a perfect absurdity. There is no criminality in applying for expedition. You have Mr. Walsh's statement that at the time in question he had not talked with any of the Government counsel, and would not talk with them; that he had not produced any of his papers; that he did not produce his papers before the first grand jury, or that he read only one of them to that grand jury, in which statement he was mistaken. We had not then got Price as a witness against Kellogg; we had not Walsh; we had not anybody. We had simply Kellogg's name on a petition for increase or expedition. But when we came to the July grand jury we were very differently situated.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. After you talked with Mr. Sloan, were you not satisfied that Mr. Ker had prepared the indictment which you had previously sworn that he had not prepared?—A. No, sir; not for the March grand jury.

Q. Was there any other time at which he could have prepared it?—A. In July, of course; he prepared it then. I have no question about that.

Q. Do you know that he did prepare it then?—A. I do know it, in this sense, that it was arranged that he should prepare the indictments.

Q. Did you ever see the indictment that was prepared for the July term?—A. All I can say about that is that after the question came up of reconvening the grand jury I had a conversation with Mr. Ker about the preparation of those indictments in anticipation of the action of the jury. In Mr. Woodward's letter of July 6 he writes to Walsh to come here, telling him that it has been arranged by the counsel that the grand jury is to be reconvened on the following Monday. In point of fact, however, it did not meet until Wednesday. The statute of limitations would run on the 19th, and it was arranged, necessarily, that the indictments expected to be obtained should be prepared beforehand. It was expected that there would be more than one indictment obtained against Kellogg. I had some conversation with Mr. Ker about the preparation of the indictments for that grand jury. He told me he was preparing them, and, being in the office, I saw papers lying there that looked like indictments.

Q. Upon what did you base your idea that he prepared the indictments at that time?—A. Upon what I saw and what he told me.

Q. Did you see any indictments prepared?—A. I saw what I believed to be the indictments.

Q. At the July term?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he tell you that he was preparing the indictments?—A. Yes, sir; we all talked it over.

Q. Where were you when he told you that?—A. Where we talked that over I cannot say. I should think it must have been in the Department of Justice, or it may have been when we were walking along the street. I will not undertake to locate it.

Q. Was there anybody else present but you and him?—A. That I would not undertake to say.

Q. But you have a distinct recollection of his telling you that?—A. I have a distinct recollection of our talking of the preparing of the indictments for the July term.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was that an indictment containing these three names?—A. I will not undertake to say about that, but I would say that I never heard of any such indictment being prepared for the March term. I don't see how it was possible for any indictment to be prepared for the March term. I never knew of Mr. Kellogg as being connected with the case at the March term. There were no papers which connected him with it, except the mere petition for expedition which he had signed, and which was certainly no ground for an indictment. Walsh had not given his testimony at that time, as he swears. I do not know of any statement of Mr. Woodward's at that time that connected Kellogg with the case in any manner. All I have to say on that point is that if Mr. Ker did prepare such an indictment, I think he is mistaken as to the term at which it was prepared, but I have no doubt that it is a mistake made in good faith.

Q. How can Mr. Ker be testifying in good faith when he says that at the same term he subsequently drew an indictment leaving out Kellogg? Now, at the July term there were no parties indicted.—A. No; but we expected that there would be.

Q. You say that he made that mistake here in good faith?—A. I do. I believe he did.

Q. Did you not understand him to say that when the jury failed to present these three men and he had to leave Kellogg out, he tore up that indictment and prepared another against Brady and Price?—A. I believe he did say that.

Q. Well, there was no such indictment prepared at the July term, was there?—A. That does not prevent its being a mistake made in good faith. I think Mr. Ker is mistaken upon this subject; I do not think he prepared any indictment with Mr. Kellogg's name in it for the March term; I do not see how he could have so prepared an indictment at that time; I believe Mr. Ker conscientiously thinks that he did prepare the indictment, but I have stated the reasons why I think he could not have so prepared it; I cannot see any source from which he could have got information at that time on which to indict Kellogg. I had no such information. Walsh says he had given no such information; Price was not available; there was no paper in possession of the Government in which Kellogg's name appeared except this petition for expedition of the service. Therefore, I say I think he could not have prepared the indictment for that term as he says he did. But, as pertinent to myself, the important thing is this: That I never knew of the preparation of any such indictment for the March term; never knew that Kellogg was to be indicted at that term. In this very brief that I put before the grand jury and which was indorsed by them, I said, "Indictment desired against Brady and Price;" and I did not suggest Kellogg's indictment; I had no idea of it.

Q. Was not Walsh before this March grand jury?—A. Yes.

Q. Did not you examine your witnesses before you took them to the grand jury?—A. Walsh said he would not talk to me, and he would not.

Q. Had he talked in regard to the matter with others?—A. No, sir.

Q. Were you present when he testified before the grand jury?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Didn't he testify that the orders or drafts were given him by Kellogg?—A. No, sir; at that very time he testified that he had got those drafts from Brady; just as he did in his statement made on the 28th of September, 1881, which I produced yesterday; he did not say that he had got the drafts from Kellogg; he said he had got them from Brady. Then he went on a little further and said that he got them from Brady, but he said that "Mr. Kellogg" was the messenger or party who brought them. I confess I did not understand that by "Mr. Kellogg" he meant Senator Kellogg, but even if I had understood that I should not have thought anything of it at all, because I did not dream at that time of any improper connection of Kellogg with the matter.

Q. But Walsh did swear that Kellogg had brought the drafts with him?—A. His statement at first was that he got them from Brady. Then the question was, "How did you get them?" and he answered, "Why, Mr. Kellogg brought them to me." That is the way it was.

Q. Who was the foreman of that grand jury?—A. Mr. Mitchell; and Mr. Mitchell testifies substantially that there was nothing done about the Kellogg case.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. In Mr. Gibson's examination, page 76 of our record, I find the following question and answers about which I wish to ask you:

Q. Did you call the attention of Mr. George Bliss to that case [Route 40101]?—A: Yes, sir.

Q. State what your interview with him was in reference to bringing that case to the attention of the grand jury.—A. Well, some time while I was still at the Post-Office Department building, Mr. Bliss in looking over one of the papers connected with this case of 40101—I had prepared them all together, because in trying one case you necessarily would have had to try the others partially; I had left purposely the statement as to some matters relating to the route from San Antonio to Corpus Christi (route No. 31148) blank—Mr. Bliss in reading it over of course noticed that, as any person would who was familiar with all the circumstances. He asked me who that referred to. I wrote on a slip of paper and handed it to him, "William Pitt Kellogg." That was the first information that he had with regard to it.

The WITNESS. I am perfectly well aware of that testimony, and something of that sort may have occurred in October, 1881, which was just after I came into the case, and at a time when, as I have said here, there was a great deal being pumped into me. There was nothing in any statement that Mr. Gibson ever submitted to me that showed any criminality on the part of William Pitt Kellogg in connection with Price, or anything of that kind. I have an indistinct recollection that at some time and somewhere Mr. Gibson did show or tell me something—possibly he wrote it on a piece of paper, though I should not think he would be likely to do a thing of that kind—something about Mr. Kellogg's name, but there was nothing that occurred to my mind in relation to any guilty connection of Mr. Kellogg with this business, or anything of that kind.

By Mr. FVAN:

Q. Your recollection was not refreshed in the grand jury room when

Mr. Walsh swore that Kellogg took him those drafts?—A. He did not say Senator Kellogg; he said "Mr." Kellogg.

Q. When you heard that, your mind did not revert to what Mr. Gibson had told you or shown you?—A. No, sir; not at all. You will remember that I came down here about the middle of September, the greenest of green men—greener than Mr. Ker when he first came here—about all this post-office business, about "increase" and "expedition," and subcontracts, and everything of that kind, and, as I looked over Walsh's statement here since I have been here on this occasion and saw the comments that I made on the margin at that time, they carried me back and reminded me of how ignorant I then was of these matters; because they showed that I had asked explanations of things which now seem to me the A B C of the business. Now, I have an indistinct recollection that in that condition of things Mr. Gibson did say something to me at some time in regard to Mr. Kellogg, but I am very confident that he never said anything that indicated to my mind anything about Senator Kellogg's criminal connection with Price on this route, or anything of that sort; and I cannot see how, in the preparation of any statement about route 40101, there should have come in any question of Kellogg's criminality in relation to the Corpus Christi route. I do not remember Gibson having said anything of that kind to me, and I don't think he did; but if he did, it made no lodgment in my mind, and when, in the following March, when I was in the midst of the Dorsey case, the name of "Mr. Kellogg" was mentioned in the grand jury room, it did not carry my mind back to anything that I had ever heard before on that subject. Now, I may have been wrong, I may have been dull, may have been negligent about that, but all I have to say is that I acted in good faith.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Gibson goes on to say that he narrated in a report that he made to you all the facts of the Kellogg matter.

The WITNESS. Well, I do not think it is so, and I do not think any report of that character ever existed. I do not recollect it, and I don't believe it ever existed.

You remember that Mr. Ker, with reference to the question whether he drew that indictment for the March term, said that he knew Walsh would so testify. How did he know it? Walsh had not communicated with anybody at that time. Walsh himself swore before the committee that he had not done so.

I think I have now touched upon all the points that I desire to correct. There is no use in wearying the committee or anybody else by talking back and forth upon these controverted points, and therefore I content myself with making these corrections.

Mr. FYAN (to Mr. Ker). Did you prepare an indictment against those three parties—Brady, Price, and Kellogg—for the July term of the grand jury?

Mr. KER. No, sir; I did not.

Mr. FYAN. Did you ever tell Colonel Bliss about preparing an indictment against those parties for the July term?

Mr. KER. I may have told him about preparing an indictment, but I never told him about preparing one against those parties, and I never did prepare it.

Mr. FYAN. Was there any expectation of finding an indictment against those three men together at the July term?

Mr. KER. Not at all.

Mr. FYAN. You did not intend to prepare any such indictment at that time

Mr. KER. No, sir.

Mr. FYAN. Then you did not tell him about preparing any such indictment at that time?

Mr. KER. Not at all; but I may have talked to him about the indictment against Kellogg for receiving the money.

Mr. FYAN. I am talking about the indictment against Brady, Kellogg, and Price together.

Mr. KER. Oh, no, no; nothing of the kind. There was no necessity for such an indictment then.

The CHAIRMAN (to Mr. Bliss). Since you testified before the committee in March I have received a letter, dated May 17, from a gentleman who lives at Cheyenne, in Wyoming, which I intended to call to your attention when you testified the other day, but it escaped my mind. I now show you the letter.

The letter was shown to Mr. Bliss, and was then put in evidence, as follows:

CHEYENNE, WYO., May 17.

DEAR SIR: Herewith I beg to hand you a verified copy of the Dorsey letters. They are not as full as I thought them; that is, the epitome of the originals that was published, a copy of which I inclose, are weaker than the originals. It is, however, sufficiently strong to show you how potent this proof would have been in the case. Had Mr. Bliss been in earnest in his prosecution, how can you account for his refusal to call such testimony as this? You will doubtless remember that I called Bliss' attention to these letters, told him of the suit that was brought, the settlement that was made and of the fact that the originals had been destroyed by Dorsey, and the names and residences of each person by whom he could prove each of these facts by. No effort was made to get them all, and by reason of his not having all he failed in getting in evidence the copies. He omitted each witness by whom he could have laid the foundation for secondary testimony.

If you wish me to come on I will.

Respectfully, yours,

C. W. WRIGHT.

Hon. WM. SPRINGER,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. BLISS. In my previous examination I referred to the fact that there were four witnesses omitted on the second trial because we had tried to get the matter to which they were going to testify in on the first trial, and it had been excluded by the court, and we then abandoned it. That arose in this way: Dorsey, very early in the case, wrote letters to a man named Wilcox, in Oregon, directing him to get up petitions for expedition and increase, to help the development of that branch of the conspiracy. That is what it amounted to, practically. This young man did not personally attend to the business, but his father did. It went along for some time. Before I came into the cases, and by the time the investigation in the star-route cases commenced in the spring, Dorsey had failed to pay Wilcox for his services. Dorsey usually cheated his subordinates, and that was one of the things that went against him on the trial of the case. The other contractors usually treated their subordinates well, and divided with them their illegitimate profits, but Dorsey wanted to keep all himself. The consequence in this instance was that Wilcox went down to Denver, or sent these letters to Denver to a Mr. Brown, a leading lawyer there, and a partner of Governor Teller, to get service on Dorsey and sue him down there. He did sue Dorsey, and they made a settlement, under which the original letters were delivered up. When the suit was brought at Denver one of these omnipresent newspaper reporters got after some of the parties and published the letters in a Denver paper.

The CHAIRMAN. Those are the letters, copies of which have been furnished to us here?

Mr. BLISS. I suppose so. Mr. Brown, the lawyer, had also kept copies of the papers. Before I came into the cases Mr. James had sought to get those original papers, but found that they had been delivered up on the settlement to somebody who represented Dorsey as his lawyer, that he had delivered them to a man named Tankersley, and that Tankersley had taken them to New York to Dorsey. We brought both the Wilcoxes all the way from Oregon. We summoned Mr. Brown, we summoned the reporter, we summoned Mr. Tankersley, and we called them all as witnesses, I think, except Tankersley.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you call Mr. Wright?

Mr. BLISS. No, we did not; he was of no importance to us.

The CHAIRMAN. He had given you the information?

Mr. BLISS. No, he had not.

The CHAIRMAN. He states in his letter that he had.

Mr. BLISS. If he gave any information it was no addition to what we already had. Mr. James had got the information. The matter had been published in a Denver paper. We kept those gentlemen from Denver here six or eight weeks, and then we went into court and undertook to prove our case. We had Frank R. Wilcox under examination for a long time, and we asked him how he had got this information and went to work to show the whole process and course of their operations, but Judge Wylie made a ruling to which I will call your attention in a moment.

The lawyer was Putnam; there was a lawyer named Brown, and the reporter was a Mr. Brown. He was put upon the stand, and he told us about the suit. We brought one more witness, the son of Mr. Brown, of the firm of Brown & Putnam. We brought the son because he had made the copies of the letters before they were given out, and Brown & Putnam verified the copies, so we brought them in addition to the reporter. There were two sets of copies, Brown's and the reporter's. We put them all on the stand. Then we tried to get that evidence in, and we had an elaborate argument, considerable running discussion, and the court finally summed it all up by ruling out that evidence, in substance, saying, "There is no law to prevent a man getting up petitions, or writing to get petitions gotten up, provided there is nothing illegitimate in view." We had to admit that we could not show anything illegitimate there, so that evidence was all excluded. We had the Western Union telegraph blanks, and we bestowed endless time and trouble on that matter, but the evidence was excluded, and I thought wrongly excluded. I may now say, however, that there was another reason. In the course of the conference there the elder Mr. Wilcox handed to me, in connection with the letters which his son knew of, and which had been published, some other letters from Dorsey, which, if they had gone in, would have done away very largely with the effect of our evidence, because they were letters in which Dorsey said, in substance, "I do not want you to do anything improper," and "I am doing this for my friends; I have no direct interest," and so on. While I did not think that was true, yet those letters would, of course, have militated against the effect of our evidence. But the letters we knew of and had tried to get in, and we were so strenuous about it that we insisted on keeping Mr. Putnam here. It was a very great hardship to him to keep him here, and I paid him something in addition to his witness fees, as I recollect, and had to pay it entirely out of my own pocket. There were a good many of those little expenditures that I never got any allowance for.

The CHAIRMAN. In another letter of this gentleman to me he says:

In February, 1882, I called upon the Attorney-General in reference to the star-route cases, particularly the case against Dorsey. I was possessed of certain facts that seemed to me conclusive of Dorsey's guilt. The Attorney-General referred me to Mr. Bliss. Mr. Bliss impressed me with the idea that these prosecutions were organized and instituted for but one object, and that was to give him employment. He treated me with considerable disdain, and intimated that the information was immaterial.

Have you any comment to make on that?

Mr. BLISS. I remember Mr. Wright now. I did not remember him before. Let me say, first, that we had heard of Mr. Wright in connection with this matter before that time. I think he had represented Dorsey, or been in some such relation to his side of the case. At any rate, he had had something to do with it, and we had sent out to Wyoming, where he had a ranch, to find him, and had missed him. Although he was a lawyer in Denver, I think he had a ranch up in Wyoming. At a later period he turned up here and was referred to me by the Attorney-General. I had a talk with him. I found that he could give us nothing except what we already had, and it seemed to me pretty clear that Mr. Wright was seeking a retainer for the Government and desired to be employed in the cases, and, as he gave us nothing we had not before, I did not think we needed him, but I treated him, I think, as politely as I could. I took his address and left him. He did not give us any information that we had not already.

The CHAIRMAN. He says he gave you the names and residences of witnesses to prove these facts.

Mr. BLISS. I know; but we had no trouble in proving those facts. We had the Wilcoxes here at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. But could you not prove the existence of the letters and their loss, and thus put the copies in evidence?

Mr. BLISS. Judge Wylie ruled that that evidence was inadmissible, as you will see if you turn to the record.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand you to say that you did endeavor to put the letters in evidence, and that Judge Wylie ruled them out?

Mr. BLISS. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you offer to show that there were originals, that the originals had been lost, and that those letters which you had were copies?

Mr. BLISS. Yes, sir. We had witnesses to prove all that.

The CHAIRMAN. On what ground did the judge rule them out?

Mr. BLISS. I do not recall at this moment the ground on which Judge Wylie ruled them out. You will find it, I think, about page 1640 of the record of that trial. We examined two witnesses that we had brought here to prove the receipt of the original letters and dispatches in Oregon. Then we brought the Denver lawyers, Brown & Putnam, here. Something comes to me now in relation to the break there. I remember it now. We brought the Oregon people here who had received the letters, and we brought Brown & Putnam, to whom they were forwarded from Oregon. We had the declaration in the Denver case, or, as we would call it in New York, the complaint, and we also proved the settlement with Dorsey, or somebody representing Dorsey, and the delivering up of the original letters to him. We proved also the taking of the copies before the originals were delivered.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. You did not prove the loss of the letters, and that was why they were ruled out?

Mr. BLISS. No, you are mistaken. You are a little "previous," judge.

We proved the taking of copies by Brown & Putnam. We had here the reporter of the Denver paper, but we did not put him upon the stand. I think that after keeping him a month or six weeks, his wife took sick, or was about to be confined, and we let him go. We had here also Mr. Tankersley, the man who took the letters to New York and gave them to Dorsey. During all the time he was here he was associating with the other side, and was in their interest completely, so much so that I received a letter from the Attorney-General in which he warned me against Tankersley, knowing nothing about him except that he was here as one of our witnesses. We had been informed from Oregon that the letters had been sent direct by the Wilcoxes to Brown & Putnam; Wilcox had stated that. His statement was, "I sent them to Brown & Putnam," and he stated that in good faith; but after we got to work on that point it turned out that instead of sending them direct to Brown & Putnam, he had given them to his lawyers at Portland, Woodward & Woodward, who had sent them to Brown & Putnam; therefore there was a little break there. The chain was broken at that point, as to showing that the letters that Woodward & Woodward had sent to Brown & Putnam were the same letters that the Wilcoxes had received from Dorsey, though they testified that the contents agreed. There was that break there, and we tried to get over it by producing correspondence between Woodward & Woodward and Brown & Putnam, a telegraphic dispatch and so on, but, as I recollect it, there was the point where we failed to connect, as the judge held. The judge also held, though, that the letters did not amount to much anyhow, because Dorsey had a right to ask for expedition, and to ask these parties to get up petitions for expedition, always provided there was not involved any misstatement or misconduct in getting up the petitions. I think the judge required us to prove that there was something wrong done there, and Wilcox testified that there was not.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. In the first place, you were not sure that the copies you had were true copies of the letters?

Mr. BLISS. Yes, we were.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. No; because they were copies that had been made from those that were in the hands of these other parties.

Mr. BLISS (interposing). That break Mr. Wright could not have supplied in any manner. Mr. Wright knew nothing about the letters until they got to Denver. Everything that he furnished or could furnish we had already in our possession, and in the best form for getting it in. Mr. Wright, as I have said, impressed me with the idea that he wanted to make some money out of it. Mr. Wright's point where he thought he could be valuable to us was that he was the lawyer who had represented Dorsey. Therefore I considered, in the first place, that he was here as a lawyer anxious to betray his client, which did not make a good impression on me; and, in the second place, all that he could testify to that we had not before was the fact that he had sent the letters to Tankersley, directed to him at Dorsey's room in New York. He said that Tankersley would swear that he had read them in Dorsey's presence. Well, we had Tankersley here as a witness, but, as I have said, he was a witness who trained with the other side; so much so that the Attorney-General learned of it and wrote me a letter warning me about it.

Mr. FYAN. Was Tankersley examined?

Mr. BLISS. No, sir; because when they ruled us out on that question of the connection between Portland and Denver we did not go any further.

Mr. FYAN. If Tankersley had sworn that he read the letters to Dorsey and that Dorsey had admitted that they were his letters, that would have remedied the defect in the proof, would it not?

Mr. BLISS. I do not recall all the points now. All I can say is, that we tried in good faith to get the letters in, and I think all the counsel took part in that tussle.

The following statement received by the chairman from Mr. Wright, being a copy of a publication in a Denver paper setting forth the letters referred to toward the end of the foregoing examination of Mr. Bliss, was put in evidence:

RICHES IN ROUTES.—DENVER, AS USUAL, FIGURES IN THE TOPICS OF THE TIMES. AND IT IS LEARNED THAT SUIT FOR STAR-ROUTE SERVICES HAS BEEN FILED HERE. EX-SENATOR DORSEY, THE DEFENDANT, IN INTERESTING PROCEEDINGS. EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS ALLEGED TO HAVE BEEN WRITTEN BY HIM. GOOD SUNDAY READING FOR "THE BOYS."

The intricacies and alleged irregularities of Postmaster-General Brady's "star-route mail service" are to-day looked upon with more interest by a suspicious public than has been given to any like matter since the days of the Credit Mobilier and whisky ring scandals. Mr. Brady's star routes are far-reaching. They are to be found running over the sandy plains, through deep cuts, and into gaping tunnels, and along the precipitous edges of high mountains. The great West and Southwest are especially well cared for by this, the star-route system. Anything in connection with this great scheme, which is now most seriously suspected of being a consummate fraud, is of more than passing present interest, pending the investigation that is being made into the inner workings of the star route.

A Tribune reporter yesterday discovered that proceedings had been begun in the district court of Aprapahoe County against ex-Senator S. W. Dorsey, of Arkansas, for moneys promised the plaintiff for services rendered in getting up petitions, creating an interest among the people, &c., in order to increase the mail facilities of certain portions of Oregon.

That this suit should be brought in Colorado will naturally excite the surprise of the reader. The circumstances that caused it were peculiar. It came about in this way: Some months ago a well-known legal firm in Denver, which also operates an extensive collection agency, received from their attorney in Portland, Oregon, a claim for collection against Senator Dorsey. The man who presented this claim is a well known politician of Portland. As the Tribune is under a promise not to publish the name of this person, at this time, the reader will know him throughout this article as "Doc", a cognomen given him by his intimate friends. "Doc" had in his possession a number of letters, written by Senator Dorsey, promising him so much per day for his services, and giving him minute directions as to how to proceed to get up his petitions, make contracts, &c. These letters, together with the claim now placed in the hands of the Denver law firm, and last winter, when Senator Dorsey came to this city, to look after his mining interests, he was visited at the Windsor Hotel by an agent of "Doc's" lawyers, and the bundle of letters alleged to have been written by him, were shown him in support of the claim, which the agent then presented for collection. Senator Dorsey pronounced the claim a fraud, and emphatically denounced "Doc" as a blackmailer. Proceedings were immediately begun in the district court. Senator Dorsey instructed his counsel to enter a demurrer on the grounds that these contracts made by "Doc" (for making which he claimed the promised pay) were illegal. Since that time matters have remained in statu quo.

It was with difficulty that the Tribune reporter succeeded in persuading "Doc's" attorney to lay bare to his reportorial eye the letters alleged to have been written by Senator Dorsey, which told "Doc" how to "work the thing" to the best advantage.

However, honest perseverance won, and the anxiously sought letters were brought out from their resting place in the proverbial "dusty pigeon-hole."

Letter No. 1 is written upon four sheets of the Senate chamber letter heads. It is written in a free, round hand, and from the blurred appearance of some of the words, where the ink is heaviest, it is evident that the letter has been through a letter-copying press. Senator Dorsey's initial letter to "Doc" is dated Washington, April 12, 1879.

The Senator gets down to business at once, by telling "Doc" that he wants him to go to Eugene City, and "get up all the petitions possible for an increase of mail service, from Eugene City to Bridge Creek, to a daily line instead of a weekly, and also to have the time made faster than it is." The letter states that forms of petitions are inclosed, and then breaks out suddenly, in this style:

"I want ten or a dozen on this route, and also to get people to write to the Postmaster-General and their two Senators."

The letter informs "Doc" that there should be at least fifty letters written to the Department, while a petition should be gotten up and signed by the governor, the United States officers, and the county officers. The letter takes it for granted that "Doc" "understands what is wanted," and then it directs that he shall go and see H. H. Fink, who is subcontractor at Looking Glass. "We want," says the Senator, "prominent Democrats to write to Grover and Slater, urging them to see that this increase is made."

The directions are then plainly marked out for "Doc" to follow:

"1. Get ten or twelve different petitions on each route.

"2. Have large number of letters written to the Postmaster-General and United States Senators.

"3. Be sure all ask for daily and fast line.

"4. Get State officers to write.

"5. Get chamber of commerce of Portland to write.

"6. Send all you can, and send immediately; time is important.

"7. Write me if you can go at once; if you can't, get some good man who knows what to do to go. But I desire you to, and it is probable that I may give you permanent employment at this business. I will pay your expenses while you are gone and $5 per day. If you haven't means I will telegraph you sufficient."

After telling "Doc" that he is "relied upon for prompt and efficient work," the writer of the letter signs himself "Yours, very truly, S. W. Dorsey."

Letter No. 2 is dated April 16, four days after the first one was written. The letter begins by stating that contracts are inclosed to be made on the route from Bridge Creek to Eugene City, at that time under contract to P. J. Wycoff, of that place, for one trip a week, and says that if the schedule be changed a new contract will have to be made. "Doc" is cautioned to be especially careful about these contracts, and the sage reflection that "mail contracting is peculiar and extraordinary business" is thrown in en passant. Says the letter-writer: "They will bluff, blow, talk, and put on airs about the thing costing four times what they will finally take to do it." The letter continues by stating that the "Very best we can do—and there must be a guaranteed bond for fulfilment of contract—is $7,500 per annum for three trips a week; time, 100 hours, which would be slow walking time." Under no circumstances is "Doc" to pay over $8,000 per annum.

The writer of the letter gives "Doc" a point by saying:

"Now make your contracts thus: Three trips a week, Department time, $7,500 per annum; six trips per week, $14,000; seven trips, $16,500 per annum, the contract to run until July 1, 1882, and not to be filed here in Washington." These words in Italics are heavily underscored in the letter, and that the writer means what he says cannot be doubted. Senator Dorsey goes on to say in this letter of his that, "I guarantee all of the contracts, and if they want to know about my financial standing, I can give any reference they want in their own State. The money will be paid every quarter, and, after January next, every month, if they want it. In regard to Looking Glass and Cogville contract, we must have a new one with him. We are now paying him a good deal more than we get. Contract with him as follows, or if not with him, with A. C. Fink, who lives at Rosebury, and who now gets $1,000 per year; with some one else in case it is increased to three trips: for three trips, $2,500; you may go to $3,000; for six trips, $5,500; for seven trips, $6,200; no contract to be binding upon us but upon them until approved by M. C. Rerdell, agent, here.

"This Mr. Fink has filed his contract. I don't want it filed. I will pay him monthly if he wants, but I don't want contracts on file here. Tell them so. I shall need you if you can do this kind of work. I want papers, letters, petitions, and so on, by the car load, sent in on these two routes. Send to me, to Slater, and to Hon. T. J. Brady, Second Assistant Postmaster-General; no letter or petition to be written in the same hand." This letter was signed like the first.

Epistle No. 3 was written to "Doc" while he was in Walla Walla, Washington Territory. He is told that he will find inclosed in the letter contracts for Wallula and Pleasant Grove lines. He is also informed of the facts that "Keach, of Yakuria, has been ousted for drunkenness and general bad conduct." Says the letter, "Let to some good man as you will see. We propose to pay for one trip what it has been carried for all the time, to wit:

One trip.....	$1,400
Two trips.....	2,000
Three trips.....	3,700
Six trips.....	7,000
Seven trips.....	7,500

"I hope to have work for you in the future, if you do as well here as you did in Eugene City." "S. W. Dorsey" is the signature to this letter, which completes the list of correspondence by mail.

There was some telegraphic communication between the Senator and "Doc" after that time.

The first dispatch is dated Washington, May 11, 1889. It tells "Doc" to "proceed immediately to Walla Walla, where instructions await you. Get papers for daily line and draw on me for $100."

The next dispatch is dated the 24th of the same month. It merely tells "Doc." that he can return to Portland.

Dispatch No. 3 and the last of the correspondence is signed by M. C. Riddell, the agent spoken of in letter No. 2. "Doc." is told to remain at Wallula, where he is then stationed, "Until Dorsey returns. Will arrange money for you."

These letters will be produced in evidence by the plaintiff to support his claim that he was ordered to do the work, and promised so much money for doing it. The developments will doubtless be interesting.

WASHINGTON, June 21, 1884.

HENRY A. WILLARD sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. State your age, residence, and occupation.—Answer. I am 62 years old. I am engaged in general business.

Q. Were you a member of the grand jury of which Mr. Eli S. Hutchinson was foreman?—A. I was.

Q. Were you present in the grand jury when the case of the United States versus William Pitt Kellogg was being considered—in July, 1882, I think it was?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Mr. Hutchinson was before this committee and testified as follows. I will call your attention to his testimony in order that you may see the point. On page 427, he says, speaking for the jury:

We were promised on Friday that Mr. Price would be there Saturday almost to a certainty, but he did not come. I suppose, however, that the Government attorneys were not to blame for that.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Who made that promise?—A. Mr. Bliss.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Do you know why Price did not come?—A. I do not.

Q. Was any reason given?—A. Simply that he did not come. We understood that he was to come, but, as a matter of fact, he did not come.

Q. Do you know where Mr. Price was at that time?—A. I do not.

Q. Was he under arrest?—A. No. My opinion is that he was in Canada at that time. I think Mr. Bliss said that he had, until recently, been in Canada, but that he (Bliss) had learned, through a respectable source, that he would be there the next day.

Q. But he was not there?—A. He was not there.

Again, on page 429, I find this:

Q. Did he make any suggestions as to the sufficiency of the evidence?—A. No further than his great apparent anxiety to get Mr. Price there, and his anxiety that we should consider Price's testimony. He was confident that Mr. Price would be there, and he seemed exceedingly anxious to have him there.]

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Did he make any remark to the effect that it would be necessary to have Mr. Price there in order to find an indictment?—A. No, sir; not as broad as that; nor I don't think he intimated that.

Q. Did he convey any intimation to you to that effect by his declarations?—A. Not that it would be necessary to have Price there, but he seemed to be exceedingly anxious that Mr. Price should be there.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did he say whether the evidence that he hoped to produce from the examination of Mr. Price was necessary to make out a case?—A. Well, I think he said it would be "a clincher," or something like that. My impression at the time was that he wanted Mr. Price's testimony in order to make up the case; that it was necessary. I might have drawn that inference, though, because I thought it was necessary; or I might have drawn it from the manner in which Mr. Bliss said it; I don't know.

Q. Then you drew from his manner that it was necessary to have Price's testimony to make out a case?—A. No; I say I believe at the time he thought it was. Whether I was influenced in that by my own opinion, because I thought it would be necessary, or whether I was influenced by his manner, I do not know; but I certainly thought that he thought so.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Are you willing to say whether or not you submitted your views upon that subject to the balance of your associates?—A. I would not say that.

Q. That is, you are not willing to say whether you did or not?—A. No, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You could not say either way?—A. No, sir; I would not give you any of our consultations among ourselves.

Q. Failing, then, to obtain the presence of Mr. Price, what became of the case so far as Mr. Bliss was concerned?—A. Well, on Saturday we came together expecting to find Mr. Price there, and, he not being there, after deliberating, we went down to court and reported that we had considered everything that had been brought before us, and had made no presentments. That was on Saturday about 1 o'clock, I suppose.

Q. Did Mr. Bliss make any statements to the jury on that day as to the reason for Mr. Price's failure to attend?—A. Simply that he did not understand it.

Q. (Continued.) Now, Mr. Bliss stated before this committee that he did not promise Mr. Price's attendance as a witness before the grand jury; that he might have said that he expected on the trial of the case to have Mr. Price, but that he did not intimate to the jury that he would be before the grand jury. You have heard Mr. Hutchinson's testimony on that point read. Please state whether you have any recollection of the matter stated by Mr. Hutchinson in regard to Mr. Price.—A. What Mr. Hutchinson has stated I can corroborate. He has stated it clearly, as I understand it. Mr. Bliss did say that he expected the presence of Mr. Price, and dwelt upon the importance of his being there; and if it is proper for me to say at the meeting of the grand jury when Mr. Bliss came before us, which was the first time that I had seen Mr. Bliss, his opening remarks were that the jury was called together for a special purpose or a special occasion, not that they wanted any more evidence for indictments against Mr. Brady and Mr. Dorsey, but that they had information that a person in high position might be implicated, and that was what this jury was called together for. He did not name the person for some time, but he used that expression, "a person in high position." But afterwards he did name the party in regard to whom evidence might be presented. I recollect that particularly, because it was the opening remark of Mr. Bliss.

Q. Was there anything said in the opening as to what witnesses would appear before you?—A. He said that Mr. Walsh would be the first witness, and that he expected to have Mr. Price by the next day, or immediately. My impression is that he said Mr. Price was on his way from Canada, and that he expected him before us.

Q. Did you understand from what he said that the question as to whether a case would be made out or not would depend upon the testimony of those two witnesses?—A. No, I do not recollect that.

Q. Was anything said as to whether there should be an adjournment over from Friday until Saturday to await the arrival of Mr. Price?—A. Yes, sir; we were asked to adjourn over, and told that we should probably have Mr. Price before us by Saturday; and Mr. Bliss stated, if I recollect right, why it was urgent that we should act before Monday on account of the statute of limitations. Those things I recollect.

Q. Do you state now that you adjourned on account of that statement expecting the appearance of Mr. Price next morning?—A. That is what we adjourned for.

Q. Are you sure that the statement to you was not to this effect: That Mr. Price would be present on the trial of the case if an indictment was found, and that that would make the case much stronger when it went to the petit jury?—A. Well, I am very clear about his saying that Mr. Price would be before the grand jury, for we adjourned for that very purpose. He might have said that he would be before the court—he might have added that; but I am very clear that we adjourned for the purpose of receiving Mr. Price's testimony.

By Mr. HEMPHILL:

Q. You adjourned for the purpose of receiving Mr. Price's testimony, relying upon Mr. Bliss' statement that he was to be there next day?—A. We had no other statement from any other party but Mr. Bliss. There was no other attorney before us.

R. O. EDMONSTON sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Where do you reside?—Answer. In Washington.

Q. State your age and occupation.—A. I am 29 years of age; I am in the wholesale grocery business.

Q. Were you a member of the grand jury of which Mr. Hutchinson was the foreman, and which met in this city in July, 1882?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You have heard the testimony of Mr. Willard, who has just preceded you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you remember the circumstances about which he has testified?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Will you give your recollection of those facts?—A. Well, what Mr. Willard has said I will corroborate.

Q. You understand the matter just as he did with regard to the promised appearance of Mr. Price?—A. Yes, sir; Mr. Bliss said that Mr. Price would be there. That was the understanding.

Q. It was the grand jury that he was to be before, and not the petit jury?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you understood that you adjourned on Friday for the purpose of having Mr. Price present on Saturday?—A. Yes, sir.

Did you regard the evidence that Mr. Price was to give as material in the case, or presumed that it was?—A. Yes, sir.

WASHINGTON, June 21, 1884.

H. CLAY STEWART sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Please state your residence, age, and occupation.—Answer. I reside in Washington; my age is 55. I am in general business.

Q. Were you a member of the Hutchinson grand jury that met in this city in July, 1882?—A. I was.

Q. You have heard the testimony of Mr. Willard and Mr. Edmonston in regard to the promised appearance of Mr. Price before that jury; what have you to say as to that?—A. Well, sir, I am positive in my mind, after thinking it over, that Mr. Bliss did say to us that Mr. Price would be there at a subsequent day. I don't know whether it was Friday or Saturday; but we certainly adjourned, the jury expecting Mr. Price to be there next day. I am positive of that. What makes me positive about that is I said, "It is not proper for the grand jury to hold over day after day; you ought to have your witnesses here."

Q. What did Mr. Bliss say to that?—A. I do not remember what reply was made, but having made that remark impressed it upon my mind that we did adjourn for the purpose of receiving the testimony of Mr. Price. I won't be so certain that it was Mr. Price, but it was somebody.

Q. Was it one of the parties mentioned by Mr. Walsh as connected with the case?—A. Yes, sir. We never had but one other witness before us, and that was Mr. Walsh; and I recollect asking Mr. Bliss whether he had't some other witness, and he said, "Yes; this other man (I think it was) Price." I don't recollect names very well, but I know it was some one who was somewhere in Canada, he said. I have not thought much of it since, but I am positive about the jury's adjourning to wait for some witness.

By Mr. HEMPHILL:

Q. And that witness was to come from Canada?—A. Yes, sir; or somewhere from the North.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was the man mentioned by Mr. Walsh as connected with the transaction?—A. I am not speaking of Mr. Walsh; I am speaking of Mr. Bliss.

Q. But you had heard Walsh's testimony the day before?—A. Yes; he was the only witness we heard, and I asked if there was no other witness, and the reply was that they would have some other witness to come on Friday or Saturday, and we adjourned to that day; and when that day came Mr. Bliss came into the room and somebody asked him about the witness, and he was very sorry that he had not got the witness; I am as positive about that as that I am living.

HENRY SEMKEN sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Please state your residence, age, and occupation.—Answer. My residence is in Washington; I am 59 years of age; I am a merchant.

Q. Were you a member of the grand jury of which Mr. Hutchinson was foreman, and which met in July, 1882?—A. I was.

Q. You have heard the testimony of Mr. Willard, Mr. Edmonston, and Mr. Stewart, have you not?—A. I have.

Q. And also a statement of what was testified to on a previous occasion before this committee by Mr. Hutchinson?—I have.

Q. Please state your recollection of the matters in controversy.—A. It is just about as Mr. Willard stated it; I remember as far as that, though it is a long time ago, and it is very hard to call every conversation to mind; but I remember that the grand jury adjourned over one day; I could not state whether it was Friday or Saturday, expecting another witness, and this witness was to be Mr. Price, who was absent then, I believe, in Canada.

Q. Did you understand that the witness was a material witness in the case?—A. Well, I could not recollect that, but it must have been, for Mr. Bliss asked us to adjourn over.

WASHINGTON, June 21, 1884.

GEORGE TRUESDELL sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. State your age, residence, and occupation.—Answer. I am 42 years of age; my residence is in this city.

Q. Were you a member of the grand jury that met in this city in July, 1882, of which Mr. Hutchinson was foreman?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know whether anything was said in the grand-jury room about Mr. Price being present as a witness on a subsequent day, or whether he was to be called?—A. Yes, sir. Mr. Bliss, I think it was who represented the Government, told us that Mr. Price was expected on the following day or the day after to appear before us in that matter that we were investigating, but he stated, I believe, that he was uncertain that he would appear, or that if he did come here at all he would testify that influences might be brought to bear upon him which would prevent him testifying, but he gave us to understand that he was expected here.

Q. Was an adjournment had on that account to await his presence?—A. Yes, sir; that is my recollection.

WASHINGTON, June 21, 1884.

JAMES B. COLEGROVE sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Please state your age, residence, and occupation.—Answer. I am 52 years of age. I am residing here for the present. My voting residence is Missouri; I have lived there for the last fifteen years. My occupation is that of a Government contractor. I am also engaged in other business, but that is my proper business.

Q. Are you acquainted with Mr. C. C. Cole, an attorney of this city?—A. I am.

Q. And with Mr. Charles D. Colman?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Have you read the testimony of Mr. Cole before this committee?—A. I have read the most of it. I have not had time to read it carefully, but sufficiently I think.

Q. Please state what business transaction you had with Mr. Cole in which he acted as attorney for you.—A. Well, Mr. Cole has been my attorney since 1881 in several different matters.

Q. How much have you paid him for his services during that time?—A. That I cannot tell. I paid him $250 at one time, and I have paid him various amounts since according to the business that he has done for me.

Q. Have you an idea of what the aggregate of it all would be?—A. I should think probably in the neighborhood of $400.

Q. I think he stated that it was about $750.—A. That is a mistake. I saw the testimony of Mr. Colman here also. I will begin at the beginning of this matter and go through with it.

Q. State your recollection of the transaction about which Mr. Colman testifies?—A. In the year 1881, there began to be published in this city and in New York a great many statements with regard to the star-route matters, and my name was published in connection with them very extensively. Charges were made against me. Notably, they began to be made in the New York Times, by their correspondent who was then in the Post-Office Department, making investigations. I think his name was Root. The most atrocious falsehoods were published about me in the New York Times, and they were copied into the Star of this city, statements that were garbled and contained only part of the truth—just enough to make me out a very bad man. About that time Charles D. Colman called upon me at my house. He was a man that I knew in Saint Louis during the war. I was then a Government surgeon, and he was provost marshal. He referred to these matters in detail, and stated that he had information that satisfied him that my name would be presented to the grand jury for indictment. I stated to Mr. Colman that I did not fear any indictment—that is, I did not fear the result of an indictment; that my conduct with the Government was clean, that my hands were clean, that I did not belong to any ring, was not associated with anybody, was doing business by myself, and had been for a number of years. Mr. Colman went on to state what the public sentiment was, and that it would cost me a very large sum to defend a suit by the Government, and advised me to take some measures to protect myself. He advised me to procure counsel. I told Mr. Colman I thought the time to employ counsel would be after the Government had taken some measures; that I didn't see any necessity for employing any counsel. He said that to defend against an indictment, if found, I could not employ an attorney of any repute for less than $3,000; that it would cost me at least that to defend it. He called upon me several times; probably three or four times. We had been friends together, and I took it for granted that he was acting as a friend. He urged upon me with considerable vehemence the necessity of taking some course, saying that otherwise I would probably be indicted. I asked him what course he thought I ought to take. He said he thought that I had better get Mr. Cole, of this city, for my attorney. He referred to the fact that Mr. Cole was a partner of Mr. Cook, who was then the Government counsel in the star-route cases. I asked Mr. Colman if that would not have an appearance of bribery. I told him that I would not take any steps that would look like or have the appearance of bribing a Government attorney or anybody connected with the Government. He stated that he thought that Mr. Cole, being associated with Mr. Cook, would be a valuable man for me to have, and advised me to employ him. I finally consented to do so. I was very much averse to it, though, and so stated to Mr. Colman. Mr. Colman came to my house and told me that it would cost me $500 as a retainer. I went with Mr. Colman to Mr. Cole's office and talked over matters with Mr. Cole in a general way, without any reference whatever to star-route matters. I had a considerable business; I have had a very large business, and I had no attorney at that time here, and I so mentioned to Mr. Cole. There was no reference made to the threatened indictment in my conversation with Mr. Cole. He was retained by me as counsel in a general way, with the understanding that the fee was to be $500 as a retainer. I paid Mr. Colman $250 of that fee then and there; Mr. Colman handed it to Mr. Cole. It was understood that the balance was to be paid in the course of two or three months. About two weeks after that Mr. Colman came to my house again and advised me to pay the balance of the money. I told Mr. Colman it was not due, that that was not the agreement, but he said he thought it was better for me to pay it. I told him it did not make any difference to me when I paid it. I went down to the bank with Mr. Colman and took out $250 and gave it to him. From that time until now Mr. Cole has attended to my business regularly. A suit was brought against me by parties at Sedalia, Mo., in behalf of a man who carried the mail for me in Arizona, with whom I had been trying through the Delegate from Arizona to make a settlement. He demanded about four or five times what the service was worth, and I was not going to pay it. I offered to leave it to the Delegate, but he would not do it, and after various efforts to settle the matter he refused to take what I deemed the service was worth and what had been paid for it in prior times; he brought a suit, and got judgment. In that case Mr. Cole acted as my attorney and counsel here in the taking of depositions. There were other matters. I brought suit against parties in New York for quite a large amount—parties who had engaged to carry the mail for me and had thrown up their contracts—and Mr. Cole was engaged in that. My wife had business of her own in which Mr. Cole was engaged as attorney, and he has been engaged in a great many cases; I cannot recall them all now. It has been my custom to go there for counsel. During the existence of Mr. Cook's attorneyship for the Government I never, in a single instance, had any conversation with him at all. I never paid him a cent, and the statement that he was engaged, by whomsoever made, to prevent my being indicted is absolutely and unqualifiedly false.

Q. When was this payment of $250 made in the office of Mr. Cole?—

A. It was some time in 1881; I cannot tell you exactly the time. I have Mr. Cole's receipt for it, but I have not been able to find it.

Q. It was made some time in 1881?—A. Yes, sir; it was simply a receipt for $250 as a retainer.

Q. Had you any suits pending then?—A. Oh, yes. No, I don't think I had any suits pending here. This Missouri or Arizona matter was pending. The suit in New York had not been brought at that time.

Q. And that payment of $250 was for services that he was to perform in preventing you being indicted?—A. There was no conversation of that character between Mr. Cole and myself.

Q. Well, it was paid in pursuance of the suggestion of Mr. Colman?—A. I confess that I thought the point was well made—that Mr. Cole would be a good attorney to have under the circumstances—but I explicitly stated to Mr. Colman that I would not put myself in the position of employing a Government attorney in any way, and I entirely refrained from any reference to that matter at that time; and as I before stated, during the time Mr. Cook was the attorney of the Government

I had no conversation with him whatever. I did not know him; I never had been introduced to him.

Q. When you said that you had paid Mr. Cole about $450 in all, you did not reckon that $250 that you paid Mr. Colman, did you?—A. Yes, sir; I reckoned that in.

Q. The second $250?—A. No, sir; I paid that to Mr. Colman.

Q. You do not reckon that as a part of the money you paid Mr. Cole?—A. No, sir; I have paid Mr. Cole small sums since; $25 and other small sums. In regard to the second $250 I know nothing about it further than that I gave it to Mr. Colman in the Central National Bank.

Q. Was he to give it to Mr. Cole?—A. I presumed that he would give it to Mr. Cole, but I don't know.

Q. It was intended for Mr. Cole?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And if that went to him how much did he receive?—A. Then they received between them (Mr. Colman and Mr. Cole) about $500.

Q. For this purpose?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now the payments that you made otherwise to Mr. Cole for legal services amounted to how much?—A. Well, I should say probably $150.

Q. Altogether?—A. Yes, sir. Now, amongst the outrageous and scandalous falsehoods published about me was a pamphlet signed by Mr. Tidball and Mr. Shalcross, but I have never opened my mouth to this day; I have never been to the Star office about it.

Q. I understand that this pamphlet, of which you speak, is one of the reports of the inspectors?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did they state?—A. They made a statement that my securities were insufficient, and that I had altered a contract, and that statement was put into a pamphlet. It was a most atrocious thing. There never was a thing published or put into print by mortal man that was such an atrocity—it was cruel to the last degree. Mr. Shalcross at that time was engaged in the Government service, and was a contractor; which was contrary to law. He had a contract up in West Virginia.

Q. What was that contract for?—A. It was a contract to carry the mail.

Q. Do you know what the points were?—A. It was a star contract. I don't remember the points. It was probably somewhere about Wheeling.

Q. Do you know that of your own knowledge?—A. I do. I saw the papers in the Department.

Q. Was he an original contractor or a subcontractor?—A. He was a contractor, I think, and his son was carrying the mail when a quarrel arose between him and his son.

Q. How large a contract was it?—A. It was not a very large affair; probably two or three hundred dollars a year.

Q. Some neighborhood matter?—A. Yes, sir; the records will show.

Q. There was no controversy in the Department about that service being performed?—A. Oh, no.

Q. And no expedition upon it?—A. No expedition upon it.

Now, I want to state here that I was ready and have ever been ready to meet any indictment. I did not fear it. I have carried the mails probably more extensively than any one man connected with the Government. My service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, has been 3,000,000 miles, under five hundred different contracts; and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, over 2,500,000; and for 1882, 2,000,000 of miles. At the time they made these charges in reference to my securities, I went to the Postmaster-General, Judge Howe, and had an interview with him, and Judge Howe at my earnest request made an examination of these charges that were made against me, and he pronounced them unfounded. I requested him to examine the matter. He did so, and he told me in person that he saw no ground for these charges that were being published against me, and that my record was clean. And as they had made complaint at that time about the insufficiency of my bondsmen, Governor Tabor, of Colorado, qualified in $3,000,000 on my bond. I asked Senator Hill to come there, and he came in and indorsed Governor Tabor's statement that he was possessed of real estate to the amount of $3,000,000, and Judge Howe said: "I know Governor Tabor and I will take judicial knowledge here of his estate and of his responsibility."

Q. Is Governor Tabor now on your bond?—A. Yes, sir, and I have a letter of his on file in the Department, offering to become my bondsman upon any contract that I might then have or should thereafter have, or upon any bids or proposals that I might make.

Q. Has he any interest with you?—A. No, sir—well, I don't want you to put down that answer exactly. It was agreed that on any bids that he signed afterwards, I should divide with him, but not while he was Senator. It was within the last year I put in some bids with his name. But he had never signed any bids at that time. This was a written proposition by Governor Tabor to Postmaster-General Howe, to become my bondsman if they desired him to do so. I was greatly exercised over those matters, as you or any other man would have been. My conduct with the Government was open to investigation all the time. I was a very large contractor, none larger, and I sent word through Mr. Fenwick to the Star, that if instead of publishing the lies about me they would see me I could convince them that they were publishing what was untrue.

Q. Did you have any contracts while Mr. Brady was the Second Assistant?—A. Yes, sir; very many of these were during Mr. Brady's time. I have been a contractor for a great many years.

Q. Did you ever have your routes expedited?—A. No, sir; I never had a route expedited in my life.

Q. You took them at the original contract price and carried them through?—A. Yes, sir; unless otherwise ordered by the Government.

Q. You had none of those routes that were in controversy?—A. No, sir; none whatever.

Q. Can you tell who were the different combinations; the Dorsey combination and the Kerens combination?—A. Yes, sir; I know all these parties well; but you understand that such combinations were kept secret. If there were such combinations they were not made public.

Q. But still those that were inside knew about them?—A. Well, there was a lot of contracts awarded by Mr. Brady, but as to what was called the "Dorsey gang"—that was their soubriquet, or the name by which they went in the Department—Mr. Vaile came in. It was understood that they were going to fail, and did fail. I saw a telegram that Mr. Brady sent them at that time asking what they were going to do. Mr. Vaile was called in. He made a proposition to take this service off the Dorseys' hands. I think Mr. Brady telegraphed Mr. Vaile asking what they were going to do about it, and saying that they would have to fail them up. Mr. Vaile then came to the front and took these Dorsey contracts.

Q. Do you know who constituted the Kerens combination?—A. No, sir; I do not.

Q. Mr. Roots; was he one of the parties?—A. Well, I know Mr. Roots and Mr. Kerens well, and I know that they were associated together in contracts. Beyond that I do not know anything about it.

Q. Of course you had to bid against those combinations?—A. Yes, sir; certainly.

Q. You do not know who constituted those combinations?—A. No, sir. My business has been by myself. I have not been associated with anybody for a number of years.

Q. Do you know how many contracts Kerens and Root had?—A. No, sir.

Q. What interest did Mr. Elkins have in those contracts?—A. That I do not know. I don't know Mr. Elkins. As I was going on to say, I was very much exercised about these publications. They were telegraphed all over the United States, everywhere, and from every place I had service. I was receiving letters as to what this meant. I am very well known throughout the country, and of course it was very injurious to my business. I at one time asked Mr. Cole if he did not think it would be better for me to go right to these Government attorneys, Mr. Merrick, for instance, and say, "Now here, I want you to have the facts about this matter;" and Mr. Cole said he thought it would be a good plan. I did go to see Mr. Merrick and had a conversation with him, and he wrote a letter to Mr. Fenwick in which he stated that there was no intention to do anybody injustice and that my name should not be presented to the grand jury for indictment until I had been seen and heard. I had a conversation with Mr. Woodward and I denounced him to his face. I told him that he was taking a very wrong course, and that he had made public declarations in the Post-Office Department that Mr. French together with myself would be indicted, and that when indicted we would be convicted. I called him to task in severe terms, and he took great offense at my remarks, and immediately thereafter he sent before the grand jury Mr. Boone, who had been seven times indicted for perjury and fraud. Three grand juries have had my case before them and every one of them have declared me innocent, at least so far as any evidence that the Government ever produced.

By Mr. HEMPHILL:

Q. Do you mean to say that you have been presented three times by the Government counsel?—A. Yes, sir; and I engaged Mr. Key of this city to see Mr. Ker, and Mr. Ker told him that if I would give them $5,000 they would drop it.

Q. That is all hearsay.—A. Well, Judge Key is here in this city.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did Judge Key tell you that?—A. Judge Key told me that. I called with him to see Mr. Ker.

Q. Did Judge Key say to you that Mr. Ker told him that?—A. Yes, sir; that by the payment of $5,000 they would drop it. I think it is well enough for these matters to come to the front.

Mr. HEMPHILL. We want to get the facts.

The WITNESS. Well, I am going to state the whole facts. Now, the New York Times published an article in regard to the Georgetown route, in which they charged me with conspiring with Mr. French, then Acting Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and charged him with letting a route to me without competition. They charged Mr. French with giving me this contract and being a beneficiary in it. That is the charge that Mr. Woodward made. In that connection, here is a telegram :

[Post-Office Department, Office of Second Assistant Postmaster-General.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 13, 1879.

JAMES STEPHENSON, Omaha, Nebr.:

For what sum per month will you perform seven times a week service, from November first to April thirty, from Georgetown, by Montezuma, Haywood, Junction City, and Frisco, to Kokoma, Colorado? Answer immediately.

J. L. FRENCH,
Acting Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

I went to the Post-Office Department, and went to the jacket containing all the papers on this route, and that dispatch had been taken out; it was not there. This route formed the foundation for an article a column long in the New York Times. If the party that wrote that article had seen me I could have produced that dispatch, which would have killed the whole article dead.

Q. What do you understand to be the significance of that dispatch?—

A. Why, that says that another man was asked to bid on it. They said that nobody else bid on it but myself, and that Mr. French gave it to me without competition; but this dispatch shows that he asked Mr. James Stephenson to bid on it.

Q. Who was Stephenson?—A. He was a man who was carrying the mail on that route, as a summer route; this was for winter service. That disposes completely of the allegations contained in the New York Times, as well as in the Star of this city. They made another statement, that Mr. French allowed me to withdraw from routes and to retake them at higher figures. Now that would put Mr. French in the penitentiary if he did that. This business of temporary service, about which there has been so much talk, is historical. The law of 1836 authorized the Postmaster-General to make contracts for temporary service for six months. It was afterwards increased by Congress to a period of one year, and was then afterwards reduced to six months and increased again to one year; and it has been the custom of the Post-Office Department, since 1836, to let temporary contracts. I understood that the Government attorneys went before the grand jury and argued—not only cross-questioned the witnesses, but argued and labored to secure an indictment.

Q. You understood that?—A. I understood it about as you would understand that there was a convention in Chicago about two weeks ago. It was perfectly notorious in this city.

Q. Did you get that information from any member of the grand jury?—

A. I got it from the attorneys. I got it from my attorney.

Q. Who was your attorney?—A. Mr. Cole.

Q. Do you mean that they argued in behalf of indicting you?—A. Yes, sir; argued in behalf of indicting me—a very reprehensible practice.

Q. What attorney was that?—A. Well, Mr. Ker was with Mr. Boone before the grand jury at the time they sought to have me indicted. I have already stated that Mr. Ker went with Mr. Boone before the grand jury, and Boone was the witness to secure my indictment.

Q. When was this?—A. In the winter of 1882 and 1883. The idea that the grand-jury system can be used in that way, and an attorney for the Government, whose highest motive is a hundred dollars a day, should go there and cross-question and catechise witnesses and then make an argument to get an indictment against a man, is a pretty commentary upon the practice of Judge Wylie's court. It is reprehensible in the last degree. Judge Key can be found; he has an office in this city.

Q. What is his first name?—A. That I do not know.

By Mr. HEMPHILL:

Q. Is he a lawyer?—A. Yes, sir. Mr. French at no time during his incumbency of the chief clerkship at the Post-Office Department, or at any other time before or since, was the recipient of one cent from me as a consideration for awarding me any contract, although that has been repeatedly charged. I hope Mr. French will be called here.

Q. Is there any further statement you desire to make?—A. Well, Mr. Colman states here that Mr. Cole went out of the office and had a conversation with Mr. Cook. That did not take place while I was there. What conversation Mr. Cole may have had with Mr. Cook I do not know, but I had no conversation with Mr. Cole at the time I first saw him in regard to any threatened indictment; and that was not the first business that I transacted with Mr. Cole. The first business that I transacted with him was with regard to that Missouri suit.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Please state when the conversation between you and your attorney, Mr. Key, took place in reference to immunity being offered to you.—A. It was, I think, a year ago last winter.

Q. About what time?—A. I cannot tell you. It is impossible for me to fix dates. Probably along in December or January; it was at the time the grand jury was in session.

Q. The grand jury that was deliberating upon your case?—A. I don't know whether they were deliberating upon my case at that time.

Q. But you state that not only the facts were presented in your case, but that an argument was made?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did this conversation to which you have referred occur contemporaneously with that event?—A. Along about that time. I went with Judge Key to see Mr. Ker. First we went to see Mr. Merrick, and he gave Mr. Key a letter to Mr. Ker, as he said he did not have this case in hand, and Mr. Ker did. Judge Key went to see Mr. Ker, and Mr. Ker was very imperious in his manner and would not talk about it. Afterward Judge Key went up to the court-house, and Mr. Ker told him that if I would pay $5,000 they would drop the case, and Judge Key replied that if he had such a client he would kick him out of his office.

Q. That conversation took place in the court-room?—A. In a little room near the court-room; in the little room that the Government counsel had for consultation.

Q. And that was in the winter of 1882 and '83?—A. Yes, sir; I think so. Now, this information came to me from Judge Key, and I told him to tell Mr. Ker that I would not pay him one cent.

Q. Was it after this alleged conversation that you understood that the grand jury had deliberated upon your case?—A. Yes, sir; it was after that.

Q. And that you had been presented to the grand jury?—A. I know that I was presented to the grand jury. The foreman of that grand jury was Mr. Ledingham, of this city, I think.

Q. Who told you that you had been presented? Did any member of the grand jury tell you?—A. No, sir; I never conversed with a solitary member of the grand jury, first or last.

Q. How did you learn, then, that you had been presented?—A. Well, I learned it through a friend. It was information that was conveyed to me in a way that I know it was true.

Q. How did you know it?—A. Well, he got it from one of the grand jurors. He got it, I think, through the foreman of the grand jury, who stated that there was no evidence. It was not while the case was pending; it was after the case had been dismissed and the grand jury had been dismissed.

Q. What did he say?—A. That they had gone over all the evidence in my case that the Government had presented, and there was nothing on which to found an indictment.

Q. Who was this friend of yours?—A. I cannot tell you that, sir. It would do no good. I will see the party, however, and, if he is willing, I will come and tell you who it was. The publications and threatened indictments that were a matter of talk all the time here through the papers have injured me immensely in my business.

Adjourned.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 24, 1884.

JOHN J. KEY sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Please state your age, residence, and occupation.—Answer. I am sixty-seven years of age. I reside at 3327 P street, West Washington. I am an attorney at law.

Q. State whether you were at any time attorney or counsel for Dr. J. B. Colegrove.—A. I was.

Q. When?—A. About a year ago; perhaps a little over a year. I don't remember the time exactly, but it was within the last two years.

Q. What was the nature of that business, generally?—A. It was a special employment by Dr. Colegrove of me. I was not acquainted with him until he came to my office. I knew of him, but I do not think I personally knew him until he came there, though I did know his wife and family, and knew who he was.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Was he formerly a minister?—A. I do not know, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. He was a mail contractor?—A. He was a mail contractor.

Q. Did he ask your assistance in regard to any of his mail-contract matters?—A. He asked my assistance in connection with the indictment about to be found against him by the grand jury of the District of Columbia in connection with mail contracts.

Q. State whether you had during your employment any conversation with Mr. Ker, the Government counsel at that time.—A. Yes, sir; I had two conversations with Mr. Ker.

Q. Please state what occurred at both those interviews, and when and where they took place.—A. Both interviews took place at the city building where the courts of the district sit. The interviews were in one of the court rooms there. The object of my calling upon Mr. Ker was to inform him of the character of Dr. Colegrove, and to endeavor, by the presentation of facts or statements made by Dr. Colegrove to me, to convince him that it would not be right to indict a man under such circumstances. I suppose I had better state the circumstances which led me to call upon Mr. Ker, so that the committee may understand the matter fully.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Where was this first interview between you and Mr. Ker?—A. It was in one of the court rooms of the city building.

Q. Do you remember which one?—A. Yes; it was in the one in which the criminal court sat at that time.

Q. The room in which the star-route case was being tried?—A. Yes; I think so.

Q. Do you remember the month?—A. No; I do not remember the month. It was at the time that this matter of the indictment of Dr. Colegrove was before the grand jury.

Q. The grand jury was then in session?—A. The grand jury was in session.

Q. Do you know what prosecuting attorney had the jury in charge?—A. I understood that Mr. Ker had, but I do not know.

Q. Do you know how many grand juries he did have in charge?—A. I do not.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. It is a fact that he had but one.

The WITNESS. Well, I don't know anything about that.

Q. Did you approach Mr. Ker?—A. I did.

Q. What did you say to him?—A. Now, if the committee will permit me, I will explain why I approached Mr. Ker. I want to explain that because it was not directly in the line of the practice of the business of an attorney defending his client. Dr. Colegrove came to my office, and then, for the first time, I was informed that an indictment was about to be found against him, or that he feared that an indictment would be found against him by the grand jury. The charge, he informed me, was of participation in a conspiracy alleged to have been entered into between him and other parties to defraud the Government in a mail contract. He went on and made a statement to me of all the circumstances, which I will not detain the committee by detailing fully now, but from his statement I came to the conclusion that he was not guilty—not only that he had not been guilty of taking any advantage of the Government, but that he was not guilty of any of the charges made against him. He asked me if I knew Mr. Merrick; I told him I did; he said, "I wish you would go and see Mr. Merrick and tell him about this." I agreed to do so. One of the reasons why I did it was this: Dr. Colegrove represented to me that he had a large number of mail contracts, and that his mail-routes had been sublet to a vast number of persons; that he had had for many years an extensive business in the West, and was known to a great number of persons there and throughout the country; that if this indictment was found against him, although he would be entirely innocent, yet it would do him great damage, and would perpetrate a great wrong upon him; that it would affect his relations with his subcontractors, who would become timid and fearful about getting their pay; that the fact that he was indicted would go forth to the world, and that, although he would ultimately be found innocent, still the stain would rest upon him to a very great extent. He said also that his wife was in great distress of mind; that she had a very influential connection in Kentucky (which I knew to be the fact, because many of the persons referred to were known to me), and that she was in a dreadful condition of mind and felt that they would be eternally disgraced if this indictment should be found. He said to me, "If you can see Mr. Merrick and tell him these circumstances, perhaps it may stop this matter." I went to Mr. Merrick, whom I knew very well, and after stating to him the facts which I have just stated to you he said, "I can do nothing in this matter myself, but you go to Mr. Ker and tell him exactly what you have told me." I said, "I do not know Mr. Ker. I never have spoken to him. In fact I don't know whether I would know him if I should meet him on the street." "Well," said Mr. Merrick, "I will give you a letter to him;" and he sat down and gave me a letter to Mr. Ker, saying, I believe, in substance, that any statement I might make Mr. Ker might rely on, and so on—the usual letter of introduction; also stating the business on which I wished to see Mr. Ker. I went and handed the letter to Mr. Ker. I found some difficulty in making him hear me, but I stated the case to him. I do not know that I stated it quite as fully as I have stated it here, but I gave him a general outline of the case. He was very reticent; he said nothing until I got through. Finally he said substantially this: "I don't believe these men are innocent." Those were the first words he uttered. I recollect that distinctly. Then he said, "I have proof that they are guilty." I said to him, "Mr. Ker, if your proof rests upon the charge or the statement, or the evidence of this man Boone, I can tell you not only that he is under indictment, but I have seen letters to Dr. Colegrove attempting to blackmail him, and it is simply a matter of spite on the part of Mr. Boone. His character I know only from the public papers and from the statements I have heard in regard to him, but I judge, from all I hear about him, that no jury would believe him under oath, and unless you have evidence outside of Boone and one other witness, whose name I do not recollect at this moment, it would be wrong to indict a man who is in good standing, and who would be greatly injured and disgraced, upon the oath of such a man as Boone and others who, I understand, are joined with him in this conspiracy against Dr. Colegrove." Mr. Ker listened to what I said, and then he said this: "Let Colegrove make this thing good to the Government—that is, the loss the Government has suffered by this conspiracy." I said, "I understand that you require that Dr. Colegrove shall arrange to pay any amount which the Government may claim that they have been deprived of by his action; I will tell him what you say." Just at that moment Mr. Ker got up and said, "That is all I will do," or something to that effect, and the interview terminated.

By Mr. KER :

Q. Was that in the room or in the entry?—A. I do not recollect. There was a portion of the interview in the entry and a portion in the court-room—not exactly in the entry, I think, but in the small ante room right adjoining. I returned to my office and told Dr. Colgrove what had been said as I understood it. He had been laboring under very great excitement. He said, "This is outrageous. I did the Government a service. I never had a more fair contract in my life, and no one could be fairer. I have not in any way, shape, or form connived or conspired to defraud the Government of one dollar." He said further, "This is going to ruin me. It will ruin me financially. I have many contracts out, and if I am indicted it will be utter destruction. I don't know what to do. What do you advise me to do? I would rather pay what I don't owe, taking so much out of my pocket, if I could stop this matter and prevent this great injury. Then, too, my wife has not slept for nights." Said I, "You want my advice as to what you shall do?" "Yes," said he, "just tell me what to do." "Well," said I, "don't you do that. It would be taken as a confession of guilt, and if you are an innocent man you had a thousand times better stand your trial than in any way recognize the theory that you have joined in a conspiracy to defraud the Government. But, said I, "it is too important a matter for you, Dr. Colegrove, to decide at once, and you had better consult your wife and see what she says." He said, "I will do so." Next morning he came to my office and said that he had talked the matter over with his wife and had told her what I had said, and that she agreed with me that it would be better for him to stand a trial and show himself innocent than to admit in any form or manner that he had been guilty of what was charged against him. I said then, "Dr. Colegrove, I will go and tell Mr. Ker, and let it go on." Then the second interview took place with Mr. Ker. That was, I suppose, about the same place and in the same manner.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. How long after the first interview was it?—A. It was either the first or the second day after the first interview—immediately after. I told Mr. Ker about it. He said, "You don't understand me. I don't want that. That is not it, sir. If this man will give me information by which I can convict and bring conviction to other parties, I will not continue this prosecution against him." Well, as a matter of course, I knew whom he meant. I don't know whether Mr. Ker called the name of the party or not—that I cannot say positively; but I knew to whom he referred, and I replied as if he had called the name. Said I, "Dr. Colegrove says that he is innocent of any wrong in this matter; that Mr. French is innocent also, and that there has been no combination between them. If he were to tell me now that he would turn informer I would kick him out of my office." There the interview ended, and that is all there is in the story.

Q. Then the whole upshot of the matter is simply this: In the first interview Mr. Ker insisted that Dr. Colegrove was guilty of wronging the Government?—A. That he was guilty of participation in a conspiracy. As I understand it, the charge was conspiracy between this man Boone, Dr. Colegrove, and Mr. French, the chief clerk. I do not know whether other parties were connected with it or not, but the charge was that those three parties had conspired together for the purpose of obtaining a contract from the Government in a fraudulent way and contrary to law.

Q. But you understood Mr. Ker to say at that time that before Colegrove should have immunity he must make the Government good?—A. I understood him to say that before Mr. Colegrove could have immunity he must make the Government good. In the second interview Mr. Ker said that that was not it.

Q. That you had misapprehended him?—A. No. He turned around and said, in a very quick, short tone, "That is not it, sir. If he will give me the information by which I can bring conviction to this man, then I will do what you want." That is the substance of the remark.

Q. You did not understand from what Mr. Ker said to you that he suggested any corrupt action?—A. None whatever.

Q. If Mr. Colegrove derived such a notion from any conversation you had with him, he was laboring under a misapprehension?—A. Yes, sir; a misapprehension. Mr. Colegrove simply recollected that he was asked to make good the amount which the Government had lost. That was what I intended to convey to him, what I did tell him; and he declined to do it for the reasons I have already stated.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Mr. Colegrove was in "a state of mind" just at that time?—A. Yes, sir; you never saw any one suffering mentally more than he was. He looked as if he hadn't slept for nights. Now, gentlemen, I have only a word more to say, and that is this: I have heard Dr. Colegrove state all these matters half a dozen times. I have watched his statements very closely, and I have found just enough variations in them to show that he was telling the truth all the time. I do not believe that Dr. Colegrove is guilty of what has been charged at all.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE :

Q. In these two interviews that you had with Mr. Ker, a portion of them being in the room where the court was held and the remainder in the ante-room, I suppose you talked soto voce to a certain extent, did you not?—A. Yes, sir. There is a possibility and there is a probability that Mr. Ker only heard part of what I said, but he understood the general tenor of it, and the object I was there for.

WASHINGTON, June 24, 1884.

JAMES B. COLEGROVE recalled and further examined.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE :

Question. You testified on Saturday of last week before the committee?—Answer. Yes, sir.

Q. You then made a statement of what you understood to have been a communication from Mr. Key, your counsel?—A. I did.

Q. You have talked with your counsel since upon that subject?—A. I have.

Q. Have you learned from the conversation which you have had with Mr. Key since then that you were laboring under a misapprehension as to the purport of the communication he had made to you at the time you gave evidence about it?—A. I think I was, sir. But right here let me say the language which I used in giving my testimony was this, that Mr. Key told me that Mr. Ker had stated to him that for the payment of $5,000 the matter would be dropped. Those are the words that I used last Saturday.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Well, you did not stop to inquire whether that money was for the Government or for the counsel?—A. No, sir ; I did not. The proposition coming at that time to me was simply horrible ; it was atrocious.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE :

Q. (Interposing.) You were laboring under the idea that it was going to the counsel?—A. Yes, sir. I have since ascertained from Mr. Key, who told me on Saturday night, that I had misunderstood him, and I came to the chairman of this committee yesterday of my own accord and told him that I owed Mr. Ker no grudge, no spite, no malice, and that I did not want to do him or any other any harm. I have suffered wrong continuously for three years. I have been outraged most shamefully, and even since my testimony was given here on Saturday I have suffered by misrepresentations in the press. I was persecuted here steadily for three years, followed and hunted down with the most injurious and slanderous misrepresentations.

Q. That has grown out of your business, I suppose?—A. It has grown out of the evil that is in men's hearts.

Q. It grew out of the fact that you were an extensive contractor?—A. Yes. I want to say here now that I did not recognize Mr. Ker's authority to make any demand upon me whatever. Mr. Ker knew and knows now that there is an Auditor in the Department, and that if I owe the Government it is the Auditor's business to collect the money.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Do you now, as an honest man, insist that Mr. Ker did make any demand upon you in any form?—A. No, sir; I am only explaining to the committee the influences that governed me at the time, and how it was that the impression came to me that Mr. Ker made a demand on me for $5,000, when I did not owe the Government one cent.

Q. You say, however, that that impression has been removed?—A. I say now that Mr. Key explains it by saying that Mr. Ker understood that I had had a corrupt contract with the Government, and said that by the payment of $5,000 I could liquidate the damages which the Government claimed to have sustained from me. But I say, in connection with that, that Mr. Ker, acting as an attorney in the prosecution of the star-route cases, had no authority whatever to make any demand upon me for anything; that the Auditor, who has under him a small regiment of clerks, men of experience, was the proper man to supervise my accounts, and if there was found to be a cent due the Government, those officers of the Department would find it out. It was their business to see to all this, and hence, in my judgment, and with the feelings that I had upon that occasion, it seemed to me to be a very great outrage indeed that any demand whatever should be made upon me by the counsel.

Q. You knew very well at that time that a large number of men had been indicted for frauds upon the Government in various conspiracies in connection with mail contracts?—A. Certainly. I stated all this to the committee last Saturday.

Q. And you knew pretty well that your contracts were mixed up with those of that class of people?—A. I knew that my name was mixed up in the business by parties who were making accusations, but, as I have already stated here, I had no connection with anybody else, and never engaged in any wrong or conspiracy of any kind or character.

Q. You have never had any dealings with Mr. French?—A. I never had any corrupt dealing with Mr. French in my life.

Q. Have you had any business dealings with him?—A. Well, I have had business in connection with these mail contracts.

Q. In connection with those contracts?—A. No, sir; no business dealings except with him as an officer of the Government, just the same as I have now with Mr. Lyman—nothing different.

Q. Mr. French never received pay on any of your routes?—A. I am very glad you have brought that up, and as you asked me that question I want to say here, once for all, that John L. French never received from me a single nickel, not the value of one farthing, in any way, in connection with any mail contracts that he ever awarded to me.

Q. Directly nor indirectly?—A. Neither directly nor indirectly. And, furthermore, I believe Mr. French to be as pure a man as the sun shines upon in all its course.

Q. You were taking exception to the presentation of your name to the grand jury, and you were finding fault with the prosecuting officer because he had not refused to listen to the witnesses against you. Don't you think that was going a pretty good way?—A. I went to this man Ker—

Q. (Interposing.) You did not; you sent somebody else.—A. No; Judge Key and I went together. I stated here on Saturday that Mr. Merrick had given Judge Key a letter of introduction to this gentleman, and that Judge Key complained to me of the treatment which he received from Mr. Ker in that connection.

Q. That Mr. Ker was not courteous?—A. Yes, sir; that he was discourteous.

Q. That he would not listen to your counsel's statement?—A. That he would not listen to him; that he treated him discourteously.

Mr. KER. The counsel believed his client innocent, and I did not. I suppose that was the trouble.

The WITNESS. I don't know what the trouble was. I know this, that I have never had any corrupt dealing with this Government, and that my hands are as clean as yours [addressing Mr. Ker] or as the hands of any other man.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Would you not naturally suppose, if you were entirely free from blame or criticism, that, although there was an effort to present your name to the grand jury, it would be an absolute failure?—A. Well, I did believe it would be a failure, but I didn't know that, for I could not tell that fact in advance.

Q. You had no reason to suppose that any of the prosecuting officers had any enmity against you?—A. I didn't know that either.

Q. You were a stranger to Mr. Ker?—A. Yes; and to all of those gentlemen.

Q. And you had no reason to suppose that Mr. Ker or any of them entertained any enmity against you?—A. I had no reason to suppose that they did. They had no reason for any such feeling.

Q. Had you procured assistance from anybody else than Judge Key in this matter previous to that?—A. Yes, sir; I had. I explained that fully on Saturday.

Q. You had Mr. Colman?—A. I had Mr. Colman and Mr. Cole.

Q. Did Mr. Colman volunteer to act?—A. He did. He came to my house. I had known him in Missouri, as I explained last Saturday.

Q. How long was it after he came to your house before you saw Mr. Key?—A. He came to my house probably a year and a half before that.

Q. You had retained Mr. Cole?—A. I had retained Mr. Cole.

Q. In the same business?—A. Now, in this connection, let me say that a young gentleman named Harding came to me and told me that Judge Key was a friend of Mr. Merrick, and advised me to see Mr. Key, and I went, upon the suggestion of this young man, to see Mr. Key, thinking that I could bring the matter directly before these Government attorneys. I had such confidence all the time in my integrity that I wanted to go direct to the Government attorneys with my case; I wanted to stop this blasting of my name before the entire country. I had contracts all over the country, and this matter injured me very materially.

Q. You did not expect to spread the facts before the Government counsel, but only that they should hear the statement of your legal adviser and rely upon that?—A. No, sir; not that at all. I wanted to take all the facts and the evidence and lay it before those men and let them see that I was innocent.

Mr. KER. Mr. Van Alstyne, if I remember right, the price for which this route would have been let to Callan, the lowest bidder, was $10,000, and the price that Mr. Colegrove got it at was $15,000, and the difference between those two prices would, of course, be $5,000.

The WITNESS (ironically). That is a good suggestion.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. How was that?—A. You will hear all about that contract now; and in this connection, Mr. Chairman, I hope you will call Mr. French.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE (to Mr. Ker). What route was that?

Mr. KER. I cannot remember.

The WITNESS. I know what route it was. It was the route from Gainesville to Tampa, Fla. Mr. Boone, through another party, had failed on the route.

Q. That route was to let; how many bidders were there?—A. I can't tell you how many; there were probably eight or ten.

Q. And you were one of them?—A. No, sir; I didn't bid on it at all originally. Mr. Boone came to me, in the Department, and said, "This route has failed; a cyclone has gone over the peninsula of Florida and destroyed all the roads, and I want you all to keep your hands off"—

Q. (Interposing.) What price did he have the route for?—A. He had it at a considerably less price, probably about $10,000. I give that as a guess; I have no accurate recollection of the amount of the original pay. Mr. Boone comes to me, in the Department, and says, "Here, this route has failed, and I want you all to keep your hands off, and I am going to have it put up to $40,000 a year." I said, "How are you going to do it?" Said he, "There will be no other bidders on it." Mr. French came to me and said, "Dr. Colegrove, there is a proposition here by which the Government is to be wronged, and I want you to put a bid on that service." He also went to Mr. A. H. Brown on the same business.

Q. Who is he?—A. A contractor here in Washington. Others were appealed to in the same way, and we all put in bids, and amongst the rest was a bid by a Mr. Callan, which proved to be a straw bid.

Q. Was he a contractor too?—A. No, sir; he is a notary public in this city. That was a straw bid, and there was no intention to carry it out, and I charged Boone with having put in a straw bid there.

Q. What was the amount of Callan's bid?—A. It was a little under mine.

Q. Was it $12,000?—A. It may have been a thousand dollars under my bid. I don't remember the amount exactly. Now, I charged this home upon Boone.

Q. (Interposing.) What was your bid?—A. Fourteen thousand six hundred dollars about; it may have been fourteen thousand and between $600 and $700. When I charged Boone with putting in this straw bid he went in and took out this Callan bid, and Callan came in and told Mr. French, in my presence, that he was very sorry about it, and said that if Mr. French would forgive him he would never do such a thing again in the world. Then Mr. French went to Postmaster-General Key and told him the facts, and they decided to award the route to me. Those are the facts in that case.

Q. What do you mean by a straw bid?—A. A bid that is put in without any intention to execute it or to execute the contract on it, to carry it out.

Q. What was the service on that route really worth?—A. All I got for it and more.

Q. You sublet it?—A. Yes.

Q. For what amount?—A. For just $1,000 less than I got it for.

Q. You sublet it for $13,600?—A. Yes.

Q. You made $1,000 on it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you have reason to think that Callan's bid was a straw bid, and that he did not intend to carry it out?—A. Yes, sir. He stated that fact to Mr. French in my presence.

Q. Boone, you say, wanted you to keep your hands off?—A. Yes, sir; he wanted us all to do so.

Q. And you, as one of the contractors, would not stand to that arrangement?—A. No, sir.

Q. You made your own bid?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And your bid was made in good faith, and you made $1,000 on it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And when you told this other man Boone that he was acting corruptly, he got down on his knees and begged for mercy?—A. No; that was Callan. I charged this thing upon Boone, and he went in and withdrew Callan's bid, showing that he had put in two bids—his own and another.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did not Callan give security on his bid?—A. No, sir.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. How came it to be considered, then?—A. Because it was a failed-up route, and the law did not require security.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. The law did not require you to give security?—A. No, sir.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Now, don't you think that that whole transaction as you state it, unexplained, squinted towards a conspiracy?—A. Well, that is the reason I wanted to go to this man (Mr. Ker) and tell him the facts, but I could not get to him. He was away above me—as inaccessible as the Autocrat of all the Russias.

Q. How long have you been a contractor?—A. Twelve or fifteen years.

Q. Have you followed that business exclusively?—A. Yes.

Q. Were you originally a minister?—A. Never.

Q. You are now a mail contractor?—A. Yes, sir. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, I have carried the mails three million miles, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, I carried the mails two and a half million miles; counting the whole amount of travel, steamboat, railway, and all.

Q. How many routes have you got?—A. Nearly 500.

Q. At the present time?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you work them yourself?—A. Some of them. I sublet some.

Q. What proportion do you work?—A. Very few.

Q. As a rule you sublet?—A. I sublet, of course; and my service I think has been carried with as little trouble to the Government as any, or with less trouble than that of any other contractor or set of contractors.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How much do your receipts from the Government aggregate?—A. My gross pay I should say is about $160,000.

Q. On all the routes?—A. Yes, sir; I should say so. I don't know the amount exactly, but I guess it is about that.

Q. What are your earnings on the sublettings?—A. On several routes I am losing heavily.

Q. Not on the subletting?—A. Yes, on the subletting. There is one route in Arizona on which I lose $1,000 a year, and one in Kansas on which I lose $500 a year—

Q. (Interposing.) Those routes you work yourself?—A. No, sir; I could not stock them. I have not got means enough to stock them.

Then, on those routes on which you lose, you pay a man a premium for taking them off your hands?—A. I make a contract with a man to do the service for so much money, and when pay day comes he is paid.

Q. Where you sublet, you turn over the contract?—A. No, I do not turn over the contract. The Government does not release me. I am held on my contract.

Q. Just explain this subletting.—A. I will. I go out into a town, either myself or my agent, and I find a man there who is out of business and who has got some stock and is hard up and looking for something to do, and I make the best bargain I can with him.

Q. During the last five years have you made a contract with any man for mail service where you have paid him more than you have received from the Government?—A. Unfortunately a great many. I pay Emerson at Dodge City $500 more per annum than I get for the service, and on the route from Navajo Springs to Springfield, Ariz., I get $5,500 a year, and I pay $6,000 and odd. That is the situation so far as that is concerned.

There is one point more that I want to state here that incensed me, and I think Mr. Ker will admit that I had a right to be incensed at it. That is, his proposition to Judge Key that if I should give them some points on Mr. French, that then my matter should be dropped—even the whole $5,000 that they had demanded.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Oh, no; that was not it.

The WITNESS. That was the way I got it.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Don't you know that it was your duty as a good citizen, if you possessed any knowledge of criminal acts on the part of any officer of this Government, to communicate it?—A. It was my duty, and I should most certainly do so.

Q. Then all there is about this thing is, that you were surprised that Mr. Ker should suppose that you possessed knowledge of corrupt acts to which you were supposed to be a party?—A. No, sir; pardon me for correcting you, but that is not it. The case is this, that after a demand for a payment from me of $5,000 which I was supposed to owe the Government, there should be a proposition to waive that, provided I would give the Government some points on Mr. French.

Q. You understood that to be the proposition?—A. Yes, sir; and I so understand it now.

Q. Didn't you hear Mr. Key say that when he made his second statement to Mr. Ker, Mr. Ker said, "That is not what I mean," or "That is not it"?—A. Well, but I want to say——

Q. (Interrupting.) That if you were one of the gang, you would not disclose?—A. No, sir. Excuse me; I don't want any such reflections as that cast upon me. I repudiate that most emphatically.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. The repudiation is all right. If you were one of the gang——

The WITNESS (interrupting). I have not said so. I say this, that I do not know, and never have known, of one solitary thing against John L. French, and I believe him to be as pure as the sun itself; and you can't find a man, from Mr. Lyman clear down to the bootblacks in the Post-Office Department, that will not admit that he is as pure as the sunlight.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. That is a matter that I know nothing of.

The WITNESS. Of course not. I stated yesterday to Mr. Springer voluntarily and of my own accord, that at the second interview which Judge Key had with Mr. Ker, Mr. Ker proposed to have me come there and divulge something against Mr. French, as the condition upon which this whole business against me should be swept away.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. And you were very indignant at that.

The WITNESS. I was, sir.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Why didn't you say to Mr. Ker, "I could not if I would; I don't know anything."—A. I couldn't reach Mr. Ker; he was as high as the sun; he couldn't be reached.

Q. That was because he thought you were going to stick to your friends.—A. I don't know what the reason was. Mr. Key was very much annoyed. I think the reason of Mr. Ker's conduct was that he got up cross that morning; that is my opinion about it. I have not directly or indirectly reflected upon anybody, but I have been a target for years for the most malicious and unfounded charges. All my conduct has been open and subject to examination. Here is this contract division, at the head of which is Mr. Lyman, and which was presided over at the time these matters were up by Mr. French, who was acting as second assistant. Under the head of that division is a vast retinue of clerks. Then, there is the inspection division, also with a large retinue of employés to inspect all this service. Then, after that comes the auditor to look after these matters.

Q. Yes, but the authorities outside of the Post-Office Department were finding more fault at that time with the men in charge of the service than with the people outside who trafficked with them.—A. Then, why on earth did they assail me? Can you tell me why it is that newspapers will go on and publish charge after charge against a man without the slightest foundation in fact?

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. I don't know anything about that.

The WITNESS. Well, it touches me in a point where I have suffered. I have been greatly wronged, and have been a great sufferer, both in my business and in my character.

Adjourned.

WASHINGTON, June 25, 1884.

WILLIAM A. COOK, again appeared before the committee and testified as follows:

The chairman called on Mr. Cook and stated it would be necessary for him to be brief.

The WITNESS. Mr. Chairman, I addressed to this committee, some time since, a letter, which, for the sake of brevity, I will now read:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 7, 1884.

GENTLEMEN: At the conclusion of my testimony in March last, I requested that I might be recalled before your committee in the event that any essential part of my statements should be assailed by any other witnesses.

This has been done chiefly by expressions of "belief," and narratives of alleged declarations of dead men, blended with the pretended utterances of a few living.

These, however, involve my professional and official character and conduct, in connection with "the star-route cases," and it is not proper that the various assertions allowed to be made from "the witness stand" should go uncontradicted or unexplained. Neither the committee nor the public shall be allowed to be misled or deceived.

Besides, I have additional papers, and, I may add, facts, which, with a view to a fair and impartial investigation and correct conclusions, should be laid before the committee.

I trust that I have too much respect for the committee to appear before it to indulge in mere vituperation, or to even attempt to occupy its time with impertinent and irrelevant matter.

My numerous engagements require all my time; but I will arrange my business so as to be able to appear before the committee any day next week.

Very respectfully,

WILLIAM A. COOK,
Office, 402 6th street, n. w.
P. O. Lock Box 71.

To the Committee of the House of Representatives on Expenditures of the Department of Justice.

I presume that letter was in some way overlooked.

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir; I notified your messenger that I would inform you when you could be heard, and this is the first opportunity that we have had to give you a hearing.

The WITNESS. Very well. Now, in deference to your statement, Mr. Chairman, as to the limited time of the committee, I presume that I had better confine what I have to say to matters which may be regarded as personal, and omit for the present the additional facts that I have in reference to the case, as they would extend the investigation manifestly beyond the time that is under your control at present. Hereafter, I presume, I can present those facts in some form to the committee.

Now in the first place, Mr. Bliss saw fit to state to this committee that in my office on a certain occasion I referred to Mr. Kellogg and said, in substance, that he was a client of mine and should be protected. No such statement was ever made to Mr. Bliss in my office or any where else by me. It is a studied, deliberate falsehood, a pure invention. Mr. Kellogg was not then a client of mine. His case in the Spofford-Kellogg contest in the Senate was conducted on his side by Messrs. Wilson and Shellabarger. The statement attributed to me by Mr. Bliss could not have been made, and never was made. At that time there had been nothing brought to my attention in relation to Mr. Kellogg in connection with the star-route cases, nor was I aware that any accusation existed against him, and I had strong reason to believe otherwise.

With regard to the papers that have been mentioned as in my possession, in order that I may be brief, I will refer to the letter I addressed to the Attorney-General and annex it to my testimony. In reference to those papers Mr. Bliss said, in a letter which I have in my possession, that they were of no consequence to anybody. In fact, they were mere general abstracts of no value, except, perhaps, to some extent, to an attorney in the preparation of his case. It was strongly intimated that the defendants obtained papers from me. They never obtained, directly or indirectly, any paper from me. If they obtained any papers improperly, those papers were probably obtained through the action of Mr. Bliss and Mr. Woodward, by whom the safes were locked up, and charge taken of the papers, so that no one else could have any access to the papers, or could allow a single one of them to go out of the Post-Office Department. Mrs. Gregg never copied any of the papers for me.

I perhaps may pass, with this general statement, from Mr. Bliss to Mr. Woodward. There is not one statement made by Mr. Bliss in any way reflecting upon me that has the slightest foundation in fact. The explanation of Mr. Bliss's conduct is unquestionably this: That after the death of President Garfield, and after he ascertained that he could have full control of the star-route cases, he desired to exclude from it every one over whom he could not have control, so that they might be conducted according to his own conceptions and purposes, and in doing that he took in with him one man—Mr. Woodward. It is said by Mr. Bliss that I desired the appointment of district attorney. That is an absolute falsehood. His statements to me were that President Arthur had selected a friend of his for the position, and in a little while would appoint him. I never desired the position nor intimated to him that I did. It is equally false that I furnished him the name of Mr. Cole, my partner, as a candidate. I furnished him one name only, and that was the name of Mr. A. C. Bradley; no one else. Mr. Woodward has said, among other things, that one Lilley stated that I received, in connection with what are called the Brott and Lilley indictments, $250. The statement is placed by Mr. Woodward in the mouth of a dead man. Its value the committee can determine. It has no foundation whatever in fact. I never received any money in that matter. Mr. Brott disappeared, it was supposed at the time, with the co-operation of Mr. Woodward; whether correctly or not I do not know. It is certain he opposed the finding of the indictment and subpoenaing of witnesses. When I took the case up before the United States commissioner, he was not present. It was the purpose then to depend in part upon Brott to secure the indictment against Lilley. Failing to have him present, or to secure his attendance, I at once arranged to secure indictments against both Brott and Lilley. They were found, but have not been tried up to this time. It has been said that those indictments depended on the testimony of Brott. It is not true. When I left the Department of Justice, letters which had passed between Brott and Lilley, containing evidence of guilt, were in possession of the Post-Office Department, and copies of those I can procure.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE :

Q. Of letters of both parties?—A. The correspondence between Brott and Lilley clearly implied that if the one was guilty the other was also, and I have never had any doubt of the ability of the Government to convict one or both those parties, independent of the testimony of Brott. We are accustomed to speak kindly of the dead, but there are, perhaps, occasions which require us to speak otherwise. There was no man capable of doing improper acts more freely than Mr. Lilley. He became the frequent associate of Mr. Woodward, in the office where we had our papers; so much so that before I resigned, whenever I approached that office to obtain information, or to procure papers, Mr. Lilley was present as an obstacle, and I could make no inquiries, nor procure any information. Mr. Woodward was accustomed to visit at his house, and the two were much together. This was the Lilley that the testimony shows was concerned in procuring contracts and other matters in the Sixth Auditor's Office—not the indicted Lilley; but his father.

Q. What business had he ostensibly at the office, so far as you could learn?—A. None whatever. The rule established by Mr. Gibson and myself was that no one should be admitted into that office except employés or officers of the Government.

Q. Then Lilley was there as a privileged character?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. By reason of the indulgence of some one?—A. By reason of the indulgence of some one.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. He was an attorney for the contractors?—A. Yes, sir; a sort of general attorney, not merely in settling up their accounts, but in procuring contracts—using influence for that purpose. I have now authority to say to you what I had not authority to say before, that at least part of the papers obtained by the defendants, or the mode of procuring them, was through parties in the Post-Office Department; that papers were procured and were conveyed in that way to persons who were not entitled to have them, for some purpose, proper or improper.

Q. You say you have authority to say that?—A. I have the authority.

Q. From whom?—A. Col. William P. Wood.

Q. What authority has he?—A. This authority, as I understood him, that he was acquainted with an employé, or with one or more employés of the Post-Office Department who could obtain papers from that Department and through whom they were obtained by him, not corruptly but as a demonstration that there was leakage in the Department. You may never know how the papers got out, and possibly never will fully, but that is a fact which I have authority to state to you now. The name of the gentleman who procured them, as given to me, was Green.

Q. Who was he?—A. A clerk in the Post-Office Department.

Q. What is his first name?—A. I do not know.

Q. The clerk that leaked?—A. So I am informed; a clerk in the Post-Office Department through whom papers could be obtained.

Q. Who do you say is your authority for saying that?—A. Col. William P. Wood.

Q. He is your authority for saying that Green furnished this information?—A. Not that he furnished it, but that he could procure papers.

Q. But did he procure them and furnish them to the defendants?—A. Mr. Wood can inform you of that.

Q. But you are making the statement now.—A. I have stated generally that papers could be obtained in that way out of the Post Office Department, and that I have understood they were so obtained; but beyond that I have no knowledge.

Q. You got that information entirely from Mr. Wood?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. It is hearsay?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What means had he of knowing? Was he the agent of the defendants?—A. I don't know that he was.

Q. Do you know that he was employed by the defendants?—A. I don't know that he was; but I have reason to believe that at one time he was in the employment of the star-route defendants.

Q. For the purpose of getting information for their benefit?—A. I don't know how far he was employed for that purpose. I have given you, perhaps, enough.

Q. What is his business?—A. He is a general detective.

Q. A private detective?—A. Yes. He was formerly connected with the United States Government. I simply furnish you what comes to me.

Q. Then if he was employed by the star-route defendants it was in the character of a detective?—A. I presume so—"advisory counsel," as he styles himself.

Q. Is he a lawyer?—A. No, sir; but he is shrewd, doubtless, and able.

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed with your statement.

The WITNESS. Now, it has been said here that at one time the President of the United States, Mr. Garfield, sent for Mr. Woodward to inquire why I had been appointed. You will pardon me for saying that it seems quite remarkable, when my appointment came through the Attorney-General, that Mr. Woodward should have been sent for by the President in relation to it. It may have been so, but it seems very remarkable. But, however that may be, it is unquestionably true that shortly after I obtained my appointment a vigorous effort was made to have it withdrawn. That effort was made in the interest of star-route defendants and, perhaps, to some extent, in the interest of one or two others. It was said that one of the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia called upon the President and represented that I was one of the most disreputable members of the bar. The best answer I can make to that is to say that if the time comes when you can do it, I should be pleased if you would subpoena each of the members of the judiciary of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and, if necessary, several of the members of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Our time is getting very short, you know.

The WITNESS. I am aware of that fact. I merely say that you can do that or not as you may determine. I am willing that they shall speak. It may be that some one of the judges did approach the President in the interest of parties who desired it to be done. I was informed by some correspondent whose name I cannot recall that there had been a visit made to the President by one of the judges in relation to that matter. I immediately wrote the President a letter in which I stated to him that I understood that there were vigorous efforts making to displace me, that my appointment had been obtained unsolicited, and that it was a matter of no importance to me whether I retained it or not; also that——

Q. (Interposing.) Have you that letter or that correspondence?—A. I have looked for that correspondence but have not found it. I can, however, give you the substance of it. I also said to the President that from childhood up I had endeavored to live a correct life, and that no human being could place his hand upon a dishonest or a disreputable act in my life, professional or otherwise; that I might be subjected to ordinary abuse and censure arising out of vigorous action in life, and success in my profession, and strong political action, but that beyond that no one could go. I say so to-day.

If I have not referred to all that was testified to relating to me by Mr. Bliss and Mr. Woodward, allow me to say, in a method that may not be misunderstood, that any statement which they have made differing from this and intended to reflect upon my conduct while connected with the star-route cases cannot be otherwise than studied malignant invention and perjury. I can make it no stronger.

Now, let me conclude. If President Garfield had lived, and those star-route cases had been conducted according to the original plan which received his sanction, I have no manner of doubt that there would have been some convictions. When he fell, and Mr. Arthur was made President, the first effort of Mr. Bliss was to obtain control of the cases. I had no acquaintance with President Arthur. Repeatedly did I seek an interview with him through Mr. Bliss, and request that I might be allowed to go with him and present the cases to some extent in outline to President Arthur, as I had done to President Garfield. I never was able to obtain an interview in reference to the cases with President Arthur, apparently because of Mr. Bliss's reluctance that any one should appear before the President other than himself. The next arrangement was the exclusion of every one connected with the case, except Mr. Woodward. The failure of the grand jury to find other indictments was attributable to the mode in which the case was presented.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. In what respect was President Garfield's plan in regard to the prosecution of those cases changed by the administration of President Arthur?—A. In this: In the plan of President Garfield there was to be a thorough and full investigation of every case, after submission of it to him and the Attorney-General, and on that plan no case was to be neglected or omitted; every case was to be thoroughly prepared before it was presented to a grand jury. And as each case was to be submitted to the President and Attorney-General, there could be no misrepresentation of it before the grand jury or keeping back facts. The cases of Salisbury & Co. and others, as presented to the grand jury, were confessedly not prepared in that mode or in a manner to procure indictments. That was one of the leading differences in the two plans. There were others. It is true that Mr. Bliss opposed my going before the grand jury, and subsequently went himself, and procured others to go, and placed the statement of the cases, according to his plan, largely in the hands of a mere layman, Mr. Woodward, who, after all, had not the capacity or the power to properly present a case. This fact in part accounts for failures.

The CHAIRMAN. He never was charged with that duty I believe, except as a witness?

The WITNESS. Yes, sir; he was charged with that duty to this extent—not simply as a witness but also to make statements and explanations of papers before the grand jury. He appeared there in more than the capacity of a mere witness. It was only in this form he could appear; for he had no information or knowledge which could render him a competent witness. Now, I think that, by the kindness of the committee, unless you wish to ask me some questions, I have stated all that I wish to state at present.

The CHAIRMAN. I think you have overlooked one more recent matter relating to you that has appeared in testimony here.

The WITNESS. Oh, yes. I am much obliged to you for reminding me of it. So far as that matter is concerned it relates chiefly to my partner, Mr. Cole. Mr. Colman never spoke to me in relation to the case of Dr. Colegrove. I had no acquaintance with Dr. Colegrove whatever, and, during the time that Mr. Colman fixed for that interview between Mr. Cole and myself (of which of course he could have no personal knowledge), I was, I presume, at Elberon. From the time that the President was struck down I was chiefly in New York and at Elberon, so that it would have been physically impossible for such an interview to have occurred at that time. I never received any money from Mr. Cole in connection with the Colegrove case or any other of those cases. I never heard of any. The whole statement, so far as I am concerned, is without any foundation in fact.

Q. The statement only related to you in this, that you were Mr. Cole's partner, which, of course, is true?—A. His partner in civil cases only.

Q. Mr. Colman says that, after talking with Mr. Cole and explaining what he wanted, Mr. Cole went into the room and conferred with you, but what was said there he did not claim to know.—A. Well, if Mr. Cole came into my room as testified to by Mr. Colman, then he did not speak to me on that subject at all. We have some four rooms on one floor, and three or four on another, and Mr. Cole may have come in to obtain a book, as part of the library is in a room that I generally occupy. The statement as it relates to me is entirely untrue, and it may be that, so far as I am concerned, it was inspired by some ill-feeling toward me, for Mr. Colman at one time desired to place a desk and did place a desk in one of the rooms of my office, and—

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). I think that is immaterial.

The WITNESS. Very well; I have stated the facts.

By Mr. MILLIKEN :

Q. Don't you think that Mr. Woodward is one of those industrious, digging men that we sometimes meet, and really a very good man for the details which he furnished in these cases?—A. One of the most inefficient and unfortunate men to select for any position of that kind that could possibly be chosen. Let me tell you why, as you have asked that question. Statements are of no value to a lawyer, as you know, excepting the mere cold facts. Now, the invariable practice of Mr. Woodward is to interweave, with any statement of facts that you may request him to make, his own inferences, deductions, suspicions, and conjectures; so that if he presents you a paper purporting to set forth the facts of a case you will have a much larger proportion of it occupied by his own views, opinions, and conjectures than by facts, and he insists with pertinacity upon weight being given to them. All such statements are of no value to a lawyer, and I declined to receive from Mr. Woodward. They were of no value to me. I speak more decidedly on this point with regard to Mr. Woodward, because in the case of the United States against Hinds, in which I was employed by the defense, and in which Mr. Hinds was acquitted—a case for violation of the postal laws—I had a full opportunity of ascertaining what Mr. Woodward's capacity and ability might be, and it was partly the view I obtained of the capacity of the man in that case that led me to distrust investigations made by him when I was engaged in the star-route cases and to set them aside. I might add other facts.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. You have stated that if the prosecution had been continued in the manner agreed upon during President Garfield's administration there would have been some convictions?—A. I have never had any doubt of it.

Q. State in what cases those convictions could have been had, in your judgment?—A. A conviction could have been had in the case in which Mr. Walsh was interested—route No. 40101, from Prescott to Santa Fé. It has been stated here (perhaps by Mr. Bliss) that that conviction depended upon the testimony of a single witness. That is not correct. I made a thorough investigation of that case, and I may say now, without involving any person or reflecting upon any person, that I would have produced evidence of money passing through the hands of different individuals, apart from Mr. Walsh, in connection with that contract, and would have shown interviews between parties involved in the case, in New York and here, and other facts.

Q. Is that the Prescott and Santa Fé route on which Mr. Walsh became a subcontractor?—A. Yes, sir; and in which, let me say, a paper was signed by which increase was recommended—signed by Mr. Woodward, among others, in my absence—a paper which never would have been signed if I had been here. That brings up another fact, Mr. Woodward has said that I destroyed a letter; I never destroyed any letter in that case.

Q. You recommended the remission of the fines?—A. I did not. I had that subject under consideration at one time, as to whether the fines should be remitted or not, but we had not ultimately determined the question when my more active connection with the case ceased.

Q. In what other cases, then, do you think convictions would have been had?—A. The case that was tried might have been so conducted that there would have been a conviction of some of the parties, but it could not have been done by the complicated and intricate method in which the case was presented.

Q. Did you make any examination of the Salisbury and Parker cases?—

A. A limited examination; and I had at one time an interview with Mr. Salisbury and others in the Post-Office Department, in which I stated with some emphasis to Mr. Salisbury, when he was urged to make an adjustment, that he had better, perhaps, be less better, or that in due time, from the cursory examination I had made, I judged he might be in a more unpleasant position than he was in then.

Q. What matters did he want to have adjusted?—A. At that time, if I remember correctly (and please bear in mind that I may be mistaken about some details at times, for this matter has largely passed out of my memory), there was an attempt to have some adjustment of his accounts on some of his routes.

Q. He was willing to pay up, to settle without the matter going to the grand jury?—A. Yes, sir; and nobody that has ever been willing or able to pay up has ever been indicted, or ever would be.

Q. There is no evidence that anybody did pay up?—A. I said anybody that was apparently willing to pay up. You have not got at the foundation of the case, and never will, perhaps. You have labored well and carefully and industriously, but you have not got to the bottom.

Q. Did you reach the foundation yourself?—A. Not since the case passed out of my hands.

Q. Did you reach it while it was in your hands?—A. To some extent.

Q. Will you reveal some of those foundations that are still concealed?—

A. I have just told you how a conviction could have been had in the Prescott and Santa Fé case.

Q. And from the examination you made you think there could have been a conviction in the Salisbury case?—A. That has been my opinion, but of course it is only an opinion, not fully matured.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Do you think the attorneys who acted in these cases failed because of lack of capacity, or because they did not want to bring the defendants to grief?—A. In an interview, which I published immediately after my retirement, I stated that I doubted very much, now that the cases had passed into the hands of Mr. Bliss, whether there ever would be a conviction, and that time would tell whether there would be or not. That was said long ago.

Q. But that does not seem to answer my question at all. Do you think the attorneys in those cases failed because of lack of capacity or because they did not want to bring the defendants to grief?—A. Because of both.

Q. Do you mean to say that the attorneys who prosecuted the cases lacked both brains and heart?—A. No, sir; I mean to say that they lacked, in a case of that magnitude, the methodical power and discriminating ability necessary to gather a case out of the mass of crude material that they had, and to condense it and present it in a reasonably brief time, so that the jury could comprehend it, bear the facts in memory, and arrive at a correct conclusion.

Q. Then you think they did the best they could with the power which they had; in other words, that they used all the ability that they had?—A. Some of them did. You are asking me now for an opinion, and I answer accordingly.

Q. Well, you have been giving opinions all morning.—A. No, sir; not all morning; part of the time. I doubt, and ever have doubted, whether there was a sincere purpose to convict from January 1, 1882, until the close of the cases, on the part of all the attorneys.

Q. Do you mean to say that all of them lacked sincerity?—A. No, sir; there was one attorney that evidently was anxious to convict; that was Mr. Merrick. There is no question about that at all. The motives that may have controlled Mr. Merrick in that I cannot determine, but the error of Mr. Merrick was really in being too bitter, too censorious, too denunciatory, so that there was a revulsion of public feeling, even on the part of the jurors and others. Of Mr. Merrick's sincerity I have no doubt.

Q. Do you think that his bitterness grew out of his zeal to convict?—A. Yes, sir; out of his zeal; and then, too, out of an additional fact. He is a man who cannot control his partisan feelings as they ought to be controlled. There was too much partisanship underlying his prosecution of Mr. Dorsey and Mr. Kellogg. This he seemed to feel toward the end. You cannot convict a man of previous good character and standing in that way.

Q. Do I understand you to say that you think Mr. Merrick wanted to convict Mr. Dorsey and Mr. Kellogg because they were Republicans?—A. No, sir; but that the fact that they were Republicans intensified, perhaps unconsciously, his feelings, and rendered him more bitter and earnest in his efforts than he otherwise might have been.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Have you any knowledge that any one of the counsel for the Government in this case was corruptly influenced in his action in connection with the prosecution?—A. No; I have no direct knowledge. I have an accumulation of facts, but you would not want them. I have facts and inferences, but I might state a great deal that would not be evidence.

Q. Is it such an accumulation of facts as has been brought out before this committee and through the press?—A. Certainly; and perhaps some additional, but they are not such as I ought to introduce as testimony. I occasionally indulge in opinions, especially when called for; but after all they are not evidence.

Q. Did any of these defendants ever approach you, directly or indirectly, with propositions for securing immunity?—A. I answer that question according to the terms in which you put it, and place the emphasis where you will comprehend it. No defendant ever approached me.

Q. Did any defendant ever by his counsel or by a friend?—A. No defendant, so far as I know, through a counsel; but I have already stated that I was once approached. I was once approached with a proposition that would involve corruption on my part, and I arranged to explode the whole scheme.

Q. Has that been stated in your previous testimony?—A. I have stated that.

Q. I do not remember that you stated that before.—A. I think I did. I was once approached. I think I so stated. I intended to do so at all events.

Q. Was that the case in which you were to be employed as counsel by —?—A. That was a case where there was a proposition made to me to withdraw from my employment on behalf of the Government for a pecuniary consideration, and have it paid in some mode which would make it impossible to trace it.

Q. I do not think you have explained that to the committee.—A. Well, do not ask me for the name, and I will give you all that occurred.

Q. Give us all that occurred, and we will see about the name afterwards.—A. Yes, sir. That approach was made by a gentleman who came to my office, and, after one or two interviews, stated that he wished to talk to me on this subject. I arranged an interview and at the same time arranged to have one or two persons in my office, so that it might be ascertained that he had called there. When he called, those persons were present. I finally took him up-stairs in one of my upper rooms, where there is a bed that Mr. Cole generally occupies. I had placed a gentleman under the bed for the purpose of hearing the proposition and what might take place. This man suggested to me, after some time, that he would rather see me at the Portland, and I told him that I would consider that proposition. In the mean time he had ascertained in some manner, as I was afterwards informed, that I had a watch upon him and it would not be safe for him to come to my office, and so the matter ended.

By Mr. MILLIKEN :

Q. Did he discover that there was anybody under the bed?—A. No, sir; he did not. I don't do things in that way.

Q. Did he make his statement while the other party was under the bed?—A. In part. He commenced it.

Q. What stopped him?—A. He said that he would prefer that I would come and talk to him at the Portland, and then he stopped.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Did he disclose the nature of his proposition?—A. His proposition was just what I have stated; that if I would withdraw, or if, or if while I remained in the case, I would so act as to protect some of the defendants, whom he did not name, or "the defendants," a large sum of money could be placed in my hands.

By Mr. MILLIKEN :

Q. Was that man a private citizen?—A. He was a private citizen.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Of ability to pay?—A. I believe he had the ability.

Q. Did you regard him as representing some of the defendants?—A. I could have no other idea but what he came to me representing, from motives friendly or otherwise, some of the defendants.

Q. Was he a lawyer?—A. He was not. He may have made the proposition on his own responsibility.

Q. He was exceedingly anxious to have perfect privacy, was he?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And he was somewhat mysterious in his movements?—A. Yes, sir. His first statements when he first came into my office were plain enough to me.

Q. What answer, if any, did you give to this tempter?—A. To the invitation to go to the Portland? I said that I would consider whether I should go or not, and possibly I should let him know at some future period. Of course I had no intention of going to the Portland.

Q. Was there any other occasion on which an effort was made to corruptly influence your action while you were Government counsel?—A. No, sir; no one else ever approached me.

By Mr. MILLIKEN :

Q. At what period did this occur?—A. It occurred in the fall of 1881.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Was it before the trial began?—A. Yes, sir; before the trial began. There was an effort, as I have stated heretofore, and this may have been a part of that effort, to get me to retire from the cases and accept employment on behalf of the defendants.

Q. Mr. Woodward states somewhere in his testimony that you made the statement to the President that Mr. Brady had approached you.—

A. I never made any such statement. He also stated, I remember now, that I had stated to the President, in substance, that Mr. Dorsey should be protected because of his great political influence and the aid he had rendered in the then late campaign. I never made any such statement. No one would suppose that I would venture to make such a statement to the President of the United States. I did say that I regretted that any one who had occupied the high position that Senator Dorsey had occupied was involved in the accusations that were made against him. I regret it now. That is what I stated, and Mr. Woodward may have misunderstood what I did say.

With the permission of the committee I will submit a copy of a letter which I addressed to the Attorney-General in relation to the papers that it was claimed were in my possession:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 28, 1882.

SIR: Agreeably to my communication of yesterday I herewith transmit you the following papers, viz: 44,154 (Part 2), 44,154 (Part 1), 38,135, 38,140, 34,149, 38,113, 44,140, 38,134 (Part 1), 38,134 (Part 2), 44,155 (Part 2), 34,124, 38,135, 35,051 (Part 2), 33,264, 34,124, 35,013, 35,015, 34,042, 35,015, 34,042, 35,043, 33,259, 35,042, 35,015, 34,042, 35,043, 33,259, 35,042, 35,015, 44,160, 44,119, 38,152, 44,140, 35,051.

These include others than those referred to by Mr. Bliss and are of a different class. None of them came into my hands through Mr. Woodward. The first eleven were exhibits of the report made by Mr. Gibson in the so-called Dorsey cases. The original report I believe passed into the hands of Mr. Bliss at Elberon. They all were received from H. J. Finley, a former clerk in the rooms set aside for the investigation of "the star-route cases."

2. It may be proper for me to add that there seems to me to be a concerted effort on the part of Mr. Bliss and Woodward to place me in a false position in relation to papers in "the star-route cases."

On the 6th of January last Mr. Bliss addressed me a communication requesting me to return "original" papers in my possession. In replying on the 9th of that month, I stated, in substance, that I had no such papers, and never had taken any from the Post-Office Department, and that I was unable to conjecture why he made the request, and that I feared that he had received incorrect information. I then took occasion to state that for some time I had been unable to get even a glimpse of "originals" or to procure copies, or the return of some copies temporarily obtained from me, and that the usual reply of Mr. Woodward was, "they are in use," "Mr. Bliss has them," or something of this kind.

3. When I received his communication of the 16th instant,, asking me to send him "reports" which Mr. Woodward furnished me in the Dorsey routes, I replied truthfully that I never was furnished any "reports" by Mr. Woodward, in the Dorsey or any other routes. And I added that I had repeatedly requested copies (of "reports"), but was unable to obtain even these except in a few instances, and that these were taken away or returned, in part by Mr. Gibson; and that it did not seem to be the first time incorrect information in relation to "star-route papers" had been given him; but that I would carefully examine my papers, and if I found any, I would with pleasure send them to him.

4. On the 17th instant I received a communication from Mr. Bliss, stating that it was not "reports," but "abstracts" prepared by Mr. Woodward, and furnished me, he desired, and that he remembered to have seen some of them in my possession, and that I referred to others. This letter was placed on my desk and I did not see it until late in the evening of its date. That night I had a severe attack of sickness—dangerous in its nature—from which I have not yet fully recovered.

(1.) But self-respect, had I been in a condition of health to have responded to Mr. Bliss's letter, would have prevented me from doing so; for it was not true that Mr. Woodward had furnished me abstracts, and it was not true that Mr. Bliss had seen such "abstracts" in my office. He did see other and returned papers, and carried some in person away from my office.

(2.) On the morning of the 18th instant an interview with Mr. Bliss appeared in the Post, of this city, followed by one in the New York Herald, so denunciatory of me, and so incorrect in some of its statements, that I determined that I would hold no further correspondence with him; nor have I.

5. I however arranged for a thorough examination of my papers, so that I could transmit any I might have, or which should be found, to the Post-Office Department. Before this examination was completed I received a letter from the chief clerk of the Department of Justice requesting a return of papers in my possession.

It affords me pleasure to send you the accompanying papers, as well as to comply with any request I can which your sense of justice or right will permit you to make. If I hereafter find even a fragment of a paper in relation to the "star-route cases," I will transmit it to you.

Of no use to me, the returned copies of abstracts I think can be of no use to any one else.

6. I return the copy of Mr. Bliss's letter sent me dated March 24, and addressed to you, and I indulge the hope that in inclosing it to me it was not your intention to indorse its positive falsehoods and base insinuations.

Regretting that from any cause this burden has been added to the arduous labors of your exalted position,

I am, with great respect, &c., yours,

WILLIAM A. COOK.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General of the United States.

WASHINGTON, June 28, 1884.

DAVID G. SWAIM sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Please state your age, residence, and occupation.—Answer. I am Judge-Advocate-General of the Army; I was fifty years of age last December.

Q. How long have you been in the Army?—A. Twenty-five years, lacking two or three months.

Q. When were you appointed Judge-Advocate-General?—A. In December, 1880.

Q. Were you acquainted with the late President Garfield?—A. I was, sir.

Q. Were you intimately acquainted with him?—A. I was very intimately acquainted with him.

Q. Were you frequently with him during the time he was President?—A. Yes, sir; daily.

Q. Had you ever any conversation with President Garfield in regard to the appointment of William A. Cook as special counsel in the star-route cases?—A. Yes, sir; in regard to the employment of Mr. William A. Cook and Mr. Gibson. The President asked me one evening, I think, or one day, when we were talking, if I knew who had been employed to investigate the star-route matters. I told him that I had heard. He expressed great surprise and indignation that certain persons of whose character he had heard unfavorable reports had been employed; and I think he named those two as persons who he thought should not be employed in that service, from what he had heard of their character and reputation.

Q. Did he say anything about having learned any fact in reference to Mr. Cook from a judge of the supreme court of the District of Columbia?—A. Well, our conversation was very confidential, and I cannot remember at this time positively whether he told me that he had been so informed or not. I got that impression, however, from the President, or perhaps from seeing him and hearing him converse with different persons that were there.

Q. What impression did you get?—A. The impression that he had been informed of the character of these men.

Q. By whom? Did he mention any one that had informed him?—A. I think not. At least I cannot remember the name of any one being mentioned.

Q. Did he mention the fact that he had been informed by a judge of the supreme court of the District of Columbia that Mr. Cook was not a fit person to be appointed?—A. I cannot say positively as to that, but he may have done so. He spoke generally of his having been informed in regard to the matter.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Did he take exception to Mr. Cook's ability or legal knowledge?—A. I don't know that he did; I don't know that he knew anything about that. I think it was Mr. Cook's reputation, perhaps his moral reputation, that the President referred to.

Q. He said that he was a man of questionable character?—A. That was the impression I got from what was said.

Q. Do you know whether President Garfield obtained information directly or indirectly?—A. Directly, I think, sir.

Q. From a judge of the supreme court of the District of Columbia?—A. I would presume that.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Can you state definitely what conversation you had with President Garfield in regard to this appointment?—A. We had many conversations in regard to it. I know we talked generally about the policy of employing men who had any taint resting on their moral character or any question about it, and I think I told him that, in my judgment, such men should be kept away from that investigation, and that it should be left entirely in clean hands, and with men above suspicion. One remark that I remember in some of the conversations was this: He said that it was impressed on him strongly that it took a rogue to catch a rogue; and I recollect that my reply was, "Who will catch that rogue? You must evidently, to be successful, end with an honest investigation by men of character in whom you have confidence, and in whom the public have confidence."

Q. Do you remember an occasion on which an interview was had between the President and Mr. Cook?—A. The President said that he would send for Mr. James and give him his views thoroughly on this subject; that he was in a delicate position; that while he did not feel that it would be proper for him to take this investigation out of the hands of those who had charge of it, yet he would urge the necessity of the employment of the best class of men that could be obtained for the service. He did send for Mr. James, and he had several interviews with him. I think the last interview that I remember was shortly before the assassination. I think Mr. James and Mr. Woodward and Mr. Cook were there.

Q. That, you say, was a short time before the assassination?—A. Yes, sir; I think a very short time. My recollection is that it was but a few days before it.

Q. Did Mr. Cook have any other interview with the President?—A. Not that I know of. He came to the White House, and I had a conversation with him.

Q. When was that?—A. That was some time before this. In that conversation he spoke of attacks and assaults that had been made on his character, and my recollection is that he had with him a pamphlet, or something of that kind, with certificates as to his standing. That is my recollection.

Q. Was President Garfield present?—A. No, sir; he was not.

Q. Did Mr. Cook ask to see the President, or to see you?—A. That I do not remember. My impression is that he asked to see the President, or came there for that purpose, and that I was requested to go out and see him.

Q. Were you at the White House in business hours every day through the greater part of President Garfield's term?—A. I was there a good deal of the time. I would stop there in the morning as I went to my office, and I would stop again in the afternoon as I came back—generally about 1 or 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Q. If there were any other interviews of Mr. Cook with the President, prior to the one with Mr. James, you have no knowledge of it?—A. I have no knowledge of it. I heard of none.

Q. Was the question as to the removal of Mr. Cook as one of the star-route attorneys discussed between you and the President at any time?—A. Oh, very frequently. Mr. Cook and Mr. Gibson—I associate those two names, for they were spoken of by the President together. He felt very indignant at the employment of those men, but he was restrained by a feeling of delicacy from interfering, or appearing to interfere, in work that he had assigned to others.

Q. What had been the President's relations with Mr. Cook prior to this employment? Had he any acquaintance with him at all?—A. I think not. He never spoke of it.

Q. You may state in this connection what was the position of the President generally with regard to the prosecution of these star-route cases.—A. He was very anxious to have a thorough, searching, and honest investigation, and he was willing to sacrifice any personal feeling that he might have in regard to the employment of men who were personally offensive to him, in order to secure that end. He was also anxious and solicitous that nothing in the nature of personal hostility or anything that looked like persecution should be indulged in.

Q. He desired a legitimate investigation for the purpose of ascertaining the true state of facts?—A. Yes, sir; so that the dishonest parties, whoever they were, should be brought to the surface and punished.

Q. Did that opinion and position of his continue unchanged up to the time of his death, so far as you know?—A. Yes, sir; always.

Q. So far as you know, then—and you knew his sentiments on this subject—he was in earnest in the matter of these prosecutions up to the time of his death?—A. Thoroughly so; and I know of no subject that caused him greater anxiety than that. His desire was that the work should be done fairly and fully. He so expressed himself and so acted, so far as I ever knew.

WASHINGTON, June 28, 1884.

H. V. BOYNTON sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Please state your age, residence, and occupation.—Answer. I am forty-nine years of age. I am the Washington correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette.

Q. How long have you resided in Washington?—A. Since December, 1865.

Q. Were you acquainted with the late President Garfield?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Intimately acquainted with him?—A. I knew him very well. I do not claim to have had an intimate acquaintance with him.

Q. Did you have any conversation with him during his Presidency in regard to the employment of special counsel in the star-route cases?—

A. I had a conversation with him in regard to the employment of Mr. William A. Cook only.

Q. State what that conversation was and when it occurred.—A. It occurred about within a day or two days of the announcement of Mr. Cook's employment by the Government. I should say it was about a month before the President was assassinated.

Q. What was the nature of that conversation?—A. Well, it began by an inquiry on my part as to whether a report which I had heard, that Mr. Cook was to be employed as special counsel in the star-route cases, was true or not.

Q. What did President Garfield say?—A. He said that he knew nothing in reference to Mr. Cook; had no acquaintance with him, and he asked me about him.

Q. Did you give him any information?—A. Well, I gave him my own opinion, sir.

Q. I will not ask you what opinion you gave, but I will ask what steps the President took or what he said in reference to the further employment of Mr. Cook.—A. He asked me to go to the Attorney-General and tell him what I had just said to him, the President, in regard to the matter.

Q. Was that Attorney-General MacVeagh?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you do so?—A. Yes, sir; I did.

Q. Did that end the conversation that you had with the President?—A. No, sir.

Q. What further was said?—A. I went there on that occasion to make an appointment with him for a friend of mine from Cincinnati; this was soon after noon, I should say, and we were to go back after the close of office hours that evening, and when we went back the conversation in regard to this matter was resumed by the President himself.

Q. How long after the first interview was that?—A. It was a few hours; it was after the close of office hours at the White House that day.

Q. State what was said then by the President.—A. The President was very much annoyed at the employment of Mr. Cook; he expressed his opinion very decidedly in reference to it, and said that he had had no knowledge of the man up to the time of his appointment or employment.

Q. Did he express any opinion as to the propriety of Mr. Cook's employment?—A. Yes, sir; he said he thought the employment of Mr. Cook was an outrage upon him.

Q. Did he give any reason?—A. The reasons proceeded upon the theory of the correctness of the conversation that he had had with me in regard to the matter. The conversation consisted chiefly in his asking me about the matter, and my talking with him in regard to it. Of course, my opinion was of no consequence, but that was what led to the expression of opinion on the President's part.

Q. Did you give him any facts in addition to your opinions?—A. I simply talked to him in reference to Mr. Cook's general reputation as an attorney in the District, as I understood it.

Q. Did you have any other conversation with President Garfield at any other time in reference to Mr. Cook?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was there anything further said in this conversation in reference to the subject—anything that you have not mentioned?—A. Well, Mr. Chairman, there was a great deal said, but much of it was my own talk and the President's remarks in reference to it. I do not suppose that my talk is of any consequence to the committee at all, and it is difficult to dissociate one from the other. There was a very considerable conversation on the subject.

Q. Did you see Attorney-General MacVeagh, as the President suggested?—A. Yes, sir; I went to see him immediately.

Q. What occurred there?—A. I told him that I had come at the President's request to repeat some statements to him that I had made to the President, and thereupon I proceeded to do it.

Q. Did he make any explanation in regard to Mr. Cook's employment?—A. He told me the theory upon which he was employed.

Q. What was that?—A. He said Mr. Cook was employed upon the theory of setting a thief to catch a thief. That is exactly what he said. He said he had had him engaged in a case once before and knew all about him. He stopped me in repeating what had been said at the White House, and said, "I know all about Mr. Cook; I have had him employed in cases before, and he is employed upon the theory of setting a thief to catch a thief."

Q. Did you repeat what the Attorney-General had said to President Garfield?—A. I don't remember whether that particular statement was repeated to him, but I told the President that I had repeated to the Attorney-General what I had previously said to him, and it was in the conversation that arose upon that feature of the case that he said he thought the employment was an outrage upon him.

Q. You do not remember whether you repeated to the President what the Attorney-General had said?—A. I do not. Very likely I did, but I would not like to testify absolutely that I did. It was a very free conversation, and I think it is very likely that I repeated that remark of the Attorney-General.

Q. From the conversations that you had with President Garfield in regard to Mr. Cook, was it your understanding or impression that he would confide the secrets of the star-route prosecution to him or intrust the case in his hands?—A. No, sir; the statement made by the Attorney-General in regard to the employment of Mr. William A. Cook was in substance this: That he was employed rather in a detective capacity than any other, and that it was not expected that he would have any prominent connection with the conduct of the case before the public. Mr. MacVeagh was very decided in regard to that, and said that he would take care of that branch of the case largely himself. In talking with the President in the evening I said to him that Mr. Cook had already risen in open court since I had called earlier in the day, and had asked to have the text of his employment by the Government spread upon the records of the court; at which the President was much astonished, and expressed his astonishment very emphatically.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 30, 1884.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee had an executive session this morning at which the chairman was instructed to inform Mr. Cook that the committee did not think it was necessary for him to appear again as a witness, as he had been already examined in chief, and had also appeared a second time and made a reply to all the evidence theretofore given affecting him; since which time two witnesses only have been called, General Swaim and General Boynton, who did not, as the committee understand, testify to any new material fact, but were merely called to corroborate another witness who had previously testified. Such being the case, the committee think that under the rules of evidence that branch of the inquiry should be regarded as closed. The chairman was instructed to announce this decision to Mr. Cook, and the chair did announce it to him outside of the committee room, but Mr. Cook preferred that the announcement should be made there formally, so that the official stenographer might make a minute of it.

Mr. COOK. Yes. I cannot oppose the ruling of the committee, but I regard it as unfair and unjust, in view of the new evidence which has been introduced, and which I am prepared to contradict by my own testimony and by that of others. I am prepared to show that the statements that General Boynton made here are unfounded in fact, and that the statements of General Swaim are absolutely false in every essential.

Mr. HEMPILL. Mr. Chairman, as the committee has decided that there is to be no further testimony upon the points in question, I do not think that Mr. Cook should be permitted to make an attack upon these other gentlemen in this way. I do not know either of the gentlemen; I may have seen them the other day, but I do not know them; but this does not seem to me to be proper.

Mr. COOK. I cannot say anything more, Mr. Chairman, except that I shall seek other means of vindication and try to ascertain whether the right of petition is still open in Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee desire to be perfectly fair with you, Mr. Cook, and we believe that we are so. Under the ordinary rules of evidence which prevail in courts of justice, the testimony must be closed at some time, for if an investigation or inquiry were to be conducted by the witnesses coming back again every time anything was testified on the other side that they wished to contradict, the hearing would be endless.

Mr. COOK. Yes; but it is a little remarkable that the committee should close its inquiry on this point just when I am prepared to refute the testimony of these witnesses.

The CHAIRMAN. The witnesses to whom you refer testified to no material fact that was not already in testimony when you last appeared before the committee.

Mr. COOK (ironically). Perhaps the committee had better strike out all my testimony.

WASHINGTON, June 30, 1884.

Mr. C. C. COLE reappeared before the committee at his own request, and testified as follows:

I wish to state that I deny most emphatically that I ever had any conversation with C. D. Colman in relation to attempting to prevent an indictment against James B. Colegrove for alleged fraud connected with star-route matters, or that I ever stated to Colman that I could be of advantage to Mr. Colegrove in that direction, for money or otherwise; or that I ever told or intimated to him that I could or would use any supposed influence I might have with Colonel Cook for such a purpose; or that I ever told Colman I had talked with Colonel Cook upon the subject, or had given or was to give him any money received by me from him (Colman) or from Colegrove. According to my recollection, Colonel Cook was away from Washington during all the time that the late President Garfield was at Elberon, the time fixed by Colman for the alleged interview. I also deny that I ever gave Colonel Cook any money paid me by Colegrove or Colman; or that I ever attempted in any way, directly or indirectly, to prevent an indictment against Colegrove by conversation with Colonel Cook, or in any other way whatever. According to my understanding of the rules of evidence, Mr. Colman is an incompetent witness to give testimony in any tribunal searching for truth.

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). That is a mere matter of argument, Mr. Cole, and had better be omitted.

The WITNESS. But I desire to state a fact in that connection.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the committee will hear you in relation to any statement that Mr. Colman has made here which concerns you, but not as to new matter, because you are given this hearing now merely to enable you to reply to testimony heretofore given reflecting upon you as an attorney.

The WITNESS. This that I am about to state is substantially in reply to Mr. Coleman. Mr. Colman admitted to me in open court, where he was testifying as a witness, and admitted to the court, that he had been convicted of crimes involving moral turpitude.

The CHAIRMAN. I object to that. That is not proper. It is not a part of your statement at all.

The WITNESS. It is a part of my statement.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not a part of your statement in reply to any matter that has been testified to here.

The WITNESS. It is. I wish to show that Mr. Colman, by his own admission, is a convict and has served in the penitentiary.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you come here to reply to testimony or to make an attack upon a person who has been a witness before the committee? This investigation will never end if we are to proceed in this way.

The WITNESS. I have come here simply to defend myself. When Mr. Colman or any other witness comes before this committee and swears to matters that involve me in transactions that would be dishonorable if the statements were true, I have a right I think—I certainly would have in a court of justice and I think I have a right here—to show that the person who so testifies is an incompetent witness to testify before any tribunal.

The CHAIRMAN. You were asked on your first examination in relation to all that occurred between you and Colman.

The WITNESS. I beg your pardon, Mr. Chairman; you simply asked me one question, whether I had ever said to Colman that I gave money to Colonel Cook which I had received from Mr. Colegrove. That was the only question asked me, and I replied that I had not. Mr. Colman afterwards came upon the stand and testified to matters which are false, and which I now say are false.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. If this man Colman was a convict and was offered as a witness and, by reason of his conviction, he was disqualified for giving evidence, that would be good ground upon which to exclude him altogether from testifying; but, he having been received as a witness here, if you now want to impeach him you ought to do it under the general rule, and that, you know as a lawyer, would not permit you to detail instances on his part of misconduct or impropriety, or whatever it might be. You would simply be permitted to state that you knew the character of the man, and perhaps facts communicated to you by him—self which authorized you to say that he was not a credible witness, not to be believed under oath. That, I think, is the extent to which you would be permitted to go in a court of justice, and therefore I think the chairman is justified in limiting you to that, instead of allowing you go on and make a statement of details in relation to this man's past life.

The CHAIRMAN. So far as the committee is concerned, the whole evidence of Mr. Colman might be struck from the record, and yet the only statement that is material in regard to this transaction as it affects Mr. Cole, was testified to by Mr. Colegrove, and Colegrove's testimony in regard to that was substantially the same as Colman's.

The WITNESS. I beg your pardon, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. In regard to the fact of his payment of money to you for that purpose.

The WITNESS. No, sir; I understand that Mr. Colegrove did not so testify. I have not read his testimony in the record of the committee, but I read it as published in the papers, and I have talked with Mr. Colegrove about it, and he has told me that he testified that the money that he paid me was for services entirely disconnected with star-route matters. I do not know what he did say, but that is the way it was published in the papers, and that is the way he reported it to me; and it looks to me very much as if an effort were being made to involve me in matters with which I have no connection in the world, and to deny me a chance to defend myself.

The CHAIRMAN. You have all the chances that a man could possibly ask. You rely upon your own denial of this alleged fact. It is a question of veracity between two witnesses, and you have made your statement and he has made his.

The WITNESS. Well, but I think I have a right to show in that case that Mr. Colman is a man who would not be believed under oath by those who know him.

The CHAIRMAN. You know what the rule of evidence is on that point—you have to show his reputation for truth and veracity.

The WITNESS. Well then, I will say that I know Mr. Colman's general reputation for truth and veracity among people with whom he has associated, and have known it for the last ten years.

The CHAIRMAN. Where does he live?

The WITNESS. He has lived in both Michigan and West Virginia. I know his reputation in West Virginia. I do not know it in Michigan.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, if you desire to impeach his testimony, you should proceed in the regular manner, which you understand very well.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. The witness has qualified himself upon that point. [To the witness.] You say you do know Colman's general reputation for truth and veracity?

The WITNESS. I do.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Amongst people in the community where he has lived?

The WITNESS. In the community where he has lived; and I know it to be exceedingly bad; and I know him to be a man who would not be believed under oath.

The CHAIRMAN. You know very well that in a court of justice, unless the party put his character in evidence, you could not go beyond that.

The WITNESS. I disagree entirely with the Chairman in regard to the rule of evidence. I think it is competent where a person has been convicted of a felony, to prove that fact as tending to impeach his credibility.

The CHAIRMAN. But you can only prove such a conviction by the record of the court.

The WITNESS. Well, I was going on to say that the record I refer to is on file in the War Department here. I have not had time to procure a copy of it, but it is within reach of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. And it also appears of record that President Johnson set aside that conviction?

The WITNESS. No, I beg your pardon. President Johnson made an order in relation to it which he had no authority in the world to make, and the Secretary of War and the General of the Army both, during the present administration, have declined to promulgate the order.

The CHAIRMAN. But the President did make the order?

The WITNESS. He did make the order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anything further that you desire to say?

The WITNESS. I wish to state that my employment by Mr. Colegrove had no relation to his alleged complicity in the star-route frauds. I did not even know at the time, nor for some time afterwards, that it was claimed that he was involved in them. The business I did for him then and have done for him since had no relation whatever to these matters, and was fully worth all Colegrove has ever paid me, and more, and I am still attending to unsettled business for him. Colonel Cook received no part of the money which Mr. Colegrove paid me for the business I did for him. Colman was in the habit of hanging around our office, and we had to notify him to remain away; for which he became enraged at Colonel Cook and myself both. A few months ago I got some action of a court in West Virginia——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). I do not think that is proper.

The WITNESS. I want to show Mr. Colman's animus towards me. A few months ago I got some orders made in a case in West Virginia in which Colman claims to be interested, which were very much against his interest, at which he became very much enraged against me, and sent me word through friends that if I did not let up on him he would injure me in some way. I did not let up, and his testimony here is the sequel. Mr. Colman, I believe, is the only man who has testified to anything that attempts to reflect upon me, Mr. Colegrove having already testified, as I understand, that his employment of me had no relation whatever to any star-route matters, so far as any conversation or understanding he ever had with me is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think he made that statement.

The WITNESS. Well, I understand that he did. At any rate, what I say is (and it is what I understand Mr. Colegrove here said), that in all his conversations with me and all his employment of me he never stated or intimated that he expected me to do anything in his star-route matters, or sought to employ me for that purpose. That is my statement, and Mr. Colegrove's testimony, as I have read it in the papers, corroborates that statement.

WASHINGTON, June 30, 1884.

WILLIAM P. WOOD sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Mr. William A. Cook testified before this committee a few days ago that he was authorized by you to state that a clerk in the Post-Office Department by the name of Green was, or had been, in a position to procure papers from the Department for the purpose of giving them to the defense in the star-route cases. Do you know anything about that?—Answer. Yes, sir.

Q. Please state what you know about it.—A. I would like to preface my remarks with such explanatory matters as would neither do injustice to Mr. Green nor Mr. Cook, and, if that is conceded, I will state my case; or I can do that subsequently.

Q. Just state the facts in your own way.—A. I was satisfied that in the proceedings in the star-route cases Mr. Woodward was acting the scoundrel, and I was satisfied that he was putting through fraudulent claims. I wrote to the foreman of the grand jury, to Judge Wylie, and to Mr. Howe a statement of the facts, giving the numbers of the routes and the facts as I understood them, and was desirous of going before the grand jury at the time. My efforts failed. I called the attention of General Brady to the matter, and he referred me to the son-in-law of Postmaster-General Howe. I called upon that gentleman, and stated the facts in the case, as I presumed them to be.

Q. Do you refer to Mr. Totten?—A. Yes, sir; I refer to Mr. Totten. He was desirous of having some information that was reliable. I told him that in all probability I could get it, but that I could not commit any breach of confidence with the party I had in view, for I would have to get my information from the Post-Office Department. After some preliminary arrangements Mr. Totten agreed that the clerk should not be disturbed, and it was arranged that the original jacket in which the papers belonged should be brought to Mr. Totten's office and exhibited, for the purpose of stopping these frauds in the Department, or these rascally transactions that I charged Mr. Woodward with having instigated, and which were going on. I specified two matters. One was the money that was paid to John A. Walsh, of which I gave you, Mr. Chairman, a private memorandum at an early stage of these proceedings. The other was in a case that I wrote to Mr. Cook about. I advised Mr. Cook not to have anything to do with the Government, but Mr. Gibson persuaded him into it, and when he did start in I went to him to post him as to the rascally proceedings going on in the Department. I called his attention to my communication, and it resulted in a hearing being had by Mr. Bliss, and I produced evidence of forgery and perjury for the purpose of putting these things through that Mr. Woodward had recommended, and which I stopped simply by the production of the evidence of forgery and perjury, copies of which evidence I have in my pocket, if you desire to see them.

Q. Do you refer to the papers that Green was to furnish?—A. Mr. Green did furnish them; he brought them to Mr. Totten's office and showed the facts and then took the papers back.

Q. What position did Green hold in the Department?—A. He was chief clerk in—I don't know exactly in what division, but it was one that had custody of these papers.

Q. State what Green did.—A. After some preliminary arrangements, he brought the papers to Mr. Totten's office and exhibited to him the evidences of the fraud.

Q. That was done in the interest of the Government, was it?—A. Certainly, sir; in the interest of the Government.

Q. It was not for the purpose of giving information to the defendants as to what evidence was on file in the Department?—A. I do not know that that was the prime motive. I was in the interest of the defense and against the Government.

Q. For whom was Mr. Totten appearing? Whom did he represent?—
A. I think he represented the defense.

Q. Do you know which of the defendants?—A. I cannot say that I do, but I understood that it was all the defendants—that he had a general interest in them.

Q. Were these papers that Green furnished to Mr. Totten matters which would apprise the defendants of any movements that were going on in the Department to procure their conviction?—A. I am under the impression that I produced the evidence for the purpose of satisfying the Government officials that the parties who were proceeding against the defendants were not doing it in good faith, and that they were resorting to means that were neither proper nor honorable.

Q. But the question the committee are interested in is, whether any of the records of the Government that were supposed to be secret and for the benefit only of the prosecution got into the hand of the defendants?—A. I believe Mr. J. W. Green to be an honorable gentleman. He would not be guilty of any act which would deceive his employers, or of any treachery to those who employed him. It was simply to post the Government as to the bad manner of proceeding in the Department, and he did that under the pledge of secrecy from Mr. Totten and myself, and he was subsequently removed because he did that service.

Q. Was he acting in the interest of the Government, or in the interest of the defendants in furnishing papers?—A. I think he was acting friendly toward me; it was on the score of friendship toward me.

Q. Whom did you represent?—A. I do not think that Mr. Green was aware that I was in the employ of the defendants. I think he was under the impression that I was endeavoring to expose the scoundrelism in the Department.

Q. Whom did you represent?—A. I represented no one but W. P. Wood.

Q. Then I misunderstood you awhile ago, when I thought you said you represented some of the defendants?—A. Mr. Green did not know I was in the interest of the defendants and opposed to Bliss.

Q. What defendants?—A. The star-route defendants.

Q. The defendants in the Brady-Dorsey case and others?—A. No; I cannot say that. There were very few of them I conversed with interested; my interest was in behalf of General Brady.

Q. State what kind of papers they were that Green furnished to Mr. Totten?—A. The star-route contracts. I can give you the numbers by referring to my papers. I am confining myself now to this one case. Here (producing it) is a copy of a letter that I wrote to Mr. Howe, dated Washington, May 18, 1882.

Q. Is that one of the papers that Mr. Green furnished Mr. Totten?—
A. No, sir; this is my letter to Postmaster General Howe.

Q. What papers did Green furnish to Totten?—A. He furnished the papers in that case and gave such explanation as they desired to have. They were not familiar with the facts, and he gave them all the information that was requisite—information, as I imagine, perfectly proper, perfectly correct, such as any citizen should have a right to get, only that I knew the way to get it, and desired that Mr. Totten should be satisfied that I was making a correct statement. It was a plain steal of the Government funds.

Q. Then, as I understand you, Mr. Green simply brought the original jacket to Mr. Totten containing the official documents upon which you based the charge that the remission in that case ought not to have been made? He brought all those papers to Mr. Totten?—A. No, sir; I do not think he did. Finding that the papers were not in the jacket, I called Mr. Totten's attention to the fact, and he could not think it was possible; so I brought Mr. Green to show him the empty jacket, and to show that the papers were withheld for the purpose of enabling Walsh to get this money.

Q. Then Green simply brought the empty jacket?—A. It was not exactly empty. There was something in it. He also gave some additional information that they requested. Nothing improper. I believe Mr. Green to be an honorable gentleman.

Q. Those were all the papers that Green furnished?—A. That I do not recollect now. The other case was one of fraud and perjury concocted here in Washington. I communicated it to Judge Wylie and wanted to be allowed to go before the grand jury, and I prevented that fraud from being consummated. Mr. Bliss met me in Mr. Cook's office. I produced the record there. I kept the record straight, so as to convince the most skeptical.

Q. Will you state again now just exactly what it was that Green did in the way of furnishing papers?—A. I requested Mr. Green to call upon Mr. Totten, the son-in-law of the Postmaster-General, to verify the statements I had been making to him, and to furnish such evidence as would convince Mr. Howe, because I wanted to go before the grand jury and make the statement in both cases.

Q. Did you go to Mr. Howe or to Mr. Totten?—A. I went to Mr. Totten, and I wrote to Judge Wylie and received his answer. I wrote also to Colonel Cook and received his answer. I was simply fighting the combination that was in the Post-Office Department.

Q. You desired simply to protect the interests of the Government in regard to these allowances, which you believed to be unjust?—A. I do not know that that was my object altogether. I wanted to expose the system. I did not ask anything for it; I agreed to do it gratuitously. Sometimes I charge, but generally I get humbugged by officials.

Q. But your desire in this matter was to prevent the allowance of claims which you believed to be unjust and fraudulent?—A. Yes, sir; if you will recollect, Mr. Chairman, I furnished you a memorandum of that matter at an early stage in your proceedings, which you had an opportunity to digest, and to call upon me for further information or explanation of, if you desired. If you had called upon me for it I would have given it. I do not want to make any Democratic campaign thunder, as I am not a Democrat.

Q. You desired to have the Government officials indicted?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you so wrote to Judge Wylie?—A. Yes, sir; and I have got his response. I wrote, also, to the foreman of the jury, Mr. Mitchell.

Q. What did Judge Wylie say?—A. Here is a response [reading]:

WASHINGTON, May 19, 1882.

DEAR SIR: Your note dated the 17th inst., with a copy of your communication to the Postmaster-General of same date, has been handed to me. I think you had better await the decision of the Postmaster-General in the matter, and advise also with District-Attorney Corkhill before going to the grand jury.

Very respectfully, &c.,

A. WYLIE.

W. P. WOOD, Esq.

Q. You may state in what respect that allowance to Mr. Walsh was unauthorized by law. Was it a remission?—A. I have written upon that subject, and some of what I have written upon it has been published, and some not. Some of the publications that have been made in the Sun are mine. I have a pretty long one there which, I think, explains the subject, and I could give you that.

Q. I prefer that you should explain it now, briefly.—A. It would be impossible to do the subject justice briefly. It is a fraud. There is nothing honest in it. It is just as much of a fraud as that matter of the mail-bag fastener that I desired to call the attention of Mr. James to in connection with that carpet-bagger, Sheridan, that was put upon the people of Washington by Hayes. They paid some $28,000 there, and they did not make any investigation, but it was just as great a steal as that matter of Walsh. They would not do anything about it but cover it up. I exposed it, and they hate me a great deal worse than they do any of the Democracy.

Q. Do you want to make any further statement about this matter?—

A. I am satisfied that that Walsh matter was a fraud, and I can establish it whenever the committee desire to have it done.

Q. This committee has not been engaged in re-trying the star-route cases, or undertaking to determine whether the parties there charged were guilty or not. We have merely been endeavoring to ascertain whether the officers charged with the prosecution did their duty?—A. Well, I have expressed my opinion about Mr. Bliss.

Q. Have you any further facts that you desire to state?

The witness was proceeding, in reply to this question, to read a paper in which he spoke of Post-Office Inspector Woodward as a "creature," and stated that he (Woodward) and Mr. Lyman had recommended the allowance of what was known as the Jennings claim.

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). Have you any further facts? Confine your statement to facts.

The WITNESS. I believe these to be facts. If they are not, let them be thrown out.

Mr. WOODWARD (to the witness). Did I ever recommend the payment of that claim, or did Mr. Lyman ever recommend it?

The WITNESS. You did—Walsh's claim.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did Mr. Woodward recommend the payment of that claim?—A. I understand that he did.

Q. Did Mr. Woodward or Mr. Lyman, either or both, recommend the payment of that Jennings claim?—A. I believe they did, for the reason that Mr. Bliss came to Colonel Cook's office and I furnished him the papers, and he said that he had already stopped it. That was in the office, in Mr. Cook's presence, and I base my statement on the strength of that.

Q. You base your statement on a conversation that you had with Colonel Cook?—A. No; but in part on the conversation I had with Colonel Bliss in Mr. Cook's office. Apart from that I know that Mr. Woodward did sign a recommendation of the Walsh matter, and that Mr. Cook did not, when I requested him not to do it, and I know that Lilley called upon me and stated that he had "had Woodward all right," and that I had prevented him getting the Jennings matter through. I believe that Woodward and Lyman and the rest of them would have put that claim through, and that, had I not put in a protest, it would have been paid. No one else made a protest against that payment but myself. Nobody else interfered with it, and it would have been paid, as other frauds have been paid.

Q. What claim do you refer to now?—A. The Walsh claim.

Q. Was that a claim for remission?—A. The Government had recouped, so that they would not have lost anything. Walsh was paid without rendering any service to the Government. Favoritism put it through.

Q. There were some three or four claims that Walsh had against the Government. To which claim do you refer?—A. I refer to the lump, some $24,000 or $25,000, that he got when he ought not to have got 25 cents, and would not have got it if he had not promised what he did. This Jennings claim would have gone through in the same way, if I had not prevented it. I challenge the production of any paper showing anything done towards stopping that Jennings matter outside of what I did. I will give you the affidavit of one of the parties who was interested in the fraud, and he aided in the perjury. [The witness here handed a paper to the chairman.]

The CHAIRMAN (after examining the paper). This is simply an affidavit stating what you did in reference to the case?—A. Yes, sir; and there are several others.

The CHAIRMAN. I think this paper is immaterial so far as this committee is concerned.

The WITNESS. All right; I just wanted to show you the proceedings that I took in the matter.

Q. Is there anything further that you want to state?—A. Nothing particular.

Q. In the first part of our investigation there was some evidence before the committee to the effect that you had been authorized by some of the star-route defendants to employ Colonel Cook in their behalf. Will you state what your recollection of that matter is?—A. I called on Colonel Cook at an early stage in the prosecution, and advised him not to accept any position under the Government, saying that he would get a larger fee from the defendants, and for him not to accept Government employment. Mr. Gibson was running to his office at that time to secure him as counsel for the Government, and I advised him not to accept it; I told him that Gibson was in the interest of the Democratic party, that he had done everything he could to hound Garfield in this DeGolyer paving matter, when Colonel Cook was counsel for the corporation of Washington; and also that it would be impolitic for the colonel to go into the matter for the Government—that it would be a fizzle, and for him not to get into it. I thought I had advised Colonel Cook sufficiently to keep him out of the Government employ, but I went off to New York on some business, and when I came back Mr. Gibson had trotted Mr. Cook up to the White House, or they had both been up to the White House, I do not know the details of what happened there, but Colonel Cook was no longer accessible to me, so far as star-route matters were concerned. But I will say this, that he never aided me, directly or indirectly, in any manner, or betrayed the Government or any interest connected therewith. I believe him to be an honorable gentleman. He has been such in all my transactions with him. I furnished this information that I have been speaking about in the interest of the Government, as well as to show the surroundings of the parties engaged in the prosecution.

Q. Were you authorized by any of the defendants to retain Colonel Cook in their behalf?—A. I think that I recommended it myself, that it was left entirely to my judgment, and, had he been accessible to the parties, negotiations in the matter would have commenced. I have had some experience with counsel, and I imagine that he is without a peer in Washington.

Q. Was there a sum that he could have as compensation mentioned by you?—A. Yes, sir; I offered him $10,000.

Q. And he told you that he was employed for the Government?—A. No, sir. He did not then, but subsequently he did, when I came back to renew the proposition and to increase the offer, after I had gone to New York to see certain parties and to attend to some other business.

Mr. COOK (to the witness). Please state what the proposed increase was.—A. Well, I was directed to make it $5,000 more, or $10,000, if successful.

Here is a paper signed by Gibson and Woodward in relation to the Walsh payment, and I will say that I do not think the other route (Jennings) would have been entertained had it not had similar approval.

The CHAIRMAN. All the facts about the remission of the fines in that case were laid before the committee, and I supposed there was no dispute as to the facts.

The WITNESS. Well, I will say that I do not know this positively, but I believe it, and was so informed by inside parties in the Department.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that every material fact in relation to that matter was stated by Mr. Woodward and Mr. Walsh.

The WITNESS. That may be. I have not kept the run of the testimony.

Mr. WOODWARD. On top of that payment, Mr. Cook and Mr. Gibson united in a recommendation that Walsh should be given a month's extra pay. Mr. Lyman refused to agree to that. Mr. Cook then sent me to get the paper that he had signed making the recommendation, and I got it and gave it to him and he tore it up.

Mr. COOK. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that that is a deliberate, studied lie.

Mr. WOODWARD. Well, Mr. Chairman, I say it is the truth, and Mr. Lyman knows it. [To Mr. Cook.] Did you not write such a letter?

Mr. COOK. That is a deliberate, studied falsehood.

Mr. WOODWARD. I have heard a good many such statements from you here.

Mr. COOK. Yes; and I propose to prove your character outside of this committee. There is another tribunal before which you will appear in due time.

Mr. WOODWARD. Do you say that you never saw or wrote such a letter?

Mr. COOK. I will attend to your case in due time.

The WITNESS. Well, I will simply add that no matter by whom signed or recommended, whether by Colonel Cook, or by George Bliss, or by Woodward, or anybody else, it was an infamous fraud.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean the remission of the fines and the allowance of the extra month's pay?

The WITNESS. Yes; the whole affair. All the money given him from the Government was a steal, the whole amount, $24,000 or $25,000. I should not be the least surprised if there were lots of papers torn up. I do not know whether Colonel Cook tore them up, but I should suppose Woodward was an artist at that business.

Adjourned.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 1, 1884.

WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG appeared before the committee at his own request, and testified as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I labor under considerable disadvantage in making a statement this morning, from the fact that I have not been able to procure the last testimony of Mr. Bliss, and there is much in that testimony to which I desire to call the attention of the committee, and also because I have not had an opportunity to refresh my mind with regard to certain facts. After the intimation that I have received from you as chairman of the committee, I do not propose to go into this matter at any great length at the present time. I have made no sort of preparation and taken no notes whatever, and have only partially read the evidence from time to time as I have been able to get hold of it in installments. I have noticed, however, that much has crept into your record reflecting upon me, and it is with regard to this testimony that I desire now to submit a few remarks. I shall endeavor to be as brief as possible, because you have intimated to me that the committee desire to get through immediately and adjourn.

The fact that I have been charged with complicity in improper transactions in connection with star-route matters is, of course, well known. The nature of the indictment the committee is doubtless well acquainted with, and I may be pardoned for referring here to the fact that it is an indictment predicated upon the statute of 1782, prohibiting members of Congress from receiving compensation for services rendered in connection with any of the departments of the Government, or in matters where the United States is a party. I notice with regret that a number of witnesses, especially some of the attorneys for the prosecution, have dwelt with great emphasis upon that indictment as though it charged me with an offense involving bribery. I believe there is no charge anywhere—certainly there is none in the indictment—that there was any improper or undue action on my part unless it be receiving compensation for influence as alleged, or for services rendered in procuring the contract, or the two contracts, involved. There is no charge anywhere that I paid Mr. Brady anything, unless it be the statement of Mr. Walsh that I told him when I delivered certain drafts to him that I desired him to set one half of the proceeds to the credit of Mr. Brady and one-half to my credit; which statement I utterly deny.

The first question is as to whether I rendered any service or whether I promised Mr. Price to render any service in connection with the procuring of these two contracts. The two routes referred to are, one in Northern Louisiana, from Monroe to Shreveport, and the other from San Antonio to Corpus Christi. If Mr. Brady is called upon to testify here and swears to the truth, he must swear, and I believe will swear, that I never approached him in any manner, directly or indirectly, in regard to either of those two routes. I state here that I never did approach Mr. Brady, and never did attempt to influence him in any manner, directly or indirectly, in regard to the expedition of either of those two routes. The principal expedition, I am told, was upon the San Antonio and Corpus Christi route. Mr. Blackmar, of the Post-Office Department, is here to produce certain papers relating to that route, and the jacket which he has handed me contains a statement (usually called a "brief," I believe) of the merits of the case, together with the names of the persons recommending the expedition. Upon the back of this statement are the words, "Do it from August—Brady." Then here is the order:

From August 1, 1879, expedite service so as to require it to be performed by a schedule of departures and arrivals not to exceed 29½ hours' running time each way.

Then follow the usual provisions. This is signed French, and, as I have said, the indorsement is, "Do it from August—Brady." Here [showing it to the Chairman] is the jacket. The jacket refers to a letter which I will read :

[Maxey, Lightfoot & Denton, Attorneys and Counsellors at Law.]

PARIS, TEX., July 5, 1879.

DEAR GENERAL: I beg to call your attention to the mail service between San Antonio and Brownsville, Texas. If this service can be expedited I shall be grateful. San Antonio is the Army headquarters of the Department of Texas. Brownsville is an important point on the Lower Rio Grande, at the most important American town on our Rio Grande frontier, connected with the points along the river. It is in the interest of peace and quiet on the border to have as speedy communication between San Antonio and these points as circumstances will admit. To these reasons, of course, the usual commercial reasons may be added.

Most respectfully, yours,

S. B. MAXEY,
United States Senator, Texas.

Hon. THOMAS J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.

This letter is dated July 5, 1879, and the filing was on July 9, 1879. Accompanying this communication is the following :

WILLARD'S HOTEL, WASHINGTON, D. C., July 8, 1879.

DEAR SIR: Please let me know if you will act upon applications on file for temporary service, San Antonio and Corpus Christi route.

Yours, respectfully,

J. B. PRICE.

Gen. THOMAS J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

That letter was filed July 9. I find also the following:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 15, 1879.

Statement of contractor on route No. 30140, San Antonio to Corpus Christi, Texas, as to difference in cost of operating said route under existing schedule and proposed expedited schedule:

Under present schedule of 40 hours, 150 miles, six times a week and back, can be performed with 20 animals and 8 men; but should speed be increased so as to run the route in 29½ hours, it would take 74 animals and 23 men.

J. B. PRICE, Contractor.

WASHINGTON, D. C.: Personally appeared before me this 15th day of July, 1879, J. B. Price, who signed the foregoing statement, and, being duly sworn according to law, says upon oath that said statement is true to the best of his knowledge and belief.

[SEAL.]

H. B. ZEVELY,
Notary Public.

Lest I forget it, I desire to say at this point that I understand there is no question made as to the propriety of that expedition, and I think it will be conceded that the propriety of it is not questioned. I mention that in justice to Senator Maxey. The route runs through a densely populated country, and the demands and requirements of the people, commercially and otherwise, are such as to justify the expedition. So much for that. The other expedition in question was upon route 30183, from Monroe to Shreveport. Monroe is the terminus of the railroad running from Vicksburg, or from a point opposite Vicksburg called Delta, 90 miles, I think, into the interior of North Louisiana. There is a railroad being rapidly built now between Monroe and Shreveport. It has been projected for 15 or 20 years, and it was partially graded fifteen years ago. The distance between Monroe and Shreveport, I think, is about 165 or 170 miles. Shreveport is the second city in Louisiana, the eastern terminus of the Texas Pacific Railroad, and at the time of this expedition the Texas Pacific road was completed, of course, and about that time or soon after, connected by way of Fort Yuma, on the Rio Colorado, with the coast line running to San Francisco. Here is the application of Mr. Price for that expedition :

JEFFERSON CITY, MO., June 25, 1870.

DEAR SIR: The present schedule time on route 30183 from Monroe to Shreveport, La., is forty hours. The press and people are anxious to have the service expedited, at least during the summer and fall months when low water in the Red and Ouachita rivers interrupts navigation, much to the prejudice of commerce. This route is the most important land route in Louisiana. It distributes double the mail matter of any land route in the State. It connects important business cities and supplies a large population of industrious and intelligent people. By reducing the running time eleven hours from May to January each year, which would cover the low-water season, the citizens supplied by this route would receive their mails from fifteen to twenty hours sooner than they otherwise would, by reason of closer connections with the railroad at Monroe and Shreveport. I therefore propose to convey mails in twenty-nine hours each way, at the general pro rata increase of pay allowed by the Department in similar cases, for the eight months embraced between May and January.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. B. PRICE.

Hon. T. J. BRADY,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Below this communication is the following indorsement :

I fully indorse this application.

J. B. ELAM,
M. C. Fourth District.

This district is the one through which, in part, this route runs, and Shreveport is the principal town in the district, which was then represented by Mr. Elam. The indorsement is signed also by "E. W. Robertson, sixth district." Mr. Robertson represented the district just below, in which Baton Rouge is situated, and which is now represented by Mr. Lewis, and the distribution of the mails for all that district of country from the northwest, from up in the neighborhood of Shreveport, and from Arkansas and Western Texas is, of course, by way of Shreveport. I mention this to explain the interest taken in that route by Mr. Robertson. Below the indorsement signed by these two gentlemen is another, and I ask the committee to notice the manner in which my signature appears here :

I concur in this petition.

W. P. KELLOGG.

You will see (exhibiting the paper) that my name appears down in the corner, and that it is written carelessly, as I oftentimes indorse papers. Mr. Price says in his testimony that he thinks he came to me after having gone to Mr. Elam and Mr. Robertson and got me to add my indorsement. My indorsement, you will notice, is in the words, "I concur in the above." Now, I suppose I write that from twenty to thirty times a month upon different papers—sometimes every day. Sometimes I step into a store to borrow a pen to write it, sometimes I write it in the corridor of the capitol, sometimes on my table, and sometimes at my desk. At that time I was doing a great deal of indorsing of applications, perhaps quite as much, or more, than now, because our offices down there are pretty well settled now. The civil service rules were not in force at that time, and everybody seeking an appointment as a clerk there would come to me for an indorsement, and I was constantly writing indorsements, and my usual manner of indorsing such a paper, especially if I had no particular interest in the matter, was, "I concur in this" petition, or application, or whatever it might be.

Now, I want to say to the committee that they will not find anywhere in the evidence—anywhere—the slightest proof that I rendered any service whatever in connection with the procurement of this expedition except writing this simple indorsement. Some gentleman here—I think it was Mr. Woodward, or perhaps it was Mr. Ker—said that Mr. Kellogg did render service in connection with this matter because he indorsed the application. I find in the testimony of Mr. Bliss, on page 209 of your record, these questions and answers:

Q. And he (Mr. Walsh) stated before the grand jury that he had made money payments to Kellogg?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And it was on account of his influence?—A. No, sir; Mr. Walsh did not know anything about that. That is just where the break came.

Mr. Bliss, certainly, if not another of the attorneys connected with the prosecution, has said repeatedly that there was a missing link in the evidence in this case; that they never could prove any service rendered by me; and there is a member of the House upon the Democratic side who heard Mr. Bliss say that he thought it would be utterly impossible to make a case against me, for the reason, if for no other, that there was this missing link, and if the committee care to know the name of that member I will give it to them. You will find that ground taken repeatedly by Mr. Bliss, I believe, and perhaps by some others, in the course of the history of this case.

Now, I will call the attention of the committee to what Mr. Price says, and I will give it in the very worst form, for I want to be perfectly candid in this matter. As I gather from the testimony of Mr. Woodward, Mr. Merrick, and Mr. Bliss, Mr. Price, who was indicted in June, 1882, made an affidavit under these circumstances: Some months after he had been indicted his son went naturally enough to Mr. Merrick, at New York. Some of my Republican friends thought it a significant fact that Mr. Price's son is a member of the Democratic committee in Louisiana, from my district, but I do not attach any great importance to that. Mr. Price's son goes to New York, to Mr. Merrick, and has a conference with him upon this subject, as Mr. Merrick himself states. Mr. Price's son says to Mr. Merrick, "I want my father to get out from under this prosecution." "Well," says Mr. Merrick, "if you will make a statement against Kellogg"—that is just about the substance of it, as the committee will see from the testimony that has been given here—"if you will make a statement against Kellogg, I will agree to give your father immunity." "But," says young Mr. Price, "I want to be certain of it." "Well," says Mr. Merrick, "don't talk to me any more about it now; go away and send me an attorney." The attorney comes. I am not going to trouble this committee about that attorney, though I think I know who he was, and precisely what occurred. It is enough for me to say now that the attorney comes on; Mr. Merrick, or some one else, writes out a statement which they want Mr. Price to swear to; whereupon, to use the expression of one of the attorneys, they put Price into Woodward's hands in order that he might set his pumps to work." Now, let us see what Woodward says about Price's affidavit. I have not got Mr. Merrick's testimony here, so I speak of it from the report in the papers, and from what I have been told; but here is what Mr. Woodward says on this subject:

Well, in the year 1882, I went to Connecticut to spend the holidays, and, perhaps the day after Christmas, I was telegraphed to to come back immediately to Washington. I came here and was told that a controversy had arisen between the counsel respecting the acceptance of Mr. James B. Price as a Government witness, and that the matter had, in a certain sense, been referred to me. I was handed a statement, unsigned and unsworn to, which purported to give what Mr. Price was willing to testify to, and was told to see him and obtain more explicit information. I spent two days with Price, taking down his statements. He put them in my hands in trust, to be returned to him in case he was not accepted as a witness. I called on the Attorney-General and read this statement. He asked me more or less questions about the relations of the testimony of Price and Walsh to each other and to the case. I explained everything as well as I could, and there seemed to be no doubt in his mind with regard to the propriety, and, in fact, the necessity of accepting Price as a witness.

This statement, which was handed to Mr. Woodward "unsigned and unsworn to," the committee will find, by turning to the evidence of Mr. Merrick and others, proved to be so unsatisfactory that it was handed back with the intimation that Price must make his statement more satisfactory and significant. Now, I have here the affidavit of Mr. Price, for it crept into the public prints, as pretty much everything of this kind did. I do not care to go into that question, but if I were to do so it would be quite interesting to show the committee how everything relating to my case was promptly made public, so that even when Price testified before the grand jury the Associated Press was furnished with a statement of his testimony direct from the grand jury room by some one, I believe, connected with the prosecution, who furnished what purported to be the evidence given against me—not the evidence as it was really given. In the first affidavit that was published, or that fell under my observation, there was a curious and significant omission. There was no statement that Price had delivered to me the petition and application for these expeditions. That was not in the first affidavit that I saw. I do not know whether the copy I saw was correct or not, but there was no such statement in it. In the next affidavit, however, were the words, "Kellogg said he would see Second Assistant Postmaster-General Brady and learn of him what could be done." I hold in my hand the affidavit given to the Associated Press as it appeared in the National Republican of this city of March 28, 1883, the day after Price appeared before the grand jury, and in that statement of the affidavit that Price had made, which was, as they stated, in the hands of the Government attorneys, and of which they give what purported to be an abstract "obtained from what are believed to be trustworthy sources," this occurs:

Affiant then applied in person to William Pitt Kellogg, whom he had known for many years, saying to him, "If you succeed in increasing my pay on this route I will give you $20,000." Kellogg said he would see Second Assistant Postmaster-General Brady, and learn of him what could be done.

That statement appeared in the affidavit as given to the Associated Press. Now, what does Price testify to? I do not care to go into it in detail. The committee have the testimony before them, and can examine it for themselves; but I call their attention to the fact that nowhere in that testimony does Price make any such statement, or charge that in any conversation that he alleges he had with me in regard to this matter, I ever said one word to him of this kind, or ever said anything even implying that I would go to Mr. Brady and procure this service, or that the service would be procured by my intercession or influence in the Post-Office Department. No such statement, I think, is in Price's evidence. He makes a statement of what he alleges took place between us, and says that nothing more took place. He says that the conversation lasted but a moment or two. He says that his head has been out of fix, and that he does not recollect distinctly, and so on. In this connection I desire to read portions of Price's testimony bearing upon these two points. He does state, however, the point in regard to the delivery of the petition and the application. On his direct examination one of the attorneys for the United States asked him this question :

Q. Here is a paper (marked number 5), did you hand that to Mr. Kellogg? Was that the application?—A. Yes, sir.

This was the paper that I have called your attention to here, with “I concur” at the bottom of it.

Then the counsel asked him, “Did you also hand him the other papers connected with the Corpus Christi route?” and he answered, I believe, that he handed the applications on both routes to me. Now, on his cross-examination this occurs :

Q. I wish to show you this paper (No. 5) that was shown you yesterday, and see if you are not mistaken as to having given that paper to Mr. Kellogg. Notice the indorsement on the back of it. It seems to have been filed in the Department on the 10th of July.—A. [After examining the paper.] I never noticed the indorsement on the back. But it is usual, in making applications for service, to have the application indorsed before the filing of the paper.

Q. No, no; but here is a paper filed in the Department on the 10th of July, as shown by the file mark. So you must be mistaken about having given that paper to Senator Kellogg.—A. Well, quite possibly.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Just ask him if he took it off the files.

Q. You did not take it off the files after you had put it there?—A. No, sir.

Q. I find here the name of J. B. Elam, M. C., of Louisiana; do you know him?—A. Very well.

Q. Who was he?—A. He was the Congressman representing that district.

Q. The district in which this service was to be performed?—A. Yes, sir; Shreveport.

Q. And E. W. Robertson’s name, sixth district, also appears; who is he?—A. A Congressman from Baton Rouge, La.

Q. He was a member of Congress at that time?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Both of these gentlemen have signed this application of yours?—A. Yes, sir; I carried it to them and they signed it.

Q. Do you not recollect, also, of carrying that application to Senator Kellogg, and that he signed it, and that then you went and filed it with all those names upon it?—A. I carried it to him and he signed it.

Q. Do you not remember carrying it to the Department?—A. I do not remember filing it, but I surmise that it must have been filed, since you called my attention to the indorsement.

Q. So that, as to that, you must be mistaken in what you stated yesterday. How long did this interview last between you and Senator Kellogg, to which you have referred?—A. It was of very short duration.

Q. How many minutes, do you think?—A. A few minutes, I could not surmise.

There is a good deal bearing upon this part of the case, and while I am speaking of this testimony I want to say that Mr. Price states here two points. When he speaks of the drafts having been given to me he is asked this question : “Q. That was the end of the matter?—A. Yes. I don’t suppose there was a word said. I handed them to him and walked off.” Mr. Price, I think, says that he put the drafts in the envelope, handed them to me, and walked off.

Now, I want to ask your attention to his testimony on one other point, namely, the immunity that he was to receive. On cross-examination he gave the following testimony on that point :

Q. You were indicted, were you?—A. I was.

Q. And you had been indicted before you went before the grand jury?—A. I had been.

Q. And that indictment is still pending, so far as you know?—A. It is.

Q. I want you to state whether immunity has been promised you from prosecution on this pending indictment against you in the event that you would testify before the grand jury, and in these cases against Brady and Kellogg?—A. Personally, it has not.

Q. What has been done about it?—A. But my friends have given me the assurance that if I came forward and testified to the facts, immunity would be granted.

Q. Are you relying upon that?—A. You may draw your own inference.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. That testimony which you have been reading be the testimony of Mr. Price in court on the trial?—A. Yes, sir. Now I want to settle this matter of the service right here. If there be any further evidence necessary I will give the committee the names of four or five gentlemen, one of them a gentleman formerly connected with the prosecution, to whom Mr. Price has admitted that I had nothing whatever to do with the matter of procuring this service. I have the affidavits here of two witnesses, and I can give you the names of two or three others in addition, if it be desired, who will swear that Mr. Price has stated, repeatedly and explicitly, that, so far as Kellogg was concerned, he did not procure the service; that these transactions were entirely with Walsh; that Walsh got the expedition; that his (Price's) dealings in that respect were with Walsh, and that I had nothing whatever to do with the matter.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE :

Q. Do you say that Price has made an affidavit over his own signature to the effect that he has made such statements?—A. Oh, no. I say that I have here the affidavits, and that I can produce three or four witnesses who will testify that he has made such statements, and I can give the committee their names, if they are desired. When Mr. Cook was an attorney in the star-route cases he had an interview in New York with Price, who stated there explicitly to Mr. Cook and one or two other persons that he had had no dealings with me whatever in relation to these two expeditions. I am glad that the gentleman (Mr. Van Alstyne) interrupted me, because I do not wish to be misunderstood. I make no charges or accusations against Mr. Price. I state the facts as I understand them, and as I gather them from the evidence, those matters that are not within my own knowledge. The matters within my own knowledge I state, of course, upon that knowledge, and am responsible for them. I do not believe that Mr. Price desired to give this testimony against me. He was a sick man, and is still, and I think he is the best man among them—far superior to Mr. Walsh, in my opinion, whatever Mr. Bliss and others may say about the matter. I think that Mr. Price, being a sick man, and having been indicted, this matter troubled him very much, and he is a very sensitive man, and I suppose he felt that he must get out from under the indictment; so, for that purpose, he made a statement about his giving me the drafts. Mr. Price made that statement about giving me the drafts, leaving it to be inferred that I had some business relations with him in this matter. You will observe that all these witnesses testify that they rely upon Walsh. Mr. Merrick testifies that he relied upon Walsh; Mr. Bliss testifies that he relied upon Walsh; nobody seemed to rely upon Price. Walsh was their reliance, and not so much Walsh's parol testimony as his papers, the letters and telegrams that he was ready to produce bearing upon this question, which, as he averred, would inculpate me.

Before I leave the question of service I want to say a word in regard to these drafts. Originally, I had intended to go into this matter fully and state the origin of this thing as I understand it, fortifying myself with such facts and documentary evidence as I could procure to show the animus of this attack upon me, and the cause of its being pressed against me. I think it must have occurred to the committee that there must have been some overpowering motive influencing Mr. Walsh—a man whom I had befriended; a man in regard to whom it would be easy for me to prove to-day by twenty witnesses that I had for years been uniformly his friend. Why, Mr. Raum, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, said to me a few months since, "Kellogg, you ought to have let me send Walsh to the penitentiary." It is well known that Mr. Walsh was mixed up with our politics in Louisiana; that he got into a difficulty with Governor Warmoth; that when Warmoth and I were squabbling over State affairs Walsh stood with me, and that I had a friendly feeling for him. He is a man of education, and a man of considerable adroitness and suavity, a companionable man, and I have felt kindly toward him, and have rendered him one unbroken line of favors, running through years. Indeed, I understand that he stated before this committee, in the course of his testimony, that he felt very kindly toward me, and that I had been a friend of his, yet, strange to say, he went before the Mitchell grand jury and, as he told me afterwards, and as he repeatedly stated in his evidence, indicated, in a sentence or two, that he had received certain drafts from me, thus connecting me with this matter. Mr. Bliss says that Walsh did not produce any papers before that grand jury, and it is known to the committee that that grand jury did not find an indictment. There was no grievance there. There was no reason why he should have felt bad about that. But we next find him going to Mr. Merrick, two weeks later, and telling him that he feels aggrieved because he was not permitted to tell all he knew in regard to me before the Mitchell grand jury. He complains about that to Mr. Merrick, and says he wants to be "vindicated." Mr. Merrick tells him that he will see that he is vindicated, and that he has a fair show; that he shall have a chance to get before the grand jury again, and that he (Merrick) will have the grand jury reconvened for that purpose. Mr. Merrick says that he was very anxious that Walsh should testify in the case pending against Dorsey and Brady, and that he told him that if he would testify in that case he would see that he was vindicated. Perhaps I had better read a portion of Mr. Merrick's testimony on that point, which has been handed to me. He says, page 599 of your record:

I continued to urge him to testify in the Dorsey-Brady case, and said that I would see that justice was done to him; that he should have an opportunity of vindicating himself; that I would cause the grand jury to be reconvened, and that he should go before them again and give his testimony in regard to Kellogg, which would be the best vindication he could have. He said that if I would do that he would testify in the Dorsey-Brady case; that all he wanted was to be vindicated and fairly treated. I told him I would see that he was both vindicated and fairly treated, and would have the grand jury reconvened. Mr. Walsh did testify in the Dorsey-Brady case, as you are all aware.

I call attention to this to show that Mr. Walsh was very anxious to get before all these grand juries, and when he got before the Hutchinson grand jury they listened to him for two days. Now, if I had time, and the committee cared to go into that, I would show them the animus of this thing from letters received by me containing extracts from newspapers of a very suggestive character; and I would also show them the process served upon me, demanding my attendance in court for the purpose of testifying in substantiation of a claim that Walsh had made against Brady. I would show the committee that Walsh desired that I should assist him in procuring from Brady, or from the contractors, some forty and odd thousand dollars, which he claimed he should receive.

Q. Should receive from whom?—A. Either from Brady or the contractors or some one. However, I do not care to go into that now.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Do you mean to say that before he gave his testimony, and before he had that interview with Mr. Merrick, you had been importuned, by letter or otherwise, to aid him in recovering a claim which he had against Brady or against the Government?—A. I do, sir.

Q. What had you done in reply to those requests?—A. I had utterly refused. It is a long story. We had had some difficulty in regard to the matter. It would consume so much of the time of the committee that I do not care to go into it now; but, at the time he had his interview with Mr. Merrick, he intimated that he wanted to see me, and I did see him. He demanded then that I should aid him in procuring his claims against Brady, and it was after that time, or about that time, that he first indicated that he had had notes of Brady's. He had made the statement which Mr. Bliss has produced here, and which I have read; a statement revised and corrected in his own handwriting, and then given to Mr. Bliss, in September, 1881, in which statement he gave a different version of this indebtedness of Brady to him, and did not claim that it did grow out of any notes at all. He also omitted there a very significant passage, which appears in the testimony that he gave in court, and which gave the court the opportunity to rule his testimony in, namely, the statement that in that conversation with Brady in regard to the notes, Brady said he was only demanding from Walsh the same pro rata amount that he demanded from all the other contractors. Walsh had never thought of that at the time he made the statement in September, 1881. In that statement he says positively that he received those drafts from Brady, and my name does not appear anywhere in the statement.

Mr. STEWART. That is already in evidence.

The WITNESS. Well, if it comes to that, I could pile up evidence showing the animus of this business. Letters have been sent me. I have one here now from New York that I had thought of reading to the committee, but I will not take the time. The whole question was as to whether I would aid him in compelling certain men to pay him money, and because I would not do that, and corroborate his evidence, he has pushed these proceedings against me. Only a year ago I received a process from a New York court, in which Mr. Walsh had made an affidavit setting forth that I knew of an indebtedness, which I could by no possibility have had knowledge of, existing on the part of Brady to him, Walsh. He says that I paid him $10,000 as the agent of Brady, which he knows to be utterly false; and that was the basis of the application in the civil suit pending before Judge Bartlett in New York against Mr. Brady, to have me brought as a witness to prove an indebtedness on the part of Brady to him.

Now I will leave the question of service, and pass to the question of indebtedness. The question is, did I receive any compensation? If I did not render any service whatever, of course the charge is baseless. If I rendered service, and did not receive any pay for it, that would not be an offense within the statute. Mr. Walsh alleges that I received one-half of the proceeds of five drafts of $3,000 each, if my memory serves me right, and a note of $5,000, given by J. B. Price. Now I want to state to the committee precisely what relation I had to those drafts. As is well known, my contest for my seat in the Senate, the case known as the Kellogg-Spofford case involving the question of my seat, was pending in April, May, June, and July, 1879, having originated in April, 1879, at the extra session of the Senate. We had taken a great deal of evidence. The witnesses arrived in Washington on the 4th of June; they began to testify on the 5th of June, 1879, and the committee continued to take testimony during part of June. Congress adjourned on the 1st of July that year, and in the mean time the committee had taken, I suppose, 500 pages of testimony, which was being transcribed, and I was looking after it and making a summary of it, with the aid of my attorneys, Messrs. Shellabarger and Wilson, with the view of going to New Orleans and attending the session of the subcommittee that had been directed, by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to go there and take testimony, commencing on the 17th of November, 1879, at the St. Charles Hotel. I was then living at Willard's, as I am now, and occupying the same rooms that I now occupy—rooms 70 and 71. Mr. Walsh had been living on Fourth street, but had given up his house there, had sent his family to Fortress Monroe, and taken rooms at Willard's adjoining mine, his being rooms Nos. 72 and 73. His parlor opened into my parlor. Mr. Price was at that time in room 83. This, you will observe, was about the close of the fiscal year, and the contractors were all here looking after their contracts. Mr. Walsh had, it appears, just procured expedition—you may have heard of it in the testimony adduced before you—a very large expedition, as it turned out to be, growing out of what is termed the McDonough contract on the route from Santa Fé, New Mexico, to Prescott. He had had the service expedited and the pay increased, first, I think, from $18,000 to $36,000, then from $36,000 to $74,000, and then from $74,000 to $135,000. I am not sure, but I think that is a substantially correct statement. Mr. Price had, I believe, a route called the Albuquerque route, running in the vicinity of Mr. Walsh's, and of course they were friends and were together a great deal. Now I call attention to certain facts of which I have procured a memorandum from the hotel register. From that register it appears that Mr. Walsh came to Willard's Hotel and occupied room 72 and 73 on June 4th, 1879; left on the 12th of July; returned on Friday evening, July 18th; left July 21st; returned, and left July 23d; returned again October 20th; left October 29th; returned November 1st and occupied room 32, and left again November 5th. Mr. Price came to Willard's and occupied room 83 on June 30th, 1879, in the morning; left July 12th; returned July 15th, in the morning; left July 18th, after dinner; was there on different occasions during August and September, returned October 30th, and left November 5th. He occupied room 52 while he was there. He came here and occupied a room near Walsh's on October 30th. Walsh arrived November 1st, and they both left November 5th. I had left Washington the latter part of July. I think I was here some time during the summer, and then casually for a day or two looking after some matters connected with my case, and then I went West and South.

At the hotel we were often together and Walsh and Price were in and out of my room a great deal, having been, as I understood, old friends in Louisiana. Mr. Walsh had procured his expedition, and Price knew it, and Price himself was applying for expedition, and, as I understood it, they were working together, though I did not know the details of the matter. Mr. Walsh left the hotel on July 12th and went to Saint Louis. He returned on the evening of the 18th of July. Before Mr. Walsh went away he said to me, "If Mr. Price gives you any papers, keep them for me." Mr. Price came to me, as nearly as I can recollect, on the 18th of July, the very day that he left according to the hotel register, which would be Friday. Walsh had not returned; he returned that night. Price came to me and said, "Hand these papers to Mr. Walsh." I put the papers in my drawer. Mr. Walsh arrived on the evening train, and the register shows that he arrived after supper. Mr. Price had left after dinner. Immediately after washing and getting supper Mr. Walsh came into my rooms, and we sat up, as gentlemen often do, smoking and talking, and I think it was that evening, but if it was not it was early the next morning, that I handed him the package in the envelope, whatever it contained, telling him that Mr. Price had left it with me for him. Now, that is my whole connection with those drafts. Walsh has himself made a statement that I had no connection with the drafts, and Mr. Price practically admits it in his testimony when he says, as I had read, that not a word passed, that he handed me the drafts and walked away.

Now, I want to show this committee how much compensation I received. That is a question easily settled. According to the statement last made by Walsh, I handed him these drafts, and told him to set one-half to the credit of Brady, and give me the other half. Now, that is a matter that we can get at. The question is, Did Mr. Walsh pay me any money on those drafts and on that note? I have a copy of that note, and I will read it. It is the note that it is said accompanied the drafts that Mr. Walsh afterwards stated, and that I have reason to believe, I handed to him. This note reads (I read from the court record):

$5,000.00.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 16, 1879.

Less 300 and 4,700 due. Four months after date I promise to pay to the order of myself five thousand dollars at First Nat. Bank, New York. As collateral security attached, see list on back of this note with power to sell at public, or notice upon non-payment of this obligation.

Due November 19.

The indorsement on the back in red ink is:

List of collaterals attached to note: One thousand shares of the "The Shakespeare Gold and silver M. and M. Co.;" also the note of Hugh White, indorsed by M. Salisbury, dated Washington, Jan'y 13, 1879, for four thousand dollars.

Then follows the indorsement "J. B. Price," which is erased by marks drawn through it. Below that is this indorsement:

November 8, '79. Credit on the within note ($300) three hundred dolls.

Now the statement of Mr. Walsh, as I understand it, and I do not think there is any dispute in regard to it, is that in conformity with my instructions—which I deny absolutely and unqualifiedly—he did pay to me one-half of that note, and one-half of the drafts. Let us examine that question, and let us take the note first. On page 1733 of the court record, Mr. Walsh, testifying in the first star-route case, as it is called, gave certain testimony to which I call the attention of the committee. The counsel were going over this matter of his suit against Brady, and the credits he had given, &c., and he was examined as follows:

Q. You have given him [Brady] credit here for $5,000.—A. That was the Price note that he gave me [MY NAME HAD NOT BEEN MENTIONED AT ALL AT THAT TIME] that was collected by Winslow, Lanier & Co.

Q. That who gave you?—A. That Kellogg gave me.

If you will notice the context, you will see that my name does not appear anywhere else in his testimony. He has been talking about Brady, and about the credits that he gave Brady, and there is, I think, a place in his evidence where he makes out that the note and the draft were given to him by Brady, just as he represented in that statement made in September, 1881, produced here by Mr. Bliss, but in the answer that I have just read he says, "That Kellogg gave me." Then he was further examined as follows:

Q. You say that Kellogg gave you the $5,000 note?—A. He gave me $15,000 in postal drafts and $5,000 in a note of J. B. Price.

Q. A $5,000 note?—A. Yes.

Q. That you are sure of?—A. Very sure of it.

Q. As sure as you are of anything you have stated?—A. I am very sure of it; yes, sir.

Q. And you gave him [Brady] credit for that $5,000?—A. As the examination afterwards shows.

Now, I want to call the attention of the committee to page 1752 of the record, where there is a schedule or bill of particulars given, together with the affidavit of John A. Walsh, in a suit that he had brought against General Brady, a suit entered in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. In this suit, in his petition Walsh gives Brady credit for this identical $5,000 note—i. e., $4,700 and $300. In this affidavit he states that it is a bill of particulars, and he predicates it upon an unliquidated account; whereas afterwards he testifies in regard to the existence of notes. If the committee cared I could tell them just how that originated, and how it was set up, and how Walsh came to testify about those notes. I could give you the name of the lawyer who was called in, and could tell the manner in which that whole thing was set up so that Walsh should testify about those notes and interject into his evidence the statement of what Brady had said to him on the occasion of the interview, and that Brady had wrested those notes from him—a ridiculous story, as seems to have occurred to some of the members of this committee, because I observe that in Walsh's examination here Governor Stewart remarked to him, "You are not a weakling" In the same way it was arranged that he should inject into his testimony in regard to that interview the language which he put in Brady's mouth—"I expect you to pay just what all the other contractors pay." However, I will not dwell upon that part of the case, but I cannot pass from it without making one additional remark. I make no charge, but I want to call attention to the testimony of certain witnesses here. Mr. Bliss says in this connection, at page 207 of your record:

Now, as regards Mr. Walsh, he could not testify to the payment of any money in the Dorsey routes or anything of that kind. Walsh's testimony related solely to his own route from Prescott to Santa Fé. He claimed to have paid money to Brady; that he gave that to Brady from time to time as loans, and when he called upon Brady for a settlement, that Brady then said, "Why, I don't owe you any money; I have done enough for you. Have you not had a good contract, and various things of that sort?" That is the way it was presented in connection with the original statement regarding the route from Prescott to Santa Fé. On that basis of things, as a lawyer I should say it was exceedingly doubtful whether that evidence of Walsh would have been admissible in the Dorsey case, which related to entirely different routes; to entirely different parties. I thought it would hardly come within that class of decisions which allow you (where you are trying a man for false pretenses in a particular case) to prove that he made other false pretenses to other persons of the same general nature. At any rate, it appeared to be very doubtful whether it would be allowed as evidence against Dorsey. I remember that I gave the matter careful consideration. It turned out, however [the committee will notice the language, "it turned out"], that according to Mr. Walsh's version of his interview with Mr. Brady during that time, when he was having this discussion, that they went to work, and had some figuring, and that Mr. Brady said to him in substance, "You must pay such a percentage of expedition, and such a percentage of increase, just as the other contractors do," indicating very plainly by that that all of the other contractors were doing that thing.

After an elaborate argument, as I recollect it, extending over two or three days, Judge Wylie admitted that testimony into the Dorsey case. You will not find it in the original brief of what Mr. Walsh would testify to in connection with the Prescott and Santa Fé route, which these gentleman produced at Long Branch. It came to my knowledge incidentally, considerably later on. With Mr. Walsh I had comparatively little to do. He early conceived a hostility to me. Mr. Merrick was the party who, after my first interview with him, had dealings with Mr. Walsh, as a rule. It was Mr. Merrick who ascertained from time to time what Mr. Walsh could testify to.

I read now from Mr. Merrick's testimony, page 598:

Q. When did you first learn the fact that Mr. Walsh was a material witness for the Government in that case?—A. At some time in the progress of the trial I learned it, I think from Mr. Woodward, and possibly Mr. Bliss also may have spoken to me about it. After I learned of it we had a consultation about it. I know that before Mr. Walsh testified Mr. Bliss and I had a consultation about his testimony—a very full talk. Now, just when I first learned of it I do not know, but it was after the trial began, and my impression is that it was brought to my attention by Mr. Woodward. The discussion between Mr. Bliss and myself was in regard to the admissibility of the testimony, and we agreed that the testimony was admissible in the case for the reason that Walsh would say [notice the language, "Walsh would say"] that Brady had avowed that the rule which he sought to apply to him (Walsh) was the rule applicable to all contractors, and therefore it embraced these contractors.

Mr. BLISS. But that statement was only obtained from Walsh after the trial commenced.

The WITNESS. That may have been.

Now, I do not want it understood that I charge Mr. Bliss or Mr. Merrick, or any of these attorneys, or Mr. Woodward, with having persuaded Mr. Walsh to change his original statement, which they had in their hands—the statement he had made in September, 1881. I cannot imagine that those gentlemen would induce Mr. Walsh to resort to the extraordinary story that he did resort to. Still, he must have told it to them, and he did tell it to them in this connection, and I repeat that I know of the lawyer with whom he consulted, and who advised him that he could not maintain his suit against Brady upon an open account; that no person in the world would believe that story any more than the grand jury would believe it, or did believe it; and thereupon Walsh changed his plan entirely, and resorted to the story of the notes. Now, I have shown that Mr. Walsh, according to his own testimony, did not pay me that $5,000 note, or any part of it, and that he swears unqualifiedly that he gave Mr. Brady credit for the proceeds of the note. But he says in an interview—and I take his interview rather than his statement before the grand jury—

Mr. STEWART. If you will allow me to make a suggestion, Mr. Kellogg, it seems to me that your case would be better presented if you would state the facts as you understand them, and pay your respects to Mr. Walsh afterwards.

The WITNESS. I admit that my statement is somewhat disconnected, because it is so hurried and incomplete. If I could take my case consecutively and have a day or two in which to state it fully, it would be much more satisfactory to me, and also, I think, to the committee; but the circumstances seem to forbid that at present. I am just going to pass from Walsh. I am simply on the question of payments now. Mr. Walsh states that he gave me a number of checks and drafts; he calls them drafts, but I call them checks, and I think they are called checks in common parlance. I am very anxious that the committee should see those checks, and I will show them a copy presently. One of them is a check for $2,000, which Mr. Walsh says represents a part of this note and drafts. There is also a check for $500, paid to Shellabarger & Wilson about that time. Now, I am prepared to show the committee that that $2,000 check given by Mr. Walsh to me related to an entirely different matter. He has sworn in the first star-route trial that he gave Mr. Brady credit for the whole of the $5,000, but I will show the committee that all the money that he paid me proceeded from an entirely different source, and was paid for an entirely different purpose. Mr. Walsh owed me money, and if the committee desire I have any amount of documentary evidence to show that fact, and if you are willing to examine the witnesses who make these affidavits I will bring them here and prove the existence of that indebtedness on the part of Mr. Walsh to me. He owed me money. I had just returned from New Orleans in December, and on the 23d day of December I went to Mr. Walsh for the fourth or fifth time and told him that I wanted him to pay me a certain amount he owed me, and he agreed to give me, and did give me, a check. It was a check upon the bank of Lewis Johnson & Co., and was payable on demand. I told Mr. Walsh that I must have the money. He said that he had not the money to spare at that time, that he was endeavoring to stock his route anew, and had no money to spare, but that if I would agree to indorse a note for him of $2,000, and have it discounted, as I was going to New York the next day, and set the amount to his credit at the banking house of Winslow, Lanier & Co., he would pay me $2,000 that day; and then when this note came due, thirty or forty days later, he would take it up. I was going to Worcester, Mass., to spend the holidays, and going through New York, leaving here on the night of the 23d, and in order to get my money, I agreed to Walsh's proposition. I took the check that he gave me to Lewis Johnson & Co. and had it cashed. I took his note, which he gave me that day, with me to New York, arriving there on the morning of the 24th. I went down to the banking house of Winslow, Lanier & Co., and went into Mr. Charles Lanier's office. Walsh had an account there, but he had run it down pretty well, because, as I was told by him, on account of his expenditures in stocking his route. I said to Mr. Lanier that I wanted him to discount Walsh's paper, and give him credit for $2,000. He hesitated a little about it, but finally said, "If you will indorse it I will do so." I sat down and indorsed the note. He rang his bell. Mr. Chamberlain, his cashier, came in, and Mr. Lanier told Mr. Chamberlain to discount that, and the "ticker," as they call it in bankers' parlance, shows that it was discounted, and they gave me their check for $1,987.56, and I indorsed it and sent it to Walsh. The only way I have of judging the length of time the note ran is the amount of discount at the rate of 6 or 7 per cent. When I saw these papers published by Walsh, and understood that he was trying by means of them to connect me with this Price transaction, I was quite certain that that $2,000 check had come in some peculiar way, at his instance, but the circumstances I could not recall. The grand jury had failed to indict; Walsh had published his interviews in the Herald on the 17th and 20th of November, 1882. After the failure of the grand jury to indict me, he went to New York, and in a few days made a publication setting forth his testimony before the grand jury, with notes, checks, &c., this check being among them. As I have stated, I felt that this check had come in some peculiar way, and I tried to recall the circumstances and to investigate the matter, but I could find no clue to it among my papers, because I keep no books. Walsh testified that he had kept books, but that they had been taken to Welcker's and sold for old paper. How to get at this matter I did not know, when, one day, at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, I was talking with Governor Warmoth, and he said, as nearly as I recollect: "I know that fellow very well. There is a catch in that; didn't he have you indorse that over to somebody else in some way?" I said, "That is not possible; I remember very well sending him back a check sitting at Mr. Lanier's desk." "But," said Governor Warmouth, "are you sure that it was payable to him?" I said, "I am not so sure about that." "Well," said he, "let us walk down there." We walked down to the office of Winslow, Lanier & Co., and took the cashier into our confidence. He put two or three of his men at work, and they ran through the papers and found the check, a copy of which, with the indorsements and the certificate of the notary, I will read:

No. 91423—B

I hereby certify that the above is an exact copy of the original draft No. 91423, issued by Winslow, Lanier & Co. on the Third Nat'l Bank, N. Y., and of the indorsements thereon.

[SEAL.]

HUMPHREY J. MONAHAN,

Notary Public, City and County of New York, Nov. 30th, 1883.

I have here also a letter from Winslow, Lanier & Co., transmitting this and expressing regret that they cannot consistently take the original from their files or otherwise they would send it. This accounts for the two thousand dollar check. When I saw this, the matter came back to my mind in a moment. Ben. Scheckel was Walsh's clerk; he is now a clerk in the War Department. He did not keep Walsh's books, he says; Walsh kept his own books; but Scheckel ran backwards and forwards and collected for him. Scheckel received that check, and if you send for the check and for Mr. Scheckel he will testify to that fact. I have seen the check. I know that the indorsment is in Mr. Scheckel's handwriting and he received the money for Walsh. That accounts for the two thousand dollar check published by Walsh. Now, I say to this committee that I have evidence of indebtedness, and affidavits and documents from New Orleans, showing an indebtedness on the part of Mr. Walsh to me of several thousand dollars, if the committee cares to go into that matter now or at any time hereafter. It is enough for me to say at present that I account now for the principal draft of $2,000, and that I will account for every single draft or check that Mr. Walsh has paid me. One is for $500, less a discount of 7 or 8 per cent., payable to Messrs. Shellabarger & Wilson, my attorneys, and dated in July, 1879, I think. The next is for $500, I think, and there is another for $625, and one for $600; another is this one for $2,000, and later on I think there is one for $1,500 that Walsh says, I am told, that he has lost, but I say to this committee that I am prepared to show that these payments all related to legitimate indebtedness of Walsh to me and had no relation whatever to these postal drafts, and that the money he paid me belonged to me of right, without regard to any supposed service that I had rendered in relation to mail matters, and I am prepared to show the origin and basis and nature of that indebtedness in general and in detail, if the committee desire.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. You say that Walsh gave you a check for $2,000?—A. He gave me a check for $2,000 on the 23d of December.

Q. A check on what bank?—A. On Lewis Johnson & Co., in this city. He gave me the check and I received the money.

Q. You received the money in this city?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And then, for his accommodation, you took his two thousand dollar note and indorsed it, and Winslow & Co. discounted it?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And, on account of that note which was discounted, you received this two thousand dollar check, less the discount?—A. I received the two thousand dollar check.

Q. And that check you indorsed to Walsh's clerk?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And it was transmitted to him or to Walsh?—A. To Walsh. The moment my eye fell on that I remembered that he had told me to indorse it to Sheckel.

Q. Did Walsh pay the note to Winslow, Lanier & Co. when it matured?—A. Certainly he did.

Q. And that was all there was of it?—A. That was all there was. That accounts for the two thousand dollar draft; it shows you the origin and nature of that transaction, and the use he made of it shows the methods he adopted to cut off all evidence of indebtedness, and if I had time I could show his tracks all the way through this conspiracy. If Walsh had been an honest banker, simply doing a regular banking and collecting business as he said, and if the transaction had been such as he described, and if I was to have the half of that note, he would have paid me my $2,500 in full; he would not have stopped with paying me $2,000; but he not only did not pay me $2,500, which would have been half the amount of the note, but he did not pay me even $2,000 until I myself indorsed his note and procured a discount on it, which note he paid later, and on an indebtedness due to me.

Q. Do you remember why you indorsed that check to Sheckel instead of to Walsh, if Walsh was to have the benefit of the money?—A. That was at the instance of Walsh. He told me to indorse it to Sheckel; why he told me so, I do not know.

Mr. WILSON (counsel for Mr. Kellogg). It may have been to enable Sheckel to indorse the check in Walsh's absence.

The WITNESS. No; Walsh was here.

Mr. WILSON. But he might have been going away.

The WITNESS. Well, I never did understand the reason of that, any more than I understood the reason of a good many other things that Walsh did.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. You say Walsh had an account with Winslow, Lanier & Co.; why didn't you leave the money to his credit there?—A. Because he desired me to send it to him, in order to replace the $2,000 that I had got from Johnson & Co. a day or two before on his check.

Q. Do you remember the date of that check?—A. It is dated December 23. The check as published by him is correct, I think.

Q. At the time you received that two thousand dollar check here in Washington, you say it was paid to you by Walsh on account of an indebtedness from him to you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that, you say, was indebtedness growing out of your past business transactions?—A. Yes, sir; in New Orleans.

Q. Was it in any way connected with his star-route transactions?—A. Not in the slightest degree.

Q. It was not given to you for any service that you had rendered him in that way?—A. Not in the remotest degree.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Let me understand this matter clearly. You say that on the 23d of December, 1879, Walsh paid you a $2,000 check, and you got it cashed at Lewis Johnson & Co.'s?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You received the benefit of that?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was that for any sum of money that Walsh owed you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then why did not that square your account? If he simply owed you that much, and paid it at that time, why did not that payment end the matter?—A. It ended the matter so far as that payment was concerned.

Q. That ended the Lewis Johnson & Co. matter?—A. That ended the Lewis Johnson & Co. matter. Mr. Walsh afterwards took up the note discounted by Winslow, Lanier & Co., and I gave him credit for the $2,000 he had paid me.

Q. You enabled him to borrow the money to pay you?—A. Yes, sir; I have put this check in evidence for the two reasons I have stated. I have shown that Mr. Walsh swears that he gave Brady credit for the Price note, but I have not been content with that. Inasmuch as he has intimated, or left it to be inferred, by publishing that $2,000 check, that it was part of the proceeds of the Price drafts, I have gone on and shown how that check came to be given, and in what manner it was received by me.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Now, you say that there was a $500 check that he drew which was payable to your counsel, Messrs. Shellabarger & Wilson?—A. Yes, sir; less discount. There is also among others a check of, I think, $1,200 or $1,500. There was another payment that he made me, I feel quite sure, but I have tried in vain to ascertain when it was made. I have a letter here from Mr. Lewis Johnson, in which he says he is utterly unable to find any such check. Walsh states somewhere, I think, or some one states for him, Mr. Ker, perhaps, that some of the checks that he relied upon were lost and could not be produced.

Q. In what did your account against Walsh rest or consist?—A. I will go into that if the committee will hear me.

Q. Just answer my question.—A. It was a note that he gave me in 1877 for $6,000. In January, 1879, I put to his credit $1,900. I have the certificate of it here.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What did that relate to?—A. It related to a note that I had indorsed by him, and I took it up and set that amount to his credit. That was another favor that I did him.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. You say you had a note of Walsh's in 1877 for $6,000?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where is that note?—A. It was finally paid and surrendered to him about the last of December, 1880, or in January, 1881.

Q. Was that note outstanding and due at the time you got this $2,000 check?—A. Oh, yes, sir; I have affidavits in regard to that; two of them made by men who cannot be impeached, and one of whom had the note in his possession and presented it to Walsh at one time.

Q. Was that payment indorsed on the note after it was received?—
A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the other payments that were made to Messrs. Shellabarger and Wilson—were they made also on that note?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Mr. Walsh produced before the committee several checks payable to your order; were those checks given and applied to that $6,000 note of which you speak?—A. Yes, sir; every one of them on indebtedness to me.

Before I pass on to another branch of the case I want to make an explanation in regard to the proceeds of these drafts. It will be borne in mind that Walsh testifies that he agreed to set to my credit one-half of the amount of the five $3,000 drafts, making $15,000 in the aggregate, and one-half of the $5,000 note. He testifies that one-half of the amount was to be paid to me and the other half to Mr. Brady. I have shown you that he testified in the first star-route trial that the proceeds of the $5,000 note were given to Brady absolutely. I will now show you that one of the drafts, if not more, was made payable and was paid to entirely different parties. Here is a draft of Frank Seaman, assignee of J. B. Price, for deposit, indorsed by Frank Seaman, and after that E. J. Masson, showing that it passed through two or three hands; but Mr. Walsh, in his testimony before the court, stated that he paid it to Frank Seaman.

Mr. WILSON. The indorsements show that.

Q. Who is Frank Seaman?—A. I do not know; he is a Brooklyn man, I believe.

By Mr. CRISP:

Q. Are those drafts indorsed by Walsh?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. That indicates that Walsh received the money?—A. That either he or his assignee received the money. In his testimony in the star-route case he was asked if he collected all of them. He answered that he did not; that some of them he assigned, and that he assigned one or more to Frank Seaman.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. According to that statement they were all for his benefit?—A. Yes, sir. Now, the committee will notice that Walsh testified in the star-route trial that he paid the proceeds of the note of Price—the $5,000 note—to Brady, or gave him credit for it. They will notice also that one of these drafts is assigned to Frank Seaman. Walsh says he put to Brady's credit $7,500 of the proceeds of the drafts, so that I could not have got that money. Then, in addition to that part of the proceeds of the drafts, there is the $5,000 note which he says he put to Brady's credit. That makes $12,500—

Q. (Interposing.) But he stated that $7,500 of the money came from some other source—from Petersen.—A. I am still right, Mr. Chairman; wait a minute. I am speaking now of the postal drafts. Now, if Walsh paid Brady, say, one-half of the $15,000 in postal drafts, that would be $7,500 of that money placed to the credit of Brady. Then Walsh swears further that he credited Brady with the proceeds of the $5,000 note. That, as I have said, makes $12,500 that he swears he gave to Brady. Then there is this other postal draft for $3,000 collected by Seaman.

The CHAIRMAN. That is embraced in those other drafts.

Mr. CRISP. As I understand the witness, he is seeking to show the particular application of each one of these drafts. The substantial thing, as I understand it, is that Mr. Walsh says he got $20,000—no matter how he got it—$10,000 of which went to Mr. Brady and $10,000 to Mr. Kellogg, and these details as to what he did with the drafts it seems to me are entirely immaterial.

The WITNESS. But what I want to show is that, according to Walsh's own testimony, I could not have received $10,000 of the proceeds of those drafts and that note.

Mr. CRISP. If the money was necessarily paid out of that specific fund, that would be correct; but if half the whole amount was for you, he might still have given Brady $5,000 as a payment on his half, and then paid you out of the proceeds of the other drafts.

The WITNESS. But he does not account for any payment to me except half of the Price note and drafts, and yet he swears that he credited Brady with the whole of the Price note.

The CHAIRMAN. I think he swore that he paid half the proceeds of that note to you.

The WITNESS. Yes; I think he did so swear in one of the star-route trials.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Kellogg's point is this: That there is a contradiction in Walsh's testimony, because he testified on the Dorsey-Brady trial that Brady had received the entire proceeds of that $5,000 note, and he testified here that Mr. Kellogg received half the proceeds of the note. He says now, in substance, that he collected the money on these postal warrants and the $5,000 note, and credited Brady with half and Kellogg with half. Now, the point made here seems to be immaterial. If you were criticising Walsh before a jury as to the question of his credibility, and as to how much reliance was to be placed on his testimony, I can see that an attorney might make a point on that, but I do not think it is very material here.

The WITNESS. Oh, no, I am not making the point in that way. I am only showing you that, according to his own evidence, it would not have been possible for him to have given me more than $4,500 of the proceeds of those drafts and that note. But, as I have said, I am prepared to account for everything he has paid me. I was going on to show now that, according to his own evidence, he paid Brady, or gave Brady credit for, the proceeds of the Price note, and then indorsed one of those drafts to Seaman, and as to another one he says that I drew on him in the winter of 1881 for the $1,943, of which he says $1,500 was part of the next to the last draft, and $443 was the proceeds in part or in whole of the Petersen draft. I refer now to what he said in a published interview; I don't think he even swore to this. I have here the very draft that he says I drew on him, together with copies of telegrams and letters relating to that transaction. Here is the draft:

Please pay to Messrs. Winslow, Lanier & Co., 26 Nassau street, $1,900, and this will be your receipt for the same.

On the back is, "Pay to the order of Winslow, Lanier & Co.," and then "Returned."

Here is the letter of Winslow, Lanier & Co.:

NEW YORK, March 4, 1881.

DEAR SIR: Herewith we return your order on John A. Walsh for $1943, unpaid. We have presented this at his residence several times, but could not collect.

Very respectfully,

WINSLOW, LANIER & CO.

Hon. WM. P. KELLOGG.

Now, I was going on to say that there is $3,000 of these drafts that he assigned to Seaman, and he does not, I believe, claim that he has paid me anything since that time. Then there is half the Price note, amounting to $2,500, which he swears he gave Brady credit for, and the other half that he says he paid me, showing that there is only left $4,500 out of that fund that could by any possible means have come to me. I say further that whatever he did pay me I can account for as a payment upon an indebtedness which he owed me. I will not trouble the committee with the details, but that is the substance of it. I desire here to say that Walsh never did pay me that $1943.

Now, as to the Petersen matter, if the committee care to go into that, I have Petersen's affidavit and the evidences of indebtedness, which I will cheerfully produce at any time they are desired. The point that I make is that I never rendered any service, and that there is no evidence that I ever did render any service. When Walsh was asked before the grand jury if he knew that I had rendered any service, he said that he did not. He had to say that for his own protection, as I understand it, and there is no evidence outside of Walsh that I did render service. I say that I never received any portion of those drafts. I may have received a part of the proceeds of the drafts, but whatever he paid me he paid me upon a legitimate indebtedness from him to me, as I am prepared to establish. Now, I may be asked, "Why was it that you did not go into the merits of the case before the court?"

Mr. CRISP. We are not going into that question, Mr. Kellogg.

The WITNESS. Well, then, I do not care to trouble the committee with it.

By Mr. CRISP:

Q. I understand you to say that the evidence does not disclose that you were instrumental in procuring that expedition, and that it does not show any other connection of yours with the matter than that your name appears indorsing the application?—A. None other that I am aware of.

Q. Now, I want to know whether in fact you did have any other instrumentality in procuring that expedition?—A. I stated in the outset this morning, I think, before you came in, that I absolutely did not aid in procuring the service on these two routes, and Mr. Brady, if you send for him, will be compelled to swear to the same thing if he swears to the truth. If Mr. Price had come to me and had said, "I desire you to make inquiry at the Department about this matter," I should certainly have done it; or if Mr. Walsh had come to me in the same way, I should have done it; but Mr. Walsh knows, and others know, that he was a broker here engaged in that business, and you have only to send for George F. Brott and Mr. Petersen and others to establish the fact that Walsh was engaged in getting mail contracts expedited and receiving pay on the same.

Q. You did not have any conversation with Mr. Brady on that subject?—A. I never spoke to Mr. Brady in my life in regard to it that I can recollect. I have asked Mr. Brady, and Mr. Wilson has asked him, and he says that he never spoke to me in regard to the matter. He says that Mr. Elam and other members of Congress from Louisiana were very anxious that the expedition should be made, and that he thought it a meritorious case, as I believe it is conceded to have been; I state that in justice to Mr. Elam.

Q. You say that Walsh paid you $2,000 by a check?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And $500 at another time?—A. That is my recollection.

Q. And $625 at another time, and $600 at another time, and $500 to Messrs. Shellabarger and Wilson?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. That aggregates $4,225. Now, as I understand you, those payments were applied by you to an indebtedness from Walsh to you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Will you be good enough to state when that indebtedness arose?—A. I will, sir [referring to a paper]. In January, 1877, I was elected to the Senate in Louisiana. As is well known in Louisiana, Mr. Walsh was around the legislature, advancing money and buying up warrants. I left about the middle of January, and just before I left—a night or two before I left—we were making up funds in order to provide for our legislature and for the taking up of warrants that had been issued under an act which I had approved. The Nicholls government had done the same thing. Mr. Walsh came to me and expressed the belief that Hayes would be maintained, and that the Packard government would be maintained at the same time. He was banking upon that, and raising what money he could for investment. I was about to go away, and he asked me to let him have some money, and I did let him have some. I have here an affidavit made by Mr. W. G. Lane, who was a member of the committee on contingent expenses, I think.

Mr. CRISP. Unless you desire to go into those details, Mr. Kellogg, I do not think it is necessary.

The WITNESS. I thought you desired it.

Mr. CRISP. No, sir; I merely want to know in a general way how the indebtedness arose.

The WITNESS. Well, it arose in that way. I came up here with my credentials, and the Electoral Commission was in session, and Hayes was finally declared to be President, and I went back. Walsh had an office in Gullier court, I think, where he was a broker. My brother-in-law, Mr. Wills, had dealings with him as a broker; and in our final settlement, on the 30th day of May, I believe it was, 1877, we settled up and I took Walsh's note for $6,000. The note is fully described in an affidavit by a gentleman of whom Mr. Ellis or any of our members will, I think, tell you is entirely reliable.

Q. And that was the origin of the indebtedness?—A. Yes, sir; that was the way the indebtedness arose. The note was held for a while, and then presented to Walsh, and then it was sent on by another man to me, and I have here the affidavit of a gentleman who held it and presented it, and who knows its history from the beginning to the end. I have here a number of affidavits in relation to it. Here is the affidavit of Mr. Petersen in regard to that indebtedness.

(The witness here handed a number of papers to the chairman.)

Q. (Referring to the papers.) Who is W. G. Lane?—A. W. G. Lane was connected with the committee on contingent expenses of the legislature, and was a sort of financial agent of Walsh there.

Q. Where does Lane live?—A. In New Orleans.

Q. He swears in this affidavit that he heard Walsh say that he had borrowed $5,000 of you at that time.—A. Yes, sir; he knows the fact, and the use made of it, as it went into a fund used by Walsh. That could be easily established.

Q. What fund?—A. The fund that was raised for the purpose of purchasing warrants and paying the expenses of the legislature. There was the Nicholls legislature establishing a government, and on the other side was our legislature, and there were no taxes being paid to either. One legislature passed an appropriation act under which they issued warrants, and the other legislature did the same thing. It was believed that if Hayes was declared President, Packard would be maintained as governor of Louisiana, and these speculators were purchasing the warrants of our legislature on that chance, and they paid for them just in proportion to the belief they had in their intrinsic value, depending upon the chance of the maintenance of the one government or the other.

Mr. WILSON. Walsh was speculating in those warrants?

The WITNESS. Yes, sir; he was speculating in them.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. How did it happen that Walsh borrowed $5,000 of you?—A. Well, it was very natural that he should borrow of me, because he was borrowing of any one that was a friend to our government. I had just been elected Senator, and I wanted the government to be maintained.

Q. Why did he borrow money from you, who had been the governor of the State and had been elected Senator?—A. It had nothing whatever to do with the election.

Q. You had been elected and of course you were interested in maintaining the legislature that had elected you?—A. I was.

Q. And these warrants of which you speak were issued for the purpose of keeping that legislature alive?—A. Yes.

A. And Walsh was speculating in them?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And he came to you to borrow some money?—A. Yes, sir; he wanted me to let him have some money and I let him have it.

Q. He borrowed money from you at that time for the purpose of assisting him in buying those warrants?—A. He was a friend of mine and had been helping to maintain my government and had had difficulty with my opponents, and he came to me and wanted this money and I let him have it.

Q. Was there any other interest or relationship existing between you and him that caused him to borrow that money of you except his desire to invest the money in those warrants?—A. He told me afterwards that he had invested that money and $20,000 more in those warrants, and had lost a great portion of it, but at the time I did not know anything about that; I did not stop to inquire. He was a friend of mine and of my government, and was anxious to see me succeed, and I had shown him uninterrupted friendship up to that time, and he asked me to lend him the money and I did.

Q. You do not answer my question, which is whether there were any other business relations between you that caused you to advance him that money?—A. No; I cannot say that there was. He knew very well that I had the money, and that I would aid him if he asked me.

Q. What did you know about it?—A. Nothing. He was also acting as broker for my brother-in-law in connection with a plantation that I was interested in.

Q. You lent him the money and took his note?—A. Yes.

Q. Where is that note now?—A. I have already explained that when he had paid me these various amounts I surrendered the note to him. That was in this city.

Q. Did he give you any security on that note, or was it merely his own paper?—A. Just his own paper. I would take his paper and he would take mine. I have indorsed his paper repeatedly.

Q. Do you say that that payment by you of $5,000 to Walsh was a loan which you and he expected would be repaid?—A. Oh, absolutely. It was so understood.

Q. It was not the proceeds of any legislative influence that he had exerted?—A. None, whatever.

Q. Nor of any other political matter?—A. No, sir.

Q. It had nothing to do with politics?—A. No, sir; it had nothing to do with politics.

Q. It was a mere business transaction?—A. It was a mere business transaction.

Q. And that was repaid to you by the proceeds of the so-called Price drafts?—A. That I do not know, except from his statement.

Q. And you say that at the time when he says he was paying you for your influence with Brady, he was in fact paying you that indebtedness?—A. Yes, the indebtedness accruing from the $5,000 loans and other indebtedness; he sold some sugar for my brother-in-law and we settled that also in the final settlement.

Q. How much in all did you receive from Walsh?—A. I cannot tell you exactly, but in three or four years running I must have received over $7,000.

Q. Was it as much as $10,000?—A. No, it was probably between $7,000 and $8,000.

Q. Was there any part of the $7,000 or $8,000 that you received from Walsh, during the period that we have been talking about, which was the proceeds of either the $5,000 note or the five drafts of $3,000 each which Price has mentioned?—A. None whatever, that I am aware of, though he may have paid me out of the proceeds.

Q. And the payments had no relation whatever to those matters?—A. None at all. Walsh made a point about this $1,943, and this "dynamite," these letters that he has been talking about. Now I have brought those letters, and I will give them to the chairman, if desired, that they may be incorporated in the record, and I am prepared to account for every one of those checks. I refer to the letters and papers that Mr. Merrick said he wanted when he remarked that he did not want Walsh himself so much as he did his papers. I have got all those papers—that dynamite—and I will account for every paper.

The CHAIRMAN. Walsh did not make any statement in reference to that $1,943, and it is not involved in this matter. Mr. Bliss stated in his testimony before the committee that you admitted to him on one occasion that you had received this money, but that it was not received in payment for service in securing expedition, or anything of that kind, but as a political contribution from Price to the Republican party. Have you anything to say on that point?

The WITNESS. I want to preface what I have to say about that by stating that the first intimation that I had of anything of that kind was from an interview purporting to have been had with Mr. Merrick and published in the Baltimore Sun a year ago. It was there intimated that some party had stated that I had said that I had received that money for political purposes, and then soon after this I saw a published statement by Walsh in which he accused Mr. Bliss of having said the same to the Attorney-General. Soon after, the Attorney-General having his attention called to the statement, denounced it to one or two newspaper correspondents as untrue; stated with very strong emphasis that it was entirely false. After that Walsh came out and commented upon that denial by the Attorney-General, and attacked the Attorney-General on account of the language he had there used. I heard no more about that until the very day that my case was set down peremptorily for trial, which was a Saturday. Brewster Cameron said to me, "Well, we don't know that we can get Walsh, but do you know that that man Bliss has been telling Merrick and Ker that you acknowledged that you received that money, but claim that you used it for political purposes?" I said, "It is not possible." "Well," said Mr. Cameron, "I did not think it possible, because I heard him testifying before the committee, and Mr. Springer asked him if he knew about anything of that kind, and he said that he did not, except as he had heard it from some friends of Kellogg's upon the outside." Thereupon Mr. Cameron said to me, "Didn't you receive through the mail a package of the testimony?" I said that I had received it, addressed in a feigned hand. "Well," said he, "I sent that to you in order that you might see what Bliss testified to before the committee, and so that you could afterwards confront him with it in case he should say that you had made this acknowledgment." The matter ran along for a time until I picked up Mr. Merrick's testimony and my attention was called to a colloquy reported there between Mr. Bliss, Mr. Merrick, and the chairman, in regard to what Mr. Bliss had told Mr. Merrick that I had told him, and I saw that, according to that report, Mr. Bliss had stated that I had said to him that I had received money from Walsh, but that it was for political purposes. I had some curiosity to know what he would say about that when he got upon the stand again, but I have not been able to see that part of his testimony.

The CHAIRMAN. He stated substantially that.

The WITNESS. Very well. Now, I state that I called upon Mr. Bliss in June, 1882, and stated to him in substance, and practically, just what I have stated here to-day in regard to the drafts and the manner in which I came into possession of them. He asked me if I had received any money from Walsh. I told him I had received money from Walsh. I did not know what Walsh was testifying to before the grand jury or what he would testify to, but Mr. Bliss went on and told me what Walsh would testify to, which was that he had paid me from the proceeds of the drafts. Now, Walsh may have paid me money from the proceeds of those drafts, and I said to Mr. Bliss in substance that Walsh "has paid me money, and it may have come from that source. But it is an outrage to attack me as I have been attacked on such testimony as that, because the fact is that every dollar that I received from Walsh went to my attorneys, Shellabarger & Wilson, and other attorneys that I employed in connection with the contest for my seat went to pay them and to pay my other expenses; and, in fact I have spent almost a fortune in maintaining my seat in the Senate and for political purposes. There is not a single dollar that I have received for years, except the money derived from my ordinary sources of revenue, that I have not put into politics, except what I have had to spend for my living expenses, and a good deal even from my ordinary sources of revenue has gone in for political purposes, and I think that for a man who has made such sacrifices for his party as I have made to be attacked in this way is an outrage."

Q. Then you did not state to Mr. Bliss that you had received that money and used it for political purposes?—A. I cannot believe that Mr. Bliss has said that, other than as I have explained.

Q. Did you so state to him?—A. No, sir; I would not be apt to do that when I had published cards, one of them published contemporaneously with that, making a different statement, and when my attorneys and a large number of other persons knew to the contrary. The report in the paper as to what Mr. Bliss did testify on that point was vague and uncertain, and but for that I would have come before this committee at once, or would have gone directly to Mr. Bliss. The interview between Mr. Bliss and me was very hurried. He was packing up to go to New York, and I was sitting in his room when some messenger came in and the interview terminated. Still, he could not have misunderstood me, I think, or understood me to say that, for I have uniformly stated otherwise. I may have complained that it was an outrage to treat me in this way, because I had spent so much of my means in politics, and made such pecuniary sacrifices for my party, that it was an outrage to attack me in such a way under such circumstances, when I had absolutely done nothing wrong.

Adjourned.

WASHINGTON, July 3, 1884.

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. You are the Attorney-General of the United States?—

Answer. I am, sir.

Q. Will you please state when you were appointed to that position?—

A. I think I took the oath of office on the 1st day of January, 1882. I was appointed some time in December, 1881; on the 15th, I think.

Q. Prior to your appointment as Attorney-General were you retained as counsel for the United States in the star-route cases?—A. I was.

Q. Please explain the circumstances of your employment as counsel in those cases, and state what compensation you were to receive.—A. I had a telegram sent to me by Mr. MacVeagh, then Attorney-General, while I was arguing a case up in Mauch Chunk, asking me to come here and take part in conducting the star-route cases, and I postponed accepting the offer until I returned to Philadelphia, and finally until I came to Washington. I had to go up to Altoona, in the mountains of Pennsylvania, to see about another case, and when I got through with that and it was adjourned I came down to Washington. I then accepted the employment of the Government, and subsequently went home and prepared an argument on the application for an information, and studied the cases, and occupied myself for near two months with them, until I came into office as Attorney-General. I was diligent in studying them for I had a great deal to learn about them. I argued a motion to dismiss that information. Then I became Attorney-General, and there my connection with the matter, as employed counsel by the Government, ceased. I knew nothing of the cases except as I had read of them in a general way in the newspapers until Mr. MacVeagh appealed to me. When I came here I had to learn all about them, and I studied them at home and did learn about them.

Q. What compensation did you receive for your services in connection with those cases before you became Attorney-General?—A. I got what amounted to about $5,000. I know that I received two payments for services rendered.

Q. The contract for your compensation was made with Attorney-General MacVeagh?—A. Yes. Mr. Bliss being in the cases before me, we had a conference upon the subject, and he informed me that Mr. James and he had some understanding with Mr. MacVeagh. The details of that are better explained by Mr. Bliss in his letter which is published in the report I made to the Senate upon what is called the Van Wyck resolution. I believe you have the document here. There are several letters there that allude to the subject of compensation, and there is one letter in particular written to Judge Lawrence, the First Comptroller, in which Mr. Bliss explained the matter and told his story about it. The result of our conference was that Mr. Bliss told me he was to have $100 a day and his expenses. That I understood to be the arrangement, and of course, as leading counsel, I charged the same. In fact I charged less than $100 a day for the time actually occupied by me with the cases, and I charged nothing for expenses. I did not fix the rate of compensation, I did not believe the cases would take so great a length of time as they did—nothing like the length of time they did take subsequently—or I would not have taken the employment, as I could not have afforded to have left my own practice for so long a time. Mr. Bliss told me there was a contract to pay him, and it was understood that he was to have $100 a day and his expenses before he consented to take charge of the cases. He explained the matter in his letter to Mr. Lawrence. My bills were approved by Mr. MacVeagh, and by the Acting Attorney-General, Mr. Solicitor-General Phillips, and were paid before I went into office.

Q. Mr. Bliss was employed in the star-route cases before you were appointed Attorney-General, and the contract made with him, whatever it was, was made by your predecessor?—A. Yes; and Mr. Bliss so reported it to me; and I had no knowledge in any way of the compensation that he was to get until I derived it from him, shortly after I consented to act with him.

Q. What attorneys were already employed in the cases when you became Attorney-General?—A. Mr. Cook was, and Mr. Gibson was acting in some capacity—a sort of counsel—I did not know exactly in what capacity he was employed. I did not understand that he was to take part in court; I thought he was a kind of a solicitor, arranging the papers and putting them in order. He seemed to have a great deal of authority in the case, and to be the active man.

Q. Do you know why the services of Mr. Gibson and Mr. Cook were dispensed with?—A. I do. The letter in which Mr. Bliss gives an account of the manner in which he was retained is dated New York, November 12, 1882, and appears upon page 11 of Senate Executive Document No. 156, which I now hold in my hand. In that document there are other letters and papers—letters written by me to Mr. Bliss, and by Mr. Bliss to me, upon this very subject, that go to explain all about this matter of the rate of compensation. Now, I beg your pardon; you asked me a question that I did not answer, which was whether I knew how the services of Mr. Cook and Mr. Gibson came to be dispensed with. Mr. Bliss privately to me took serious objection to Mr. Cook and Mr. Gibson, and expressed the opinion that it was not safe to have them in the case, and told many things, the details of which I now forget, which went to the discredit of those two persons, and made it quite uncomfortable and improper to have them in the case. Mr. Cook and Mr. Gibson came to me and complained that Mr. Bliss treated them with a want of confidence; that their usefulness was hurt by the manner in which they were treated—not merely their feelings, but their usefulness in the case. I objected to hearing any private talk about it, and suggested that they meet Mr. Bliss and say what they had to say in his presence. I have the impression that Mr. Woodward, too, at that time, came to see me upon the subject, and gave me to understand in pretty plain terms that it was not safe to continue the employment of Mr. Cook and Mr. Gibson. They withdrew themselves. They proposed to leave, and I was at first rather disinclined to part with them abruptly. I thought it would injure the case to have a sudden break-up of the attorneys in that way, and I wanted to consider what the effect of it would probably be. I consulted with Mr. Bliss, and the more I talked with him the more he insisted upon parting with Mr. Cook and Mr. Gibson at some speedy and convenient opportunity, and the more I came to think of it I was convinced they ought to be parted with, but I was not prepared to act at the time when they sent me their letters of resignation. Mr. Gibson I did not want to part with as soon as I did. I thought his services were useful and important, and that the objections to him were exaggerated. I wanted to be as gentle as I could with both Mr. Cook and Mr. Gibson; I did not want to deal sharply with them or to form a stern or a harsh judgment. However, the result was that they withdrew; but it was the intention to dismiss them.

Q. Were any special reasons given by Mr. Bliss for desiring the dismissal of Messrs. Cook and Gibson?—A. Yes; among other things the reason was given that it was not safe to trust them with the papers; that he and Mr. Woodward had to lock up the papers, or to change the combination of the lock of the safe, in order to prevent those persons from getting access to them. He stated also that he was of the opinion they were disclosing the information contained in the papers to people upon the other side—to the defendants. Mr. Cook and Mr. Gibson, on their part, complained that they could not get access to the papers; which corroborated Mr. Bliss's statement.

Q. Please state the position that Mr. Bliss occupied in relation to these star-route cases.—A. Mr. Bliss I confided in above all men in the case. When I came into the cases they had been given to him in special trust by the Post-Office Department. I was made to understand that Mr. James had selected Mr. Bliss, and as those prosecutions were, to a certain extent, instigated by the Post-Office Department, and were urged in furtherance of the interests of that Department and of the postal service, I recognized him as the most important person in the cases, as representing that Department, and I so recognized him all the way through. He of the counsel had full and, I believe, exclusive access to the papers, and he seemed to have a more thorough knowledge of the details of the cases than anybody else. At that time I did not know Mr. Woodward's position in the investigation. Subsequently I learned that Mr. Woodward was the person who had been the means of arranging and methodizing the papers and getting them ready for the investigation and for use upon the trial, and that Mr. Bliss was and had been in constant intercourse with him. I was in a peculiar position. After Mr. Gibson and Mr. Cook left there was nobody in the cases but Mr. Bliss and myself, and my impression was when I went into the Department as Attorney-General that I could continue to hold the lead in conducting the prosecution; but I had not been there many weeks, not more than two or three in fact, when I discovered it was almost impossible I could do so and attend to the duties of the Department; that it was impracticable; that it could not be done, because the business of the Department required my constant attention in the office and at the Cabinet. Then it came to be very important to know who should be employed to aid Mr. Bliss in conducting these cases, and I conferred with him about the matter. He insisted in a most peremptory, in a very earnest and urgent letter—I think in two letters, but certainly in one—that he would leave the cases if Mr. Corkhill was not dismissed from the District attorneyship, because he had no faith in him. He said Mr. Corkhill was treacherous; he was in the interest of these star-route people; that he had access to the grand jury, which opportunity he would abuse to the prejudice of the prosecutions; that he was a trouble and a hinderance to the prosecutions, and if he were not removed would be the means of absolutely frustrating the work that he, Mr. Bliss, proposed to do in the cases. I consulted with the President upon the subject, and the President said to me, as he has said all the way through, "I want this work to be done as you are doing it, in the spirit in which you are doing it; I want it to be done earnestly and thoroughly. I desire that these people shall be prosecuted with the utmost vigor of the law. I will give you all the help I can. You can come to me whenever you wish to, and I will do all I can to aid you." And he did so all the way through, without a moment's hesitation—always stood by me and strengthened me and gave me confidence. I went to the President about this matter of Mr. Corkhill's removal. I did not like the thought of removing Mr. Corkhill. The charge against him was only of a general character. Then, again, I regretted very much that he was not in the cases—not that Mr. Corkhill as an individual was not in the cases, for I knew but very little about him, but that the district attorney here was not engaged in the prosecutions. I thought he ought to take command of them. But it seemed that Attorney-General MacVeagh and the counsel had distrusted him from the beginning, and had refused to give him a position in the cases, and he complained very bitterly to me he had been excluded in a way that touched his honor and humbled him. The President said to me, "If you say this gentleman ought to be dismissed, dismiss him. You are to be the judge of that, and I will respect your judgment." Mr. Corkhill had just then been doing some very useful and, I thought, very effective work as district attorney in the Guiteau case; that case was unfinished, and I thought—I am not merely giving you my thoughts now—I not only thought but said that it would be a very unfair thing and a very impolitic thing to put him out of the district attorneyship when he was in charge of that case, which was one of national importance. The President agreed with me about that, and we both paused and hesitated about removing him. His removal was demanded to take place upon or before a given night; it was claimed it was necessary bills should be signed before the statute of limitations would run. Mr. Ker had that idea in his mind, and he, in conjunction with Mr. Bliss, came to see me and told me that Mr. Corkhill would refuse to sign the indictments when they were presented to him, and would put them in his pocket, and the practical result would be that the statute of limitations would have run. I had to act with promptitude, and I went to Mr. George F. Edmunds and conferred with him. I came away from the conference with the President authorized to have Mr. Corkhill removed and another person appointed, and I went to confer with Mr. Edmunds. I had a personal acquaintance with him and had a high esteem for him, as every person has who knows him. Then he was the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and would have to pass upon the act of removing Mr. Corkhill and appointing his successor, and for those reasons I went to confer with him upon the subject. We talked the matter over, and he agreed with me it would be a very harsh and a very impolitic thing to put Mr. Corkhill out at that time and under the circumstances. Mr. Edmunds also thought the district attorney ought to be in charge of the prosecutions if possible, but agreed with me that, as he had been theretofore excluded, it was too late to talk about that. Then, in conversation, I said, "I will have to obtain somebody to help Mr. Bliss, and I must have some one very soon;" and Mr. Edmunds suggested Mr. Merrick should be selected and employed by me as an assistant. I had already considered that subject, and I agreed with him. Mr. Merrick was selected for the reason that it was considered a proper thing to disassociate the cases from all political feeling, and to select a prominent Democrat to appear in them for the Government with the other counsel already employed, so there could not be any charge of anything being done that was not known to all parties, and so that the prosecutions should be manifestly in the interest of the public and not of any party. Then I wrote Mr. Bliss a note, in which I was a little guarded about suggesting the employment of Mr. Merrick, because, out of a proper feeling of courtesy and delicacy, I did not want to put anybody in the cases without the entire assent of Mr. Bliss, believing that to do so would be both discourteous and impolitic. Mr. Bliss came to me and said he was well pleased to take Mr. Merrick. Mr. Merrick was absent from the city in Chicago. I telegraphed him, and upon his return he came to see me, and Mr. Bliss accepted him at once. Mr. Merrick considered the matter for a little while, a day or two, and then consented to accept the employment, and Mr. Bliss proceeded to instruct him in the cases. Before this, Mr. Bliss came to me and said, "I am in a puzzle about the pleadings in these cases; I cannot draw them; I have not the proper facility at it, and I have not the time." I replied, "Select somebody, and whoever you select I will employ." He came back again and said, "I thought I had a man in New York, but when I come to reflect I am satisfied he will not do, and I wish you would select some suitable person." I thought a little while, but I then recalled only one person I believed was sufficiently skillful as a criminal draftsman, and that was Mr. Ker, who had been assistant district attorney in Philadelphia, and had made considerable reputation there in connection with some very important bills he had drawn and that had met with open public approval of the court and the profession. I knew, too, that he was a faithful, diligent man. I was not intimate with him. I knew him and knew his reputation for respectability, industry, and integrity, and particularly for an aptitude for drafting criminal pleadings. I sent for him and he came, and, upon reflection, I concluded to employ him for another reason. He was a Democrat, and I preferred to commit the preparation of the pleadings in these cases to the hands of a Democrat, because party feeling was running quite high, and as the object of the Department was to conduct those prosecutions in the public interest and not in any way for party purposes, I was determined that if the pleadings should prove to be defective in any way, there should be no room for charging they had been made so intentionally from a desire to protect any of the parties indicted. Therefore, I employed Mr. Ker to draft the pleadings, and he immediately took charge of the matter, came to the Department of Justice, had rooms assigned to him and worked there for weeks with great industry and perseverance, oftentimes till late in the night. I sent for Mr. Corkhill and told him exactly where he stood, and said to him, "It is in my power now to remove you on the spot." As I have already said, he complained with a good deal of feeling of the treatment he had received, and pledged me his honor that he had never thought of doing anything except his duty to the Government in connection with the cases. He did say that if he had been treated in a more considerate manner he would have been better pleased to have been out of the cases than in them, because he had personal relations with some of the defendants, and it would have been an unpleasant thing to have had to proceed against them; but, notwithstanding that consideration, he would have proceeded against them. He said that some of them were people once of high character and high official position with whom he had enjoyed close relations, but that would not have deterred him from performing his duty, and he then said to me, "Mr. Attorney-General, if you will produce those bills of indictments to me, instead of caviling over them as you have been told I would, I will put my name to them on the spot, in obedience to your command; and if at any time in the course of the proceedings you find me or hear of me doing anything which indicates that I am not faithful to the Government, I am willing to be removed. I want to be tried by you and am willing to abide your judgment, and I am deeply in debt to you for your kindness to me in this instance." I said, "Wait," and I sent up-stairs where the bills were being prepared, and ascertained that they were nearly done, and at a very late hour in the night they were brought down to me. I handed them to Mr. Corkhill, and without a word he put his name to them then and there, that very night. That ended the transaction—that part of it. Mr. Bliss continued in charge of the cases as managing and controlling counsel, going before the grand jury, as I was informed, marshaling and arranging testimony, and working in the cases with diligence and energy, and, I thought, with considerable aptness. Mr. Ker prepared the indictments, as I have told you. Afterwards he went into court, and I was surprised to find him in court taking part in conducting the cases. My impression was, when he was first called to Washington to be employed in the cases, that he would only prepare bills and then appear in court to maintain the legal propriety and fitness of the bills for their purpose, in case any point of legal dispute should arise, any point that might be raised or any issues that the defendants might make in law, and after that he would retire. But the cases went along, and I found that he was appearing in court, and when I asked Mr. Bliss about it he said Mr. Ker had a knowledge of the details of the cases; that he, Mr. Bliss, was obliged frequently to be absent from court for a considerable time before the grand jury, and it was essential to keep Mr. Ker in the cases, because Mr. Merrick could not get along alone against ten or eleven counsel, and that there must be somebody to help him, and he had concluded to keep Mr. Ker. That was the way Mr. Ker came to be retained in the cases. He drifted into the conduct of the cases in court, but he was selected by Mr. Bliss for that purpose, with the concurrence of Mr. Merrick, as I was told, and he was actually engaged in that business for a week or ten days, or perhaps two weeks, before my attention was directed to the fact. When I observed it I asked Mr. Bliss about it, and he told me what I have stated, and I assented to Mr. Ker's continuing to take part in the proceedings in court. In a letter from Mr. Bliss, dated May 14, 1883, I find this passage, which justifies what I have said:

Ker, as you know, was brought into the case for his ability as a draftsman, and has justified your selection. He naturally remained so long as his indictment was to be defended, and so long as others were to be drawn. He has, naturally, drifted into the trials, and has been very useful, especially in the pending trial. Merrick has been essential as able local counsel. As for myself, the knowledge of the facts and papers I acquired in the genesis of the case has been of value.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if I am discursive, check me, and bring me back to the point; do not let me talk too long.

Q. Please state the circumstances under which Mr. Bliss left the star-route cases, and the amount of compensation which you agreed to pay him from time to time.—A. You will find my correspondence upon that subject in this Senate document No. 156. Mr. Bliss continued in the cases until about the time the Kellogg case was to be tried, when I concluded Mr. Merrick ought to leave the case, because there was a charge that he was influenced by malicious feelings toward Mr. Kellogg. Mr. Kellogg himself was very open in his denunciation of Mr. Merrick, as having prompted the prosecution against him from malicious motives. I knew that was not true, because Mr. Bliss had told me Mr. Merrick knew nothing about the case when it began, but that it was developed in the course of the investigation and hearings before the grand jury, and had said that he, Mr. Bliss, had been accused by his friends of pushing the case a little too strictly, and Mr. Merrick had nothing to do with it. Mr. Merrick was very earnest in his desire to have the Kellogg case tried, upon the faith of what he had learned as to what Mr. Walsh could prove and what Mr. Price could testify. Mr. Woodward also was very earnest upon the subject. When Mr. Merrick left I requested Mr. Bliss to leave also. Mr. Merrick had often offered to leave, but I had retained him because I believed he had some influence over Mr. Walsh, and probably he could persuade Mr. Walsh in some way to come back here and testify when the case came to trial. I thought, too, that he had knowledge of the case that was valuable, and it would be important to keep him. Mr. Walsh was proclaiming by his published letters all the while that Mr. Bliss was favoring Kellogg and was hostile to him, Walsh. Mr. Bliss also was disinclined to remain in the case. He was willing to stay if required, but he did not desire it, and he was disinclined to pursue the case, I thought, and I therefore considered it better, both on account of the saving of expense and for other reasons, to part with both the counsel. Mr. Merrick wrote a letter announcing his withdrawal, and I wrote a note to Mr. Bliss, stating I would dispense with his services, and he retired. He sent a bill to the Department in the latter part of 1883 and insisted upon its being paid. It was for $9,200. It was for services down to November 19, 1883. The bill was approved by the Auditor of the Department and passed over to the Comptroller's Office, and the Comptroller called upon me to have Mr. Bliss apportion his bill. You will find the correspondence on the subject in this Senate document. Mr. Bliss resisted that. He said the Comptroller desired that the bill should be apportioned between two fiscal years, and to this he resolutely objected, but it was evident from the face of the bill the services had been rendered within the two fiscal years, and yet he resisted the Comptroller's demand. You will find in his letter very urgent complaint about it, and he was importunate to have the bill paid in the present fiscal year and was not pleasant—indeed I thought he was very uncivil about it. However, I tried to placate him. I wanted to have peace with everybody in the case, and did not wish to have our relations disturbed, but I gave him to understand in a letter that it was a matter of indifference to me in what fiscal year the services were paid, but that I could not rule the Comptroller, I could not regulate his judgment, and the judgment of the Comptroller was the judgment of the law upon the subject, and, therefore, the apportionment ought to be made. After resisting the requirements of the Comptroller in the way I have described, he did apportion $4,700 of the bill in the last fiscal year and $4,500 in the present fiscal year. I was away at New Orleans arguing a case for the Government, and the Solicitor-General paid Mr. Bliss $2,500 out of the amount which he then said was due for the present fiscal year. When I came home and investigated the bill it struck me it was a very peculiar thing Mr. Bliss should be charging for services in the present fiscal year. I did not see where the services were rendered, except some service in the Kellogg case and some in the matter where Mr. Spencer was arrested and brought here to be punished for contempt of court in avoiding the subpoena. I called upon Mr. Bliss by letter to explain it. Most of these services, which I assumed had been rendered in the last trial of the Dorsey case, had been rendered in the last fiscal year.

Mr. Bliss took issue with me, and was very angry and cross in his letters upon the subject, and almost refused to answer my inquiry. It ended in his giving me this statement (all of which appears in his letters) that he had gone to New York, and had taken the papers of the untried star-route cases—the criminal cases—and had inspected them there in his office with a view to determining what ought to be done with them in the future, and that the charges for services in the present fiscal year, which came to $4,500, were for that service. Upon the 11th of February I wrote a letter to Mr. Bliss, which is published in this Senate document, in which I said I could not allow those charges; I never had authorized him or anybody else, at that expensive rate of compensation, to take those papers to New York and examine them; that I had not yet determined there was a necessity for it; if the papers were to be examined in that way the other counsel ought to have done it with him, and they might, with like propriety, have done it alone as he had, and if they had each done the work in the same way that he alone had done, I would have a very extravagant bill to settle at the rate at which he charged for his services, and, in short, I must decline to allow the bill. After this letter of mine dated 11th February, refusing to allow this charge, upon the 18th of February, Mr. Bliss made a restatement of his case. His letter making the restatement is also in this Senate document. In that restatement, instead of putting $4,700 of his bill in the last fiscal year, as he had done in the first apportionment, he put $6,400. He changed his whole apportionment and brought over a portion of the amount from the present fiscal year to the last fiscal year. After he had my letter of the 11th of February, on the 18th of February he made the amount due him on the last fiscal year to be $6,750, done by him evidently to escape the effect of my ruling rejecting his claim for these services said to have been performed by him in New York. This correspondence occupied some time, and Mr. Bliss complained very bitterly of the delay and wrote me very rude letters about it. I thought he had received a large sum of money from the Government, and could afford to wait until I could fully investigate the matter. I gave it to different officers of the Department, whose duty it was to make such investigations, and they investigated it and made reports to me. I then took it up myself, and made it the subject of a special finding, and here is a copy of that finding taken from the record, which I will ask to have appended to my statement. You will read I there told him he had done a very improper thing; that it was experimenting with the Department; that he, in the first place, had made his apportionment deliberately; that he knew what services he had rendered in the last fiscal year, knew all about it, yet he had now changed the amount from $4,700 to $6,700, the practical effect of which would be to avoid my ruling of the 11th of February. I told him I thought, and believed, he had been overpaid, and that I would not allow that account, and I did not. He then, at or about that time or a little before that time, presented a special, distinct, account of $2,000 and some odd for services, as he said, rendered in the Spencer case and the Kellogg case, and I reduced it, as you will discover in the report I have handed you

That is all I have to say about that question of compensation. I have here a sort of tabular statement which you may have for your record.

[The statement here referred to will be found among the papers appended to this testimony of the Attorney-General.]

Q. That account is still unadjusted?—A. There is $4,700 due to him on last year's account. It is unpaid.

Q. But allowed?—A. Yes, sir; it is allowed. He claimed to make it

$6,700 by this change which I have mentioned. Then the other award which I made to him by that opinion which I have given you has been paid, I believe; I am very sure it has been paid. He has accepted the result of my finding. He did not, by any application, dispute my decision; he accepted it.

Q. There have been some statements made before the committee with regard to what occurred at a conference at your residence, when Mr. Bliss and Mr. Merrick and Mr. Ker submitted to you the question as to the acceptance of Price as a witness. Will you state whether it was understood at that interview that your decision was to be final as to the acceptance of Price as a witness for the Government?—A. My attention was called the other day to the testimony on page 303 of your record, (which is about the only page of it I have read). There is on that page a very fair statement by Mr. Bliss himself of what happened there. At that time there was quite a contention between those gentlemen, and Mr. Bliss and Mr. Merrick got very warm. It was in my house, and I thought I ought to stop it. They both threatened to leave the case; Mr. Merrick if the prosecution did not go on, and Mr. Bliss if it did go on; and I checked them both. I said, "Now, gentlemen, just stop, if you please. I cannot consent to this. It is in my own house, and I must be very careful, for I want to treat you with entire kindness and courtesy, but there is something due to me officially and to the case, and it is not proper for you to talk in that way. Neither of you will leave this case." They both behaved very well and said civil words to each other, and expressed their regret for what had occurred, and I said, "Never mind; there is nothing to regret; but I want to prevent this matter going any further"; and the result was the restoration of a pleasant state of feeling. Then Mr. Bliss said, after they had discussed the whole case, that if, after I had seen Mr. Price's affidavit, I would say the case should go on, he would acquiesce. He has testified, as appears on page 303 of your record, that he subsequently did acquiesce, and he believed I was right in what I did; although he did shortly afterwards write me a note which I believe has been put in evidence here by him in which he stated that he respectfully protested or objected to the conclusion at which I had arrived. On page 303 he says as follows:

The moment I learned of the production of those papers and what was in them, I stated to the Attorney-General that in my opinion that changed the position of the case entirely, and that it was a proper one to be proceeded with, and that it was proper to let go of Price and proceed against Kellogg, and I have not changed my mind or view upon that subject.

That, however, did not change his position in the case. I have been told that it was said here and elsewhere I had instigated some assaults upon Mr. Bliss. As to that, I have only to say it would be a very unworthy thing for me to do, and that I never did it in any way, and I wish that nothing reflecting on Mr. Bliss had been said or any assaults made upon him as counsel in the case. The statements that were made about him and his conduct I had no knowledge of whatever. Mr. Ker had not seen me for a month or two, nor had I communicated with him directly or indirectly in any way before he gave his testimony, and I had no idea he would give any such testimony. I have abstained from talking with any of these gentlemen about these matters; if I had known in advance Mr. Ker intended to give any such testimony, I would have suggested that the courtesy and good feeling that should exist between counsel engaged in the same case ought to modify what he had to say, not to induce him to conceal the truth, but to abstain from saying harsh things. I wish those things had not been said for the sake of the proprieties of the case. But to come back. Mr. Merrick called upon me a few days ago and told me, or, may be I read it in the report in the newspaper, that Mr. Bliss left the Dorsey case when it was on trial and was absent for a day in consequence of my ruling as to the acceptance of Price as a witness in the Kellogg case. I never knew that fact until I was told it or read it the other day. I never knew that Mr. Bliss had left the case. I am told Mr. Merrick said that Mr. Bliss gave as a reason that he considered I had acted with a want of courtesy towards him, in not giving him notice of my intention to take Price as a witness. I never intended any discourtesy to Mr. Bliss. I knew I had a perfect right to decide as I judged right about that matter, and it was so understood at the interview which took place at my house, at which, as Mr. Bliss himself has testified, the question was left to me, so that there was no occasion to call upon him afterward or to make any explanation. It was left to me to say whether the case should or should not go on, and when Mr. Bliss wrote me the letter objecting to the decision I had made to have the case prosecuted, he never complained of any discourtesy and I never heard of it at all until Mr. Merrick's testimony was given here. If I had known of it at the time I would, of course, have said to Mr. Bliss, "There is no discourtesy intended, and you ought to know that, and I hope you will not think there is."

Q. Did Mr. Bliss oppose taking any steps to secure indictments against Mr. Kellogg for any reason, and if so, what were those reasons?

—A. I know nothing whatever upon the subject, except what Mr. Walsh has published.

Q. Did Mr. Bliss say to you, or write letters to you, saying that you should consult anyone in regard to the effect of the prosecution of Kellogg from a political point of view?—A. On December 20, 1882, he did write me a letter upon that subject, as follows:

Mr. Bliss to Mr. Brewster.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., December 20, 1882.

MY DEAR SIR: As to the matter which I spoke of to you this a. m. as to the using of Price as a witness, why not consult with Secretary Chandler on the political view of it? Of course you would not consult any one in the legal aspect. But the matter may be productive of great difficulties. Merrick may get ugly if he does not have his own way and make trouble in the case on trial. At the same time we cannot, any of us, allow Price who is indicted and guilty to escape unless he gives us some one more guilty and does it certainly. Without Walsh, Price is of little or no use to us and Walsh is not now available to us. With Walsh even we do not get a clear case through Price's assistance against any one, except, perhaps, Brady, and situated as we are now we do not need to give up any one to get proof against Brady in another case than that on trial. Price cannot aid us in the one on trial.

Merrick has become greatly interested to attach Kellogg. I think politics affect him. He may claim to have promised Price protection. I think in fact he has done so only conditionally. He certainly had no legal right to do it without consulting you and getting authority from you. He had no moral right to do it without consulting me. I think in fact he has not done it, but he may be willing to have it supposed he has, as being more likely to get your approval of something he has done than your consent to do the same thing.

The matter may come to a shape where you will have to "put your foot down," but I think the wise way is to temporize, at least till this trial is over. At worst it may become necessary to accept anything Merrick has done in promising Price immunity, but that does not involve consenting to prosecutions against others with Price's assistance unless your judgment tells you that such prosecutions ought to be instituted.

I am very anxious about the whole matter.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. BENJ. HARRIS BREWSTER.

Q. Did you make any reply to that letter of Mr. Bliss?—A. No.

Q. Did you act upon the suggestion contained in it?—A. No. I just put it aside, for I was not pleased with it. It was a very difficult thing for me to deal with this subject. Here was a gentleman, Mr. Bliss, in charge of these cases, enjoying the confidence of the Post-Office Department, and having knowledge of all the papers in the cases, and really having great usefulness in the prosecutions, and, of course, I did not want to have any conflict with him of any kind. I could not dispense with Mr. Bliss. So, also, when the amount of the payment that he demanded was a subject of criticism, I could not dispense with him; although I did admonish him he ought to abate his charges because the amount would be criticised and complained of. I thought any rupture with him would be a great shock to the prosecutions, and I therefore believed it was both my duty and my policy to keep him in the cases and to avoid any such conflict. These things occurred and I did not like them, but I thought it would be unwise to have any controversy with him.

Q. He suggested the propriety of consulting somebody as to the political effect of the prosecution of Senator Kellogg; did you have any such consultation with anybody?—A. No, sir. I made up my mind that I would not permit anybody to talk with me upon the political relations of this case or of any other case. I thought it would be a scandalous thing for me to do. I did not come into the office of Attorney-General to dispense the justice of the United States upon political considerations. I would rather never have taken it—I would rather leave it than do that.

Q. Mr. Walsh has stated in his testimony that you have some correspondence with Secretary Chandler in regard to this case. Is that correct?—A. Yes. I had some correspondence with Secretary Chandler in regard to this case. You have called for those letters, and I will give them to you. Mr. Walsh wrote a letter to the President, which will speak for itself, and in that letter he charged or intimated, among other things, I was a party to Mr. Bliss's determination to suppress this case, and I did not intervene, as I ought, to compel Mr. Bliss to do otherwise: and the letter was intended to leave an impression upon the public mind that I was participating in an attempt to strangle the case. Among other things, Mr. Walsh charged in the letter that "a member of the Cabinet had a conference with Mr. Bliss upon the subject, the purpose of which conference was to suppress the case." I wrote to Mr. Bliss about that. I thought it my duty to call his attention to it. I did not believe it—did not believe a word of it—but I still thought it my duty to call Mr. Bliss's attention to it, and I wrote him a letter about it. That letter is here. It did not reach Mr. Bliss promptly, in consequence of his coming to Washington at the time when the letter went to New York; and then I believe the letter came back here just when he returned to New York, and I was absent for some days; and the result was his reply was delayed. When he did reply he wrote in the most emphatic way, denying the charge, and said a great many things in that letter—a letter which will speak for itself. He intimated, among other things, that Mr. Walsh was a witness for the Government, and I ought to be very careful not to let his denial or anything else to the prejudice of Walsh be made known, because Mr. Walsh would take advantage of it as an excuse for not appearing, for he believed Mr. Walsh was really in the hands of the people who were opposed to the Government. Now, I am speaking of this from recollection, and I cannot quote the letter accurately, but that was the sense of what he expressed in the letter, and he denied all that was alleged against him. In the mean time it seems Mr. Chandler—I may as well state it because it is in my letter to him—spoke to the President and said he wished to take notice of this charge, and wanted me to write him a letter asking him whether the charge was true. When I was applied to about it, I said, “Walsh’s letter does not name Mr. Chandler; there is no Cabinet officer named; it speaks merely of a Cabinet officer.” Still I was given to understand that Mr. Chandler believed that it was intended for himself and he wanted me to write him a letter. I delayed writing a letter because I was waiting for the reply of Mr. Bliss. By and by Mr. Bliss’s reply came and I took it and wrote a letter myself to Mr. Chandler stating why it was I wrote to him, apologizing for doing it, and saying it would be a very indecorous thing for me to do if he had not expressed a desire I should do it, and I would not do it even then but for the way in which the expression of his desire had been conveyed to me. Then I said to him, as an act of civility, that he need not regard Mr. Walsh’s statement; from what I could learn of Mr. Walsh he was a shameless kind of person; that I had been waiting for Mr. Bliss’s reply, and I had now received it and sent him a copy of it. I also said to him, “You will please observe that Mr. Bliss gives a caution as to the use that is to be made of his letter or of anything that he says about Mr. Walsh—urges we ought to be careful that it shall not become public, because if it does Mr. Walsh will take offense and make it an excuse to avoid appearing as a witness.” I got a reply from Mr. Chandler in which he positively denied the whole matter, and concurred in Mr. Bliss’s suggestion as to the caution that should be observed not to let it become known to Mr. Walsh there were any remarks made about him or anything to his prejudice, lest it should give him an excuse to keep away. There the matter rested. I never showed that letter to any human being; I am sure I did not. It was locked up among my private papers. In the summer of last year, when I was away, I got a letter from Mr. Walsh, which was subsequently published, as all his letters have been, stating I had written such a letter to Mr. Chandler, in which I had reflected upon him, and intimating it was a very indecorous thing for me to be commenting unfavorably upon him when I depended upon his testimony, thus showing a knowledge of the letter, and demanding the production of it. I never answered the letter of Mr. Walsh. Mr. Chandler had a like letter sent to him, which was not answered. How anybody came to a knowledge of those letters you have called for I do not know, for they were in my special custody, kept by me privately, and not put upon the records of the Department—purposely kept from the records for the reason Mr. Bliss assigned in his letter, that it was not prudent to put anything of that kind in a public place where it could become known to Mr. Walsh, and give him an excuse to remain away. You have called for the letters, and I have them here and will give them to you.

The CHAIRMAN. They were called for by a resolution of the committee.

The WITNESS. They were, and they have been ready for some time, but I thought that by your leave I would keep them until I would come before you to testify.

The letters were produced and put in evidence, as follows:

Mr. Walsh to the Attorney-General.

NEW YORK, November 3, 1882.

SIR: In the month of June, 1882, a subpoena was served on me in this city to appear before the grand jury of the District of Columbia to testify in the matter of the United States vs. Brady et al. In accordance with this summons I appeared before the grand jury whose term expired June 30, 1884. Mr. George Bliss, counsel for the Government, was present during my examination. On my testimony an indictment was found by the jury against ex-Assistant Postmaster-General Brady and mail contractor James B. Price for conspiracy to defraud the Government of the United States. During the following month—July, 1882—one of the special counsel for the Government in the star route cases, with whom I then had no acquaintance personally, called on me in his official capacity, and during the conversation recited that which he had heard rumored as having been the tenor of my testimony before the grand jury, whose term had just then expired, and asked of me confirmation. I then related to him substantially my testimony, whereupon he expressed the greatest indignation and astonishment at the action of the grand jury in not including in the Brady-Price indictment, Senator Wm. P. Kellogg. I inquired of him if this was the first official information that he had received of the character of my testimony, and to my surprise he said it was.

A few days after this interview the grand jury (a new body) was called together in extraordinary session; indeed, the gentleman after listening to my recital, said he would have the jury called together immediately. In the mean time I had been subpoenaed to appear as a witness before the traverse jury in the suit of the United States vs. Brady, Dorsey et al., and while awaiting to be called, I was summoned to appear before the grand jury of the District of Columbia bringing with me my books and papers. I was before this body the greater part of two days giving my testimony and exhibiting original papers, &c., with the result, as is known to all the world—a result as insulting to all law and justice as it was mortifying to me, reflecting as it did on my veracity. The purposes of this negative action, i. e., not finding an indictment, were, in my opinion, two. First, to the end that a distinguished Senator should escape indictment, and, secondly, to vitiate my testimony, which I was to give before the traverse jury in the case of Brady et al., then on trial. That influences of a most potential character were brought to bear on the grand jury to accomplish such a result, unhappily, does not admit of a doubt. Manifestly testimony which was considered ample on which to find an indictment against Brady and Price had not been deemed strong enough to reach a Senator. This was the finding of the first grand jury whose term had expired June 30, 1882. The finding of indictments against comparative pigmies, the oi polloi, and allowing official giants to escape had become embarrassing, for some jurors revolted against other system on the first jury, and hence this latter grand jury, to avoid similar complications, determined to indict no person. In order to furnish them, if possible, with something like a reason for not finding an indictment in accordance with my testimony, the conspirators on the grand jury had presented to them by their associates outside, for the undoubted purpose of influencing the minds of their fellow members, a copy of the testimony in the case of Spofford vs. Kellogg, a contested election case in which I had testified. My testimony before this jury was direct and positive, and supported as it was by documentary evidence, simply overwhelming. What could possibly be the reason, then, for the remarkable action of this grand jury? Were they dazed by reason of the high official position of one of the persons against whom my testimony bore most heavily? Or could it be that they concurred with the special prosecuting officer of the Government, who, in the grand jury room, gave expression to the opinion “that it was a serious matter to indict a Senator of the United States?” Were the jurors influenced by the Spofford-Kellogg testimony? Who directed them to inquire into the case of Spofford vs. Kellogg? Whether they were or were not influenced by the testimony, the criminal object had in view by those who brought it there was to influence them. Precisely the same object which, the prosecution say, William H. Dickson had in view when he, as foreman of the traverse jury, read to its members his statement of the alleged attempt of the Government to bribe him, and for which attempt to influence the minds of the jury he is now being prosecuted. I assert that whoever brought into the room of the grand jury the Spofford Kellogg testimony is far guiltier than William H. Dickson. That this book was there does not admit of doubt, as counsel for the Government, Mr. Bliss, will bear me out.

In behalf of justice, and of law and of order, I call upon you, as the highest law officer of the Government, to discover who it was that brought into the grand jury room the testimony in the case of Spofford vs. Kellogg; who it was on that grand jury that entered into the conspiracy to protect these men from indictment, and, by rendering me discreditable thereby, tending to break down the case of the Government against Brady, Dorsey, et al. This is a discovery, sir, which the Government owes me and owes to itself.

You will please recall the condition of the Government's case at this juncture; I mean that against Brady et al. To say that it was in extremes would be untrue, for it hardly had life enough to die; indeed it was generally understood that a motion to dismiss it would be listened to by the court. A material witness of the Government, indeed an officer thereof, then under subpoena, was moved, as he has said, to go away about this time, for the reason that he was satisfied the case would be dismissed, and for the further reason that he did not believe the prosecution was in earnest. This gentleman's official, commercial, and social relations with members of the administration gave him exceptional opportunities for informing himself. I take this from the public prints as going to show the condition of sentiment about the time that this grand jury resolved to protect these criminals. Everything was against the prosecution, hence how necessary it became to break me down in behalf of the defendants in court, and those who ought to have been defendants, that were not yet at its bar. As John A. Walsh, I was not personally known to a member of that grand jury; to them I was simply an important witness for the Government, and as such, and in the interests of crime, they showed their bias against me from the moment that I appeared in the jury room. Such of them as did not listlessly tilt their chairs against the walls, resolved themselves into cross-examiners in the interests of the persons against whom I was testifying, with the apparent motive of trying to exhaust the Government's case in the grand jury room. I again repeat that it behooves the Government to find out the person or persons who first informed a member or members of this grand jury of the existence of the Spofford-Kellogg testimony, and the member or members of that body who brought it into the jury room. I emphasize this, not because there was anything in that testimony on which to base such an infamous result, but because it will be the first step toward developing the connection between the conspirators in this case. Inasmuch as this book came from some one of the public libraries, surely it ought not to be a difficult task for this great Government, and such action, believe me, would go far towards evidencing that witnesses for the Government would have at least its moral support, a condition it pains me to say that it does not enjoy, in my mind at least, for I have yet to see the first evidence of any support of any kind from it. Simultaneously with the extraordinary action or rather non-action of this grand jury, now holding session in Washington, a daily paper of that city, conducted in the interests of the star-route conspirators, gave joyous expression to the information that a grand jury had unanimously refused to believe me on oath. Branded thus by a corrupt grand jury, in furtherance of this conspiracy, as one unworthy of belief, I literally stepped from the threshold of their room to the witness stand in open court to be there taunted by counsel for the defense as one whom the grand jury did not believe. Such in brief was the character of my introduction to the court, to the traverse jury, and to the people of this country. I do assure you, sir, that nothing but my own sense of duty and self-respect sustained me in such an ordeal, the most trying of all ordeals for a man of honor. Indeed, while I was on the witness stand the leading counsel for the defendants asked me contemptuously, "If I was the same Walsh that had appeared before the grand jury?" In the meantime I was assailed in column after column of the vilest abuse, and that, too, in a paper the control of whose columns it was sworn to in open court, was exercised by a man who was then, and is now, the occupant of a lucrative office under the same Government in whose interests I had been summoned to appear as a witness. At this period, when I felt as though this combination of conspirators, composed as it was of the grand jury, the defendants in court, together with such other allies as rumor assigned being in sympathy with these robber barons, were about to crush me, I bethought of appealing to that national jury composed of millions of freemen who in their honesty could not be influenced. Through the medium of a free and enlightened press I addressed myself to this jury, which evidence being weighed has resulted in a moral verdict of guilty against these men; I am convinced that but for the aid extended the cause of justice by the press of this country, these conspirators would have triumphed. I have been informed that you have expressed the opinion that my testimony before the traverse jury saved the prosecution from defeat, in a case which special counsel had selected as the strongest, albeit well informed people never agreed therein with said counsel. Whether or not I rendered the Government any service in these cases it is not for me to say, but such aid as I have contributed has not been without great sacrifice to me in many ways. Because of my appearance as a witness against these men I have been criminally libelled in the District of Columbia while under subpoena from its judiciary, and I have yet to see the first evidence that the Government intended to protect me. I have never witnessed such terrorism as was exercised against witnesses in this case. I have been informed by counsel that the persons who have been engaged in libelling me are criminally liable, and yet, sir, I say to you in all candor, that I am practically unable to obtain the slightest legal redress in the capital of the Republic.

All that I have set forth in this communication, and more, has been printed by the great journals of the country, touching the present grand jury of the District of Columbia, and it is in no spirit of sentimentalism for myself alone that I beg of you to take cognizance of the conspiracy which has been entered into by this body. Some member or members of this jury conspired to protect certain people from indictment; this must be obvious to you. If it was really "a serious matter to indict a Senator of the United States," why did they not so resolve and let it go to the world that the Senate of the United States was an asylum for violators of the law? If this jury feared trenching upon the divinity that, in their minds, hedged in a Senator, why not so proclaim and then the people of this country would know and understand that there was a body of men in the Republic who were not amenable to its laws? Why endeavor to stamp me with reproach, thus affording aid and comfort to the enemies of the Government whose interests they were sworn to protect?

In giving my testimony against these men I was actuated by no feelings of hostility, and in no sense of the word was I a voluntary witness. As a matter of fact, with the exception of one or two of the defendants I scarcely had any acquaintance with them, indeed, some of them I had never seen until I appeared as a witness, and such feeling as I had was rather of sympathy than otherwise, for as a body I regarded them as petty offenders compared with those, who, having had recourse to precisely the same methods of plundering the Treasury of the United States, had gone unscathed, or whose gigantic frauds have since been referred to arbitration, as I have read in the public prints.

Whatever of prestige or material benefit that will redound to the credit of the gentlemen engaged in this prosecution, none can ever reach me by any possibility. I am painfully aware that thus far I have reaped naught save abuse, and have been made the object of a conspiracy by a body acting under the forms of law, a body supposed to be engaged in conserving the interests of law and order, that this is a fiction, however, their acts have proved. I have endeavored to point out to you wherein I conceive that some member or members of the present grand jury of the District of Columbia have violated the law and their oaths, and I now ask that you, for the protection of the interests of the Government and for the protection of its witnesses, take such steps as will bring to light the extent and ramifications of this conspiracy, and prosecute the offenders as the law directs.

Yours, respectfully,

J. A. WALSH.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, November 12, 1882.

DEAR SIR: With this I inclose you copy of a letter received from Mr. John Walsh, which I think should be brought to your knowledge.

Very respectfully,

BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq.,

Mr. Brewster to Mr. Bliss.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., November 30, 1882.

DEAR SIR: * * * I also, some weeks or so ago, sent to you a copy of a letter from — Walsh, transmitted to me. I have not heard from you since then. Will you please give me a reply to it? With this I also send you an interview published by Mr. Walsh in the newspaper since he sent that letter to me, and since I sent it to you. They should both go together, it seems to me. Much that is complained of by Mr. Walsh in that letter has already been disposed of. That the complaints were groundless at the time the action of this Department and of the President has since shown.

The Saulsbury matter and the Kellogg matter are both of great importance, and I desire you to give them both your attention, and furnish me with a reply that will make a proper record upon the subject for the Department and for yourself, so that if hereafter it is made the subject of public complaint or official inquiry the records of the Department will show exactly the real facts of the case, free from these clouded misrepresentations and misinterpretations of official and personal action.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq.,
*Special Counsel for the United States in the Star-route Trials,
No. 160 Broadway, New York City.*

Mr. Bliss to Mr. Brewster.

WASHINGTON, December 5, 1882.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 30th contains the first intimation I have received that any answer was desired to your favor referring to me the letter of John A. Walsh, complaining of the action of the grand jury recently discharged. I understood it to have been referred to me—by copy—only for my information, as has been done in so many other cases.

As you know, I think the grand jury should have found an indictment; at the same time it was their right to pass upon the evidence. It was possible for them to accept as true all that Mr. Walsh said, and still to think that a link was missing, and, giving to the question of indicting a Senator of the United States—sensibly or insensibly—more of scrutiny than they would have given to the case of one less prominent, to refuse to find a bill. This result might have been, in a measure, precipitated by the fact that Mr. Walsh made manifest his distrust of the grand jury, and gave his evidence in a manner which did not secure for it the full weight it was in my opinion entitled to.

As to the introduction into the grand jury room of the book referred to by Mr. Walsh, I am unable to agree with him as to its legality. From what I saw while waiting in the anteroom I am satisfied that the grand jury sent for it to the district attorney, and that the latter procured it from the Congressional Library. At any rate, the copy produced bore the stamp of that library. The sending for the book undoubtedly indicated information given to or possessed by some of the jury. It probably indicated bias against Mr. Walsh, but in view of the right of the grand jury to seek its evidence within broad limits, it does not seem to me that the proceeding was illegal.

As to the interview with Mr. Walsh, of which you inclose me a copy, I can only say that I do not think it calls for answer, and if it did I should not think it wise to answer it. Mr. Walsh is an important witness for the Government, though not so important as he was. He has been made to feel the hostility of those against whom he testifies. He feels impatient, injured. In that frame of mind he says things that do injustice to others and which he will soon be prompt to admit are unjust. Under these circumstances, I do not think it wise to have any controversy or to aggravate feelings already disturbed.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS,
Assistant Attorney.

Hon. BENJ. HARRIS BREWSTER.

Mr. Brewster to Mr. Bliss.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, December 27, 1882.

SIR: With this I send you a letter written by one J. A. Walsh from New York, dated the 18th of December, 1882, and addressed to the President. That letter, by the President's direction, was referred to me on the 21st of December. Because you were absent I have not sent it to you until this date.

As it contains throughout charges and criticisms upon your conduct, I desire to call your attention to it, and ask a reply from you to me, so that I may be able properly to report to the President. Without such reply I cannot make such report, for all of the matters referred to in it are within your personal knowledge, and were under your direction. I had no part in what was done, or exact knowledge of what is asserted to have been done, and I must look to you for such explanations as will instruct me and enable me properly to advise the President. Allow me this reply at your earliest convenience.

There is an allusion in the letter to a Cabinet officer. I know of no Cabinet officer who is open to any imputation in this business. It certainly cannot mean me, for I must assume, as Mr. Walsh writes very freely of me when he has occasion to use my name, that he would have said he was writing of me when he refers to a Cabinet officer "who gave to a certain grand juror in violation of the statute" the "Spofford-Kellogg testimony." I never gave any testimony of any kind to any grand jury in this District, nor did I know nor do I now know of any Cabinet officer who ever did. In fact, all I know of what happened before that grand jury was only made known to me after it happened, and all I do know or ever have known is the general result.

As this letter contains charges and statements and criticisms relative to what did happen there, or ought to have been done there, and of which I am wholly ignorant, and in which you are interested, and over which you had special charge, I now call upon you for this reply to all that Mr. Walsh has said.

Very respectfully,

BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq.,

Special Assistant Attorney for the United States in the star-route cases,

Washington, D. C.

Mr. Bliss to Mr. Brewster.

NEW YORK, January 2, 1883.

DEAR SIR: I received, just as I was leaving Washington on Friday, your favor of the 27th ultimo, transmitting a copy of a letter from John A. Walsh to the President.

Mr. Walsh states that he addresses the President because you have not answered a letter which he addressed to you in November. This last-mentioned letter was referred by you to me, and I beg to remind you of the observations which I made upon it in a letter I addressed to you at that time.

Mr. Walsh was, at the last trial of the case of United States v. Brady and others, an important witness for the Government. He has come to regard himself, as his letter to the President shows, as an essential witness, and disposed to dictate to those in charge of the prosecution what they shall do and how they shall do it, and to set up his own views both of law and expediency as better than those of the gentlemen who are charged with the responsibility of the "star-route cases." He regards his own conduct and character as so pure that he can make charges against them, not only without evidence, but in the face of the very evidence to which he refers. He has been subjected to much abuse from the defendants in the case on trial and their friends, and therefore some irritation on his part would be excusable, though it hardly justifies him in attacking those who have defended him. There is much in his letter which induces me to believe that he has fallen under the influence of those interested against the Government, who are catering to his vanity and desire for rev holding out to him the hope of pecuniary advantage. Bearing in mind these circumstances, I refrain from characterizing the letter as a whole in the terms which it would seem to deserve at my hands. While, for reasons not necessary to be gone into here, the Government is not in a position where the testimony of Mr. Walsh would be as important as it undoubtedly was on the former trial, yet he is still a desirable witness, and I do not feel that I ought by any expression of my personal feelings either to tend to discredit him as a witness or to intensify his present position of dissatisfaction with those whom he claims to desire to aid. But at the same time I reserve the right to make a further reply when no possible harm can come to the prosecution by my so doing.

Mr. Walsh expresses his personal distrust of the sincerity of the prosecutors and his dissent from the judgment exercised by them in selecting the particular case to be first tried. Without pausing here to suggest that he is not in a position to judge as to either fact, and not by education or experience competent to judge, I may observe that after he testified on the last trial he voluntarily stated to me that though he had at one time doubted whether we had selected wisely, he was then thoroughly convinced that we were right.

Mr. Walsh complains that there was some conspiracy or contrivance by which a former grand jury failed to find an indictment upon his testimony. He makes a special and gratuitous fling at some unnamed member of the President's Cabinet, but does not dare to name him or to assert what he did. Indeed, he refers to the matter only as a report or rumor. The only act of any one indicated by him is the introduction into the grand jury room of a book purporting to contain evidence given before a committee of the Senate.

As to the latter, I have already expressed my views in my letter in reply to Mr. Walsh's communication to you to which I have referred. The book was, as I infer, sent for by the grand jury. They had, as I think, a right so to do, but whether this was so or not, there is no evidence that it was anything but an error of judgment, and certainly not a transaction which should lead to a general denunciation, not only of the grand jury, but of the prosecution, and of you because you do not proceed to investigate and indict the grand jury or others.

A brief statement of the history of matters will serve to dispose of much of what Mr. Walsh says:

Mr. Walsh was a witness before one grand jury in May or June. Upon his testimony and that of several witnesses summoned from Texas, James B. Price and Thomas J. Brady were indicted for conspiracy in connection with certain mail routes in Texas. In the course of that examination before the grand jury, Mr. Walsh, in referring to certain post-office drafts, casually mentioned that they were brought to him by a Mr. Kellogg, and it was only accidentally that it was brought out whom he meant. Neither I nor any one representing the Government had up to that time ever heard the name of Mr. Kellogg in connection with the matter, and he was not then, as I understood it, mentioned as a person whose connection with it was in any sense criminal. Some days after the grand jury had adjourned, I heard reports, obviously set afloat by Walsh, that the case had not been pushed before the grand jury as against Senator Kellogg. I at once stated to my associate counsel that the grand jury must be recalled. They concurred with me, though I am under the impression that they did not attach so much importance to it as I did, for the reason that it was my action, or failure to act, which the rumors impugned. I applied to Judge Wylie to reconvene the grand jury. He hesitated, in fact intimated that he should decline, whereupon I stated the facts to him in detail, and begged him as a matter of personal justice, if such a thing was proper to be considered, to reconvene the grand jury. He did reconvene it. Mr. Walsh was put before it as a witness. On the first day he testified only partially, as he afterwards stated to me, because he did not mean to tell anything more than he thought was necessary to secure an indictment. What he stated on the first day was calculated to raise suspicions against Mr. Kellogg, but not much more. For the purpose of procuring more testimony, and enabling or inducing him to produce some corroborative proof, I induced the grand jury to adjourn to another day. On that day Mr. Walsh gave much more testimony. He produced some papers. I questioned him carefully and in detail, until he stated that he had told all he knew. He made a much stronger case against Mr. Kellogg than the previous day, a case in which, if I had been a grand juror, I think I should have voted to find an indictment against Mr. Kellogg. At the same time there was a gap left in the case as disclosed by his testimony, for though it showed Mr. Kellogg's connection with and possession of the postal drafts which were alleged to have been given in pursuance of the conspiracy; though Mr. Kellogg was shown to have interested himself to prevent investigation, and though there were other things indicating Mr. Kellogg's wrongful connection with the matter, still a conscientious grand juror could, I think, be of the opinion that the evidence was not sufficient, as to Mr. Kellogg, to show criminality. Mr. Walsh did not, on either day, give his testimony in a manner to inspire entire confidence, and there were some improbabilities in some portions of it. It was a case where two men, equally honest, might differ. It was, moreover, a case where, if an indictment had been found, there could have been no conviction without further testimony. The grand jury, in fact, refused to find a bill. They did so, as I have been informed, by a vote substantially unanimous. Whether this conclusion was wrong or right, it is certain that the fact that the conclusion was arrived at, even in connection with the introduction into the grand-jury room of the book I have referred to, does not alone constitute ground for charges of criminality against the grand jury. Nor is it necessary to assume, as Mr. Walsh does, that because the grand jury did not indict they did not believe him.

Mr. Walsh is, however, in no position to complain of the action of the Government, for he is at this moment evading the service of subpoena on him requiring him to appear and testify before a grand jury, to which the Government is prepared to present evidence to sustain Mr. Walsh, evidence procured by the Government after great trouble. Mr. Walsh knows that we desire his presence, he knows for what purpose we desire it, and he knows that the confirmatory evidence the Government has is the precise evidence he desired should be obtained, and yet he evades service, and sends word to us that we can serve him if we can find him and that he will come to Washington only when he gets ready. For ten days we have had men watching for him in two cities. We know that he has received our letters. We know that he has seen his counsel to whom we have stated what we desired, and he refuses to appear. He prefers to write a long letter complaining of the Government for not doing the very thing it is seeking to do, and to do which it desires from him only the assistance which every good citizen owes to his Government. Judging by past experience he will soon give his entire correspondence to the public, and thereby aid them whom he claims to be seeking to punish. I trust that he may not do so in such a manner as to compel the Government to make public the real facts of the case, for that would go far to destroy the effect of the evidence we hope to obtain from him, for the human mind is so made up that a witness who so acts does not, even when he is telling the undoubted truth, receive the same credence as he would if he had come forward frankly and promptly.

I do not feel called upon here to refer in detail to Mr. Walsh's insinuations as to the charges against other persons claimed to have been implicated in the star-route frauds. The action of counsel in these cases has been fully reported to and approved by you. There is much more reason to believe that Mr. Walsh is at the present moment engaged with others formerly connected with the prosecution in a scheme to procure money from these alleged criminals than there is to distrust the sincerity or judgment of any one now concerned in the prosecution.

Mr. Walsh's statement as to what occurred on the former trial, as to my alleged neglect to urge the case against Mr. S. W. Dorsey, as to my being rebuked by other counsel, and as to the action of the court, is shown by the record to be thoroughly false.

For the reasons already suggested, you will perceive that it is very desirable that nothing that Mr. Walsh shall say or do should lead to a publication of this letter until after the pending trial is finished, unless his future course shall be such as to lead counsel to consider it unsafe to call him as a witness.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS,
Special Assistant District Attorney.

Mr. Bliss to Mr. Brewster.

WASHINGTON, January 3, 1883.

DEAR SIR: I have received from Inspector Woodward notice, given at your request, that you have decided to use James B. Price as a witness in some of the star-route cases. Of course I recognize most cheerfully your authority in this matter, but as I am not convinced of the wisdom of accepting Mr. Price in the present aspect of the cases as a witness and granting him the necessary immunity, you will allow me the privilege of rendering my dissent.

There are some matters connected with this business, not concerning your action, which may lead me to again trouble you, but I reserve them for consideration.

~~—~~ Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS,
Special Assistant Attorney.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

*Mr. Brewster to Mr. Chandler.*DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, January 12, 1883.

SIR: Upon the 21st of December the President sent to me for my action a letter written by one J. A. Walsh, from New York, dated the 18th of December, 1882. That letter has been published, as you no doubt have seen.

After it was copied for my use, on the 27th of December, I addressed a letter to George Bliss, esq. Mr. Bliss was absent at the time I received it. I therefore was obliged to wait until he returned before I wrote to him, remitting to him a copy of the letter, and calling his attention to the charges and criticisms contained in it upon his conduct. A copy of the letter that I sent to Mr. Bliss I herewith send to you. The letter of Mr. Walsh I will not send to you a copy of unless you require it, because I assume that you have read it, as it was published, and I know you have seen it, for the President so informed me.

There is an allusion in that letter to a Cabinet officer, as to whom he says, "A Cabinet officer who gave to a certain grand juror, in violation of the statute, the Spofford-Kellogg testimony." As I said in my letter to Mr. Bliss, "I do not know of any Cabinet officer who ever gave such testimony to any grand jury." I called Mr. Bliss's attention to that allusion.

On the 2d of January, in the city of New York, Mr. Bliss wrote to me a reply, which was not received at my Department until the 5th of January. I was then out of Washington, and did not return till the 9th of January, when I first received the reply of Mr. Bliss. That was day before yesterday. I make this precise explanation as to the times I received these papers so that you may understand why you have not heard from me before.

Upon the third page of Mr. Bliss's reply you will find he makes an allusion to the passage in Mr. Walsh's letter to which I called his attention, and that related to the supposed interference of a Cabinet officer. Mr. Bliss says: "He makes a special and gratuitous fling at some unnamed member of the President's Cabinet, but he does not dare to name him or to assert what he did. Indeed, he refers to the matter only as a report or rumor. The only act of any one indicated by him is the introduction into the grand-jury room of a book purporting to contain evidence given before a committee of the Senate."

When the President had sent to me the communication of Mr. Walsh, and before I wrote to Mr. Bliss calling upon him to answer to the matter contained in it, the President said to me that there was an allusion to a Cabinet officer in that paper which I would receive, which was intended to mean you, and that you so understood it, and that it was your wish that I should speak with you upon that subject. You have not spoken to me, and I assumed that you did not because you thought I was not ready, and because, perhaps, knowing of your intimacy with Mr. Bliss, and your constant intercourse with him as an old friend, I assumed you knew I had applied to him for such information as he could give, as it was my duty in the first instance.

The case is now ready, since Mr. Bliss' report, for me to speak with you upon the subject, as the President said it was your desire I would do. It was my place to be quiet and silent until I had arrived at the point of time when the circumstances made it fit for me to call your attention to the matter. In the first place, I could not do so under any circumstances unless I had been advised by the President that it was your wish I would do so, and that you recognized the reference to the Cabinet officer as applying to yourself. It was a surprise to me that you assumed it, and not knowing of any right to connect you with it, it would not be a proper thing for me to do; it would be unusual, unmannerly, intrusive, and probably offensive to ask you to explain a matter which did not allude to you in terms, and for which you might not wish to be questioned for reasons of your own, which it is your right to have control you.

Having thus by your request and at your instance invited your attention to the subject, I leave it with you to deal with it as it may be your pleasure to do. I feel great hesitation and delicacy in even approaching this matter and presenting it to you. It is not a pleasant thing to do. The intercourse between gentlemen and friends and official equals excludes the thought of interrogating, questioning, or inquiring in the matters thus expressed by anonymous implication, and in so offensive a way, by a man like Mr. Walsh, who has violated all of the decencies of public and private duty in his vulgar and offensive publications and communications.

Permit me to say that I invite your attention especially to the views expressed by Mr. Bliss as to the necessity of guarded treatment of this man. He is adroit, unscrupulous, and without shame; but he is valuable to the Government as a witness, and we must treat him with prudence and caution, having regard to the necessities of his usefulness in these complicated and infamous cases, in which a body of scoundrels defy the whole judicial power of the Government, after they have abused great public trusts, brought the public service into shame and scandal, and robbed the public Treasury of millions of money collected from the people and dedicated by law to a function of Government of the greatest general necessity.

I am, sir, respectfully, &c.

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Hon. WILLIAM E. CHANDLER,
Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. Chandler to Mr. Brewster.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 13, 1883.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday's date. It appears by a reference to Mr. Walsh's letter of December 18th that his statement was as follows:

"It is known of all men who it was on that grand jury that violated section 5405 of the Revised Statutes by bringing into the jury room the Spofford-Kellogg testimony; indeed, Mr. President, it is said that a member of your Cabinet gave to a certain grand juror, in violation of the statute, the aforementioned testimony."

If Mr. Walsh referred to me in thus speaking of a member of the Cabinet, I have only to say that the charge is untrue; and is without the slightest foundation upon which to base it.

In view of the opinion expressed by Mr. Bliss and yourself (in which I concur) that nothing should be said or done by any officer of the Government to impair the efficiency of the prosecution in the star-route cases, I refrain from further comment on Mr. Walsh's letter.

Very respectfully,

WM. E. CHANDLER.

Hon. BENJ. H. BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Mr. Bliss to Mr. Brewster.

(Personal.)

JUNE 19, 1883.

DEAR SIR: The motion in the Kellogg case is set down for Saturday. Do you desire that I should be present? I do not think that I am in fact needed, but as there may be an attempt to bring politics into the matter—out of court—you may not think it wise to leave the matter with Merrick and Ker solely.

I prefer not to leave here at present.

Your obedient servant.

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. BENJ. HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

I wish you would favor me with an answer by telegraph.

Mr. Bliss to Mr. Brewster.

THE UNION LEAGUE CLUB,
New York, August 16, 1883.

MY DEAR SIR: Is it desired or expected that I should take part in the trial of ex-Senator Kellogg?

I ask because it is necessary for me to know with reference to engagements for the fall and winter here.

Kellogg's trial is to be some time in October, I presume, the precise time not to be fixed till the court meets, on October 8. I consider that the Government has a right to my services at the trial if it wants them, but I must be able to arrange my engagements here. I have to arrange for some important trials here in October, and must therefore know what the Government desires of me.

As you know, I have never had any great faith that the case would succeed. If the evidence first produced by Walsh before the last grand jury were in possession of the Government, I should feel differently. I speak only from Mr. Ker's report as to those letters. But the Government has neither the letters nor copies. I fear Walsh cannot be relied upon. However this may be, I of course should do my best, if I went into the case. Perhaps some one who feels surer of success than I do would do better. Mr. Merrick and Mr. Ker are, of course, fully competent to manage the case without assistance from any one, but an attempt has been made to give a political turn to the case to the detriment of Mr. Merrick, and he as well as the Government ought to be protected from this. Some Republican ought to be associated with them. I am not sure I am the best man, but you have a right to my services.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. B. H. BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Mr. Walsh to Mr. Brewster.

NEW YORK, September 25, 1883.

SIR: Learning from a source deemed by me reliable that you have written a letter to the Hon. W. E. Chandler, Secretary of the Navy, wherein you make strictures of an unfavorable character concerning me in relation to the case of the United States against William Pitt Kellogg and my appearance therein as a witness for the Government, I beg leave to request that you furnish me with a copy thereof, as well as the date of the same.

Very respectfully,

J. A. WALSH.

Hon. B. H. BREWSTER,
Attorney-General, Washington, D. C.,
Care of Judge E. H. Grandin, 18 Broadway, New York.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Mr. Bliss made some statement with regard to your appearing in the first Dorsey trial and not appearing in the second, and made some criticism upon your conduct in that respect. Will you please explain that?—A. The occasion of my appearing?

Q. Yes; the occasion of your appearing in the one case and not in the other.—A. It was the common judgment of all the counsel in the case, and my judgment—and I was the person to be considered in that respect—and also the judgment of Mr. Woodward, that it was a very proper thing for me to appear, and it would perhaps be considered rather an improper thing if I did not appear. I had gone into court occasionally during the trial of the case; the counsel had frequently sent for me to be there. They said my presence would help it, particularly in what they thought were the pinches of the case, where points were to be argued, interlocutory points that might affect results. Sometimes I was not able to go, but I went frequently. When the first case was about to close, upon very deliberate reflection, it was determined it would be a proper and an important thing for me to appear there at the end and speak to the case in conclusion, and it would be a very improper and unexplainable thing if I did not appear and speak.

For the purpose of preparing myself, I went over the whole of the testimony that was taken; then I had it cut out and condensed, and here [indicating a large mass of papers] you see evidence of the preparation I personally made for my argument in the case. This is an abridgment of the evidence in the case. I went over it with great care. I sat up at nights—many a night—working at it, because in the daytime I had other duties and I was interrupted and could not study when so interrupted. It was very hot weather, but I remained here, at great personal inconvenience, until the 16th day of September, long after Congress had adjourned, in order to conclude that case. There was not a line of testimony or a line that counsel spoke I did not read and study. I sent for Mr. Woodward and conferred with him. He was kind enough to sit up with me and take part with me in the preparation, and his assistance proved to be very valuable. It was arranged I was to follow Mr. Wilson and Mr. Ingersoll, and close the case, and I determined, as a point of judgment, that I would confine my speech to such matters as their speeches developed and made it necessary for me to deal with, and I did so. Here is my argument, which will speak for itself. I made a brief argument, for the case had been elaborately discussed from beginning to end, and I did not undertake to touch upon all the points, because I thought it would be very wasteful and unnecessary and tiresome, and I thought it would be bad advocacy for me in the concluding speech to take advantage of that opportunity to go over the whole ground again. So, with a full knowledge of the whole case, I selected only those points which it seemed to me desirable and necessary for me to consider, and I spoke to them. The speech occupied the business part of two days, and then I left the case. I have been told that some little or puerile criticism was made here upon an incident which occurred while I was making my argument. The fact that it was commented upon here rather surprised me, for I could not see the purpose of it. It was silly and spiteful.

The CHAIRMAN. I suppose you refer to a statement which was made here to the effect that near the close of your argument the judge called your attention to an omission, and that you had some difficulty in answering him. Do you remember that?

The WITNESS. There was no omission at all. That is a mistake. I will tell you about it. Just as I was about to end, and while my mind was hurrying to a conclusion, I said, in effect, "Gentlemen of the jury, I am about to end this tedious and protracted discussion," and the judge at that point stopped me and propounded a question to me. It was a very intensely hot day, and I was very tired, and I did not catch the question. Judge Wylie's voice is a little low, and I did not quite understand what he said. I thought I had it, but I was not certain I had a perfect conception of what he meant, and, not wishing to make a mistake in any way, I turned around to speak to Mr. Merrick, who was sitting by my side, and ask him what it was the judge said, and he jumped up to explain the matter. My question to Mr. Merrick was, "What did he say? What does he mean?" Mr. Merrick rose and undertook to answer the court for me, and I sat down. I was glad to sit down, being very tired. Mr. Bliss was not present at my speech except at this last part of it. He was away. Then Mr. Wilson, for Dorsey, got up and said if Mr. Merrick was allowed to speak the defense would claim the right to speak again. I am testifying now from recollection, but I think my recollection will prove to be good. The court interposed and gave Mr. Wilson to understand that it was perfectly proper, that the Attorney-General was a little fatigued, and Mr. Merrick proposed to relieve him for a minute. The counsel upon the other side persisted and were quite eager. In the meanwhile, Mr. Ker leaned over to me and said, "The question the judge put to you was as to whether the indictment should lay the overt act to have been committed when the affidavit was sworn to or when the paper was filed." I was perfectly familiar with that subject, because when the counsel were considering how they would lay that in the bill of indictment, I was consulted by Mr. Ker, and if there was anything in the case I understood it was that. Seeing this altercation, I turned around and said to the court, "May it please your honor, I can answer. I was a little puzzled by your interruption, and as you were referring to dates and papers, I was afraid that you were referring to something that I had not seen. I now understand your question, and I will answer it." And I did answer the question of the judge. And then the case went right on. That is the history of that transaction. It was a silly, senseless thing to allude to it here. Such things happen in almost every case, and certainly in every case of any magnitude; frequently counsel do not hear what the court says, and their fellow counsel get up to assist. That is the experience of every lawyer, at least. I am sure it is my experience. No one there treated the incident as harmful, but on the contrary, when soon after that I closed, all the counsel for the Government came around to me and thanked me for "the help" they were then pleased to say I had given the case by my condensed and pointed review of all that was needed, and no one was more gracious and applauding than Mr. Bliss.

Q. You did not appear in the second trial?—A. No, sir. It was considered whether or not I should appear, and all of the counsel, Mr. Bliss included, were anxious I should appear. The court assented to it, but the other side would not consent to it. They said: "If the Attorney-General concludes, he must conclude, and Mr. Merrick cannot speak in the case, as you gentlemen propose." I had not been present much during the trial, and Mr. Merrick had borne the brunt of the case in a most manful way, and I thought it would be great injustice to him, and an act of great discourtesy for me to supplant him at the end, and I so expressed myself in a letter to him and Mr. Ker. The counsel for the Government all round said they felt regret that I did not appear. They wanted me to appear, for they said the aid of my official presence was of value to the case. And Mr. Bliss was most earnest of all in this wish, because, he said, my "forensic ability" and official position had been felt in the first trial to its great advantage.

I find upon page 15 of Senate Document 156, in a letter there published, written by Mr. Bliss, the following clause:

I assume there will be no further trials till fall, but that one or more should then take place.

As for your own past relations to the cases, permit me to say that it seems to me you have done all that the public expected or had a right to expect, and what is more all that any fair-minded men could expect. Your constant appearance in court was an impossibility. In view of your other duties it would have been an impropriety. In yielding your right to close to Mr. Merrick, you showed yourself above personal considerations and ready to sacrifice a great opportunity for personal aggrandizement to the good of the cause, for you rightly judged that, however great the difference in forensic ability, a counsel who had sat through a long case like this from day to day would be better prepared to deal with its infinite details than one who had prepared himself from the daily records, to say nothing of the inevitable springing upon counsel of new questions and new views just at the close of the defendant's argument.

Q. There was some question raised here as to whether the case that was actually tried—the Dorsey-Brady case—was the strongest that could have been selected for trial. Were you consulted in regard to that matter, or was that the act of the attorneys?—A. That was the act of the attorneys, but especially of Mr. Bliss. He selected it as the strongest case, and I had to depend upon his judgment. My impression is his judgment was approved of by Mr. Woodward; at all events, I had in that respect to depend entirely upon Mr. Bliss, whose knowledge of all the papers and of the details made it necessary for me to defer to him.

Q. If there were any other cases that should have been brought to the attention of the grand jury, and in which indictments should have been found, upon whom was the responsibility in that matter?—A. That duty was cast upon Mr. Bliss.

Q. If there were cases in which indictments should have been found, and in which they were not found, the responsibility for that, as you say, was with Mr. Bliss?—A. As the duty was with Mr. Bliss, the responsibility would have been with him. I have understood, and I believe it is undisputed, that Mr. Bliss, from first to last, controlled the selection of the cases, and he chiefly presented them to the grand jury. The reason given why Mr. Ker was kept in court was that Mr. Bliss had constant occasion to be before the grand jury.

Q. There was some effort made during the progress of these cases to bring about an arbitration. What do you know about that?—A. In reference to the Salisbury cases, I know nothing about it, excepting what Mr. Bliss told me. I heard of the Salisbury cases, and that they were important cases. Mr. Bliss used to come every day, and sometimes twice a day, to report to me what was going on, and after some time he told me that these Salisbury cases had failed before the grand jury, that they were not strong cases, were not well made out, and he had arranged with Mr. Ingersoll an arbitration should take place, and it was done with the consent of the Post-Office Department. I said, "Well, if the Post-Office Department assents to it, I have nothing to say." When he told me who were to be the arbitrators, Mr. Elmer, Mr. Ingersoll, and himself, I expressed my surprise at his selecting Mr. Ingersoll, or consenting himself, to be made an arbitrator with him after the violent scenes between them in court and the frightful insult Mr. Ingersoll had inflicted on him. He said as to himself another could be substituted. I said, "As long as Mr. Ingersoll remains, some counsel of the Government ought to be one of the arbitrators." I thought there was propriety in that, provided Mr. Ingersoll, one of the counsel on the other side, was to be an arbitrator; but it seemed to me the proper way would have been to have had some persons selected who had nothing to do with the conduct of the cases as counsel.

Q. What did Mr. Bliss say was the object of the arbitration?—A. To settle the civil liabilities of the Salisburys; he said inasmuch as the criminal cases could not be well made out, if the parties were willing to pay whatever might be found against them, it would be a great advantage to the Government to get them to consent to arbitrate without the delay incident to protracted proceedings in court; he seemed to regard it as quite an advantage to get an agreement to arbitrate; I never saw the advantage myself, but the Post-Office Department had assented to the agreement, and it was not for me to interfere.

Q. Were you consulted as to the legality to do it?—A. After wards Postmaster-General Howe and Mr. Elmer, having occasion to consider just how it stood, Mr. Howe came to me and talked about it, and I said, "I cannot see where you have the power to arbitrate. There is nothing to prevent the other side from revoking after they get a knowledge of your case." He submitted the question to me in writing, calling for an opinion upon the subject, and I gave an opinion, which is, of course, of record in the Post-Office Department, or in the Department of Justice, or in both, in which I expressed the view the submission was invalid, and it fell through in consequence of that opinion. Postmaster-General Howe was of the same opinion with me. I believe I have stated I knew nothing of that submission until after it was made, and I know nothing about the Salisbury cases, except as I have been told.

Q. Did Mr. Bliss state that the case against the Salisburys and the Parkers was a weak one, and did he give that as one of the reasons for submitting to an arbitration?—A. That is my recollection; indeed, I am clear about it.

Q. That is the criminal case?—A. The criminal case is the one I am alluding to, the case that went before the grand jury.

Q. Was this conversation which you have related prior to the submission to the grand jury, and to their decision?—A. It was afterward; it was told to me all at once; I was told at the same time the bills had been ignored—the grand jury do not find bills here; they make presentments, and the bills are prepared afterwards—I was told by Mr. Bliss the grand jury had refused to present those cases, and that the cases were weak, and he had succeeded in making this agreement to arbitrate, and he considered it was a very successful thing that he had achieved, and an advantage to the Government.

Q. Speaking of these civil suits generally, has the Postmaster-General at any time transmitted to you as Attorney-General a statement of the aggregate amounts which were estimated to be due from star-route contractors for overcharges, or illegal charges on account of expedition?—A. With reference to these civil cases, I will tell you all I know about them. When I first went into office Mr. Bliss spoke to me upon the subject of the civil suits, and in a letter which I wrote to him, and which was published, I alluded to those suits. It was the intention then to pursue them at the same time with the criminal suits, and I so expressed that intention in the letter I wrote him; but, upon conference, it was agreed that it was an impracticable thing, and not altogether a proper thing to do; that the civil suits might well be deferred until the criminal suits were disposed of as the statute of limitations would bar many of the criminal suits, but would not the civil suits. Mr. Bliss gave me to understand that Mr. James had said he should take charge of those civil suits. There the matter rested until about the end of the second Dorsey and Brady trial. Mr. Bliss then began to correspond with me on the subject of these suits. In the mean time Postmaster-General Gresham came in, and it was made a subject of discussion as to whether or not those suits ought to be pursued, and whether it was worth while to do so; whether they would not be fruitless in many instances; whether these parties sued at remote distances (as we had no faith in them at all, or in their methods of conducting business), would not interfere with juries and prevent verdicts, and make it a costly and interminable business to the Government. All this was canvassed and considered; but it was finally determined that the government did not pursue these kind of suits for the purpose of making money. That was my opinion, and it was accepted because the object was to show a determination on the part of the Government to follow whoever had wronged it by way of example, be the remedy civil or criminal, to let all such men feel they could not escape, and to see to it if they did escape it would be only after they had had their day in court.

Then the Postmaster-General undertook to have the cases put in order for the purpose of bringing civil suits. Some time last autumn he sent me a very full and abundant letter upon the subject, and sent over the papers to the Department of Justice. I do not know that he sent all of them, but many of them, and I think all. Then Mr. Bliss wrote me several letters upon the subject, in which he showed a great anxiety to get possession of those cases and to pursue them; but, on conference with the Postmaster-General, it was concluded that it would be better not to give them to Mr. Bliss; that he had his hands full with the criminal suits; and then, again, that it might be an expensive thing to let him take charge of these civil suits; at any rate, it was not considered a proper or politic thing to do, and I did not answer Mr. Bliss upon that subject for the very reason that I was not prepared to have him employed, and I wished to avoid the subject, as he was in the criminal cases, I did not care to provoke him by a flat refusal. There the matter was, and when the papers came to me in the Department of Justice, I sent them to Mr. Simons, who is chief assistant attorney-general in the Court of Claims, and his most experienced assistant, Mr. Blair—I say most experienced, because Mr. Simons indicated that Mr. Blair had the longest experience and the best practical knowledge of any of the gentlemen who were under him in the Court of Claims. Mr. Simons was selected because he has charge of all such matters. I asked them to examine these cases, and let me know what ought to be done, telling him to let nobody see the papers, but to keep them strictly private and secret. They detained the papers some two or three months examining them; they could not act more promptly, as they were occupied before the Court of Claims. Finally, they reported to me they had not time to deal with them properly; that it was not a work they could perform; as it would interfere wholly with their regular duties in the Court of Claims, and that the cases required some one to have charge of them and make it his special business. As the statute of limitations would not bar the cases, I did not feel uneasy about delay, but it was the determination of the Department, and it had been determined all round, that the cases must be proceeded with, and that is still the determination of the Post-Office Department and the Department of Justice. The cases were not laid aside for any reason of neglect or disinclination to pursue them. When Mr. Simons made this report to me, a gentleman was here who is one of the district attorneys, and connected with the Department of Justice—a man of considerable experience and practical usefulness—and I called him in and said to him, “I wish you would look at these cases and see what you can do with them for me,” because Mr. Simons, as I before stated, had said it was necessary to get some experienced, skillful, and responsible person to take charge of them. This gentleman made a kind of perfunctory examination of them, and then was called away on his professional and official duties, and he corresponded with me on the subject, and wanted $15,000 a year to take charge of the cases. I was not prepared to pay him $15,000 a year. I had not the money to give, and if I had I would not give it, because I thought it was an excessive charge. I had enough of that in the contract I had inherited, made with Mr. Bliss, and as I was about to make contracts now I was determined to have them on the safe side, and not to make any excessive or extravagant ones, such as I had been obliged to fulfill with Mr. Bliss; so I declined to employ the gentleman. Then there was another gentleman who had been named to take part in the prosecution of the election cases in South Carolina, and had come here to take charge of them; but inasmuch as, after consultation with the district attorney in South Carolina, Mr. Melton, and the best advice that could be had, we came to the conclusion those prosecutions would probably be fruitless, as all of them had already resulted in acquittals, and it would be exposing the Government to large and profitless expense to continue them, it was determined they must be abandoned, and in consequence of that determination there was of course no occasion to employ this gentleman, and he went away a little disappointed. I proposed to give him moderate employment to the amount of $1,200 or $1,500 in South Carolina, but that was not what he had expected; he wanted a higher position with more pay, and particularly more honor, and he felt disappointed and went away. I felt sorry for him, and after the offer of the gentleman who wanted $15,000 a year to take charge of the cases had been declined, the thought came to me, "Here is a man that has been disappointed, a man of reputed energy and fitness. I will send for him and see if he will take charge of them." I did send for him, and he staid here a week or ten days examining the papers, and then told me he had examined them enough to see they involved a vast amount of labor and responsibility, and it would take a year to dispose of the suits in the different jurisdictions where the cases would be brought, and he would like to know what I could afford to pay him. I said, "Now you have brought me to a point where I wish to be. Be good enough to give me a written statement of what you think would be a fair compensation for taking charge of these cases." He stated he had a large and profitable practice, and he could not afford to leave it unless he were well paid. I said, "That is all right; now make your charge according to your estimate of the value of your services. Consider what you would lose by leaving your business at home, and going away to attend to these cases, and tell me what you think a proper charge, and then I will decide whether I can afford to employ you." He went away, and, after consideration, wrote me a letter, which is of record, in which he asked $2,500 a month, or at the rate of $30,000 a year. Of course, having declined the services of one man at $15,000 a year, I declined this gentleman's services at $30,000, and so ended that negotiation. This was only a few weeks ago. As I cannot get suitable counsel without having to pay a very high price, I have determined to assign some one of the assistants in the Department connected with the Court of Claims to arrange those cases, and I will superintend them and have them attended to by the district attorneys where the jurisdiction will attach. There has not been a day of intentional nor even accidental delay. The cases have been pursued in good faith, just as I have explained. The difficulty has been to get counsel at a reasonable rate of compensation.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Does this list on the 397th page of our record comprise all the contractors against whom those cases are pending?—A. I cannot answer that. I have not examined those papers. There is an immense mass of them. I presume it does. I have not seen those papers, except one or two.

Mr. STEWART. I was going to ask you whether it does not appear on the face of this list that very many of these parties are either dead or irresponsible? For instance, here is John W. Dorsey, his name appears six times, and there is an aggregate amount against him of over $112,000.

Mr. LYMAN. The bondsmen are responsible.

Mr. STEWART. The bond would not cover any such matter as this.

The WITNESS. It has been construed that it does cover the faithful performance of the whole contract afterwards. So I am told.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is whether the bondsman would be responsible for moneys received by the illegal procurement of expedition.

The WITNESS. Prima facie, he would not be for a fraudulent act done without his knowledge, where he had no complicity.

Mr. STEWART. It would appear from an inspection of this list that some of these parties are irresponsible, and some of them are dead; for instance, John M. Peck, and John R. Miner.

The WITNESS. Peck is dead.

Mr. STEWART. Well, here is an amount of several hundred thousand dollars claimed against John M. Peck, and I suppose he died insolvent.

The WITNESS. In that case there would be no suit, of course, if the fact of the insolvency was well ascertained.

Mr. STEWART. The larger portion of these names I should think would probably come in the same category.

The WITNESS. As to those that are dead and insolvent, there would be no suits; and as to those that are living and worthless, we could not ascertain that until there was an execution.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless it was notorious.

The WITNESS. Well, even then the Government would feel it necessary to get judgment, to show the man that he would not be treated as if he were free from wrong-doing and permitted to enjoy immunity.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. We are to understand, then, that the Department has determined to pursue these cases?—A. Yes, sir; that is the intention of both the Departments. That was resolved in consequence of my expressed determination that wherever there was a legal duty, it should be performed, and wherever there was a legal right, it should be enforced.

Q. Mr. Bliss suggested to the committee that a fruitful subject of investigation would be the alleged attempt of some agents of your Department to bribe some members of the jury in the star-route cases, and there have been allegations to the effect that some person connected with the Department made overtures to members of the jury pending the first Dorsey trial; do you know anything about that?—A. I know only what all the world knows. I was away when that thing occurred. There was an attempt made to make it appear that Mr. Cameron had solicited Mr. Dickson, but it was examined thoroughly; I had it examined, intending to deal with Mr. Cameron if he were guilty in the slightest degree of being connected with such an affair, and the result of the examination was to show there was an attempt made to entrap Mr. Cameron, but that he never saw Mr. Dickson to speak to him. He saw him at a distance, but never spoke to him, and the very moment that Bowen, in the room of Driver's restaurant, made the proposal, Mr. Cameron went to Judge Hoover, on the spot, at the door of Driver's restaurant and said, "Why, the scoundrel, or the villain, demands money," or, "wants money," and he would have nothing to do with him, and Mr. Cameron then went right off to the railway and left for Arizona that night. The testimony was, and there is a letter in existence written by Mr. Merrick stating, that he and Mr. Ker both advised Mr. Cameron to see Mr. Dickson, because Mr. Dickson had sent him a message he had something to communicate, and Mr. Merrick had faith in Mr. Dickson's intention to reveal something that ought to be known, but Mr. Cameron refused to see Dickson, and never did see him, but left town immediately and started off to Arizona within fifteen or twenty minutes after Mr. Bowen had conveyed Mr. Dickson's request for money to him.

Q. Whom did you authorize to make an investigation of that charge?—A. Ex-Governor Wells.

Q. Ex-district attorney of this District?—A. He had been district attorney here. He was also at one time, I am told, governor of West Virginia. He was specially employed to investigate this case, and there is a report of his upon the subject in the Department, a copy of which you can have.

Q. Did he make a thorough examination?—A. Thorough. I was de-terminated that if Mr. Cameron had the slightest color of connection, directly or indirectly, with any attempt to tamper with any of the jury, I would dismiss him on the spot and hand him over to be dealt with by the prosecuting officer of the District, and I so said.

Mr. STEWART. There was not any evidence before this committee that he had done anything of that kind.

The WITNESS. No, sir; nor is there anywhere that I have seen, nor can there be, from all that I have learned.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Who was Bowen?—A. I do not know. He was a friend of Judge Hoover. I believe he was a man of very bad character.

Q. Did he have any authority from the Department to represent it in any way?—A. Not the slightest. I never gave him any authority. He brought me a note and card from the Secretary of War, recommending him as a gentleman. The Secretary of War said afterwards he had given him the note and card not meaning to recommend him to the extent that it was accepted. Upon that recommendation he got some employment at $5 a day, to look after violations of law relating to liquor traffic with the Indians, but he was immediately dismissed before he performed any duties. It was in consequence of Judge Hoover's recommendation and the recommendation of Mr. Secretary Lincoln, he was employed by the Department at all. I do not know that I have heard of a man in connection with any of these cases who had a worse record than that man. Members of his own family came to me and pronounced him as a castaway and a bad fellow.

Q. Were you satisfied from the report of Mr. Wells as to the facts in the case that they did not involve anybody connected with your Department?—A. Thoroughly, thoroughly, thoroughly.

Q. Where is Mr. Brewster Cameron?—A. In Tucson, Ariz. He holds an appointment there as receiver of public moneys.

Q. He has recently gone there, I believe?—A. Within a month.

Q. Was he in the city when Mr. Bliss appeared before this committee the last time?—A. No; Mr. Cameron went away from here and attended the Republican Chicago convention, and then directly upon the adjournment of that convention went to Tucson, and was 2,000 miles away from this city when Mr. Bliss last testified before this committee.

Q. I have here a letter from him, addressed to the chairman of this committee, dated Tucson, Ariz., June 24, 1884, with which he transmits a written statement of his connection with this jury matter, which is sworn to before an officer authorized to administer oaths, the clerk of a court, I think, in Arizona. Have you seen the paper?—A. It was sent to me and I sent it to you. He requested that I should do so, and I did.

The CHAIRMAN. I think this might go in as a part of your statement.

The WITNESS. As you please, sir. Mr. Cameron requested that you should have it, and I thought it was right that you should.

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection to its going in, but I do not see that there is any evidence here implicating Mr. Cameron at all.

The WITNESS. When Governor Wells was employed to investigate the matter, Mr. Bliss was consulted and was very active in advising about defending Mr. Cameron, and I have his letters to that effect. In all he said and wrote then, he was earnest in his expressions of belief that it was a snare set for Mr. Cameron by the defendants; and he never once hinted or said or acted as if he believed him guilty, and he ever after that trusted him and consulted freely with him. He did not approve of Mr. Wells's employment, but I took Mr. Wells because Mr. Simons, the first assistant in the Court of Claims, recommended him. I wrote him to know where I could get an impartial and responsible man to investigate the matter, and he gave me the name of Mr. Wells, and I took Mr. Wells.

Q. He was directed to make a thorough and impartial investigation of the facts, and report to you the truth?—A. Yes, sir; and the object was that I should learn the facts, so that if Mr. Cameron had gone astray I should deal with him, and I so told Governor Wells.

Q. And the result of that investigation was the entire exoneration of Mr. Cameron?—A. Yes, sir; and Mr. Cameron was discharged before the magistrate and Mr. Dickson and others were bound over.

Q. Mr. Bliss and Mr. Ker have stated that there was some misunderstanding between Mr. Bliss and you in regard to the course of the Department in the Strobach case. Is there any statement that you can make in reference to that matter?—A. I will tell you what I know about it. I know it because I knew the fact at the time, but I have also refreshed my recollection by reference to the records of the Department. I believe—now if I am wrong you must correct me—Mr. Bliss complained here (I know that he complained to Mr. Cameron) that the Department of Justice had acted in a very irregular way in having knowledge of the charges against Mr. Strobach and other persons and permitting the President to appoint them to office and then instituting proceedings against them after the appointments had been made. That is not the fact, and never was the fact. I think it would be a very improper thing for a member of the Cabinet to have charges pending against a man in his Department, and to know of them, and stand by silent, knowing the President proposed to appoint the man, and wait until the President appointed him, and then afterwards make an assault upon the person appointed. But Mr. Bliss did not then take that ground. He took the ground at the time he interfered and talked with Mr. Cameron and with me, that where a man had been appointed by the President (he did that in a letter to me, and he did it in a conversation with me, a very warm conversation)—that where a man had been appointed by the President and his past official acts became the subject of complaint after he was appointed, the Department ought not to pursue the man; that the appointment condoned the offense. I pronounced that a very dishonest doctrine, and said if it were to be published to the world, it would be and ought to be generally condemned as a great political immorality and infamy. The facts connected with Mr. Strobach's appointment are these: He was appointed upon March 2, 1883, and upon the 7th of March the general agent of the Department of Justice sent an examiner down to Alabama to examine Marshal Osborn's accounts. (Osborn was removed, and Strobach was appointed in his place.) After the examiner had gone the general agent received a telegram from a Mr. Booth, dated on March 6, at Montgomery, Ala., in which Mr. Booth called the attention of the general agent to the fact that Mr. Strobach ought not to have been appointed a marshal, and stated he had formerly been a deputy marshal, and an examination ought to be made into his accounts. This was after his appointment as marshal. He was appointed upon the 2d or 3d of March, and this telegram did not come until the 7th. An examiner of the Department, Mr. Bowman, was then down there making an examination into Mr. Osborn's accounts, not Strobach's, and he will tell you all about it; he made the report. On the 9th of March the general agent wrote to Mr. Bowman and referred the telegram of Mr. Booth to him. In consequence of that, Mr. Stro-bach's accounts as deputy marshal were examined, and he was found to be implicated in a way that subsequently led to his indictment. The facts were unknown to the Department, never discovered, and never thought of, until his appointment had been made and he was in possession of his office. He was then indicted, and you know the rest of it.

Q. From the sequence of those events, it would appear that the appointment of Strobach suggested to Booth to give the information to the Department?—A. It was entirely in consequence of that telegram the investigation was made. Mr. Bowman will tell you he was down there to investigate Osborn, not Strobach, and that he had no idea of pursuing Strobach until he received this telegram directing his attention to the matter. Osborn was then out of office and Strobach had been appointed. The investigation was made, and it developed the facts for which he was afterwards indicted, and which were then for the first time discovered or thought of by the Department.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Strobach was acquitted, was he not?—A. He was acquitted on one bill. There were several other bills against him. Then there was a strenuous opposition and serious complaint made by him, and a violent outcry spread by means of the Associated Press all over the country, that Mr. Cameron had persecuted him; in consequence of which I detailed Mr. Blair to examine all the papers. As soon as the stenographic report of the trial containing all the evidence and all the proceedings, with the speeches of counsel and the judge's charge and all the papers came, they were given to Mr. Blair. I then sent him down to Alabama and he investigated the matter there, and he came back and made a report to me he was of the opinion that Mr. Strobach was guilty, and that it was the opinion there while he was marshal he could not be convicted. Mr. Blair also expressed doubt as to whether or not he could be convicted at any rate. He also said there was a question as to whether or not the trial upon that one bill did not virtually include in effect all the other bills. I then directed the papers to be sent to Mr. Bentley, of the Department of Justice, not giving him Mr. Blair's report, but asking him to make a report upon those papers as to what ought to be done. Mr. Bentley, without knowing Mr. Blair's opinion, gave a written opinion of his own that, in his judgment, Mr. Strobach was guilty and ought to have been convicted, and he suggested that perhaps there was some doubt as to whether or not he ought to be tried again, as there was a question whether or not one acquittal did not virtually in law avoid the other indictments. Then I sent the case to Mr. Maury, solicitor for the Department in the Supreme Court of the United States, the first assistant. He, not knowing what the others had done, gave a similar opinion. Then I gave the case to Mr. Solicitor-General Phillips and Mr. Simons conjointly, and they examined it and came to a like conclusion, but suggested that probably there had better be another trial, stating they were satisfied the man was guilty. After reflecting upon the matter, I finally concluded, as there was a doubt, I would, with considerable misgiving, dismiss the other prosecutions, to avoid expense and to give Mr. Strobach the benefit of the legal doubts in his case, and because it was clear to me while he was marshal there could be no conviction, and I did dismiss them, and that ended the proceedings. That is the history of the case.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You reported all those facts, I believe to the Senate, at their request?—A. The Judiciary Committee of the Senate called upon me for the reports of these gentlemen, with my findings, and I sent the Senate the whole of them.

Q. Mr. Strobach's appointment was rejected by the Senate?—A. It was rejected.

Q. Then there was no difference of opinion between you and the President with regard to the propriety of your course in that matter?—

A. The President said if there was any persecution it ought to be stopped and the matter investigated. He did not like the idea of a man he had just appointed to office being prosecuted, and he wished me to have the matter investigated. I informed him of the reports that had been made, and there it rested.

Q. Did Mr. Bliss insist upon it that the appointment was a condoning of past offenses?—A. He did not use the word "condoning" or "condone" in a letter, but he wrote me a letter in which he maintained the doctrine that where the President had made an appointment, the subsequent prosecution of the person appointed was improper, no matter when the facts were discovered or known, and he did say to Mr. Cameron that the appointment condoned the offense, and he also said it in words to me. That is how I came to use the word in connection with this subject. Mr. Bliss acknowledged to me he had had a conversation with Mr. Cameron upon this subject, in which he had maintained that doctrine, and I reprehended it and refused to listen to such a proposition.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. I do not know what the object of this inquiry is, but Mr. Bliss, I suppose, had no official relations to that matter, one way or the other—no relations except as an individual?—A. He spoke as if speaking by higher authority, but really he had no more right to interfere with it than any other man you would meet in the street. He had nothing to do with it, and that made his act offensively intrusive and unmannerly.

Q. So that it is a mere personal matter as regards Mr. Bliss. No man connected with the administration has entertained or expressed any such view?—A. I do not think there is any gentleman in the administration who would have the hardihood to stand up and maintain such a doctrine. If he did, he had better prepare to leave office. I think public sentiment would put him out.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Mr. Bliss's report in reference to the Ottman case has been brought to the attention of this committee; do you remember that report?—A. I think you called my attention to it because Mr. Bliss made some allusion to it in connection with Mr. Cameron.

The CHAIRMAN. No; that was in relation to the case of Strobach. Mr. Bliss said in his testimony that he had told Mr. Ker that if the course of the Department of Justice was continued Brewster Cameron or some one must leave.

The WITNESS. Mr. Cameron reported to me that Mr. Bliss had said if these things were persisted in I would have to leave the Cabinet. They have been persisted in and I have not left the Cabinet. But they have not been persisted in any other way than a proper way. Where the guilt of persons nominated for office was not known to the Department at the time of their nomination and where it was discovered afterwards, they have been duly prosecuted according to law.

Q. Please explain now what action the Department took in reference to the Ottman case?—A. After I came into office I had a great deal of débris to clear off that had been left on my hands in consequence of the condition of things after General Garfield was wounded. There was a mass of matter that had to be cleared out and I had to learn the routine duties of the office, of which I had no previous knowledge. At that time, shortly after I became Attorney-General, Mr. Bliss came to me and told me there was a case there called the Ottman case and stated there was a considerable sum of money withheld and either attached or in the keeping of the Government officials, money which the man had been charged with stealing, but that he had been acquitted.

Q. Did he say Ottman had been acquitted or that the jury had disagreed?—A. My impression is he said the man had been acquitted. I learned afterwards there had been a disagreement of the jury, but the impression Mr. Bliss left upon my mind was that there had been an acquittal. I do not think he meant to mislead me at all; I am sure he did not; but that was the impression I got from what he said. He said the money ought to be disposed of, that it should go somewhere, and somebody was entitled to it; that the Government had rested without acting for ten years. He came severaltimes to see me upon the subject. I inquired of the chief clerk about it and quite a mass of papers were laid before me. I had no time to examine those papers. Mr. Bliss seemed to be very anxious and earnest about it, and in consequence of that I said to him: "To whom shall I refer these papers? I cannot examine them. It is out of my power to examine them." He suggested that somebody should be appointed to take them in hand. I said, "Well, to whom shall I refer them?" I did not understand much about the machinery of the office at that time. As I know now, the proper person to have referred them to would have been the Solicitor-General, but if I had sent them to him then it would have delayed the matter, because he was at that time before the Supreme Court attending to his list there, and the object, as presented by Mr. Bliss with urgency, was to get rid of the case then. Mr. Bliss named several gentlemen, none of whom I had ever heard of, and as he named them he rejected them, saying, This one won't do for this reason, and that one won't do for that reason; and it ended by my turning to him and saying, "You seem to know all about this case; why cannot you take it up and examine it?" He said, after some momentary hesitation, he would do it provided he would be permitted to do it without compensation. I said, "Why cannot you be paid for your services? If you are going to render the service you may as well be paid." He said he would accept no compensation, but he would take the case in charge and examine it thoroughly for me, and let me know what there was really in it. After some time, not very long, ten days, two weeks, or, maybe, a month, he made a report upon the subject, and I accepted and adopted that report. It is all in the papers. I have not read them since the time, but I read them all then and approved his report, and that was the last I heard or thought of the matter. I took Mr. Bliss's action in the case, because I had confidence in him. Then, too, I knew he was an old district attorney and had large experience in matters of that kind, and I thought as this was an affair that had arisen out of a prosecution by the district attorney here, Mr. Bliss would be the most suitable man I could find to take charge of it. It was for these reasons I took him, and I accepted his report and adopted it, and believed I was doing what was right. I thought it was a proper thing to do on the facts as they were reported and the case stated by him in the report.

Q. Then you acted entirely upon the judgment and recommendation of Mr. Bliss?—A. I did, wholly. That is, I consulted no other person.

Nobody else spoke to me upon the subject. Mr. Corkhill wrote a letter, which is on record, in which he sustains the facts as found by Mr. Bliss——

Q. You did not personally examine the details of the case?—A. I read all that Mr. Bliss wrote and reported about it.

Q. You knew what he stated in his report?—A. As he gave it.

By Mr. STEWART :

Q. Have you any reason now to doubt the propriety of his view of the case?—A. Since I read in the newspapers what Governor Wells said here about the time of the beginning of this investigation, I do not think that if, at the time I was conferring with Mr. Bliss, I had known and believed what Governor Wells states, I would have confirmed Mr. Bliss's report.

Q. That would depend upon whether Governor Wells was right or whether Mr. Bliss was right, would it not?—A. Certainly ; but I mean that what has been stated by Governor Wells would have persuaded me to stop and inquire further, and I would not have confirmed that report immediately, as I did. I would have inquired further.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. In what respect does Governor Wells's report differ from Mr. Bliss's?—A. Governor Wells, I believe, denies some of the statements that Mr. Bliss makes.

By Mr. STEWART :

Q. What had Governor Wells to do with the case?—A. He was the prosecuting officer when this man Ottman was prosecuted, but at the time Mr. Bliss took up the case I was assured by all who were consulted as reported by Mr. Bliss, that there was really no chance of getting a conviction.

Q. And therefore, in that view of the case, Mr. Bliss contended that it would be wise and expedient, and best on the whole, to make that compromise?—A. I thought at the time it was a proper thing to do, and I have only had a doubt raised in my mind by reading what Governor Wells said, as to whether I would not have paused and inquired further before confirming Mr. Bliss's report.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. At the time you confirmed that report you were of the opinion that civil suits for the recovery of the money would not be successful?—A. Yes, sir; I was advised and I thought it was hardly possible to recover that money. If I had been advised or had thought there was a chance of recovering the money—any chance—I should have declined to compromise.

By Mr. STEWART :

Q. Mr. Bliss expresses the opinion now, does he not, that there was not any chance of recovering the money?—A. He said so to me at the time.

Q. Well, he so testified before this committee, I believe?—A. So I understand ; I did not read his testimony.

Q. You have no reason to suppose that he acted in bad faith?—A. No. I hope you do not think I said so.

Mr. STEWART. No, you did not.

The WITNESS. I said a little while ago, when Mr. Bliss told me the man had been acquitted; he did not mean to mislead me; I was very sure he did not.

The CHAIRMAN. If Ottman had been acquitted that would have been the end of the case, would it not?

The WITNESS. I have told you subsequently I found out he had not been acquitted. I mention that because I have a distinct recollection at the time the case was first presented to me, when Mr. Bliss told me the man had been acquitted, I wondered why the money had not been handed over; that puzzled me. I said to myself, "Here is a man acquitted. Why do not they give him the money?" But subsequently I ascertained he had not been acquitted, but the jury had disagreed, and that was the reason of the money being impounded.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Mr. Attorney-General, let me ask you a general question with reference to the conduct of the star-route cases about which so much has been said—whether you have any reason to believe from any fact that transpired in the history of that prosecution, or anything in the conduct of Mr. Merrick or Mr. Bliss, that either of them omitted to do anything that he was required to do as a matter of duty, or did anything in violation of his professional duty and employment?—A. I would be very sorry to believe any such thing, and I do not believe it, from any knowledge I have. I think they did their duty to the best of their ability. I was very much startled at one time, just before the first trial ended, by an interview that was published, purporting to have been had with Mr. Bliss at Alexandria Bay, which I did not believe. I thought it was some newspaper misstatement by somebody who had taken a great liberty with him, and I said so then. Shortly after that there was a letter published by Mr. Bliss, explaining that interview, which I thought was a very incautious letter, particularly as the case had not ended; but I never supposed, and I never was willing to believe, that Mr. Bliss had been guilty of any premeditated infidelity to the case.

Q. My question, of course, bears only upon the point of good faith. I did not mean to ask whether the counsel had not made mistakes. Any lawyer is, of course, liable to make a mistake, and if Mr. Bliss published any such letter as to the weakness of the case it would seem to have been a mistake.—A. I have answered you. I say I did not believe and would not be willing to believe that Mr. Bliss or Mr. Merrick had been guilty of any infidelity to the case, from any knowledge that I possess.

Q. You have already said that so far as the President is concerned he has never manifested any other disposition or desire than that the cases should be thoroughly prosecuted, and you have said that he told you he was ready to afford you any aid he could to see that justice was done.—A. Yes. When I went into office the first thing the President said to me was, he wished me to take especial charge of those star-route cases, he wished me to give them my especial and careful attention, and he would do any and all things that I should call upon him to do to assist me in having the cases thoroughly investigated and tried. And, from the beginning to the end, he has continued to act in that spirit, has always assisted me, confided in me, and strengthened me in everything I have done. I feel that the President's help and confidence have been of very great value to me in pursuing those cases.

Q. Please state whether that attitude and conduct of the President extended to the Kellogg case.—A. Why, certainly. I said the star-route cases. I made no distinction between them. I hope you do not think I intended to make any.

Mr. STEWART. No; but sometimes people have attempted to make a distinction between that case and the others.

The WITNESS. I believe the President has been true to his duty in that matter.

Mr. STEWART. He is not now a candidate for office, so that there is no political capital to be made out of the question, and I do not ask it in that way.

The WITNESS. Well, I do not answer it in that way.

Mr. STEWART. As you are the law officer of this administration, I ask the question merely in order to have your professional opinion on the subject.

The WITNESS. I do not give it to you with any other view than as an act of justice to the President. There can be no misunderstanding about that, and I think the question is a very proper one, if you will permit me to say so.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. MacVeagh stated, I think, that there was something in relation to the removal of certain public officers which indicated that the administration was not in earnest in prosecuting the star-route cases.

Mr. STEWART. I do not remember that he said that.

The WITNESS. Mr. Bliss and Mr. Merrick made special complaints against local officers here who, they said, were hindering the prosecution of these cases and were giving aid and comfort to the defendants, and I applied to the President, and he at once dismissed them upon my application. There was not a day's delay. When I went to him he moved on the instant, and I remember that when it was the subject of remark by others present, he said, "I will stand by the Attorney-General in this and sustain him." I called for the removal of those men, and they were removed accordingly.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. One of those cases was that of Marshal Henry, I believe?—A. Yes, sir; Marshal Henry and two or three other persons. Marshal Henry was removed for a flagrant violation of his duty in aiding the defendants. I knew of his bad conduct, and officially, in a personal interview, reprehended Marshal Henry for his misconduct, and he entreated me, with much feeling, to overlook what he said was his negligence, and what I said was wilful misconduct; and I knew also of the bad conduct of some of the others, and their conduct was a matter of complaint by Mr. Bliss and Mr. Merrick.

Q. Mr. Bliss presented in his testimony here a letter written by you, requesting him to see Mr. Kellogg. Do you remember that?—A. The first I knew of Mr. Kellogg being indicted was when he came to the Department of Justice in great distress, in a most excited way, crying and wringing his hands, and complaining that Mr. Merrick was pursuing him, and that it was a political persecution. I never had heard of the suit or the proceedings. I told him I did not believe Mr. Merrick would persecute anybody, and I felt sure he had nothing to do with the indictment, because he did not go into the grand-jury room, as I understood, but that I would see about it; and Mr. Kellogg went away. Soon after that I saw Mr. Bliss and asked him about the matter, and he said, "Mr. Kellogg is all wrong there. I am the only party to be called to account for that. My friends have complained that I have been pursuing this man with sharpness, and I am doing it, not Mr. Merrick. His name appears in this transaction and he must be called to account for it." I told him it was a sad thing to have Mr. Kellogg coming to me crying and going on as he did, and I felt very bad about it, and was pleased to hear what he, Bliss, said, particularly as I had assured Mr. Kellogg that Mr. Merrick had nothing to do with this "persecution," as he called it. A day after that I was tired and worn out, having been sitting up the night before working at the star-route case then on trial, and I was lying in bed in my room, in the afternoon, at Wormley's Hotel, when there was a knock at the door. I was asleep at the time. The knock at the door awakened me. The servant came in and brought Mr. Kellogg with him; he followed in as the servant entered. Mr. Kellogg was in a high state of excitement; he cried, wept, clasped his hands and wrung them, and expressed himself in terms of great anxiety and distress. It was a painful thing for me to witness, and it wearied and annoyed me very much. I pacified him and talked with him, and told him he ought not to come and annoy me in that way. I was lying in bed undressed, and he continued this sort of distressful talk and complaining about Mr. Merrick persecuting him. I told him it was not so, that Mr. Bliss had told me only a day before Mr. Merrick had nothing to do with it; and finally I said: "Why don't you go and see Mr. Bliss? He will tell you all about it. You ought not to come and plague me and tire me and annoy me in this way." He said Mr. Bliss would not receive him. I said, "Yes, he will"; and I asked him to hand me a piece of paper, and I took a pencil and wrote a note on my knees, lying in bed, and gave it to him. Just as I had finished it and handed it to him Mr. Brewster Cameron came in to see me, and Mr. Kellogg told him in an undertone to go out, that he wished to be alone with me. I called Mr. Cameron in and said I wanted him there. I said that, because I wanted to be done with the scene. Mr. Cameron came in, and then Mr. Kellogg got up—for he was kneeling by my bed-side sobbing—and, in a very excited way, and with a great deal of feeling, expressed his gratitude, and took me by the hand, said he would never forget my kindness, and said he would deliver the note to Mr. Bliss, and went off.

After he had gone, I said to Mr. Cameron, "That man has tired the life out of me; he has waked me up and annoyed me, and I have given him a letter and sent him to Mr. Bliss to get rid of him." Mr. Cameron said, "He will make a bad use of that letter." I said, "No, he cannot; there is nothing in the letter; it is only a line or two scribbled here on my knee, asking Mr. Bliss to receive him. He is a very pleasant and agreeable man and is in trouble, and I don't think he would make a bad use of it." Remember at this time I did not know the details of the case, for when Mr. Kellogg undertook to tell me I would not permit him. I told him I had no right to hear what he had to say, that he might tell me something it would be my duty to take cognizance of officially. He said he could trust my honor. I said, "I will not take your compliments or your confidence one way or the other; you cannot talk to me. I will not permit you." In reply to my remark about his not making a bad use of the letter, Mr. Cameron said, "Yes, he is in trouble to be sure, and he is a pleasant man, but the fact that he is in trouble might make him use that letter improperly." I then said to Mr. Cameron, "Go and tell Mr. Bliss exactly the circumstances under which I gave that note." He did go away, and he subsequently swore that he did tell Mr. Bliss. To all of this Mr. Cameron has sworn, and I hand you his affidavit repeating all I have here related. That letter was never alluded to until Mr. Bliss brought it out here. I am told he said here it embarrassed him. He never displayed to me any embarrassment about it. It was months after the date of the note that we met at my house and he never spoke of it then. I will here add that Mr. Kellogg was constantly seeking opportunities to see me and importuning me to dismiss the proceedings. Once he followed me to New Port, Rhode Island, in September, 1882, and was so noisy in his excitement and solicitations that my wife, who overheard him, thought it was some one asking a pardon for a condemned man. I persisted in following the Kellogg matter up, and never abated any of my conclusions upon it. When it was before the grand jury I wanted it pursued there, and afterwards when we had a consultation at my house, or conversation about it, I said I was determined it should be pursued and proceeded with. I never had any doubt in my mind for a moment about the necessity for that prosecution. I will not say whether the man ought or ought not to be convicted; that would not be a proper thing for me to say now; but I knew there was sufficient evidence to warrant me in seeing the indictment should be regularly presented and found if possible. And it was all the more necessary the case should be followed up because there was an outcry made by Mr. Walsh that Mr. Bliss and I and "a cabinet officer" were concerned in suppressing it.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. Did you advise the bringing of this matter to the attention of the grand jury before the statute of limitations should have run on any phase of the case?—A. Yes; and when the statute was supposed to have run, there was a doubt whether or no it had run against the time when the money was paid, after it had run against the time when the papers were delivered. I also directed that question to be presented to the court for determination. That it did not become me to determine; but I wish to say here I think Judge Wylie decided that properly. I agree with Judge Wylie's opinion. Mr. Merrick and I do not agree as to that. I have always considered Judge Wylie determined that question correctly. I believe he tried that Kellogg case in good faith, as he conducted the whole proceedings. It is almost disrespectful to compliment him, but I want to say as a public officer, I feel thankful to Judge Wylie for the labor and the care and the learning he bestowed upon those cases, and generally for the way in which he discharged his duty in the cases.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think Judge Wylie has been unfavorably criticised at all.

The WITNESS. Yes; some have criticised him. In the first place, I never did; I do not think it becomes an officer in my position, or any lawyer engaged in a case to criticise a judge who has done his duty to the best of his ability, every assumption being in his favor; and, in the second place, as I have examined these proceedings and followed them through, I take this opportunity to say I think Judge Wylie deserves praise for the way in which he presided in these cases; he had a very serious, laborious, and difficult duty to perform, and he performed it with signal ability. I think his charges on both the trials were remarkably clear and fair. As to the interlocutory points he decided, not having been present much of the time, I know nothing about them; but I must assume they were correctly decided. As to the Kellogg case, I think when Mr. Kellogg insisted upon a trial it was his right to have it, and although the Government sought to have the case continued until it could be ascertained whether we could get Mr. Walsh, I think when the judge ordered the trial to proceed he did right. I think Mr. Kellogg had a right to have the case tried, and that Judge Wylie decided that question properly. I think also when Mr. Walsh appeared and Price's testimony was taken and it was decided finally upon the motion of the defense to strike out that testimony, the judge's decision on the motion was correct. I have read his opinion, and I agree with Judge Wylie; not merely because it is my duty as a lawyer to submit to the decision of the court until it is reversed, but beyond that, I say as a lawyer if I were the judge in the case I would have made the same decision.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been alleged that Mr. Merrick showed some partisan zeal or prejudice in the case.

The WITNESS. Against Mr. Kellogg?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. Was any such feeling exhibited by Mr. Merrick to you or to your knowledge?

The WITNESS. I never saw it. Mr. Merrick was very positive as to the necessity of prosecuting the case, but he always gave the reason of a lawyer, assuming Walsh would produce the papers and documents he had seen and Price would give evidence on the trial to the facts set out in his affidavits. I believe Mr. Merrick to be a man of integrity and truthfulness, and he always disclaimed any feeling of malice in the matter.

Mr. STEWART. There is not any evidence before this committee which in the slightest degree would impugn the integrity or propriety of Mr. Merrick's professional conduct.

The WITNESS. I am answering a question, Governor Stewart. I am not volunteering to defend Mr. Merrick. Mr. Merrick spoke to me frequently upon the subject of this Kellogg case, and said, "Now, whenever you think my presence in this case is unnecessary or undesirable because of these allegations of malice, just say so and I will step out." And, finally, when the case was set for hearing and we saw it would be tried, I told Mr. Merrick I thought the time was come. I said to him, "Mr. Kellogg is very open in his declarations that you are instigating this prosecution and infusing an element of personal malice into it from your hatred to him, and I think it is the proper thing you should now leave the case, as you have previously suggested your willingness to do." I made the suggestion to Mr. Merrick, and he wrote me a note at once, withdrawing. I thought the time had come, for I was determined, if the case went to trial, it should not have the appearance of being prosecuted from any but public motives.

The CHAIRMAN. You were determined that Mr. Kellogg should have a fair and impartial trial?

The WITNESS. Oh, yes; that every man should have a fair and impartial trial.

Mr. STEWART. I do not know but it may be expected that in view of the charges made by the gentlemen employed as counsel for the Government in these star-route cases for their personal services, the committee should take your judgment as to the propriety of those charges. I do not mean your opinion as Attorney-General, but as a professional man of long professional experience, and also as one having personal knowledge of the cases. I will therefore ask you whether, in your judgment, the charges made by Mr. Merrick, Mr. Bliss, and Mr. Ker are excessive?

The WITNESS. My judgment is expressed in the letters I wrote on the subject, which are published in Senate Document 156. My judgment has been, and still is this, that Mr. Bliss made a bargain and that the bargain was not an extravagant one at the time it was made, in view of what was supposed to be the probable length of time that would be consumed by the cases. It was not supposed or believed then they would occupy the great length of time they did. Mr. Bliss, I am informed, is a lawyer who enjoys a fair practice in New York, and they pay good fees there. Expenses are very high in New York. Men to live there respectably must earn a great deal of money. Mr. Bliss left his home and his business, left what business he had and surrendered the opportunities for new employment there, and he certainly gave a great deal of earnest, apt, industry to these cases, and if the cases had continued for only a few months at the rate he charged I would have thought he was properly paid. But after they had come to be prolonged as they were, I thought Mr. Bliss ought to have had some consideration for the Department, in view of the criticisms that were made, and ought to have abated his charges somewhat and looked upon the cases not merely as an opportunity for gain, but as an opportunity for professional honor and distinction as well as for reasonable gain.

But he was governed by his understanding, and he did work industriously, and, I think, with a great deal of apt skill. He has a peculiar fitness and skill in matters connected with documentary proofs, and in marshaling evidence in cases like these, and he was of value. He insisted on receiving what he had agreed to take, and for that reason I thought he had a right to it. I would rather myself he had reduced the amount and not made so heavy a charge, because it would have relieved the Department from the criticisms of a great many people in the country and elsewhere who think the charge very high; who do not understand the fees that are paid to lawyers in cities and places where money is abundant and where they are well paid for their experience and services. Mr. Merrick, I think, has been paid liberally, but not too liberally; nor Mr. Ker, either. Mr. Merrick, I think, surrendered all his business here. Being at home he was not exposed to the same risks that Mr. Bliss was of losing his practice, but still he abandoned his clients here, and gave the whole of his time uninterruptedly to these cases, and I really believe (my attention was called to it by Mr. Woodward, and we talked it over) Mr. Merrick's health has been impaired by the continuous and excessive labor he was obliged to undergo in conducting the cases. The contentions were very exciting and very frequent and the responsibilities very great, and, I say again, I really think his health has been impaired by his labors. Taking the cases as an entire thing, both trials together, I think the counsel have been well paid, but not wastefully paid. I would rather that I could have got the services at a lower rate, but I could not, for Mr. Bliss's charge resulted from his bargain, and it was very natural Mr. Merrick, who ranked up high in his profession and was selected because of his rank and ability, would expect a corresponding compensation. It was due to his dignity as well as to his ability. That is what I think about it.

The CHAIRMAN. If you had contemplated at the beginning the long continuance of the cases, I suppose you would have made other arrangements?

The WITNESS. I would have tried to get the work done cheaper if I could. It is very easy to criticise these things after they are done, but I think the best was done that could be done under the circumstances. With great care I have over and again reflected on all of this, and I really do think the best was done—the best was done. If the district attorney had been a gentleman who enjoyed the confidence of the Government at the time these suits were prosecuted, it would have spared all these expenses, or of a greater part of them, for he would have had the control and conduct of the cases, and he would have invited in such assistants as were necessary, and I feel quite sure the expense would have been much less. But, as the district attorney was excluded, for reasons that went to his discredit, why, the Government was powerless, and had to do the best it could under the circumstances. The time for removing Mr. Corkhill was the time before Mr. Bliss was retained, and before the Guiteau case went on. I could not help myself. Mr. Bliss was put in the case from the first by those who began the prosecutions. His pay was fixed at that time. He was well prepared, and understood the complex details of the cases. He had acquired, with Mr. Woodward's help, a knowledge of the multitudinous collection of papers and documents. Had I dismissed him on a question of pay I would have broken an engagement made with him, and for which he had abandoned his other business. That would not have been fair to him. Then, had I parted with him before the case was concluded it would have been taken by some as a harsh judgment and a reflection upon him, and others would have assumed that it was done in the interest of, and to protect some of the defendants who had held high official positions. To have suddenly dismissed Mr. Bliss or displaced any of the counsel on a mere question of compensation would have shocked the case itself, and it would have imposed on me the necessity of getting others instructed in the details and as fit to conduct the cause, and that could not have been done. I could not find a man or men who would take up their work with the same fitness of preparation. Had I dismissed Mr. Bliss or the other gentlemen I would have been obliged to surrender the case, and that I never would have done. My duty was to follow the case persistently.

The amount of the fees for the proceedings no one could have foreseen. They grew larger than any one could have at first supposed, because the cases expanded and so much time was taken in the trials, time that would have been forejudged to have been improbable.

Mr. STEWART. I was going to ask you generally about the services rendered by Mr. Woodward. Have you anything to say upon that point?

The WITNESS. When I first went into the case I did not know Mr. Woodward. He was a stranger to me. After the case went on he was necessarily detailed and handed over to the Department of Justice. He was at the elbow of Mr. Bliss all the while, and at Mr. Merrick's elbow whenever he was needed. I do not think there was a fact in the case they did not acquire from him. When I prepared the short argument I made in the first case—the investigation and preparation indicated by this file of notes I have shown you—when I prepared that argument I consulted a great deal with Mr. Woodward. I had learned his value. I think without Mr. Woodward these cases never could have been instituted. I think he was, to use one word, invaluable. He is a man of remarkable intelligence; he is a man of great purity of character; he is an educated gentleman. In all my life, in an experience of over 46 years of legal practice, I never have met with a man who could assist a lawyer better than Mr. Woodward. He understood his subject thoroughly. He understood all the bearings and relations of each point he submitted, and he would instruct himself in the law bearing upon it by conference with counsel. He was the most valuable assistant I ever had, and I believe to him mainly is owing the fine preparation that was made in these cases, the complete and thorough preparation. The Government, I think, is in debt to Mr. Woodward for his intelligence, industry, and integrity. I have learned to admire and respect him very much. I know him in no other way but in connection with these cases. I speak only from what I have learned of him in these cases.

There is a point I promised to say a few words about here. In the letter I wrote to Mr. Chandler I wrote some sharp words of reflection upon Mr. Walsh. What I wrote then was not written from any personal knowledge of Mr. Walsh's character. I never saw him until he came from Montreal to be a witness in court; but I judged him from what I learned from Mr. Bliss, who seemed to have a very bad opinion of him, and from what I considered to be his reckless way of dealing with me in his published letters, wherein he spoke ill of me without cause and charged me with conniving with Mr. Bliss and a "Cabinet officer" to suppress the prosecution against Mr. Kellogg. I told Mr. Walsh I would say here that what I had written about him was not based upon personal acquaintance or upon personal knowledge of his character, but upon impressions obtained as I have just stated.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anything else you desire to say?

The WITNESS. No; I came here only to answer questions, and I am ready to answer any that you desire to ask.

The witness put in evidence, in connection with his oral testimony, the following correspondence, previously transmitted to the Senate in response to a resolution of that body, and printed in Ex. Doc. No. 156, Forty-eighth Congress, first session:

Letter from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in answer to Senate resolution of January 24, 1884, copies of papers and data bearing upon the compensation of special attorneys in star-route cases.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, April 14, 1884.

SIR: In answer to Senate resolution dated January 24, 1884, I have the honor to transmit herewith copies of all papers and data bearing upon the compensation of the special attorneys in the star-route cases.

The letters relating entirely to this matter have been copied in full, and where it has been referred to incidentally in letters embracing other matters, I have had extracts made of that which was relevant to this subject.

The compensation for legal services in these cases was first fixed by my predecessor, Mr. MacVeagh, at a consultation with George Bliss, esq., at Long Branch, N. J., in the presence of Mr. James, then Postmaster-General, as you will observe from the letters of Mr. Bliss to Hon. William Lawrence, First Comptroller of the Treasury, dated November 12, 1882.

It seems that at that time Mr. MacVeagh did not think he had authority under the law to enter into a contract binding the Department to pay a specific sum for future services. The fact is, the law does contemplate such contracts, but Mr. MacVeagh, not having the Statutes at hand, pleaded his inability under the law as a reason for not entering into a formal agreement. However, they came to a mutual understanding which was deemed its equivalent.

I did not think the rate thus fixed to be either immoderate or in excess of the fees ordinarily paid in New York to lawyers of active practice. It must be remembered, too, that Mr. Bliss was taken away from home and a prosperous business, and that he was selected because of his peculiar fitness for investigations of this character, having had large experiences as United States district attorney in New York City in like examinations.

Had it been originally supposed that the cases would occupy the time they did, probably the rate fixed would not have been asked or given. When, however, the trial was tediously protracted by the policy of the defense, the sum total paid for the services of Mr. Bliss did appear excessive, and I accordingly urged that some abatement be made by him, as I did also to the other counsel. Mr. Ker's bills I reduced, and Mr. Merrick made reductions at my request, but Mr. Bliss insisted upon full compliance with the requirements of the original contract, in one instance claiming that it allowed him to charge for argument a sum in excess of $100 per day, which I refused to grant; and on the 4th day of November, 1882, he wrote a letter threatening to withdraw from the case if his account was not paid.

While the cases were in progress, I thought it injudicious to insist upon concessions which would bring about the withdrawal of Mr. Bliss. Besides this, had a new attorney been employed in his place, it would have taken him several months to learn the facts, and make the necessary preparation, which would have increased rather than diminished the expense, though he were employed at a lower rate.

The compensation of Messrs. Merrick and Ker was fixed by me not extravagantly, as I think. The record of the two trials embraces 9,374 pages of closely printed matter; the labor was extreme, and the counsel were engaged continuously for months, and often to a late hour at night. In view of the importance of the cases, and the responsibility devolving upon the attorneys for the Government, I do not think the amount received by Messrs. Merrick and Ker excessive, or out of proportion to that paid in cases of even less magnitude between private parties.

All of the counsel were necessary. There were at least ten openly acknowledged counsel for the defense in the first trial, and eight in the second. Opposed to those were but three for the prosecution. Some of the time of Mr. Bliss was frequently taken up in attendance upon the grand jury, and out of court, when the whole labor of the case was thrown upon Mr. Merrick and Mr. Ker, who had to conduct the frequent and vexatious interlocutory contentions over almost irrelevant questions raised only to prolong the trial in pursuance of the policy of the defense.

On the 29th of March, 1884, I requested Mr. Bliss to retire, and on the 31st of March, 1884, Mr. Merrick withdrew. I have recently employed Mr. Ker to assist in the prosecution of the Kellogg case, a matter which he had previously prepared and with which he is familiar. His last employment is from March 31, 1884, and is at a compensation to be fixed after the trial, when I can properly judge of the value of his services.

In the first trial of the case against Dorsey et al., I personally appeared in court as often as my other duties would permit, followed the case with care from day to day, and made the closing argument before the court and jury. Two of the defendants were convicted on the first trial, but the irregularity and incongruity of finding the subordinates guilty and failing to convict the organizers and chief conspirators, those who made the whole gain, and those who had set on foot the whole scheme to rob the Government, was so manifest, that the verdict was set aside upon the motion of the Government. On the second trial there was an acquittal.

The public men who were involved as defendants in these cases were not on their trials before those juries alone; they were on their trial before the people of the United States, and they were convicted by the common judgment of the whole country. They are not punished by imprisonment, but they had better be in prison than now at large, objects of scorn and aversion.

These prosecutions have not been without their usefulness either. I have been informed by the Post-Office officials that they have saved the Government in that Department $2,000,000 per annum. The effect has been to deter all of the adventurers who throng about the Departments in Washington. The same officials have assured me that before these cases were begun the halls of the Post-Office Department were swarming with these dishonest jobbers. They are there no more. The wholesome terror of these trials has expelled them. The thoroughness of these investigations has made it plain that there is no place so high that it could become a sanctuary for a thief and public robber.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, September 29, 1881.

SIR: You are hereby appointed special assistant United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to aid in the prosecution of certain persons charged with being concerned in frauds on the United States in connection with what is known as the star-route investigation, at a compensation to be determined by the Attorney-General when the suits are ended.

Very respectfully,

WAYNE MACVEAGH,
Attorney-General.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq.,
New York City.

NEW YORK, October 1, 1881.

DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your favor of 29th ultimo confirming your earlier verbal retainer in the star-route cases. I inclose an oath which I suppose is in proper form. I shall seek at some later day to have some understanding with you as to compensation and expenses.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. WAYNE MACVEAGH,
Attorney-General.

706 WALNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA, October 3, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated September 29, 1881, wherein and whereby I am appointed by you special assistant United States attorney for the District of Columbia to aid in the prosecution of certain persons charged with being concerned in frauds on the United States in connection with what is known as the "star-route" investigation, &c. With that letter you sent me a copy of the oath to be taken by me as such official. Having sworn to that, I herewith transmit the same to you.

I have the honor, sir, to be your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER.

Hon. WAYNE MACVEAGH,
Attorney-General of the United States, &c.

706 WALNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA, October 24, 1881.

MY DEAR SIR: Since you were here I have been reflecting upon the whole of our interview about the star-route cases, and have concluded to submit my thoughts to you by this letter.

It was my impression and hope that Mr. MacVeagh would continue as the Attorney-General till December, or, if possible, while the star-route prosecutions were pending. Indeed, as I told you, in my interview with him I dissuaded him from leaving his position, and urged him to continue to be the Attorney-General, if it would be acceptable to the President. He told me then that he might leave, but that he would remain till December or till after Congress would meet. Now, by a series of uncontradicted publications, it is given out that Mr. MacVeagh will leave in a day or so and some other gentlemen be appointed to his office. If that is to be so, I fear we will not be able to adjust with him the measure of our compensation, as you suggested we must, and a stranger, not understanding the case and its necessities as Mr. MacVeagh certainly does understand them, will be our paymaster, we will have difficulty in settling our compensation.

What, then, must we do? It is plain that much time at home and at Washington, away from our homes, must be given to the preparation, argument, and trial of these causes. Indeed, much of this has been given by you, and some study and labor by myself.

I cannot consent to undertake all of this severe labor without some definite understanding with those in authority. My affairs here occupy all of my time, and I look forward with considerable misgivings to the propriety of my continuing in the cases as a burden it will not be prudent for me to take up. At any rate, it is plain, as you said when you introduced the subject to me, that we must have our fees settled and agreed on now, so that we may have some understanding that will enable us to know if we are to be properly provided for; and if not, so that we can withdraw in time to permit those in charge of the cases to supply others instead of you or myself, if either of us will think proper to surrender our briefs and withdraw before it is too late.

Had Mr. MacVeagh been here and called to see me, as he said he would when I last saw him in Washington, I would, as you requested me to do, have presented this matter to him and asked him to take an early opportunity to see us together and enter into some stipulation with us determining the compensation that must be paid us now and hereafter. Your voluntary introduction of this subject to me, and your request that I would speak of it to Mr. MacVeagh when I next saw him, has induced me to write to you about it now. I foresee trouble and dissatisfaction before us if we do not now act.

You can probably learn if it is true that Mr. MacVeagh is now to leave the office, and if a successor will be soon named; it seems to me that we must act promptly with Mr. McVeagh and obtain his action in the matter.

For my part, the more I feel the pressure of my affairs here, and the more I consider the prospect of absence from home and the amount of labor I must give to these cases at home and at Washington, so as to do my full duty, a sense of hesitation as to my remaining in them presents itself plainly to my mind.

I am, &c.,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER.

OCTOBER 24, 1881.

DEAR SIR: It is perhaps proper that I should, before you return, call attention to my pecuniary connection with star-route and Howgate cases.

First. In the star-route cases I have received $750, and expended considerably beyond that amount, as you will remember, after consultation with you in reference to various necessary matters. I inclose a statement of expenditures less than the real amount, as there are some incidental matters that cannot well be included.

Second. In the Howgate case I have not received anything, and the total expenditures, including some at New York, will aggregate about $300.

I would be pleased if some orders were made in relation to these matters in whatever form may be deemed best. There will be some additional necessary expenses in the Howgate case, and I would respectfully suggest whether a payment of $1,000 might not properly be made in that case.

Third. I barely suggest whether it might not be well for at least a partial extent to fix the compensation, specially in the star-route cases.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM A. COOK.

HON. WAYNE MACVEAGH,
Attorney-General United States.

P. S.—In the inclosed statement the initials of the parties only are given, as in some cases it would not be prudent to disclose the names. In some cases only partial payments have been made, but my obligations for all full amounts have been given.

706 WALNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA, October 23, 1881.

MY DEAR SIR: After we parted last night Mr. Bliss advised with me as to our fees in the star-route cases, as you said we should do. We have arrived at the following result, and agreed that I should promptly communicate it to you, so that we may have your immediate action while you have the authority to act.

First. We now request you to pay us each $2,500 for the services thus far given.

Second. That your successor may be informed of the understanding between us and be prepared to fulfill your engagement with us. I repeat here what was expressed last night as to the rate of compensation to be allowed us while we are in charge of these cases, and that was, we are to be paid each $100 a day while occupied in the cases, either out of court in the preparation of them or in court in the trial and argument of them, together with our expenses.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,
BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER.

Hon. WAYNE MACVEAGH,
Attorney-General of the United States, &c., Philadelphia.

[Law offices of Wayne MacVeagh, Geo. Tucker Bispham.]

402 WALNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA, October 31, 1881.

MY DEAR SIR: I beg to inclose you a letter I have received from Messrs. Brewster and Bliss, special counsel in the star-route cases. Considering the professional standing of these gentlemen, I have no doubt you will agree with me in thinking it proper to pay them the fees they now ask; but they are doubtless aware that you cannot bind the Government to any contract in the matter which would control the action of my successor, when appointed.

I think, however, it would be proper for you to say that you recognize fully the gravity of the cases in their charge, the very great amount of labor connected with their prosecution, and the entire reasonableness of their representation, that the Department will compensate them fairly and justly for the industry, zeal, and ability it knows they will devote to the matter in question.

Of course, I only offer these suggestions for your consideration and decision, for you are Acting Attorney-General, and I am only awaiting the appointment of my successor, but I thought you would be glad to know my views on the subject.

Sincerely yours,

WAYNE MACVEAGH.

Hon. SAM'L F. PHILLIPS,
Acting Attorney-General.

[Indorsement, in the handwriting of Solicitor-General Phillips.]

The Att'y-Gen'l, Nov. 1, '81. Answered Nov. 1, '81, saying that I would carry out the contract, referring to the clause "at a compensation to be determined," &c., &c. See letter appointing the gent.; that I was indisposed to do more than pay them $2,500 "on acc't of services in general, and say nothing of the $100 per day, &c. See Mr. Brewster's note to the Att'y-Gen'l, inclosed, and dated Oct. 28, 1881.

THE ARLINGTON, WASHINGTON, D. C., November 23, 1881.

DEAR SIR: For some reason, which I do not understand, Colonel Cook has sent me a bill for disbursements made by him, with a request to "please have the bill arranged." I have inclosed it to you.

I know nothing of the items of the bill, because it was (all or chiefly) incurred before I came into the star-route cases. I can only say that Colonel Cook has worked earnestly and faithfully, and ought to be promptly reimbursed for his proper disbursements. I think he once rendered an account to Mr. MacVeagh which covers the same items, but it has been mislaid by him. Perhaps it is for this reason he sends this through me.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS,
Special Counsel.

Hon. S. F. PHILLIPS,
Acting Attorney-General.

NOVEMBER 28.

MY DEAR BREWSTER: Your fees are all right; but, as you know, such things take time in Washington to get round. In my absence, under the law, Mr. Phillips is Acting Attorney-General; but I wrote him a letter in the fee matter which made it all right; suggesting just the answer which Mr. Bliss suggested was the only one he could write—putting it on the basis of an honorable relation, but not of specific contract.

Sincerely, yours,

WAYNE MACVEAGH.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 29, 1881.

DEAR SIR: I received your letter here and telegraphed you briefly. I have no data here from which I could make out a bill. I at once telegraphed to New York for the information. It should be here in the morning, and I will get it to you by to-morrow night's mail, unless I can get through here so as to bring it myself, which doesn't look probable, as I have had to devote a whole day to a matter which ought not to come to me, but which Colonel Cook should have attended to. I am very much out with him. Doubt his fidelity, I am sorry to say, though, perhaps, without good cause; but certainly doubt his value.

I have been away so much from home—here so much—that my bill must necessarily be larger—larger than I think you will care to yoke yourself to; in other words, more than you will feel like charging, though I wish you would come up to my mark. If you do not it may be wiser for your bill to go through alone. The Department closes at 12 Saturday, doesn't open Monday. It will, therefore, be apparently impossible for you, unless your bill is here Saturday a. m., to get it out of the Department of Justice before you go in.

Your letter received in New York I shall arrange with the Associated Press to publish all over the country to-morrow. It is good.

Am here issuing subpoenas for the grand jury, and arranging for people to serve them in the West.

I came here expecting to get away to-morrow (Friday night), but may still succeed, though I fear not. If I can do anything for you, will stay till Saturday p. m. If I get away Friday, may stop over night that night at Philadelphia.

In the matter of bills, I don't want to be connected with Cook. He is putting in some bills for expenses in a way that may be right, but which will certainly be criticised.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. BENJ. H. BREWSTER.

I could not come over to Philadelphia to-day, as my subpoena servers are waiting, and I am behind time.

THE ARLINGTON, WASHINGTON, D. C., December 30, 1881.

MY DEAR SIR: I inclose a bill. You will see I have charged for fifty-three days absent from my office. This is besides immense time spent at my office and house. It is not a cent too much, and yet I recognize that if this thing is to continue the aggregate will be more than any one can stand. But I have a plan for future reduction.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER.

401 WALNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA, December 31, 1881.

MY DEAR SIR: I have been shown the bills of Mr. Brewster and Mr. Bliss for services in the star-route cases to this date, and I have no doubt you will cheerfully approve them so that they may be paid.

I have of course no right to express an official opinion, but unofficially I venture to say that if in your place I would certainly approve them.

Sincerely, yours,

WAYNE MACVEAGH.

Hon. SAMUEL F. PHILLIPS.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, January 14, 1882.

GENTLEMEN: As I have before said to you verbally, I now write to say that I desire that the expenses of prosecuting the star-route cases must be kept within restraint, and I desire that all extra outlays hereafter will be first submitted to me, and all that have been engaged in extra service may now be reported to me, so that I may know what has been done and is now doing in such extra service, so that if I think them no longer required I may say so.

I am, truly, yours,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Messrs. BLISS & COOK,
For United States.

SEPTEMBER 14, 1882.

DEAR SIR: The result of the Dorsey trial precipitates upon me a troublesome question, which I have foreseen, but which I hoped to avoid by postponement.

I assume, under the circumstances, a second trial of this case will be deemed a necessity this fall or in the early winter.

Though a new trial would take much less time than the original one, still it must take many weeks. I came into the star-route cases reluctantly and under assurances which I fully believed, as did those who made them, that they would require in the aggregate only a few weeks' absence from my office and home, and much less prolonged labor than has in fact been indispensable. They have been found to require my continuous absence for weeks and months. For an entire year they have absolutely prevented me from undertaking any new business.

For this, as you know, no compensation which I could ask or you could grant could be a sufficient return, for it is the breaking up of a business built up by twenty-five years' devotion to my profession. Were this the only consideration, though in view of the circumstances in which I came into the cases I should deem myself at liberty to retire from them, still I should be disposed, if it was thought important, to make the sacrifice which would be required by my remaining, in hope that some arrangement would be made by which less constant absence on my part would be required.

But the condition of my wife's health introduces another and imperative consideration. Circumstances have rendered her always far more dependent on me than is ordinarily the case between husband and wife, and we have in nearly thirty years never been so much separated as during the last year. This has affected her spirits and indirectly her health.

She is now in a condition which requires constant watching and care, a freedom on her part from all anxieties and annoyances, and a keeping-up of her spirits. She feels that my continued or constant absence would be greatly injurious to her, and an invalid's fixed belief in such a matter cannot be trifled with. The effect on her spirits of constant or continued absence or the prospect of it would certainly be very injurious.

Under these circumstances, I desire that some arrangement should be made by which I may be allowed to retire absolutely from the star-route cases, or by which the "laboring oar" in them should be in other hands, and my presence in Washington should be exceptional.

Indeed, I do not see how I can undertake to promise any attendance in Washington which would be of any advantage to the Government.

Of course I need not assure you that I could not, under any circumstances, lose my personal interest in the cases, or my conviction that every consideration requires that they should be vigorously pursued, and I should feel not only bound but anxious at all times to render any aid in my power, consistent with the facts to which I have called your attention; nor does it seem to me that my absence need be seriously felt.

The same ground is to be traveled over in the new trial which has already been traversed, and new counsel will have no difficulty in filling my place, though he will of course, until he becomes familiar with the facts, labor under some disadvantages; but this will be an inconvenience to himself, not an injury to the case.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS,
Special Assistant United States Attorney.

HON. BENJ. HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

NEWPORT, R. I., September 15.

DEAR SIR: Your two letters, both within the same envelope, came here to-day. Of course your own personal convenience must rule in the matter. I can hardly entertain the idea of your leaving the case. You have been and are so essential to its safe and prosperous conduct.

Do not proclaim this proposed withdrawal in any way till we see each other, or at least until I can be back in Washington and be able to adjust matters. As to this, I must respectfully and kindly insist that you will withhold your public or private announcement of it in any way for the present.

I am, believe me, truly,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER.

GEO. BLISS, Esq., New York.

UNITED STATES HOTEL,
Saratoga Springs, N. Y., September 18, 1882.

MY DEAR MR. BREWSTER: I am here at State convention.

I received your letter. Of course, if I go out of the star-route cases it must be with your concurrence, and at such time as suits you. Equally, of course, I shall make no announcement of it till you are content. As the trial is to be delayed till December, there is time enough to arrange all these matters, though the summoning of witnesses should be arranged for early in October, as many of them disappear in winter from their summer haunts.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. BENJ. HARRIS BREWSTER.

NEW YORK, October 7, 1882.

To the ATTORNEY-GENERAL:

Mrs. Bliss is pronounced by the doctors to have improved greatly—"miraculously" is their word—so that it is probable that the controlling cause for my wishing to withdraw from the star-route cases will cease to operate. I use "controlling" in the sense that it would justify me in withdrawing even against the wishes of yourself and my associates. The other reason—the loss from remaining in—would remain in force, but it is not one which, as a lawyer having gone into the cases, I should have a right to insist upon if my withdrawal was thought to injure the cases.

GEORGE BLISS.

OCTOBER 25, 1882.

DEAR SIR: I staid over in Washington on Saturday to talk to you, and hung round the Department all day, but you were absent or busy; so I must resort to paper.

I appreciate your kindness, and note your remarks passing my account. It was not intended to be a bill strictly confined to the days of trial, but rather to cover these and bring up back charges from January 1, last. But that is unimportant.

When I went into the cases no one foresaw they would take so much time. Had I foreseen it I never should have consented on any terms to go into them. I, however, fully informed those who employed me of the terms I ordinarily charged, and they agreed to them. When you came into the cases you agreed with me also.

I say this only as preliminary to what I am about to say.

A new trial commences in a few weeks. It will take most of the winter continuously. There are also one or two other cases which must be tried. The condition of my wife's health has so much improved since I wrote you some time since that what I regarded as the imperative reason binding upon, overriding all questions of professional duty, has ceased to exist. I feel, therefore, not at liberty to withdraw if it is desired that I should remain; but rather than give such continuous attendance in Washington as I have hitherto done I should prefer to withdraw, though on the other hand my belief that we succeed on the next trial, and especially that we shall convict Dorsey with the new evidence, gives me a desire to see this case at least through.

I therefore leave the question of my remaining in your hands, suggesting that it should be speedily settled, that you confer with my associates and see if they do not concur with me in thinking that I could be dispensed with without serious injury to the case.

In considering the question of withdrawal, bear in mind that with Merrick, Ker, and myself in the cases, the counsel fees must necessarily in the amounts paid to each and in the aggregate become large, so large that there will be and must be public criticism. No reduction in the rate of fees—even if counsel consented to them—would prevent this. Lawyers' bills always have been and always will be criticised when paid by the public, no matter what their rate.

As for myself, when I went into the cases I distinctly notified those who employed me that I knew my bills would be criticised any way and I should therefore charge what I thought my services were worth, what others paid me, and would accept personally any criticism made, and they must be prepared for their share. You are not necessarily their successor in this respect, and have a right to reduce the number of counsel and their bills.

I only desire to suggest these considerations to you. I have floating in my brain a theory of adjustment under which no counsel would be dispensed with and expenses would be reduced. But it has not crystallized into shape, nor if it had could I place it on paper without liability of misconstruction.

One thing more: The First Comptroller has hung up my bill, saying he wanted to see you. I call your attention to, and assume you will not allow any subordinate officer to revise an exercise of discretion which the law vests in you.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS.

HON. BENJ. HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, October 25, 1882.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 25th of October is now in my hand. I read it with great care. It is a letter such as I supposed you would have written to me.

In the star route case you have done your duty faithfully, industriously, ably, and with the strictest integrity. Your bill I indorsed and mean to stand by. I regretted that so large a sum at once was asked for, and wished you had presented it at different times before, so that you might have collected it by installments. What was agreed to be paid you by those who retained you must be paid to you; good faith must be kept with you. In allowing it, I have not merely exercised a discretion; I have only ratified what others contracted to do.

As to the future, my conviction is that your presence in these cases is essential, and it is my desire that you will remain in them. The good of the cases requires your presence, and every consideration of prudence would make your absence a thing to be regretted. However, we will talk further or write further about this hereafter. It is a happy thing that the health of your wife will permit you to act in them.

As to your colleagues in the case, I have not conferred with them, for Mr. Ker is away; and then I only retained Mr. Ker for a special duty, because you asked for such a person—and that was the preparation of the pleadings. He has been of value since then in many other ways, but the general charge of the case I did not confide to him. I intended that he should be detailed to act under your immediate and special direction in the preparation of the pleadings, and in such other duties as you might require him to do. Mr. Merrick was retained to fill the vacancy occasioned by my withdrawal.

Upon reflection, I would prefer, as at present advised, to leave the matter of your remaining to be the subject of our consideration. It is due to your position and dignity that it should be a matter that would rest exclusively between us. The case is under my control officially, and I am responsible, no matter what is done, and that responsibility I would assume after a conference with you hereafter. At present, hold yourself as being advised by me that any suggestion of withdrawal is declined.

You intimate that you have in your mind some unadjusted thoughts as to the arrangement of compensation in the case, which you would convey to me hereafter. I will gladly hear anything you have to say, for I never have yet had a conference with you without feeling its advantage. My presence in the case is no cost to the Government, and what is paid to other counsel for their services is but their due. In view of all this, it seems to me that, expensive as the cases are, by my presence without any fees paid to me for extra and unusual labor, the cost is abated and reduced pro tanto from that which would otherwise be added to them.

Truly yours, with respect,

BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq.,
Care Bliss & Schley, No. 160 Broadway, New York.

POST SCRIPTUM.—I inclose you copy of the Cincinnati Daily Gazette, in which there is a letter written upon the subject evidently of pursuing those Salisbury cases.

I desire you to give them attention. Do not let any delay benefit them. The statute may run, and then you would be censured. As to the tone of the article, I understand it, and the purpose of the people who wrote it.

I do most earnestly call your attention to this Salisbury matter, and all these other cases where the statute may possibly run.

BREWSTER.

DEAR SIR: What did Lawrence say? What is the prospect? I want the money, and moreover want to know if it is to be paid, for if it is not, I go out of the star-route cases. I am in no mood for fooling.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE BLISS.

BREWSTER CAMERON, Esq.

[Written in the autumn of 1882.]

706 WALNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

DEAR SIR: To-day I returned from Pittsburgh, and, as I had ordered, your bill and the papers were lying on my table, having been sent to me from Washington. For my own part, personally, I never object to full fees, and have accordingly signed the allowance and sent it to Washington; but you must remember that the members of Congress who are not city lawyers, but who come from the country where fees are low, will object and complain of fees at the rate of $140 per diem, including Sundays. In New York your rate of pay is higher than in any other town in the country. Then, again, the star-route men will declaim about this, and the Democrats, who may come into the majority in the House, at least, will certainly criticise you and your charges and try to deal with me for allowing them, and especially so as you are the pronounced associate and friend of the President, they will not scruple to charge it as an act of favor partaking of a job. These ideas I give you because you prompted them in your letters to me on the subject of anticipating objection.

I have not objected. I have approved, for, notwithstanding the risk of these censorious comments from others who are unfriendly, I know how much you gave up for their cases and how much service you have bestowed.

I am, truly and with respect, your friend,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER.

160 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

DEAR SIR: Please hoist my bill out of the deadlock in the Comptroller's office, and if necessary ask the Attorney-General to intervene and assert his rights to have his decision respected. I need the money.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE BLISS.

BREWSTER CAMERON, Esq.

NEW YORK, November 12, 1882.

SIR: I beg to acknowledge receipt of yours of 10th. In reply I have to say that my retainer in the star-route case came about in this way: I was first applied to informally by Hon. Thomas L. James, then Postmaster-General, to accept such retainer. I declined on the ground that I had for some time declined such retainers from the Government, because there was always delay in payment, charges were cut down, and work was not appreciated. I was urged to reconsider this, and was finally sent for to meet Attorney-General MacVeagh and Mr. James at Long Branch; I there agreed to be employed. As to my rate of charges I said—and it was agreed to—that I was content to leave that to be settled by the Attorney-General then present, or his successor, but that I might be at liberty to refer his successor, if he had one during my time, to him, in case his successor's views did not agree with mine. I also stated, and it was accepted as proper, that I had not for years accepted a retainer which involved my being away from New York City for less than $100 a day and expenses during my whole absence; that no client had a right to require me to travel at night, and that if I worked a day and then traveled a night, I charged it as two days, and that my charge of $100 per day did not cover what I regarded as work involving extra labor, strain upon the brain, such as elaborate argument in court and engagement in trials. I stated that I knew this would seem large to any one not accustomed to New York rates, and that I should not work for the Government for less than that; that general rate to be accepted as the basis, with possible additions and reductions, as experience might show was proper, and that the Attorney-General should be the judge as to these. My terms were accepted. By this I do not mean that there was any written agreement or any formal stipulation, but the Attorney-General and Mr. James said the matter was satisfactorily arranged, and a short time after I received a written appointment, though it did not, I think, come till after I had been at work some time, and was then made to take effect from an antecedent date, which, however, was later than my actual engagement and left me with some little time during which I had been at work and for which I have never received or asked pay.

When Mr. MacVeagh was about to leave office, I, at the request of the present Attorney-General, rendered a bill, having had one previous payment. Mr. Brewster informed me that he had submitted it to Mr. MacVeagh, who informed him that it was less than he expected, and Mr. Brewster expressed the same opinion. I called his attention to the fact that it was not rendered as in full, and was not intended to be so, as I thought that when I came to render a bill for a period covering a trial I should "even up things."

I may be permitted to add, that had I supposed the engagement would take my time so exclusively as it has, I should never have accepted it at the rate referred to, or indeed at almost any rate. It has practically taken my entire time for over a year; taken me from my home and my office. It has broken up almost entirely a business which I have spent twenty-five years in building up, and has been a thankless and unsatisfactory business. I have made more than one formal application to be relieved, and would forego much if I could now be allowed to go out of the cases. I came in unwillingly and I remain unwillingly, and at a personal and pecuniary loss. At the same time I know that the payments to me and other counsel seem and are large. But it is not my fault. I was employed with a distinct understanding of what it would cost, though it was not, I presume, supposed the labor would be so continuous. I think I may say that no time has been wasted. I have every day given to the Government at least twice the number of hours of work that the Departments exact from their subordinates, and have worked as many hours Sundays as other days. I may without vanity, and that is the opinion of every one who has had anything to do with the star-route cases, that whatever of success there has been would not have come but for my labor and perseverance.

With this statement, which I am prepared to make oath to, I now ask that my account as certified by the Attorney-General be promptly passed.

To meet one inquiry in your letter, I beg to add that the bill now before you covers all services rendered by me between May 26—I think it is—and September 13; that it covers the entire period of trial of the case of the United States vs. Brady and others; that it also covers services before the grand jury in presenting to them various cases against Price, two Messrs. Salisbury, two Messrs. Parker, Mr. Kellogg, and others; that it covers some preliminary motions in the case of the United States vs. Brady and others, and also covers much of investigation and correspondence as to other star-route cases between the dates named. Besides this, I have regarded it as to some extent covering the services rendered previous to May 26, and for which I had been paid in part. In short, it was intended to be a bill in full up to its date.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS,
Assistant Attorney.

Hon. WILLIAM LAWRENCE,
First Comptroller.

54 WEST THIRTY-NINTH STREET, January 7, 1883.

DEAR SIR: You expressed a wish to me that the bills of counsel should not be allowed to accumulate. The beginning of the year seems a good time to send one in. I therefore inclose one. For the period embraced in it I have actually been away from home in the business of the Government thirty-eight days. This is in addition to much time devoted to the matter in New York.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS.

Attorney-General.

WASHINGTON, March 10, 1883.

Mr. DEAR CAMERON: I send another bill. Aldrich is a man who was used in detective business, and dropped some time since. He was of some value, but worked out. Smith is my messenger.

As usual I want this money at once. This case takes all my time. I can't earn anything elsewhere nor collect anything. I am at double expense and the bills come in promptly.

So get this along. I must have it next week. Lawrence is away and can't obstruct

BREWSTER CAMERON, Esq.

COURT-ROOM, March 21, 1883.

MY DEAR Mr. BREWSTER: You have a bill of mine for approval before you. I write to ask prompt action. My constant confinement here prevents my collecting, much more earning, any money elsewhere, and meantime, I am under double expense. Unless this money comes I must borrow to meet current expenses, and in these times of tight money I don't want to do it, even if I had the time.

The bill as rendered is even less than I wrote you last fall I must charge if I remained in the cases, and in the light of which you wrote me I must remain. It is less than I charge individuals when I had a chance to work for them.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. BENJ. HARRIS BREWSTER.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, March 21, 1883.

MY DEAR Mr. BLISS: I have your letter of this date. I did not know your bill was in my office, but no one is to blame for that, for I had a bill presented by Mr. Ker, upon which I was passing, and I had directed that all bills presented should be put in the same category, so your bill has been laid aside with that of Mr. Ker's.

I have been much exercised by the remarks made to me personally as well as by public comments upon the expenses of these trials. I cannot see that any one is to blame. The expenses appear to have been absolutely necessary. When I was in Newport, and received a letter from you there, and subsequently in Washington last autumn, I called your attention to the fact that these bills would be criticised, and hoped that you would assist me to avoid it. I have your replies, in which you reminded me that the terms of your engagement were made at the time you entered into the employment. You reminded me in your letters then in this very language, "I, however, fully informed those who employed me of the terms I ordinarily charged, and they agreed to them," and that agreement made by you with them I considered it was my duty to recognize.

Again, in another part of the same letter, you say: "I have floating in my brain a theory of adjustment under which no counsel could be dispensed with, and the expenses would be reduced, but it has not crystallized into shape, nor if it had could I place it on paper without liability to misconstruction." Now is the time for us to consider the subject. Your bill, as now presented, I will approve of on account of your whole services. Will you oblige me, therefore, in furtherance of bringing this thing into some definite shape, so that neither of us may be misunderstood by any one, to give me an itemized bill of services to date, and of all moneys you have received on account of those services, and then I will consider the subject, and call your attention and Mr. Merrick's and Mr. Ker's attention to it within a short time by letter addressed to you. In the mean time I hope that you will revive those considerations that were floating in your brain as to a theory of adjustment, for I wish in this to act in perfect harmony with you, and, at the same time, to exercise that prudent control over such matters as it is my duty to do.

There is an item in your bill as now presented which has been the subject of comment as unusual. I allude to the charge for a whole section in a sleeping-car. Not having the bill by me at present, I cannot recall others, but I believe that there are no others that have been pointed out as unusual. I call your attention to this now, so that we may review it hereafter and that I may not be concluded by approving this bill.

Upon reflection, I will exclude that item and deduct it from this bill, and we can consider it hereafter.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq.,
Special Assistant United States Attorney in the Star-Route Cases.

P. S.—Since the above letter was dictated I read it to Mr. Cameron, and he reminded me that the first paragraph of my letter is a mistake; that your bill was shown to me some days ago. He brought it into my office, he said, and told me he had it, and I told him to take it and examine it and look over it and report it to me when I called for it. That I had entirely forgotten. Mr. Cameron is perfectly correct as to that. I remember I did just say that to him, and I remember also that I did not call for it, because I intended to deal with Mr. Ker's bill at the same time that I did with yours, and have not dealt with that, because I intended to deal with the whole subject of these compensations to counsel, and convey my ideas in a letter to all of you gentlemen together; and that I might not say anything hastily, I determined to consider it carefully, and so deferred it from day to day, and then I was called away to see General Cameron, who was much hurt and ill in Harrisburg, and that still further suspended it. I never intended, believe me, to delay you or any of you gentlemen to your inconvenience or disadvantage, and that you well know.

B. H. BREWSTER.

[From Mr. Hodges's files. Received May 12, 1883.]

MY DEAR CAMERON: During your absence I sent a bill to Mr. Brewster. He wrote me a pleasant letter promising to pass it as soon as you returned. He objected to something he thought in excess of my agreement, and thought it was not so. I waived it. I want it passed before he goes away. Perhaps he may like to have the record show a bill reduced. If so, let them reduce the bill he has from $6,000 to $5,600 and approve it. As he tore off the receipt, I will call and sign it, or in case he prefers a clean bill I inclose a new one. Use either you choose. Expenses are omitted, waiting Lawrence's decision. They are small during this period, anyway.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE BLISS.

BREWSTER CAMERON, Esq.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, May 12, 1883.

DEAR SIR: I received your letter last night, and your letter of to-day inclosing your bill. * * *

As to the other matters contained in your letter, it has been my regret all along that the business of my Department prevented me from going into court and taking my stand there, and doing my duty, as I have always done in a professional life of over forty-five years, according to my conception, and according to my experience of professional duty. I could not be present, and I consider it one of the misfortunes of my career that I have been excluded by other duties.

As to Mr. Merrick, if he is obliged to be away he must be; it cannot be helped. As to Mr. Ker and yourself, of course you must replace him if indisposition or any other cause takes Mr. Merrick away, for it will not do to have the case deserted and abandoned. I take it for granted, of course, that you will be present, and Mr. Ker will, upon Monday.

As to your bill, I must retain that until Mr. Cameron comes. You indicate in your letter that you make some special charge, an increase, which was for the duty of summing up. That I must object to. The charges made in this case have been the subject of severe criticism, and I have been made to bear the censure undeservedly. I was willing to pay you what you said was your contract as to your terms when you were retained. That of course must be complied with; the contract must be kept on both sides, but more than that the case will not bear. Cases like these are great opportunities to lawyers of merit, and the public very naturally disincline to have them considered as opportunities for gain. That disinclination leads to criticism, and it is not to be wondered at, for that is in harmony with the whole spirit of legislation upon the subject of compensation paid to the highest officials in the country. The principle is that there is dignity and honor to such high employment, and lift them clear of the ordinary considerations of mere personal advantage and gain.

I have been obliged to, as an act of duty to the administration and to myself, that I should not appear to be recklessly allowing unusual fees, as it has been said, as an act of favoritism. I want you to help me in it, so that I may escape from any such unjust reflections. Whatever your contract was, as I have said before, that must be conformed to, and will be by me. Your bill I will hand to Mr. Cameron upon his return; he is now absent in the South superintending some prosecutions, and will be back by the 20th of the month; he has charge of these accounts, and he will examine it, and I will give him instructions to report promptly, so that you may be paid promptly. You have receipted the bill as you send it to me; I tear off your receipt and send it to you here.

I am, with great respect,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq.,
Special Assistant United States Attorney in the Star-Route Cases, Washington.

WASHINGTON, May 14, 1883.

DEAR SIR: I have your favor of 12th.

As to my bill, I did not regard it as in excess of my contract, for that expressly provided for a further sum over the ordinary per diem in cases of extended argument, and such an argument as I made is, from the labor bestowed upon its preparation, entitled to some extra payment. However, I waive that. If reckoned by the days actually devoted to the case, the bill rendered should be reduced to $5,600. You may reduce the allowance in the one sent you, or I will send you a further one.

I am ready at any time to co-operate with you in reducing expenses, as I have repeatedly written you. I am not willing to make the sacrifices of comfort and of business I am compelled to make for less compensation than I have heretofore charged. Nothing will please me so much as when the time shall come when you will say to me that I may withdraw. When this trial closes, I think you may properly reduce the force of counsel. You no longer need these counsel. Ker, as you know, was brought into the case for his ability as a draftsman, and has justified your selection. He naturally remained so long as his indictment was to be defended, and so long as others were to be drawn. He has, naturally, drifted into the trials, and has been very useful, especially in the pending trial. Merrick has been essential as able local counsel. As for myself, the knowledge of the facts and papers I acquired in the genesis of the case has been of value.

But with this case over—unless there shall be a new trial—this condition of things will change. Two counsel will be sufficient. If I could be permitted to withdraw, there would remain only two. But I fear Merrick would object to go on alone with Ker.

Besides, these cases should be kept free from the suspicion of politics, and, therefore, one counsel should be from each party. Perhaps it can be arranged to retain Merrick; to confine Ker's services to cases where indictments are to be drawn or defended, and to let me out, substituting in my place some counsel of the same party as myself, with whom Merrick would work in harmony, and preferably a local counsel, as he could afford to work for less compensation than one who has to leave home and business.

These are ideas I intimated to you once before. Please think of them, as the time may soon come for action, for whatever is done ought to be done after the close of the present trial, and before the delays of the summer vacation.

I assume there will be no further trials till fall, but that one or more should then take place.

As for your own past relations to the cases, permit me to say that it seems to me you have done all that the public expected or had a right to expect, and, what is more, all that any fair-minded men could expect. Your constant appearance in court was an impossibility. In view of your other duties it would have been an impropriety. In yielding your right to close to Mr. Merrick, you showed yourself above personal considerations and ready to sacrifice a great opportunity for personal aggrandizement to the good of the cause, for you rightly judged that, however great the difference in forensic ability, a counsel who had sat through a long case like this from day to day would be better prepared to deal with its infinite details than one who had prepared himself from the daily records, to say nothing of the inevitable springing upon counsel of new questions and new views just at the close of the defendant's argument.

May I add that my suggestions as to the bank-tax matter did not proceed from my clients? They have said nothing. It arose from letters received from bank people not my clients.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. BENJ. HARRIS BREWSTER.

THE UNION LEAGUE CLUB,
New York, August 16, 1883.

MY DEAR SIR: Is it desired or expected that I should take part in the trial of ex-Senator Kellogg? I ask because it is necessary for me to know with reference to engagements for the fall and winter here.

Kellogg's trial is to be some time in October, I presume, the precise time not to be fixed till the court meets on October 8. I consider that the Government has a right to my services at the trial if it wants them, but I must be able to arrange my engagements here. I have to arrange for some important trials here in October and must therefore know what the Government desires of me.

As you know, I have never had any great faith that the case would succeed. If the evidence first produced by Walsh before the last grand jury were in possession of the Government I should feel differently. I speak only from Mr. Ker's report as to those letters. But the Government has neither the letters nor copies. I fear Walsh cannot be relied upon. However this may be, I, of course, should do my best if I went into the case. Perhaps some one who feels surer of success than I do would do better. Mr. Merrick and Mr. Ker are, of course, fully competent to manage the case without assistance from any one, but an attempt has been made to give a political turn to the case to the detriment of Mr. Merrick, and he as well as the Government ought to be protected from this. Some Republican ought to be associated with them. I am not sure I am the best man, but you have a right to my service.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE BLISS.

Attorney-General.

This bill differs from my former bills in the fact that it is made up in full to date. It is made up at the same rate as previously, and as agreed upon, except that, of course, any charge for services rendered in this city is on a much reduced basis.

CITY AND COUNTY OF NEW YORK:

George Bliss, being sworn, says that the above services were rendered by me as special assistant attorney for the United States; that, so far as the same were rendered outside of the city of Washington, the charge therefore is at less than the rate agreed upon when he was retained; that the charge for the others is reasonable, and the same is true of the services rendered outside of New York; that all of such services were necessary and proper, and no payment has been made on account thereof.

GEORGE BLISS.

Sworn to before me this 19th day of February, 1884.

HARRY F. LAWRENCE,
Commissioner of Deeds, New York City and County.

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 27, 1883.

DEAR SIR: I am surprised to find that my bill has not yet reached the Comptroller.
Now, my dear sir, in all frankness, do you think that I ought to be asked to come here from time to time at great loss, pecuniary and otherwise, and still not be paid? Don't you think Mr. Merrick and I have a right to ask that, so far as is in your power, you secure us payment for the past? This you can do by passing our accounts. It so happens that the Comptroller is just now in a condition of mind very favorable to Mr.
Merrick, if not to myself.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. B. H. BREWSTER.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, November 28, 1883.

MY DEAR MR. BLISS: I wish you had spoken with me yesterday when you were talking with me, and not sent me those letters.

* * * * *

First, as to your bill. Your bill came here, I am told, last week. I did not know that it was here. Nobody is to blame for keeping it. The whole of last week I was occupied, down to Sunday afternoon, when I left the city, for the very last thing I did was with that occupation, to wit, preparing, collating, composing, correcting my annual report. Not only was I concerned in it, but especially Mr. Cameron, who, as the general agent of the Department, was obliged to be with me all the while, or with others, urging them to furnish their material, which was to be appended to the report. On that account your bill was allowed to rest a few days, but with no intention of slighting you, and you cannot say you have ever been slighted, for while others complained very seriously of the amount of your bills, and criticised the Department for paying them, I have been scrupulously anxious to see your contract (such as you reported to me you had at the time you were retained)—to see it carried out.

I do not deal with you, or with any other gentleman, in a niggardly spirit. That is foreign to my character and my disposition. But I am obliged, not only by the criticisms that have been (I think unjustly) put upon these expenses, but also by a general principle of policy, administrative policy, to be careful in the payment of such sums; and as a friend of the Administration—and I hope I do not say too much when I say as my friend—I think you would encourage me to adopt and live up to that policy which I have adopted and lived up to.

The bill which you have sent I will send to the Comptroller. I will say this: That inasmuch as you charge a per diem, as a result of a previous understanding with the Department of Justice and with the Post-Office Department when you were retained, that I would rather that your account had specified distinctly the days; and if there were time to ask you to do so, and you were not so urgent, I would ask you now to do it, before I sent it to the Comptroller; but as you write a letter so complaining, and an unpleasant one to me, because you appear to think you have been neglected and wronged (which I will not permit to be done to you, and which I do not think was intended), I am willing to send it, and will send the account to-day, and let the Comptroller take his own action upon it.

I would like, however, and suggest that it would be better for yourself and for the Department, that you would kindly give me a statement, which I can put upon file here, of the days for which you have charged, so that it may appear how this round sum is applied upon your per diem. Then you say that for services rendered in New York you have charged at a lower rate. On that account, therefore, that you may have the benefit of that, discriminate in your account in the per diem entries, specifying those days which were charged at the rate of a hundred dollars, and those days of service in New York which were charged for at a lower rate. That will certainly be no disadvantage to the Department, and certainly no disadvantage to your account when it becomes the subject of criticism in Congress hereafter.

* * * * *

Another thing. You spoke to me about that Dorsey matter. I have seen Mr. Simons, and with this I send you the fruit of that interview, and I authorize you to act in the premises according to your best professional judgment.

Very truly, yours,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq.,
Special Assistant United States Attorney for the Star-route Cases, 160 Broadway, New York.

NEW YORK, November 30, 1883.

MY DEAR SIR: Now, to refer to the matters of your letter a little in detail. As to my bill I am quite willing to file with you a statement of days and dates. I wrote of my bill because I was informed it was being retained, a report required to be made on it as had been done with that of Mr. Ker, and that such report would be still delayed some time. This I learned at the Department. The truth is, I went to your room the afternoon I saw you to talk about that and the stenographer. * * * I hoped you would speak with me about it, but you were obviously so fagged that I had not the heart to refer to a matter which would trouble you. For the same reason I did not speak of the matter of the bill, but went away and wrote you instead. Hence the matters were presented in the way they were.

Yours, very truly,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. BENJ. HARRIS BREWSTER.

DECEMBER 20, 1883.

DEAR SIR: Comptroller Lawrence definitely refuses, as I understand, to pass the bill certified by you for me as wholly payable from the appropriation for 1884, and insists upon a separation of the amounts, so that it may be stated how much of the bill is for services properly chargeable under his view of the law to the appropriation of 1883, and how much to that of 1884. In other words, he asks a compliance with the request contained in his letter of December 9 (by Deputy Comptroller Tarbell), transmitted to me by you on December 13.

While I am thoroughly clear that he is wrong, and while, if I did not need the money, I could wait and "try conclusions" with him, I prefer, under the circumstances, to yield. I have therefore to request that you will either by letter or by indorsement on the account assign the proper proportion of the total account to be assigned to 1883 and 1884.

To enable you so to do I have made as careful an examination as I could, endeavoring to fairly make the division. It is a difficult thing to do; but I am satisfied it would be fair if, of the total of $9,200, $4,700 is treated as for services rendered prior to June 30, 1883, and $4,500 as for services rendered after that time.

This matter has lain so long, through no fault of your Department, however, that I would be greatly obliged if you would act at once, as I want to use the money next week.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS,
Special Assistant Attorney.

Hon. BENJ. HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

DECEMBER 28, 1883.

MY DEAR FALLS: I have your dispatch this minute. I don't understand it quite. If you mean for me to specify how many days charged in the bill were in the fiscal year 1883, and how many in 1884, can't do it. Nor would it do any good, or be fair. I might in one year work all of one day and in the other year work half of a day, all both to be charged as a day. Again, the work in one time might be easy and perfunctory, at another, hard and exacting. I have tried conscientiously to divide my charge between the years 1883 and 1884 as a whole in proportion to the service rendered in each. In so doing I charged to 1884 about $1,000 less than the Auditor had certified for to the Comptroller, because I wanted to be in the safe side relatively to the Government's view.

The fact is, I have done my best. I am entitled to be treated with some confidence by the people at the Department of Justice, when the Comptroller requires me to have a division made. I am tired of this constant treatment.

I kept no account of days. The record of the star-route case would furnish these in 1883, in a measure, but no more.

Your obedient,

GEORGE BLISS.

A. J. FALLS, Esq.

(Indorsement:) Washington, Dec. 29, 1883. Respectfully referred to the Hon. Attorney-General. A. J. Falls.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, December 27, 1883.

SIR: I have your letter of the 9th instant, in which you say that the First Auditor has reported to your office the account of George Bliss, for services as special counsel in the star-route cases "to Nov. 19, 1883." You further state that the time when the services began is not stated, but that the last preceding account for services in the same cases were to April 5, 1883, and if this is from that date, only a part of the amount approved is payable from the appropriation for fees of attorneys in the year ending June 30, 1883.

In reply to your request that I will inform your office whether any of the service was performed prior to July 1, 1883, and if so, what amount is payable from the appropriation for the current year, I have the honor to inclose herewith, for your information upon this subject, copy of a letter from George Bliss, esq., special assistant attorney, dated 20th instant, at New York City, in which he states that he is satisfied that it would be fair if of the total of $9,500, $4,700 is treated as for services rendered prior to June 30, 1883, and $4,500 as for services rendered after that time.

Very respectfully,

S. F. PHILLIPS,
Acting Attorney-General.

Hon. WILLIAM LAWRENCE,
First Comptroller.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FIRST COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 28, 1883.

SIR: Your letters of the 27th instant, inclosing copies of letters from Messrs. George Bliss and R. T. Merrick, are received.

When a counsel fee for services in two fiscal years is approved by the Attorney-General, as payable to a special attorney, I am of opinion that the necessary apportionment of the amount to the several years cannot properly be made by this office, but that it should be made by the Attorney-General. I therefore respectfully request that you will please specify on the accounts of Messrs. Bliss and Merrick the sums which are approved for services in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1883, and the sums approved for services rendered in the current fiscal year.

Please return the accounts to this office.

Very respectfully,

WM. LAWRENCE,
Comptroller,
By J. TARBELL,
Deputy Comptroller.

Hon. S. F. PHILLIPS,
Acting Attorney-General.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 1, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose a letter addressed to me by George Bliss, esq., relative to his account for $9,200 for services as special counsel in the star-route cases, and to respectfully ask that the balance of his account, which he claims as payable out of the appropriation for 1884, be approved by you, and the amount payable out of the appropriation for 1883 be submitted to Congress in your estimates for deficiencies for that fiscal year.

Very respectfully,

A. J. FALLS.

Hon. B. H. BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

DECEMBER 29, 1883.

MY DEAR FALLS:

I have yours of yesterday. I infer that I in a measure misunderstood your dispatch. What seems to be wanted is a general statement specifying about how many days I was engaged during each of the fiscal years 1883 and 1884 in rendering the services charged for in the bill which the Attorney-General has certified at $9,200. So far as I can calculate from such entries and memoranda as I have, I should say that I was engaged during the fiscal year 1883 in rendering the services charged for in the bill on about 62 different days, and during the fiscal year 1884, in rendering the services charged for in the bill about 110 different days. But the week during 1883 was more continuous; took nine entire days; was more largely away from my office than the week in 1884. In my own mind I have considered that each day in which I did something in the year 1884 might be calculated as half a day, while every day in 1883 in which I did something might be calculated as a whole day. If, therefore, I had charged at the agreed rate, I should have charged for 107 days in all, of which 62 would have been assigned to the account of 1883 and 55 to that of 1884. As I charged as fee only 92 days, I, in my letter to the Attorney-General of December 20, assigned $4,700 to 1883 and $4,500 to 1884. If I had not been afraid that I might be considered as influenced by a desire to get as much as possible from the existing appropriation, I should have assigned more of value to 1884 and less to 1883.

All this is general and indefinite. It is necessarily so. It follows from the absurd requirement to apportion to periods each side of an arbitrary line sums for services which were rendered right along, with no idea that it would be necessary to make such an apportionment, and to keep some kind of a record with that in view, because the Comptroller had last year ruled that no such apportionment was necessary.

You are at liberty to file this as my answer to the inquiry conveyed by your telegram, if you desire.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS,
Special Assistant Attorney.

A. J. FALLS, Esq.

[Indorsement.]

George Bliss. Dec. 29, 1883, rel. to his account for $9,200 in star-route cases.
Jan'y 1st, 1884, respectfully referred to the Hon. Attorney-General.

A. J. FALLS.

Col. WM. A. COOK,

Special Attorney of the United States :

SIR: As you are retained to investigate and prosecute star-route frauds, I give you notice that there has been, and still is, a persistent effort to put through the Post-Office Department a barefaced fraud. This fraud is based upon and supported by evidence manufactured in Washington and vicinity. There are officials in the Post-Office Department engaged in connection with outside parties in this attempt to defraud the Government.

I will not accept employment from the Government, as you well know, but in this case, if you are directed to make the investigation yourself, I will, without any charge, furnish the evidence to establish beyond doubt the fact that forgery and perjury have been employed to enable certain parties to obtain a large sum of money from the Government, in connection with Route 40104.

I will not disclose names or indicate the nature of the fraud until you notify me that you are authorized to make the investigation, and can have access to the original papers. Whenever you do this I will, within forty-eight hours, lay the conclusive proof of my allegations before you.

Very respectfully,

WM. P. WOOD.

WASHINGTON, January 16, 1882.

JANUARY 17, 1882.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,

Attorney-General United States :

SIR: I inclose a letter from Mr. W. P. Wood, which seems to involve matters requiring immediate attention.

Mr. Wood is an old and experienced detective—a personal friend of mine of long standing—and I do not think he would make the bold and positive statements contained in his letter if he did not believe he had facts to justify them.

Whatever (if anything) you may direct me to do in relation to the matter will receive prompt attention. Without authority from you I would not feel free to place myself in communication with Mr. Wood or to make an investigation.

Very respectfully,

WILLIAM A. COOK,
Special Assistant Attorney United States.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, January 17, 1882.

MY DEAR MR. MACVEAGH:

I send to you with this a copy of a letter and a bill presented to me by Mr. Gibson and another presented to me by Mr. Cook.

As these gentlemen were employed by you, and most of the services for which they present their bills were rendered during your time, you will confer a personal favor upon me if you will kindly inspect those bills, and say if they correspond with your ideas of what is correct.

Of course, I do not wish to impose upon you the necessity of deciding cases in this Department after you have left it, but inasmuch as these gentlemen enjoyed your confidence, and were your chosen agents, out of respect to you, as well as from a desire to guard the Department, I have concluded, upon reflection, to ask your help in the matter.

The star-route cases, as you well know, will involve a great outlay of money, and they are cases, too, of which the public have been observant, and I will be obliged, from a prudent regard to the public interests, to scrutinize with great care every penny that is spent in their prosecution. As to that which shall be incurred hereafter I will keep a strict and observant watch, and strive to keep everything within reasonable bounds. As to that which occurred during your time, I must solicit your help. I know it will be unpleasant to sit in judgment upon the compensation of others, but I know your independence of character, and I know your desire to see the public duties properly administered, and I wish you would in this matter kindly give me your help, for I can obtain it from no one else.

Will you please oblige me in this connection by informing me if Mr. Gibson was chosen by you as counsel to stand in the same relation to the case as Mr. Cook stands? I ask this because he never appeared in court, and never was detailed for any such professional duty. The bills of Mr. Cook and Mr. Gibson are alike, which would seem to me to be an assertion by Mr. Gibson that he had measured his relation in the case by the same relation Mr. Cook held towards it, and was, therefore, entitled to like compensation, enjoying a position of like dignity and confidence and usefulness.

I would like to know also if Mr. Gibson was not in the same relation to the case as Mr. Cook was and is; whether he did not stand in the same relation to the case as Mr. Woodward did, and if the services rendered by him, in your judgment, would be entitled to more compensation than that which Mr. Woodward would be entitled to receive. I do not know anything about Mr. Woodward's rate of compensation. I know that, acting for the Post-Office Department, he was engaged in investigations similar to those that it appears Mr. Gibson was engaged in, and therefore I assimilate the two.

When I speak of economical action in this business, and judicious scrutiny, I do not wish to be hypercritical, or severe, or mean and narrow in my allowances; I wish to be just and fair, and to be so both to the claimants and to the Government. I must understand exactly in what relation they stood towards this case, and to that end I must depend upon your help.

I am, truly, your friend,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Hon. WAYNE MACVEAGH,
Fourth and Walnut streets, Philadelphia, Pa.

JANUARY 28, 1882.

SIR: Allow me to withdraw my bill heretofore presented for professional services in the star-route cases. While I regard the first bill as correct and just, I wish to relieve you from all possible embarrassment in relation to it, and therefore substitute the inclosed bill.

I received $750 from your predecessor, for incidental expenses, and have credited the amount on the bill. My entire incidental expenses have been about $1,000; so that my fee as now presented is only about $5,000.

In view of the fact that during the seven months embraced in the bill my time has been largely occupied in the star-route cases, to the exclusion of ordinary business of pecuniary profit, I regard the bill as in fact lower than it should be; but I am anxious to have the matter speedily ended.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM A. COOK,
Special Assistant Attorney United States.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General United States.

[Law offices of Wayne MacVeagh, Geo. Tucker Bispham.]

402 WALNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
January 31, 1882.

MY DEAR SIR: You need no assurance that I am very glad to give you not only the benefit of any information I possess as to the business of the Department while I was the head of it, but also the benefit of my judgment in any matter in which you care to ask it, whether such matter presented itself since you entered upon your duties or before.

You will find a letter addressed by me to Mr. Phillips stating fully the facts about Mr. Gibson's appointment, and you will also find on file the letter from Mr. Woodward, with the indorsement of the Postmaster-General, which induced me to make it. These papers will fully answer the question you ask as to the character of the duties Mr. Gibson was expected to perform.

Mr. Cook's appointment was made upon the recommendation of the same gentleman, with the addition of Mr. Gibson himself. I think it must have been contemplated that Mr. Gibson's labors would be more largely performed in the Post-Office Department, and Mr. Cook's more largely in the courts; but I do not know of any such actual distribution of functions. The labors performed by these gentlemen were performed either at Colonel Cook's office or at the Post-Office Department, and my knowledge of their extent and character, therefore, is very largely the result of their statements and the statements of others. I have every reason to believe, however, that they were both very industriously and assiduously occupied with the matters committed to their charge from the time of their appointment until the appointment of yourself and Colonel Bliss. Their labors since that date are of course within your knowledge, and I have no reason to suppose that either of them has been devoting himself to any considerable extent to any other matters than the star-route cases during the period of their employment, though they might have been so occupied without my knowledge.

Mr. Gibson's employment covers a period of eight months, and Mr. Cook's of seven months. If you find that these gentlemen have been devoting themselves assiduously and substantially, to the exclusion of other business, to the star-route cases during these periods, it seems to me that an allowance of $5,000 to each of them would not be excessive; but as to that your judgment would certainly be as valuable as that of any other member of the profession, for your experience in matters of such consequence has been very extensive.

Mr. Gibson's report speaks for itself, but it certainly impressed me as exhibiting very remarkable knowledge of the subject, and very great ability in the presentation of it. Mr. Cook always impressed me as being very diligent and faithful, but since September you have probably been thrown into closer professional connections with him than I have been. If in your place, however, and I was acting with the lights I now have upon the subject, I see no reason why I should hesitate to approve payments to each for $5,000. Perhaps Mr. Cook may be entitled to some addition to cover his expenses, but of that you can best judge.

Very truly, yours,

WAYNE MACVEAGH.

HON. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 1, 1882.

SIR: Allow me to call your attention to the inclosed bill for the balance due me as late special attorney in the star-route cases.

It covers the months of January and February, and a part of the month of March, 1882; and the amount is at the rate established by you and your predecessor for my services prior to January last.

I delayed presenting the account with the expectation that the cases would be ended at the late trial, and because I had no disposition to trespass on your time and attention during the actual pendency of that trial, and since its inconclusive termination I understood you were generally absent.

Hoping that, after the long delay, the matter will receive your early attention,

I am, yours, &c.,

WILLIAM A. COOK.

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General United States.

W. A. Cook, special counsel in star-route cases:

Received July 2, 1881	$750
Received February 1, 1882	5,250
	6,000

Amount paid from June 1, 1881, to January 1, 1882.

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 17, 1882.

SIR: On the 1st instant I transmitted my bill against the United States for professional services rendered from January 1 to March 17, 1882. The reception of the bill was promptly acknowledged. Two weeks have elapsed, and I have heard nothing further from you in relation to it.

Allow me, therefore, to call your attention to it, with the hope that it may receive your immediate attention.

It includes employment and services while you were Attorney-General, and is sustained by my affidavit.

If there should be any objection to it, please let me know; I cannot conceive any.

Very respectfully,

WILLIAM A. COOK.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General United States.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, December 27, 1883.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for your information, copy of a letter, dated 26th instant, from Hon. R. T. Merrick, special assistant attorney-general, in which he states that you insist that the bill presented by him for services to July 30, 1883, should be apportioned between the last and present fiscal year. Mr. Merrick states that this is a difficult thing to do, as his charges are made, not by the day, but for services generally; but that he is entirely willing that $1,500 of the bill referred to should be apportioned to the past fiscal year, and he will treat that sum as satisfied by the payment of the balance.

Very respectfully,

S. F. PHILLIPS,
Acting Attorney-General.

Hon. WILLIAM LAWRENCE,
First Comptroller.

DECEMBER 20, 1883.

DEAR SIR: The Comptroller insists that the bill presented by me as special assistant attorney-general should be apportioned between the last and present fiscal year.

As stated by me some time since, this is a very difficult thing for me to do, as my charges are made not by the day, but for services generally, as they are rendered; and in each particular bill they are also affected by what has already been previously paid.

I am entirely willing, to save all trouble, that $1,500 of the bill referred to should be apportioned to the past fiscal year, and I will treat that sum as satisfied by payment of the balance; for under no circumstances will I be instrumental in rendering it necessary for your Department to ask a deficiency appropriation, greatly preferring to sustain a loss rather than do so.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

R. T. MERRICK,
Special Assistant Attorney-General.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, December 29, 1883.

SIR: Your account for $5,000 for compensation as counsel for the United States in the "star-route cases" from April 2 to July 30, 1883, is before me. That account has been approved by the Attorney-General. But inasmuch as it covers parts of two fiscal years, the First Comptroller, upon its going to him, has required that it be apportioned accordingly. Being notified of this requirement, you have thereupon placed $3,500 of the charge in the present fiscal year, and announced your intention of surrendering to the United States the $1,500 which you thus assign to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883. I transmitted that apportionment to the Comptroller, but he has returned it, requiring my approval thereof.

I do not find in this Department the specific terms of your engagement with the United States, if there be any such. Outside of express terms the arrangement depends, according to the custom of this office, very much upon the personal discretion of the Attorney-General. I must do nothing to embarrass the exercise of that discretion by any casual action necessitated by his brief absence—the more that he has acted thereupon frequently during the past two years, and has expressly reserved control of what has thus been done—by future official action of his own.

Upon the whole, then, I allow to-day, without prejudice, $2,000 upon your account, which I believe practically leaves the whole matter to the Attorney-General at his return, upon the same footing as if he were here now; and I hope will be of no concern otherwise, as it involves a delay to you of probably only a week.

Very respectfully,

S. F. PHILLIPS,
Acting Attorney-General.

R. T. MERRICK, Esq., &c.

[Merrick & Morris, counselors, No. 1306 F street.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 31, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to renew the request, heretofore on two or three occasions made by me, that I may be relieved from further participation in the prosecution of the star-route cases.

The most important of these cases in which it is likely any further action will be taken by the court is the case of the United States against William Pitt Kellogg, and in this case there are conditions at present existing, and others likely to arise, which, in my judgment, render my retirement desirable.

With a grateful appreciation of the legal and moral support I have received from you at all times throughout the progress of these cases, and with the assurance of my high regard for you personally,

I remain, with great respect, your obedient servant,

R. T. MERRICK.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, April 1, 1884.

MY DEAR SIR: In conformity with your letter dated the 31st of March, I consent to your renewed request to be relieved from further participation in the prosecution of the star-route cases. This is a proper time for you to take the step you do. Hitherto I have declined, because I saw there was a necessity for your presence. Now I do not see it, and I agree with you in the reasons you have given.

I am deeply obliged to you for your handsome allusion to myself, and I must add that the Government is in debt to you for the integrity, ability, and earnestness with which you have conducted these cases ever since I confided them to you.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Hon. R. T. MERRICK,
Attorney at Law, Washington.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, July 30, 1883.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for your approval, a bill, on account, for services. The bill is made out in the same form as the others. I also inclose a memorandum showing the dates and amounts of previous payments. The services commenced January 21, 1882.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM W. KER,
Special Assistant.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General of the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, October 31, 1883.

SIR: Some time in the summer when I was absent from the Department, in my vacation, you sent an account for services rendered in the star-route cases. I replied to you and stated that I thought that account was excessive. You responded, differing with me, and proposing to explain to me to my satisfaction that the account was a proper one. I suspended the whole matter till I could return to Washington, where I could examine the papers and speak with accurate knowledge of all the facts connected with your account for services, and your services.

When Mr. Merrick rendered his account, some time ago, in the early stage of his connection with the case, he said to me—as I would have supposed and believed he would, and as I have no doubt you will say—that he would not embarrass me in any way, that he did not wish to disturb me upon the quantum meruit of his account, that he would rather reduce than advance upon his charges, if in my judgment they were inexpedient. Thus far you have been paid the bills as you presented them, except one, which was reduced.

I do not now propose to consider the subject of the amount of your bill; I will suspend that; that must be reserved for future action. It is not a pleasant thing to criticise the charges of professional gentlemen retained by the Department, and I will not now anticipate that disagreeable necessity; but the purpose of this letter is to request you, as I have requested Mr. Merrick, to render a final account for the services in the case of the United States against John W. Dorsey and others, which ended June 14, 1883. This suggestion is grounded upon the fact that the trial was a unit in itself, and ended during the last fiscal year, and that no expenses connected with it could be paid out of the appropriation of the succeeding fiscal year. Counsel were continuously employed up to that time. Since then their services have been irregular. I request this because the First Comptroller of the Treasury has ruled that counsel in the star-route and other cases cannot be paid out of the present appropriation for services in the past fiscal year.

Please, then, therefore, to furnish me with the account as I here request it. Application will then be made to Congress for an appropriation to make up this deficiency, and to pay you, with the other counsel, and that is the object of this communication.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

W. W. KER, Esq.,
Special Assistant United States Attorney in the Star-Route Cases, Washington, D. C.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, November 8, 1883.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith one bill against the United States for services rendered, and another bill for expenses incurred, and in compliance with your request, made verbally through Mr. Cameron, to submit the following statements and explanations concerning the bills:

On the 31st day of July, 1883, I presented a bill for $7,000 for services rendered in the star-route cases, which bill was retained by you for examination and further consideration. By your letter dated October 31, 1883, I was informed that where services were rendered prior to July 1, 1883, the payment therefor could not be made out of the appropriation for the present fiscal year, and I was asked to render, in the place of the bill already presented, one for the services rendered by me prior to July 1, 1883, that it might be taken into account in an application to be made to Congress for an appropriation to make up deficiencies. I then asked Mr. Cameron to return me the bill first presented, which he did; but Mr. Cameron has this day informed me that although the bill cannot be approved, yet it is a record of the Department which should be retained in the Department, and I have handed the bill back to Mr. Cameron.

The bill which is herewith presented for your approval, is for $3,500, for services rendered during the four months beginning on the 1st day of July, 1883, and ending on the 31st day of October, 1883.

With a number of cases, each requiring more or less attention, the cases have always been considered in their entirety and treated as one. To itemize the bill, stating how much is charged for one case or service and how much for another, would be a difficult matter, and might subject me to unjust criticism; and it would be impossible to state how much of one day was devoted to one case, and how much of the same day was devoted to another. In the absence of any fixed and determined standard, the time devoted to the cases has been heretofore and is yet considered in making a charge for services rendered. But even this, were it adopted as a positive rule or guide, would be to the manifest disadvantage of counsel, when it is remembered that two, three, or four days in each week devoted to the public cases of the Government render the remaining days of comparatively little value, resulting in a total inability to attend to cases for other clients, and the enforced abandonment of private practice.

In the month of July, 1883, three days were spent in Hartford, Conn., or in the journey to and from that place, under directions received from you. But the greater portion of the month was devoted to the case of Thomas J. Brady, charged with receiving money in relation to a contract whilst Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and in the case of the United States vs. William Pitt Kellogg, charged with receiving money in relation to a contract with the United States whilst a United States Senator. The object sought to be accomplished was to secure pleas from the two defendants, and to have a day fixed for the trial of one of them. On the part of Brady, demurrers and motions to quash have been filed, but not argued. On the part of Kellogg, demurrers and several motions to quash were filed. The law was examined, briefs were made, the several demurrers and motions to quash were argued, the case was decided in favor of the Government, and on the 30th day of July a plea of not guilty was entered, and notice given that on October 8 the court would be asked to fix a date for trial. The days of actual engagement during the month of July, either in court in Washington, in Hartford, or on the journey, were the 1st, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, 18th, 19th, 22d, 23d, 24th, 25th, 29th, 30th, and 31st.

In August I received from Mr. Cameron a copy of a portion of a letter sent by you to him, in which I was directed to answer, specifically, in writing, certain questions therein propounded. As the answer related to certain matters contained in the records of the court, I was compelled to come to Washington to examine the records, and made a report in writing, which was copied by the type-writers, and, I am informed, was satisfactory to you. This business detained me in Washington till September 2. The days actually engaged during the month of August were the 27th, 28th, 29th, 30th, and 31st, and the days in September were the 1st and 2d.

In September, during the last week in the month, my attention was directed to the fact that it would be important to communicate with Walsh, one of the witnesses in the Kellogg case, and secure a copy of testimony it was supposed that the defendant Kellogg would give in a case in New York. I called the attention of Mr. Merrick to this matter, and he advised me by all means to secure the testimony, if possible. I endeavored to ascertain where Walsh could be found, and to arrange to secure the desired testimony. I have made no memoranda of what I did on any particular day during that week in September.

In October I was engaged during almost the entire month. I went twice to New York City to try and communicate with Walsh and get a stenographic report of the testimony of Kellogg and Brady. I was not successful in finding Walsh, and as the hearing in the case in which Kellogg and Brady were to testify was abandoned, I could not get their statements. I came to Washington on the 8th to attend court in the case against Kellogg and the case against Brady, but the cases were continued till December 10. By your direction I undertook to secure a pardon for Little Horace, who was confined in the Eastern Penitentiary, and to prevail upon him to testify in the detective cases in Washington. In pursuance of that object I visited New York, Washington, and Harrisburg. Having a great many apparently insurmountable difficulties to overcome, all of which are well known to you, yet with the efficient aid and assistance received from you, the pardon was procured, the man agreed to testify, was brought to Washington, and is now in jail here ready to testify when called upon. The days of actual engagement during the month of October, in the matters above stated, were the 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, 13th, 15th, 16th, 17th, 18th, 19th, 20th, 22d, 23d, 24th, 25th, 26th, 27th, 28th, 29th, 30th, and 31st.

I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM W. KER,
Special Assistant United States Attorney.

160 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
January 9, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I judge an investigation is to be made of the Department of Justice. For my part I am glad of it. It will cause you, and me to less extent, some inconvenience, but it is the only way of meeting the misstatements and misinferences of the reporters and the thieves. In view of it, however, permit me to suggest that before you make any statements as to star route, Ottman, &c., you cause your records to be fully examined. I suggest this because in going over my papers I find that you have on various occasions forgotten things which had been done, a result quite natural in your mass of business and yet to be avoided in a public investigation. For instance, it has escaped you, apparently, as it had me, that the rate of payment of $100 per day and expenses was fixed by a letter from you to McVeagh and his acceptance of it, though there had been previous verbal communications between me and Mr. McV. Again as to the civil suits—they were placed in my hands by Postmaster-General James before you became Attorney-General. You approved it in writing both before and after you became Attorney-General. Subsequently you have treated the matter as undecided where they should go and then sent the Dorsey cases to me (though you have never yet answered as to whether this covered Vaile); of course in this matter you have acted with my entire concurrence, but I wish to remind you of the record. So in the Ottman business there should be accuracy as to what was done and why and how; your records will show all this, I think.

In the civil suits I failed in my scheme to get jurisdiction of Dorsey here because Bosler died. I do not, however, give it up absolutely.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, November 12, 1883.

WILLIAM W. KER,

Special Assistant Attorney, Philadelphia, Pa.:

I have your telegram about your fee. I understand that you accept twenty-two fifty in full for services to October thirty-first. As you told me you would accept whatever was allowed, on the faith of that I will put it through. I have marked it "Special" and sent it to the Treasury. If not satisfactory, wire me to recall it.

BREWSTER CAMERON,
*General Agent, Department of Justice.*DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, December 19, 1883.

SIR: I had the honor to present to you to-day a bill for professional services from November 1, 1883, to December 15, 1883, the amount being $2,280, which bill has been approved by you for $1,200. Mr. Cameron has informed me that you say my "charges are excessive"; that I should not come here when requested by Mr. Merrick; that I should only come when required by you: that Mr. Merrick has no control over me, and that in future I must not come unless you send for me.

From this statement I am led to the conclusion that you consider that I have come to Washington when my services were not actually required, for the purpose of claiming compensation for time spent in the Government service, and that I have rendered bills for services that are excessive, exorbitant, and that I would not have rendered under other circumstances. A controversy over pay for professional services under every circumstance must be annoying, but in the present instance I can hardly express to you how much I am pained and hurt by the communication I have received. When you telegraphed for me to come here, in January, 1882, I left on the first train, dropping my business and everything. From what you told me, and what I could learn by inquiring, I imagined I would be engaged here not longer than two or three weeks. At that time I had begun to secure a paying practice. I thought the absence of two or three weeks would not seriously injure my practice, and I accepted your appointment, leaving my office in charge of a student. I worked in the Department (and you know how faithfully I worked, and how laborious the duties were) from January 21, 1882, till the 3d day of March, without being able to visit my office once during all that time. Then came the arguments in court and the trials of the cases. Whilst I was so employed in the Government service I had to let my private cases go into the hands of other attorneys; the student I left in charge of my office was absent visiting theaters, going to picnics and base-ball matches, and, as I learned from people who had called, my office was closed nearly two months. After the first trial of Dorsey was over, I found my private business was nearly if not quite ruined; but I hired a young member of the bar to come and take charge of my office and try and save what could be saved of my business. If at that time I had resigned the Government appointment I would have been far better off. The second trial lasted till June of this year, so that from December till the close of the trial in June I never visited my office. Since then, with the exception of the month of September, there has not been a week that I have not had to come here for one or more days, rendering the balance of the week entirely useless to me. I have written to you twice before, giving you practically the same statement of my services so irregularly required. I beg leave to remind you that you have on more than one occasion informed me that Mr. Merrick was appointed to represent you in the cases, and he had charge of them. I have felt bound to come here when requested by Mr. Merrick, and to remain here when he desired me to remain. I have never remained here one day or one hour longer than was absolutely necessary.

Under some circumstances my charges might be considered excessive, under others they might not. My family has remained in Philadelphia, and apart from the great inconvenience of separation, the expense has been increased. I abandoned my business, but have paid rent and a gentleman to remain in the office, and it will take at least six months to regain what business I have lost, the great trouble being to convince people that I can remain at home to attend to their business. I have attended to every duty connected with the star-route cases and their trial, not only faithfully but without any display of a want of ability sufficient to excite comment or criticism. I have never been absent when wanted. I have performed the same services in the trials that the other gentlemen performed. I have devoted more time to the Government than either of the other gentlemen. I have been engaged in cases that neither of the other counsel have been engaged in. I have asked less, and been paid less money than either of the others. I have never rendered a bill that I did not at the time think, and swear, was just and true, and I now think the same. I do not desire to make any comparison between myself and Colonel Bliss, as his is an exceptional case. * * * In the time I have been in the Government service, I have made no money outside, and have attended to no other business; other counsel have been more fortunately situated.

The bill I rendered to-day was for services actually performed for the Government. The amount I honestly believed to be reasonable, or I would not have stated it in the bill. It may be that I will be called before a committee of Congress to explain my charges, as Mr. Cameron says. To accept the amount of $1,200 approved by you for this last bill would not be consistent with my previous charges. I cannot present you with a bill claiming $2,280, and accept in full settlement $1,200. I could not make a satisfactory explanation if called upon to explain. I presented that bill in good faith. To accept the amount you allow would be to confess that I have attempted to overcharge the Government; that my previous charges were overcharges, and that my services are not worth one-half the services of other counsel. I cannot do this, and I therefore respectfully return the bill to you.

I am told that I must not return to Washington unless you send for me. I am glad you have given this direction, because it relieves me from all embarrassment in the future. I cannot afford to come here for one or two days at a time, unless the times are at long intervals, and with some regard to my own business.

I am told that Justice Wylie will give a decision in Spencer's case on Saturday. I have asked Mr. Merrick whether it is necessary for me to be in court, and he said that was a matter I must judge for myself. I will leave Washington to-morrow (Thursday) afternoon, and will not return again unless sent for by you, and I will inform the other counsel of your instructions in this respect, that there may be no misunderstanding.

I am sorry, very sorry, this complication as to pay has arisen. You have been more than kind to me, and I value your friendship and esteem above all things, so that I hope you will not think less of me because I am not able to alter my nature. But of all things I must earnestly beg you, if you have considered that I have attempted to wrong the Government, as stated in the first part of this letter, that you will banish such thoughts from your mind, and give me credit for that honesty and integrity which I know you have never heard questioned. If you can relieve me from the cases, I again ask you to let me go. If you cannot do this, then I ask you, as I have before asked you, to fix some certain and adequate rate of compensation, that any future difficulty may be avoided.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

WILLIAM W. KER,
Special Assistant Attorney.

HON. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney General of the United States.

HOWLAND HOTEL,
Long Branch, N. J., July 31, 1883.

SIR: I have received your bill dated July 30th, 1883. By referring to the books of the Department, I find that you have received $27,627 within one year for services rendered. I submit to you that your charges are higher than ought to be presented. I have said, and frequently written, to all of the counsel in this star-route case that such great cases should not be made mere opportunities of gain; they are occasions of honor and distinction. Furthermore, it becomes all of the counsel to remember that their charges in these cases have been made the subject of criticism.

I will have to consider the subject before I direct the payment of this bill. I think it is too high. I think the amount for one year's services, $27,627, is too much; and upon reflection you will say so yourself. I have referred the matter to Mr. Cameron, and will advise with him on the subject when I return to Washington.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

W. W. KER, Esq.,
Special Assistant United States Attorney, &c., Washington, D. C.

Confidential.]

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF POST-OFFICE INSPECTOR,
Hartford, Conn., July 7, 1883.

SIR: Your favor of the 6th instant, asking for a written account of an interview had with General Garfield upon the subject of Mr. Cook's appointment as attorney in the star-route cases, is at hand.

I have a strong aversion to writing about parties with whom I was once associated, but in the expectation that this communication will be treated as confidential, I will give an outline of the facts.

A. M. Gibson was first employed at my earnest solicitation. After a time, through his efforts, Mr. Cook was also engaged. Gibson wrote me several letters (perhaps from New York) urging me to see the Postmaster and Attorney-General, and to press his retention. He argued that Cook was an able criminal lawyer, and, further, that from his intimate knowledge of certain sinister aspects of the courts in Washington, he could prevent the defendants from corrupting the juries.

My impression was that Mr. MacVeagh yielded somewhat passively in the matter to the importunities of Gibson.

After the employment of Mr. Cook was publicly announced I received a summons to the White House. President Garfield, in much apparent trouble, asked if I could explain how a lawyer of Cook's bad reputation came to be engaged in the case. I attempted to justify the selection on the ground that the Government would be obliged to procure portions of its evidence from the low and criminal classes, and that Mr. Cook's training and associations peculiarly fitted him to perform that part of the work. I also explained that post-office inspectors, in the performance of their duties, came down upon offenders from the outside, and that they lacked the peculiar experience which qualify one to unearth the doings of criminals in combination, or as an organized class.

Through some one Mr. Cook learned of the dissatisfaction of the President, and wrote him a letter in self-justification. This communication may perhaps still exist among the papers of Mr. Garfield.

I was present when Mr. Cook was first introduced to President Garfield. It was on the Tuesday or Wednesday evening before the assassination. He came by appointment to the Arlington Hotel, whence Postmaster-General James and I went with him to the White House.

The interview may have lasted half an hour. Mr. Cook plead earnestly that Senator Dorsey might be saved from prosecution on the ground of his great services to the Republican party. I remember that I modestly argued in reply that partisan services should not be allowed to condone crimes. The President listened patiently, but made no response to the plea for Mr. Dorsey.

At the same interview Mr. Cook further said that an agent of Thomas J. Brady had already attempted to corrupt him, and that as a measure of self-protection he had secreted a detective under the sofa in his office to be a witness to the conversation. This extraordinary avowal left a very unpleasant impression on my mind, as only a few days before I had defended the employment of Mr. Cook to the President, which I could not have done had I known that such was his method of conducting business.

The memory of Mr. Cook must be at fault respecting confidential disclosures from President Garfield to himself, as their personal acquaintance began only two or three days before the assassination.

Very respectfully,

P. H. WOODWARD,
Post-Office Inspector.

The Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

[Office of United States Attorney, District of Columbia.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 1, 1881.

DEAR SIR: Referring to the interview with you this morning concerning the prosecution of certain persons charged with being concerned in frauds on the United States in connection with what is known as the star-route investigations, I desire to say that the long delay in the business of the criminal court of the District, occasioned by not having a marshal, has resulted in overcrowding my office with the work specially belonging to the criminal business of this District, and both myself and all my assistants are, owing to the near adjournment of the court, overburdened with work, among the cases, as I explained to you this morning, being many of very grave importance.

In view of the fact that these star-route cases are more of a national than a local character, and that according to report they involve a large number of persons, and will array in their defense, should indictments be found, many of the ablest lawyers in the profession, both in this city and elsewhere, and owing to the fact that the public interest in them is very intense, I do not feel, that, under all these circumstances, the whole responsibility of their management should be thrown upon me. I am well aware that your own duties will prevent your giving personal attention to the necessary details upon which successful prosecution must depend. I therefore respectfully request that, if consistent with your idea of the public interest, you designate some lawyer as special counsel for the Government in these cases, who shall have the management and control of them, and that the appointment be made at as early a day as possible, in order that the person selected may be able to prepare any indictments that may be presented.

It is not necessary to say that whoever you may appoint will have my active and earnest support and assistance.

Very respectfully,

GEORGE B. CORKHILL,
United States Attorney, District of Columbia.

Hon. WAYNE MACVEAGH,
Attorney-General U. S., Washington, D. C.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., April 26, 1881.

SIR: Having been instructed by you to make a thorough investigation into the recent operations of the star-route service, I have already entered upon the work, and find the labor so vast that I ought to have an assistant, to be supplied by the Department of Justice. He should possess both legal knowledge and skill as an investigator.

Mr. A. M. Gibson, of this city, has already rendered me great assistance voluntarily. He has in various ways acquired no small degree of familiarity with the methods and practices to be inquired into, and has placed his information freely at my disposal. If I may be permitted to express a preference, I think his selection would prove judicious. I mention his name in this connection to President Garfield, and he seemed rather acquiescent, though he made no decided reply.

Very respectfully,

P. H. WOODWARD,
Inspector.

Hon. THOMAS L. JAMES,
Postmaster-General.

(Indorsed:) Respectfully referred to the Attorney-General, with my earnest approval.—T. L. James, Postmaster-General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, October 22, 1881.

A. M. GIBSON, Esq.:

MY DEAR SIR: I do not know how it happened that no written statement was sent you of your appointment at the request of Mr. Woodward, indorsed by the Postmaster-General, to assist in the investigation and prosecution of the star-route cases.

I certainly supposed it had been done at the date of their request, April 22, 1881, and I send you this note to certify that you were accordingly employed in these matters at that date.

Yours, very truly,

WAYNE MACVEAGH,
Attorney-General.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 16, 1882.

SIR: I respectfully submit the inclosed bill for services rendered in the investigation and prosecution of the star-route cases.

As I have had no compensation since my employment on April 22, 1881, I trust you will cause an early disposition to be made of my case.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. M. GIBSON.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 1, 1882.

The United States to A. M. Gibson, assistant attorney, Dr.

To services rendered from April 22, 1881, to date, in the investigation and prosecution of the star-route cases..... $7,500 00

WASHINGTON, January 28, 1882.

SIR: I desire to withdraw the bill I submitted a fortnight since and substitute the inclose. I do this at the suggestion of the late Attorney-General MacVeagh, who says he will cordially approve my bill for $5,000.

Very respectfully,

A. M. GIBSON.

To Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, February 2, 1882.

MY DEAR COLONEL BLISS:

Now, when Mr. Gibson's account is to be paid, I wish to talk with you about his further retention and what it will be proper to detail him to do.

Pray see me about that before you leave for the week.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER.

[Telegram.]

CHICAGO, ILL., March 18, 1882.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER, Washington:

Will call on you Tuesday morning. I, in mean time, will accept no retainer against the Government.

R. T. MERRICK.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., March 28, 1882.

DEAR SIR: After our frequent conference upon the subject of retaining you to act on behalf of the Government in the prosecution of the star-route cases, I have concluded to invite you by this formal letter to accept the position in those cases which was occupied by me, and relinquished when I was advanced to my present position. As I have before said to you, it is my intention to continue in the cases, and be present in court, and take such active part as my other duties would permit me to do. I have, however, some serious misgivings as to my being able to be present at all times during the conduct of those cases in court. In view of that, Mr. Bliss will need the aid of some experienced colleague. It would be unfair to him to cast the whole burden of the cases upon him when I would be obliged to be absent.

He and I have conferred together upon the subject. As an act of courtesy and duty to him, I have submitted the whole subject to his consideration, and he has cordially assented to the proposed invitation that I now convey to you by this letter.

Please therefore advise me by your earliest opportunity, in a formal way, if you will accept the appointment I now tender you, so that I may direct the proper evidence of authority to be furnished you, so that you may forthwith unite with Mr. Bliss in the professional performance of all the duties that are necessary to secure the prompt and energetic trial of these cases.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

RICHARD T. MERRICK, Esq.,
Washington, D. C.

[Merrick & Morris, counsellors, No. 1306 F street.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 29, 1882.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of yesterday was received this morning. Since our first interview on the subject of my participation in the star-route cases as counsel for the Government, I have been seriously considering whether I could, in justice to other professional engagements, assume an undertaking which will be so exacting, demand so much of my time, and require so much labor. To reach a conclusion satisfactory to myself, it became necessary that I should look somewhat into the cases, and but for this I would certainly have given an earlier reply to the flattering suggestion you made to me some days since.

I have concluded to accept the position you propose that I shall occupy in the cases, as successor to that vacated by you on your appointment to the office of Attorney-General, and will, in conjunction with Mr. Bliss, and relying upon you for such assistance as your official duties may give you opportunity to render, endeavor to secure for the cases speedy trial and a thorough investigation.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

R. T. MERRICK.

HON. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General of the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, October 30, 1883.

MY DEAR SIR: When we first began to treat with each other upon the subject of your charges in the star-route case, shortly after you rendered your first or second account, you said to me—as I would have supposed and believed you would—that you would not embarrass me in any way; that you did not wish me to be disturbed upon the quantum meruit of your account; that you would rather reduce than advance upon your charges, if, in my judgment, they were inexpedient. Thus far you have been paid the bills as you presented them.

Your last bill, when it was sent to me, together with the account of Mr. Ker, were both laid aside for reflection before I would undertake to act upon them, and I advised you so, either by letter or directly, or by what was stated to you by Mr. Cameron by my orders. I advised Mr. Ker so directly. I do not propose now to consider the subject of the amount; that must be reserved for future action, as it is not a pleasant thing to criticize the charges of a professional gentleman retained by the Department, and I will not anticipate that disagreeable necessity now. But it is now my purpose to request you to render a final account for the services in the case of the United States against John W. Dorsey and others, which ended June 14, 1883. This suggestion is grounded upon the fact that the trial was a unit in itself, and ended during the last fiscal year, and that no expenses connected with it could be paid out of the appropriation of the succeeding fiscal year. Counsel were continuously employed to that time. Since then their services have been irregular. I request this because the First Comptroller of the Treasury has ruled that counsel in the star-route and other cases cannot be paid out of the present appropriation for services in the past fiscal year.

Please, then, therefore, to furnish me with the account as I here request it. Application will then be made to Congress for an appropriation to make up this deficiency, and to pay you, and that is the object of this communication.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

RICHARD T. MERRICK, Esq.,
Special Assistant Attorney-General for Star route Cases, Washington, D. C.

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 14, 1883.

DEAR SIR: On the 30th ultimo I had the honor of a consultation with you on the subject of one of the pending star-route cases, when it was determined that I should visit New York City on the following day on business connected with that case.

Your favor of the date above referred to was received on the 31st ultimo, a few hours before I left for New York. I was, as you are aware, detained in that city for several days, and since my return have been engaged at the trial table.

These circumstances must excuse the delay of a formal reply to your favor of the 30th ultimo, and also to your favor of the 10th instant.

The duty with which I am charged by the language of the commission, under which I have the honor of holding the position of special assistant Attorney-General, is "to aid in the prosecution of certain persons charged with being concerned in frauds on the United States in connection with what is known as the star-route investigation."

There are a large number of cases embraced within this designation, and I regarded them as constituting altogether one professional undertaking, and in the bill referred to in your letter I have so charged for my professional services.

The services for which a charge is made in that bill were rendered in the month of July of the present fiscal year, as well as during the months of April, May, and June of the fiscal year ending June 30. They were services rendered not only in the case of the United States against Dorsey, Miner, Peck, and others, on the charge of conspiracy to defraud the United States, but also in the case of the United States against Thomas J. Brady, and the case of the United States against William Pitt Kellogg, in which indictments have been found under section 1782 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

It would be a difficult undertaking for me to apportion between these respective cases and others, which also received attention within the periods specified, the charge for services rendered generally in the star-route cases, according to the language of the account.

Neither would it be much easier to cut those services into parcels and ascribe one parcel to a period anterior to the present fiscal year and another parcel to a period within the present fiscal year.

I presume no reasonable professional gentleman familiar with the services I have rendered in these cases, and capable of forming a just estimate of professional labor, will question that the amounts I have indicated as properly due in this and other bills, heretofore presented, are considerably less than would be regarded as adequate compensation to counsel in the course of an ordinary litigation between private parties of equal extent and importance.

I am gratified to know that my accounts have uniformly met with your approval, and am especially relieved to learn, from your favor of the 10th instant, that the language used in your favor of the 30th ultimo, which apparently indicated that the bill presented on the 30th of July last might be subject to criticism, will not bear that construction, as you say you have not yet "seen or read that bill."

When I learned from your favor of the 30th ultimo that there was some difficulty in regard to paying that bill, by reason of the charge therein being generally for services rendered in the past as well as in the present fiscal year, and that it was your purpose to appeal to Congress for a special appropriation, I requested to withdraw the account I had filed in your Department, and did withdraw it. My purpose was to have no complications about this matter, and to withdraw the bill altogether rather than suffer any; but in compliance with your request I now return it.

I will add that I cannot understand why an account for continuous service, extending from one fiscal year into another, cannot be paid for in full during the latter year. It was in accordance with this view of the law, and the power and duty of the Treasury Department, that the accounts presented last year for services in these cases were settled and paid.

There is in this respect no difference whatever between the bill presented by me in October, 1883, and the bill I now return to you, bearing date July 30, 1883.

With great respect,

R. T. MERRICK,
Special Assistant Attorney-General.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General of the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, November 16, 1883.

SIR: Your letter of November 14 has been received, inclosing your account, which will be examined and then considered. As you remind me, I have heretofore directed your accounts to be paid as they were presented. I have done so out of courtesy to you as a professional gentleman that I respected. Nevertheless I have not forgotten the very proper suggestion you made to me—that you always intended that I would, when the time came, exercise my judgment as to their amount, and that you would gladly acquiesce in any such judgment as I would enter. The different payments that have heretofore been ordered by me have not been made merely because I had regard to what had been done. They were made as fees are generally paid to counsel—almost always paid to counsel during the progress of the case—in consideration not only of what has been done but what is to be done—and frequently, if not always, anticipating services not yet given, from the very necessity of the case, as far as the law would permit me, for I am forbidden to pay any round sum or any given sum in advance for services to be rendered; yet, nevertheless, necessarily, in the progress of a case like this—a long protracted case—running through more than a year and a half of preparation and of service given from time to time, the compensation could not be computed as one would compute the value of goods or of labor paid for at stated times, given for stated periods and stated rates; but the whole compensation must be adjusted at the end, and not be made finally from time to time, each payment being a new start of a new service, as distinct as if for daily labor.

However, as I said and wrote to you before, I have not seen your account, for while it was sent to me at Long Branch during the summer I did not look at it, for I had returned Mr. Ker's account with instructions to postpone it, and when I received yours (as can be seen upon the jacket), I took my pencil and wrote a short memorandum, returning it with instructions to hold it until I could examine it. I did not even open it and read it, for I thought that was not the place to do it; and then I wanted an opportunity to see your whole account, see how it stood, for I had no recollection of the amounts that had been paid to you, and as I had held up Mr. Ker's account for a like reason, I thought I ought to do the same with you, not in any spirit of criticism and unkindness, but as an act of duty to you, and to the public too.

As to the other considerations which I observed in your letter (which I glanced at), the object of which is to avoid the ruling of the First Comptroller—as to those considerations, I have not entered into them at present, having no time to give them reflection at this moment, for I am busy with my annual report, but I will think of them, and I hope they will be strong enough to persuade Mr. Lawrence to pay you the amount that will be allowed you.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Hon. RICHARD T. MERRICK,
Special Assistant Attorney-General for the Star-Route Cases, Washington.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, December 20, 1883.

MY DEAR MR. KER:

Your letter of December 19 has just been received. You must not misunderstand what has been said to you. When I hesitated to allow your account, Mr. Cameron, by way of excuse for you, said to me that it was his impression that because Mr. Merrick brought you here so frequently that there was a necessity to consider the expense it incurred, and I ought not to forget that, and then I told him that you should not come unless you were sent for by me. Now, remember that these expenses in this star-route matter have been the subject of very harsh reflections upon me, such as I ought not to suffer under. I sent for your bill to see what you had received and I found that you have received near $30,000 for the service you have rendered in this case in about sixteen months, and that is a very large sum of money. This you know, and must remember, and ought to remember. If during that time you could have made more than $30,000 in Philadelphia, I will ever regret that you came here.

Mr. Cameron meant nothing harsh in what he said to me, nor did I nothing of the kind. That was not the intention. Nor was there any belief that you came here for the mere purpose of running up bills. You have drawn a false conclusion from what Mr. Cameron said. I talked of these bills as excessive, as they all are in the eye of the world—very high; and the expenses that I have had to carry, and the reproach that I have had to bear. I talked of them very earnestly and warmly to Mr. Cameron.

What can I do? I have treated you all like gentlemen; I have never higgled with you; I have never put you to terms after you began; I just treated you as I would brothers. Mr. Bliss stood upon a contract which has been thought by the public press and public men to be a very heavy one, and Mr. Merrick and yourself are said to have charged too high. Others have thought sometimes these charges were more than they should have been, considering the dignity of the employment, which was and ought to have been treated as above the level of mere employment for gain.

When you came here in January, 1882, it was my intention only to retain you for two or three weeks, and I was surprised some time afterward to learn that you were retained longer. Mr. Bliss and Mr. Merrick found it necessary to have you, and I assented to what they did, and I think they did right. You have worked faithfully and ably and efficiently, and you have given a great deal of time. I did not know anything about your private business or your private affairs. I assumed that if you staid at the instance of Mr. Bliss and Mr. Merrick, you remained by your own will, and because you had made such arrangements to be here as would make it convenient for you, and I am sorry to learn from you that you have been hurt by doing it, and lost better opportunities; and I regret that you did not resign the appointment if it has injured you and prevented your securing better and more lucrative employment. I knew you were going to Philadelphia each week, and I assumed that you knew the condition of your affairs and could control them.

I do not complain that you "came at Mr. Merrick's request," but I would rather that I should be asked before you come, particularly as I am subject to this sharp and very bitter censure about expenses. I do not believe that you have "loitered here and wasted your time unnecessarily." I am perfectly satisfied with the nature of your services; I think they have been of great value to the cases, and I think they will be of great credit to yourself.

It is true that you have "performed the same services that others did," but as I have before stated, Mr. Bliss made a contract, and Mr. Merrick ranks very high here at this bar, and the world will expect, and I ought to make, a distinction between your rate of compensation and theirs, and that with no spirit of disparagement. Your position as junior counsel would require me to do so.

Of course you "swear to your bill," and "believe it to be true"; I have no doubt you do believe it to be true. You have a firm conviction that you have a right to it, or you would not swear to it. But then I am the judge under the circumstances, and I am sworn, too, to judge correctly, according to the best of my judgment, having a due regard to what is just toward the Government as well as toward those that are employed by it.

If there is an investigation by Congress, as I believe there will be, and as I hope there will be, if any one thinks wrong has been done or explanation needed, you will certainly be called before a committee of Congress to explain your charges, and I told Mr. Cameron to say so; and so will Mr. Merrick and Mr. Bliss, and that, of course, you all know and must look for. I have reduced your present bill to $1,200 because I take the entire amount that you have received for your services into consideration, which is very near $30,000, if not $30,000. The fact that you presented the bill and "believe it to be correct," you will certainly not assert should be binding upon me in determining the real measure of compensation. I must exercise some discretion in this business—some judgment. I give a special certificate upon the subject, and my judgment is as much to be considered as your own. I do not accuse you "of attempting to overcharge." You have estimated your services according to the standard of your former charges, but I intended at the end, and have intended all along, when I settled with all of you gentlemen, to have regard to the entire sum. The rate of charge that has been made has been high, not low or moderate.

Of course I do not "think any less of you." I think as much of you as ever; and you had a good right to express yourself fully and clearly upon this subject. I do not think that you "have endeavored to impose upon or wrong the Government." You have rendered an account, as thousands of other accounts are rendered, to be subject to inspection, and to the judgment of the officer whose duty it is to inspect it and pass upon it. I have no other feeling than one of respect for you, and I must thank you for all you have done in trying to sustain and uphold me in what I have been pursuing with so much labor and so much vexation.

But as to your account, I will lay that aside and consider the subject. I do not want to do a harsh or an unkind thing by you, and I will not by anybody ; and I see that you must have been very much pained, or you would not have written such an unhappy letter. However, I am glad you wrote it, because it is better for a man to speak out what he thinks.

I am, truly, your friend,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

W. W. KER, Esq.,
Spl. Asst. U. S. Att'y, in the Star-Route Cases, Washington.

PHILADELPHIA, January 3, 1884.

SIR : Your letter to me under date of December 20, 1883, in reply to mine to you, dated December 19, 1883, has been thoroughly considered.

I begin this answer by expressing to you my thanks and great gratification at the evidence of your confidence and personal regard which your letter contains. I have tried to do my duty to you and the Department of Justice since I was professionally engaged by you in the star-route cases and other professional employment devolved on me. I take this occasion to say to you, it so happened in my relations with the cases, and the papers and witnesses it was my duty carefully and critically to examine, that I thus became informed of many matters no other of the professional gentlemen who were in the cases could know without the same line of examination. This labor laid on me became constant, and taxed my time and health far beyond my mere service as one of the counsel. This I state now only to inform you of the entire surrender of my time to a duty with which you honored me. This relation was known to many persons, and, therefore, I became unconsciously to myself identified with the history of the cases.

You may remember, I came to Washington at your request ; you may remember, you told me I must not leave until the cases were tried in court ; you may also remember, in all our interviews, from the first to the last, you never intimated that my engagement as counsel had terminated, or that you expected it to end without some official notice to me.

As to the compensation for my professional services, and the last bill rendered by me, while I do not believe in any event I have charged more than a just compensation, yet I do believe, after full reflection, that I am bound to submit entirely to your decision, which I now advise you I most cheerfully do. It is proper to remark that this conclusion is arrived at after consultation with friends to whose advice I promptly submit. If the compensation I have received is divided into fees received by me, and a very large amount of expenses paid by me at the time as immediately necessary, where no chance occurred to make a minute of the amounts paid and the emergent demand for them, you will find I have not had so large a fee as the statement thus unexplained suggests.

I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM W. KER,
Special Assistant Attorney.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General of the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, January 4, 1884.

SIR : Your letter of January 3 was received to-day by me. It is very satisfactory in its tone, and such a letter as I would like to have received from you. All that you say I will remember and consider hereafter, with reference to these cases that you have had in charge in conjunction with the other gentlemen.

I will inform Mr. Cameron about your decision as to your fee, and he will communicate with you, so that you may procure it promptly.

I need hardly say that the letter is a very acceptable and gratifying one to me. Of course, in the future transaction of the star-route business, especially the Kellogg case, I must turn to you, and will turn to you.

Truly and respectfully, your friend,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

WM. W. KER, Esq.,
Attorney at Law, Philadelphia, Pa.

[Merrick & Morris, counselors, 1306 F street NW.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 7, 1884.

DEAR SIR: During your absence from the city, on the occasion of your recent visit to New Orleans, I received a letter from Colonel Bliss, suggesting that as neither the Kellogg case nor the Brady case could be tried at present, it would probably be expedient that we should get some of the other star-route cases, of less difficulty and importance, ready for hearing and have them disposed of.

I replied to Colonel Bliss's letter, stating that I would see you in regard to the subject as soon as you returned, and that it was my purpose to ask your permission to withdraw from all of the star-route cases, except the two I have particularly indicated above; and that, whilst I would be much gratified if I could get rid also of those two, nevertheless there were circumstances connected with them, as he was aware, placing me under such professional obligations to you and to the Government, that I felt compelled to remain in them until they might be finally tried and disposed of.

There are a number of indictments pending for perjury, procuring, executing, and filing fraudulent bonds, &c., in connection with star-route matters that should be tried; but I am inclined to the opinion that they do not require, in their management, any other special counsel than Colonel Bliss himself, and I beg that you will release me from my duty in connection with them under the appointment you did me the honor to confer upon me as special assistant Attorney-General.

Please notify me at what hour it will be convenient for you to allow me the honor of an interview upon the matter referred to.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

R. T. MERRICK,
Special Assistant Attorney-General.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER.

JANUARY 8, 1884.

DEAR SIR: With reference to my bill, pending before you, I assume that Mr. Falls has filed my letter of December 29, as to distribution of time. I am now asked to say how many of the days for which I charge were for days in which I was in Washington and how many in New York. The whole bill covers, as stated in the letter just referred to, services rendered on 172 different days. Of these, I should say that about 40 days were in Washington, most of these being during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883. There are a few days when I was not in court as to which I am not able to say definitely whether I was in Washington or here. When I was allowed to charge for my expenses, in addition to services, which was part of the original agreement with me, my bills for board, &c., enabled me to keep a record of time in Washington. When, in deference to objections of the Auditor, I voluntarily discontinued that charge for expenses, I failed always to keep as complete memoranda as I should have done if I had supposed there was to be this division and subdivision which the Comptroller's change of ruling seems to render necessary.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. BENJ. HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, January 10, 1884.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of January 9 has been received. An investigation should be made, and I hope it will be. If there is anything wrong in the Department of Justice I will have to learn it, and I would like to learn it, because I will be the first to condemn it and strive to correct it.

I have a vivid recollection of all that occurred with reference to the fees, and everything connected with these transactions. You yourself stated to me and to Mr. Cameron, in so many words, and have repeatedly restated it since in your letters to me, and verbally also to Mr. Cameron and to myself, and I have repeatedly alluded to it in my letters to you, that at the time you came here it was distinctly understood between you and those that called you here that you were to get $100 a day at least, and your expenses; and it was upon the faith of what you stated, because it was a contract, that I sustained it. The purpose of my correspondence with Mr. MacVeagh was to learn from him if he thought the sum was inordinate. I accepted it because you had so fixed it yourself, based upon your prior understanding, as reported by you to me.

I thought the sum was a proper one at the time, and under the circumstances, but I have thought, at different times while the case was pending, as it was prolonged beyond the expectation of every one, that perhaps the sum ought to have been abated after the knowledge of the large aggregate amount. But you were so positive as to your right to demand the amount, that this autumn a year you wrote a letter that is now on file in the Department, and which letter you will remember the minute I tell you of it, threatening to leave the case unless your money was paid. What could I do at that time but pay your bill, even though it was criticised by the First Comptroller; pay it because you claimed it as the result of a bargain made before I came into the case; pay it because I thought you had earned it. And if I doubted it, what was I to do? Let you leave the case, and expose myself to the imputation of damaging the whole prosecution, and have the Department charged with doing so with the purpose of aiding the accused? I could not help myself.

I have no objection to say anywhere that I think the fee was a proper one, and never had any objection to it; but I have thought, I say again, that considering the criticism we were all exposed to, I for allowing it, and you for receiving it as a member of the party, that perhaps it would have been well to have abated the amount, and I have said and written to Mr. Merrick and Mr. Ker, and to you, that this employment ought not to be considered an occasion wholly for gain, as it was a great honor. Of course, the subject will have to be examined, and whatever there is in it will have to be shown by the records of the Department, not by any man's say so, one way or the other.

As to the civil suits. As I now remember it, you were requested to take charge of them by Mr. James, and so you told me. In fact, all I learned about what had been done prior to my coming into the office I learned from you, and I had to depend entirely upon what you stated, and I have no doubt you stated what was correct. I relied upon you because I confided in you and respected you. Of the civil suits since then against these parties, the only one you have had charge of thus far has been the suit against Dorsey and that was sent to you to New York in consequence of your correspondence with me requesting that it should be, pointing out how you might be able to secure the money.

I thank you, however, for your kind and polite letter. Again, I say, if there is anything to inquire into I hope it will be inquired into, and if there is anything to expose I hope it will be exposed. One thing I know, that I never have done a thing in this office that I have not done it from a desire to do my public duty in an honorable, upright way, and with an eye single to the interests of the public; with no advantage to myself in any way, political or personal.

I have striven to do my duty, and I believe I have done it, and done it correctly, and I do not hesitate to confront any investigation, and rather request it and desire it. I have known all along that there would be one, and I believe now that there ought to be one, in the face of these accusations and complaints.

Very truly, yours,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Col. GEORGE BLISS,
Special Assistant United States Attorney, &c.,
160 Broadway, New York City.

JANUARY 10, 1884.

SIR: I am now notified that you desire from me a statement of how much I charge for time in New York as contradistinguished from Washington. I have got about tired of the inquisition to which I am being subjected, and quite inclined to fall back upon the strict letter of my agreement with Mr. MacVeagh, as originally made directly with him, and put in writing in a letter to him by yourself before you became Attorney-General.

The facts are that when employed by Mr. MacVeagh I told him that I had never of late years undertaken work which took me away from my office without getting a minimum pay of $100 a day and expenses; that I should expect that at least; that for extra work, as preparation of an argument or anything requiring a strain, I should expect more; but, on the other hand, if absences from my office were for continuous days, if not so prolonged as to break up all other business, some remission might be made. In writing to Mr. MacVeagh you left out all these qualifications as to time and place, and wrote him broadly we should each expect $100 a day and expenses. I rendered my bills without making them "in full," on the general basis of $100 a day and expenses while away from my office, usually charging nothing for work done here. When on one occasion I claimed the right to add, from the strain of preparation for a long argument, you rejected it and I yielded. The next thing was that expenses as such were cut off by a decision of the Auditor, and to save trouble they were dropped.

Now, as to time in New York or in Washington, I cannot undertake to fix a rate per diem for what was done here; for it was done sometimes occupying all day, sometimes occupying an hour or two; sometimes interfering with other business, sometimes not. On at least two occasions I was compelled, in order to give the necessary preparation for matters I was summoned to attend to in Washington, to forego or return retainers amounting in the aggregate to nearly or quite as much in value to me as the bill now before you. In arriving at my charge for matters not in Washington, I judged by my general knowledge of the aggregate of work done by me and the circumstances under which it was done, precisely as I would in the case of any other client. You have already passed my bill in the aggregate at $9,200. Of this, the Solicitor-General has allowed on account $2,500. In the endeavor, at your request, to divide and subdivide an account for services in their nature continuous, I have gone into all the detail that I can.

In reply to the specific question as to what rate I charged per diem for services in New York, I answer that I charged no rate per diem specifically; that there were days in which the work I did was worth $100 or more; there were other days when $20 would cover it; there were other days when the amount was so small that it would not enter into a per diem calculation, but went to swell the general aggregate of work done for which I am entitled to be paid.

I can do and say no more as to this account. By the strict agreement I am entitled to and could enforce as against an individual, if I counted expenses, &c., not less than $13,000—I think $15,000—where I have charged $9,200. If I had the bill to render over again I should probably charge it advantageously to myself in aggregate, and in the attempt to comply with the requirement to do what is, strictly speaking, impossible, assign accurately a portion to 1883 and to 1884, I should certainly, without decreasing the amount for 1884, increase that for 1883, for I could swear conscientiously to not less than 70 days' work prior to June 30, 1883, for which I have not been paid in full, to say nothing of at least $2,000 of expenses, of which I could give itemized vouchers.

You have kept me in these cases against my desire expressed and insisted upon to get out. I warned you in writing that there would come a clamor about amounts, and told you that if I was to remain in the cases I should not abate my charges and that you must be prepared to take your share of the responsibility. I will do everything to aid and relieve you, but there comes a point where I can do no more. After you shall have acted one way or the other in this account, or rather in apportioning the amount between 1883 and 1884, I shall desire to say something as to the future.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 18, 1884.

DEAR SIR: "I am resolved that he must resolve what he will do, or I will retire. I will not incur expenses and turn my back on my home and affairs to be hereafter haggled with and probably maltreated and slighted. That I will not bear with."

So wrote Benjamin Harris Brewster, counselor at law, to me, on November 9, 1881.

He had previously, on October 28, 1881, written to Wayne MacVeagh, Attorney-General, "I repeat here what was expressed last night as to the rate of compensation to be allowed us while we are in charge of these cases, and that was we are to be paid each $100 a day while occupied in the cases, either out of court in the preparation of them or in court in the trial and argument of them, together with our expenses."

To that Mr. MacVeagh agreed, and on December 19 following you wrote me about your own bill, referring to the amount you were entitled to "under our agreement with MacVeagh," and under that we were both paid $5,000, just before you became Attorney-General, on bills approved by Mr. MacVeagh, and as to mine you told me that Mr. MacVeagh expressed surprise that it was not larger.

On September 14, 1882, again on October 7, 1882, and again on October 25, 1882, I wrote you, asking that I be allowed to retire from the cases, assigning as one ground that the agreed compensation was inadequate, and I then told you that the amount of compensation would be criticised; that I "knew my bills would be criticised any way," and that I charged "what I thought my services were worth, what others paid me, and would accept personally any criticism made," and that you "must be prepared for" your "share." This was language I had used to MacVeagh, as I remember, and then called to your attention.

You decided that I must remain. Again this summer I applied to withdraw. You declined to consent.

I have rendered a bill which as a whole you have certified. Had you certified it, as you did that of a year previously, as payable from the present current year's appropriation, I have reason to believe it would all have been paid before this. You chose to change your form of certificate. I thought I had cause to complain of this, but did not. As a result the Comptroller required the account to be split up. I have since been required to make statement after statement. I have done it, and even then my account remains unpassed.

Under these circumstances the quotation with which I began my letter becomes appropriate—I am being "haggled with," if not "maltreated"; "that I will not bear with," and I find no reason why I should bear with it, because there is the outcry of which I warned you and the investigation.

Personally I want to do anything for you, but this "haggling" as to details, after you have approved the total, touches me keenly. It is not the money, but the course pursued. If you don't mean to pass the bill I desire you will say so. I shall never again say a word as to the matter.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, January 19, 1884.

DEAR SIR: Your letter dated Washington, January 18, 1884, was received by me to-day through the mail from New York. When you were last in Washington Mr. Cameron told me that you had such letter in your pocket relating to your account. He told me this when he repeated to me what had passed between you and himself with reference to the Kellogg case. You showed that letter to Mr. Cameron. I sent for you to give you an opportunity to speak or to present the note. You came, and I called your attention to the Kellogg case, conversed with you fully upon the subject, as I had about an hour and a half before went over the whole matter and concluded it, and then waited to have you produce the letter, or to say whatever you might have to say upon the subject of your account. As you did not see fit to allude to it I did not call your attention to it, thinking that you might wish to reconsider what you had written. You took the letter away with you, and sent it to me.

I wish you had spoken to me plainly all you had to say, and I would have listened to it, and endeavored to answer your views. The tone of your letter is an unpleasant one. You seem to be in an unhappy, disturbed state of mind, and approach the subject not in a business-like way, and with some asperity of language. Let us treat of this in a business-like way, and not intrude any temper into it, for I do not.

Neither have I any criticism to make upon your account, either as to its amount or the manner in which it is presented. I will state the matter as I understand it. In the first place, I hold in my hand the last bill which you rendered, wherein you charge $9,200 for services as counsel in the cases known as the star-route cases, in full to date of November 19, 1883. As to that you complain, and say:

"I have rendered a bill which as a whole you have certified. Had you certified it, as you did that of a year previously, as payable from the present current year's appropriation, I have reason to believe it would all have been paid before this. You chose to change your form of certificate. I thought I had cause to complain of this, but did not. As a result the Comptroller required the account to be split up."

This was the act of the Comptroller, and not my act. I had been advised by him in so many words that he would require the bill so to be presented, and had not he so ruled the thought never would have entered my mind, for it must be plain to you that it is a matter of no importance whatever to me out of what fund you are paid, provided you are paid according to law; and if you can persuade the Comptroller to review or retract the decision, I am sure it would give me entire satisfaction.

You then say: "I have since been required to make statement after statement. I have done it, and even then my account remains unpassed." Permit me to turn to your own correspondence with me. In your letter to me dated the 7th of January, 1884, which I hold in my hand, you speak of the time consumed in "New York or in Washington." You do that upon three pages, the 4th, 5th, and 6th.

All I desire is this: If you allege that you did any portion of the work in New York, I merely ask you to say if any part of that work related to the civil suit, the only civil suit which you have in your hands, which I sent to you at your own request; sent to you because I thought from what you have stated it would benefit the Government to have you pursue it in the manner you proposed to do. My only purpose is to separate the charges. If any part of it applied to the civil suit, say so, and then I will be able to discriminate between the star-route cases, as they are called, and the civil proceedings.

That is all I want, Mr. Bliss, and no more, and if in asking for this I have given you any offense, I never intended to do so. If you decline to answer this request, very well; I shall approve your account anyhow. I have not interposed this objection because of any desire to interfere with you, or to create unpleasant or unhappy feelings with you. On the contrary, my whole effort has been from the beginning to maintain pleasant relations with you. At my time of life I do not wish to encourage any such sentiments as hostility or unkindness towards any one, and it would be an impolitic and an unprofessional thing for me in the slightest way to permit such feelings to be excited towards you, related to me, as you have been for so long a time, in a confidential position. Therefore, I must again repeat, I have never intended to say or do anything that would be unpleasant to you, and if I have I was not conscious of it.

In your letter that I have just received, dated January 18, you see fit, starting out, to quote a passage from one of my letters, dated November 9, 1881, and written to you before I became Attorney-General. You likewise quote from a subsequent letter. Why, in this, an official and public matter, you allude to a correspondence that was of a private and confidential character, I do not understand. We are now acting with each other in a wholly different attitude. Then we were both employed by the Government and were acting together. Now I am the representative of the Government, and you are acting under me. I am responsible to the Government now, and to the people for what I do; then I was responsible to nobody. I do not object to your quoting the letter, but I do submit that, under the circumstances, such things are not usual among gentlemen.

I have all these letters, and I hope you will collect them together, and present every one of them to the committee now investigating the affairs of this Department, and present them, so that the public may see exactly where we stood towards each other from the beginning. If you do not I certainly will. I could not have adverted to them if you had not, but as you have invoked them, I will now feel it my duty hereafter to produce them.

In the first place let me say that you cited the letters for an unnecessary purpose, if you intend to cite them to show that I have approved of your charges, or that I intended in the beginning to make similar charges myself. I have written to you recently a letter, dated January 10, 1884. I have it in my hand now. I stated to you in that letter what I now state, to wit, that when I was retained in these cases I consulted with you about the rate of charge, knowing, as you then said to me, "that such things ought to be understood in the beginning, and that you had been employed enough by the Government not to take any business without a specific contract; that otherwise you would be exposed to maltreatment;" and in view of that, and in conformity with the established rule of my life to have no trouble in professional matters with anybody about money, I counseled with you so as to avoid such trouble, and I then considered the charge you said you intended to make, and which you said you had an agreement for with Mr. James and Mr. MacVeagh when you were first retained, was a proper charge; and remembering that I was your senior and the leader in the case, I could certainly charge no less than you did, and it was agreed upon between us that such would be our charge.

I never have from that hour thought the charge was an improper one; I have always written to you and stated I believed the charge was not inordinate. In my letter of January 10, 1884, I say expressly to you I thought the sum was a proper one at that time and under the circumstances, and I say, also, that I think so still.

I said in my letter of January 10, 1884, what I here repeat, that—"I have thought at different times while the case was pending that it was prolonged beyond the expectation of every one; that perhaps the sum ought to have been abated after the knowledge of the large aggregate amount. But you were so positive as to your right to demand the amount, that this autumn a year you wrote a letter, that is now on file in the Department, and which you will remember the minute I tell you of it, threatening to leave the case unless the money was paid. What could I do at that time but pay your bill, even though it was criticised by the First Comptroller; pay it because you claimed it as the result of a bargain made before I came into the case; pay it because I thought you had earned it?"

I also said:

"I have no objection to say anywhere that I think the fee was a proper one, and never had any objection to; but I have thought, I say again, that considering the criticisms we were all exposed to, I for allowing it, and you for receiving it, as a member of the party, that perhaps it would have been well to have abated the amount; and I said and wrote to Mr. Merrick and Mr. Ker, and to you, that this employment ought not to be considered an occasion wholly for gain, as it was a great honor."

Inasmuch as you have turned to my letters before I became Attorney-General, I will, in reply, give you a passage from a letter written by you to me, dated December 30, 1881, in which you say:

"I inclose a bill—you see I have charged for fifty-three days absent from my office. This is besides immense time spent at my office and house. It is not a cent too much, and yet I recognize that if this thing is to continue the aggregate will be more than any one can stand. But I have a plan for future reductions."

That is all I intended to say, and did say, in my letter of the 10th; it is all I thought. I thought exactly what you said on December 30, 1881, "that you had a plan for future reductions;" when the case continued and the aggregate became so much and would probably apply that plan. This, your idea, you expressed in subsequent letters—in the very letters you referred to, of which you speak when you remind me you had proposed to withdraw from the cases. You have never furnished such a plan. Surely if, in the beginning of the case, you could recognize the fact that if the thing was to continue the aggregate would be "more than any one can stand;" if you could make such a suggestion (and subsequently long after renew the suggestion), then, by way of anticipation, was it not proper for me to think that at some time you would propose to act upon some such plan as would avoid the necessity for an aggregate amount so large as that which you state "no one can stand." I will conclude this by saying it is true you did propose to leave the case, but there never was a time when I could afford to allow you to leave the case, or when you could leave on a question of mere pay as a point of professional and personal honor, and no one knew that better than you did, and you continued to act willingly, notwithstanding your proposals to leave. I suspended your proposal when I answered your letter. If, subsequent to this letter of December 30, 1881, and since during the trial of these cases, you considered you were entitled to your $100 per day, I have no complaint to make, because it was based upon an understanding that I myself recognized as a fit one in the beginning, when no one supposed the cases would consume so much time; and because, furthermore, I do believe that you have given your time to these cases to the prejudice of your business—not only to the destruction of that which you had, but to the loss of that which you might have acquired—and I recognize the fitness of your charges upon those two grounds and never have disputed them.

I wish you would not put any unhappy feeling into your letters. I want none with you except the most cordial feeling. I do not want to delay you a day. It does not benefit me in the slightest. I would not harm or hurt your feelings or deprive you of your rights.

If my request seems ungracious to you, and you hesitate to answer the simple question that I propound, to wit, as to whether any of this time was charged as against the civil suit, and you think you have sufficiently answered it, say so, and I must assume, as I will, that your oath to the bill confines it strictly and exclusively to services rendered in the prosecutions of the star-route cases, and as having no connection whatever with the civil suit, and I will allow your bill upon your sworn statement, which must be respected.

* * * * *

Very respectfully, yours,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq.,
Special Assistant United States Attorney, &c.,
160 Broadway, New York City.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
FIRST COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 19, 1884.

SIR: In compliance with your request of this date I herewith return the last account of George Bliss for services rendered in the star-route cases.

Very respectfully,

WILLIAM LAWRENCE,
Comptroller,
By J. TARBELL,
Deputy Comptroller.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General, Department of Justice.

OFFICE OF BLISS & SCHLEY,
160 Broadway, New York, January 22, 1884.

SIR: In reply to your favor of 19th, this day received, I have to say that in fact during the period referred to in the bill of $9,200, now before you for apportionment, I devoted some considerable time to the civil suits against the star-route contractors; but you did not in form transmit the papers in the Dorsey cases till after the time referred to in the bill had expired. I devoted this time because I assumed that under my original retainer by Postmaster-General James and your subsequent approval of it I should have something to do with the civil suits, though you had in effect subsequently withdrawn or suspended my relations to those cases and not renewed it till after the close of the period covered by the bill.

Under these circumstances I did not feel that I had any official right to charge for that time devoted to the civil suits, and though the bill was intended to be in full of all matters to its date it was not increased in amount by reason of the civil suits. Yet I think I gave to these suits time which if I had been properly retained I should have been entitled to charge several hundred dollars for. In short, I regarded that time like a good deal else in these cases as given to the Government.

After the Dorsey case closed I went into a most careful and exhaustive examination of all the remaining cases, going over all the facts and evidence. This extended over many weeks, and was, of course, chiefly of the criminal cases, but also embraced, as I have said, the civil claims to some extent.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS,
Special Assistant Attorney.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

NEW YORK, January 22, 1884.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 19th came to hand only this morning. I have replied in another letter to the specific questions you put to me with reference to the items of my account. I place in this distinct form some reply to other matters in your letter.

1. It is not important, but in fact my letter of the 18th addressed to you personally was posted by me in Washington on Friday last, not in New York, as you say. I wrote it and retained till just before I left. First, because I did not wish to act under irritation; and, second, because I wished to wait till the last moment to see if you took any action on my bill. As it was before you, and as I had no intimation that anything else was wanted from me, I did not choose to speak with you of it. If you had wanted the further statement you now ask I should have been so informed. Mr. Cameron said you were going to write for something of this kind, but you never have done so till this letter was received. What Mr. Cameron said you would ask for was something quite different from what you now ask. The one I can and do give; the other I could not give.

2. As to the form of certificate to the account: Before you certified it I saw you formally, told you I believed you were misinformed as to any decision of the Comptroller's having been then made, and asked you to certify the bill precisely as you did that of the previous year under similar circumstances, that I might be in a condition to raise a case before him "in all forms" with the one formerly decided. If I mistake not in my letter transmitting the account I made the same request. In my personal interview you acceded to it. The bill went without such a certificate, and the Comptroller having a different case was unable to make a different decision without absolute inconsistency. Then came the necessity of splitting up.

3. I have previously given you as well as I could the proportions of time in Washington and New York. As to how much time was spent in the civil suits, I have now the request for the first time, as already stated. If that was all that delayed my bill the request could have been easily made long since and easily complied with.

4. You object to my reference to your letter written before you became Attorney-General and accuse me of doing what is "not usual among gentlemen." A hard charge and unjust, particularly when read in connection with the clause which follows it. I can see no justification of the charge unless I am to understand that you take the extreme ground that no one, friend or not, has a right to write you a personal letter, as mine was expressly marked, about a matter before you officially, and if he does he pursues a course "not usual among gentlemen." I have not supposed that was your position, nor have I supposed everything received from you since you became Attorney-General was to be treated as official. Surely there was nothing "not usual among gentlemen" in using your own words, written to me when you were in the same relative position that I am now, to show you that in the feelings I expressed I was not singular, but had a good prototype.

5. As to the amounts of your bill and mine, I have not intimated that yours was too large, though I have perhaps said it was as large relatively as any that had been rendered in the case. Your quotation from mine of December 30, 1881, is correct. I felt then what I wrote, and felt the same when I repeatedly asked to be allowed to retire from the case, and when I expressly notified you that if I remained I could not afford to work for less, and would not. As for a plan for reduction, I did suggest it. It was, in brief, that Mr. Ker be retired except for drawing indictments and defending them when attacked; that I remain, if you thought I must remain, somewhat formally, and as consulting counsel, so as not to require such long and constant absences from home, and that, if necessary, some Washington attorney be employed to do "grub work" for Mr. Merrick.

6. Your intimation that I was not sincere in my desire to retire is unfair and not justified by the facts. The correspondence and the facts will show that until my wife's health ceased to be critical I insisted upon retiring as a right. When her health improved I had no right to retire without your consent. I thought and still think that after the first trial I could have retired without serious injury to the cases, though there would have been some temporary inconvenience to those engaged in them.

You appeal to me not to put any "unhappy feeling" into my letters, not to "intrude temper," &c. You surely do not want me to conceal my feelings, and whatever might have been your opinion as to my right to be irritated before you cannot be surprised that when you accuse me of doing what is "not usual among gentlemen," and when you insinuate that in my desire to retire I was "playing a bluff game," under such circumstances you cannot be surprised that I have and that I express some feeling. Indeed, if you reflected on the charge made of ungentlemanly conduct you must have anticipated if not intended to arouse some feeling.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 1, 1884.

SIR: In obedience to your instructions that I call upon Mr. Woodward, post-office inspector, and ascertain from him the amount of time necessary to make "a most careful and exhaustive examination of all the remaining cases, going over all the facts and evidence," that is the star-route cases remaining "after the Dorsey cases closed," I have the honor to report that I called upon Mr. Woodward in his office, room 24, Post-Office Department (where I am, with his aid, preparing this memorandum), and handed him the letter of Col. George Bliss, dated January 22, 1884, in which he says that his examination into pending cases above referred to "extended over many weeks" during the present fiscal year, and for which services he charges the sum of $4,500.

The facts are these: The indictments against A. E. Boone were quashed, involving almost necessarily the permanent suspension of proceedings against his codefendants, charged with the preparation of worthless and fraudulent bonds, through which the Government had really lost nothing up to the time of their indictment.

The papers containing "all the facts and evidence" against Brott and Lilley are now in Mr. Woodward's safe, in this room, where they have been since the 1st day of July, 1884. Admitting that Mr. Bliss has seen these papers during the present fiscal year, which is improbable, in view of the position in which they were left and found, I say, granting that Mr. Bliss, who was familiar with the cases, made "a most careful and exhaustive examination" of this case, it could not have occupied him longer than fifteen minutes or a half hour. For Mr. Woodward is of the opinion, in which I concur, that a lawyer unfamiliar with "all the facts and evidence" could thoroughly master the case in an hour.

Meserole and Brady were indicted on the route from Monument to River Bend, Colo. The facts in the case were few and simple. The case is comparatively a weak one, and there could have been no conceivable reason for reviewing it at this time; but if such review were necessary I am informed by the gentleman who collated "all the facts and evidence" that any person familiar with the case, as Mr. Bliss must be and is, could refresh his memory on all the essential points in twenty minutes or half an hour.

These are all the cases Mr. Woodward can recall, except that against Kellogg, and another against Brady, growing out of the Price routes—the same transaction. Mr. Woodward has had personal custody of the documentary and other written evidence in these last-mentioned cases, and Mr. Bliss has not reviewed this evidence, so far as he knows, during the present fiscal year, nor in fact at any time since the conference at your house between counsel, or about that time—the time when Price was accepted as a witness, over a year ago. In fact there is nothing to review; the case is a very simple one.

In view of the above statement of facts it is very difficult to see clearly what this claim means or where the alleged services could have been expended.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

BREWSTER CAMERON,
General Agent, Department of Justice.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, December 29, 1883.

SIR: Your account for $9,200 for compensation as counsel for the United States from April 6 to November 19, 1883, is before me. That account has been approved by the Attorney-General. But inasmuch as it covers parts of two fiscal years, the First Comptroller, upon its going to him, has required that it be apportioned accordingly. Being notified of this requirement, you have thereupon accordingly placed $4,500 of the charge in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and the remainder $4,700 in the present fiscal year. I transmitted that apportionment to the Comptroller and he has returned it requiring my approval thereof.

I do not readily find in this Department the terms of your compensation on behalf of the United States. Outside of express terms the arrangement depends, according to the custom of this office, very much upon the personal discretion of the Attorney-General. I will do nothing to embarrass the exercise of that discretion by casual action during his brief absence—the more that he has acted thereon frequently during the past two years in making payments to you.

It was suggested to Mr. Falls, who has represented you here, that perhaps you might make a further statement of details as would give me information, but he tells me to-day that this cannot be done.

Upon the whole, then, I will allow to-day without prejudice $2,500 of your account, which I believe practically leaves the whole matter to the Attorney-General at his return, upon the same footing as if he were now here; and I hope will be of no concern otherwise, as it involves a delay to you of probably only a week.

Very respectfully,

S. F. PHILLIPS,
Acting Attorney-General.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq.

FEBRUARY 8, 1884.

SIR: In your letter of January 10, with reference to my account for services pending before you, you ask for some information, and add, "If you decline to answer this request, very well; I shall approve your account anyhow." Further along you say that if I do not answer your question you will assume the account relates to the star route-cases, "and I will allow your bill upon your sworn statement, which must be respected."

I replied to your letter and question on ———, giving such information as I could. Since then I have heard nothing of my account, except that I learn from my attorney that no action has been taken.

It is going on three months since that account was forwarded. Its amount was formally approved by you many weeks since. Owing to the action of the Comptroller it has been returned to you for apportionment, and has been in your hands about ——— for that purpose. I have been called upon for information at intervals and have always replied promptly. You assure me in your letter that there is no desire for delay. In view of these facts I submit that I am entitled to ask for action upon my account, so that such portion of it as is chargeable to a fund for which there is an existing appropriation may be paid.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS,
Special Assistant Attorney.

Hon. B. H. BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, February 11, 1884.

SIR: I have your letter dated 8th instant, in which you inquire as to the delay in the apportionment of your account for $9,200. You refer to my letter of the 19th ultimo, asking you for further information about the matter, in which I said:

"If you decline to answer this request, very well; I shall approve your account anyhow."

You also quote me correctly in saying that I wrote you in the same letter as follows:

"I must assume, as I will, that your oath to the bill confines itself strictly and exclusively to the services rendered in the prosecution of the star-route cases as having no connection whatever with the civil suit, and I will allow your bill upon your sworn statement, which must be respected."

In your reply to my letter of the 19th ultimo, dated 22d of January, you say:

"After the Dorsey case closed, I went into a most careful and exhaustive examination of all the remaining cases, going over all the facts and evidence. This extended over many weeks."

Your charge, therefore, appears to be for specific services which I did not know you had performed, and which I had determined not to authorize till I had considered the advisability of at present pursuing any of the pending cases.

I have caused a careful inquiry to be made as to the time necessary to make a careful and exhaustive examination of all the facts and evidence in these cases, and am informed that the cases are unimportant ones; that the facts are few and plain, and that the evidence is not conclusive, as to most of the cases at least.

Your letter of the 22d of January changes the case to such an extent that my letter of the 19th ultimo is no longer applicable; and I do not feel warranted in approving this bill until I have had time to examine personally and with care into the pending cases, for the inspection of which you charge in the bill now before me.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq.,
Special Assistant Attorney, New York City, N. Y.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, February 13, 1884.

SIR: Your letter of the 8th instant, with reference to the Kellogg case, has been received. This case must be tried if it can be. It is the duty of the Government to try it, both on account of the public interest and also because Mr. Kellogg ought not to be delayed unless there is an absolute necessity for delay.

It is a discredit to the Government that a man so conspicuous and well known as this Mr. Walsh cannot be served with a subpoena. It seems that wherever the Government's interests are concerned, and a person is disposed to retire, he cannot be had. This was notoriously so in Spencer's case, and has been conspicuously so in this case of Mr. Walsh. It is my wish that every effort should be made to procure him. If the man cannot be procured, when the day comes for the hearing of the case, within a reasonable time before it, the fact will be known to you and to the Department, and Mr. Kellogg can then be advised through his counsel that I will not call the case.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq.,
Special Assistant Attorney, &c., 160 Broadway, New York City.

BLISS & SCHLEY, NEW YORK,
February 14, 1884.

SIR: I have your favor of February 11 with reference to my account rendered, in which you say, basing your change of ground on my statement that after the close of the trial of the Dorsey case I went into an examination of the other cases, that this was service you did not authorize and in substance express the opinion that "the facts are few and plain," "the evidence not conclusive," the examination could have taken little time, and therefore you decline to approve my bill.

I assume this means that you withdraw the approval theretofore given of the entire bill, and decline to apportion any of it to the current appropriation, and that my oath, which on the 19th ultimo you thought conclusive, is no longer good for anything.

Now, in the first place, I claim that I had authority as special assistant attorney, and under the discretion you gave me from time to time as well as under the terms of my original employment, to do what I did. I claim that I earned under the terms the sum charged in the bill. As to the distribution of the amount between the different appropriations, I have not spoken with the same confidence because it is in the nature of the case almost impossible to decide it with entire accuracy, for reasons I have pointed. I have seen for considerable time to what the matter was tending, with its repeated calls for this and for that information, to wit, a delay until the current appropriation should be exhausted. This is the inevitable result, whether intended or not. Against that I protest. I am entitled to be paid for services rendered. I believe I am entitled to be paid now some sum from the current appropriation. For the first time now you raise a question as to the accuracy of my entire bill or of the balance not payable from the present appropriation, but belonging rightfully to what is to be paid under a deficiency bill, if there is one.

Now, I propose to go carefully over all my correspondence and books, not only the correspondence with reference to the Government cases, but as to all other matters, and see how far I can account for what I did every day covered by the period embraced in the account, and thus, if possible, by exclusion (showing that on a given day I did nothing for the Government because engaged in other matters) and by inclusion (showing that on a given day I gave my whole time or a portion of my time to the Government), arrive at a more definite conclusion. This will take much time and must be done in the intervals of business unless I arrange to give up a day or two to it. I will then arrive at a result which I shall be in a great measure prepared to prove. I shall do this for my own satisfaction, not yours—because things have arrived at the condition where in your estimation my statements, even under oath, are not to be relied upon. I do not therefore expect that you will delay that investigation you are so earnestly desirous of making nor that you will withhold the decision you arrive at.

By the same mail by which yours of the 11th is received comes yours of the 13th with reference to Walsh, with a hardly concealed reflection for the failure to find him. I have done my best so to do and failed. Under the circumstances permit me to suggest that it is your duty to set some one else at work on that business, who, if he has not more of success will have more of your confidence. This is proper for the double reason, that I have failed, and that as I have already informed you the clue, if any is to be found, must in my opinion be taken up at Washington. Independently of this, it will occur to you that it is not the duty of counsel to enter into a detective search for witness. I have been willing to do this and am still so willing, but do not feel called upon to go outside of my legitimate duties in a matter where I am so plainly told that my failure is my fault. In this as in all other matters in these cases, I have done my full duty, and so long as I remain in the cases I shall continue to do so. At some time, you will become convinced of the injustice you do me.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS,
Special Assistant Attorney.

HON. BENJAMIN H. BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

I may add that, as far as I know or can foresee, Walsh will not be available as a witness at the March term unless something is done in and from Washington. I have one possible clue still remaining, which I thought a week ago would lead to something, but the lapse of time has caused me almost entirely to lose confidence in it. Unless, therefore, you receive contrary information from me you can consider it settled that in my opinion Walsh's attendance cannot be procured. You may have better success than I in finding him.

NEW YORK, February 18, 1884.

SIR: I have spent the greater part of two days in going over all my letter-books letters received, bills, registers, &c., and am now prepared to make a statement as to the services rendered the Government during the period from April 7 to November 19, 1883, inclusive, more accurate than I have previously been able to make, so far as it relates to the precise days on which services were rendered. It is still not entirely precise as to the days after July 1, but it is accurate as showing that certain services were rendered after July 1, and that others were rendered before that date. As to the days before that date, it is absolutely accurate in day and date.

Between April 7 and July 1 I was in court in Washington, or was in Washington remaining there during the adjournment of court, and remaining solely on business of the Government, fifty-seven days. I was five days in going to or from Washington, when by going home I saved charging a day to the Government, and did not charge it. I mean I did not charge the day so saved, though I charged for the days devoted to travel. I was two days in Washington after the verdict was rendered in the case of the United States v. Brady et al., arranging as to closing up matters, the deposition of Rerdell, &c., and devoting the time entirely to the Government. This makes sixty-four days away from home prior to July 1. In addition to that I was three days in New York exclusively devoted to the Government, at my home preparing my closing address, and "putting in" sixteen or eighteen hours a day of hard work. Besides that, between June 20 and 28 I devoted, in New York, the equivalent of a full day's work to preparation in the Kellogg case, set down for June 30. There were three or four letters to you—correspondence with Ker and Merrick. This was before I returned to Washington on your express order in writing. I should therefore be entitled to charge, at the agreed rate for compensation, $6,400 for services in Washington, and not less than $350 for services in New York. This is in addition to expenses during that period, for my agreement was $100 a day and expenses. This is in accordance with your own letter as special counsel, to Attorney-General MacVeagh, of 1881. That letter made no distinction between services at home or in Washington. My own understanding was that ordinary services were to be charged less in New York than in Washington, because in such cases there was a possibility of attending to other business.

While on this subject of expenses let me remind you that in my account of March 16, 1883, you certified that I was entitled to $782.21 of expenses for which I presented you full vouchers; that they were disallowed by the accounting officers, not on the ground that I was not entitled to them, but that you had no right to allow expenses, quo expenses, but could allow an aggregate or per diem compensation embracing such sums as you were satisfied by vouchers were proper expenses, you retaining the vouchers. Since that decision I have never put in an item for expenses. I have never received that suspended sum of $782.21, and I have never been allowed anything for expenses in items for compensation, save as it might be considered as included in the account of $9,200 now before you, which is an account in full to November 19. Beyond the $782.21, my actual disbursements caused by my being in the Government employ were, up to November 19, over $600, as I am prepared to satisfy you by vouchers.

You will perceive therefore that if I was claiming the letter of my contract I should be entitled prior to July 1, 1883, to not less than $8,132 as balance, assuming that I had been paid for expenses in full up to January 6, 1883, as I have, and for services in full up to the date of my last previous bill that was paid April 5, which by the way was not "in full."

You will therefore see that the idea you have obviously entertained that I was overcharging was incorrect.

As to the period after July 1, and before November 19, I cannot be so precise.

I was in Washington at your request in the Kellogg matter on November 16, and for two days prior thereto. I was in Washington previously for two days on Government business about October 20. Your letter of October 31 refers to the fact. I cannot say that I rendered any other services away from home during the period July 1 to November 18, except on these occasions. They would entitle me to $500 independently of expenses, $28. Out of Washington there were constantly matters coming up. Your own letters of June 30, July 2, July 25, August 22, September 20, October 31, among others, show this, and indicate that the Spencer matter, the civil suits, and the attempt to find Walsh were all occupying some portion of my time, as was the fact. During the same period I had some trouble in attempting to adjust matters left over, such as various small bills, in supervising the proper arrangement for binding of the reports of the trial and matters more numerous and annoying than you can now appreciate.

Early in November Mr. Merrick, by your direction visited New York in the attempt to get an interview with Walsh, and at that time set me in motion preparing for the Kellogg case. I not only set to work and supervised the detective work, most of which, however, came after November 19, but I attended to the summoning of witnesses, and made a thorough and careful preparation for the trial, including brief on the question of the statute of limitations, and other questions which seemed likely to come up in that case, either newly or in a different form from any in which we had had to do with them previously. As a separate matter $1,000 would have been cheap for this. Considering that it was not only my right but my duty to see what should be done, if anything, with the other pending cases, I took them up in detail. It never occurred to me that I was not still responsible as to those. In the same connection I examined to some extent the question of the civil suits, but finding that there were varying and inconsistent instructions as to these I wrote to you as to them and got your reply of July 25—I think it was—which put my mind at rest as to these.

As to the other suits, I went carefully over them to see if there were any which we could try and ought to try. This involved an examination of the original bond suits brought on the report of (now) Marshal Tidball. This required an examination at the Post-Office Department of the question whether since the indictments were found there had been actual money loss to the Government under the bonds of these parties, as Boone had become a failing contractor, and consideration how far those cases were embarrassed by the entry of a nolle prosequi in Boone's cases, some of the parties having been his bondsmen. It involved an examination of a quantity of evidence taken in the police court in these cases. I also examined in the same view the later bond cases in which the witnesses came from Mobile and its vicinity. One or more of these I thought, should be tried, and still think so. I consulted Mr. Merrick, who promised to examine. Later, for reasons not connected with the merits, he thought it not wise to try them, and you have more recently directed that they be not tried.

Besides these I examined all the other star-route indictments. Besides cases against Brady, there were indicted various others, one on the Mound City route whose name now escapes me, twice indicted. There were also ex-Deputy Auditor Lilly and others. In all, my recollection is that I went over forty-eight indictments and all the papers relating to those cases. You suggest that some one has told you the cases are weak. They may be, but I don't believe your informant or any one has any real knowledge on the subject. Outside of Mr. Merrick, I don't think any one knows about them, and he will not pretend to a tittle of my knowledge as to them. But if they were weak, I deemed it my business in the position I was placed to find out, and I did. I had known all about the cases originally, but much had intervened; I had learned and experienced much as well as forgotten something.

I know better the difficulties in the way of success than when the indictments were found. I had learned to know of possible flaws which had not originally occurred to me, and I determined to revise my judgment and be in a position to act understandingly. It is a little frigid now to be told my work was unauthorized. It is worse than that to be told in effect that it took no time and labor, and is not to be paid for. I spent days and days of what should have been my vacation in hard, engrossing work in those matters, even taking the papers along when accompanying my sick wife, till she remonstrated. I say, unhesitatingly, that I earned and deserve $2,000 in this work at a moderate calculation, and to any officer who means to do his duty by the Government and the accused what I did would be worth that now.

I cannot give day and date for these services. Sometimes it was a whole day, usually a rainy one or something of that kind, sometimes half a day. From July 14 to September 6 I think there was no week day when I did not do something in these cases.

Besides this I made again an examination of the cases against Salisbury and others, in which I had sought to get indictments, and failed, in order to see whether in the light of the experience I had gained I was justified in incurring the expense necessary to attempt to again secure indictments. I also went over anew with the same general intent all the cases which had previously been regarded as suspicious, to see if I could now find any ground for criminal proceedings.

I say unhesitatingly that if the Department of Justice is to be protected from just criticism in these matters, it will be in consequence of this work which I did last summer, and which is now repudiated and declared to be unauthorized.

This work, too, took many, many hours, and deserves payment and recognition. I would not, as a new matter, do it for $2,000.

I can say no more. My bill is before you. If you really preside over a department of justice, you will carry out the agreement of your predecessor, sanctioned by yourself and repeatedly declared by you to be reasonable and proper.

If anything contained in this letter should be inconsistent with anything I have formerly written as to the distribution of the services, which it does not occur to me is the case, I have only to say that what I have now said is based upon a careful examination, while my former letters were chiefly based on memory, and that I desire the present statement therefore to be deemed correct.

Had I made the examination before rendering my bill, I should have charged a larger sum, but the increase would have been chiefly as to the services before July 1. I think in the division I subsequently sought to make, taking the bill as it was, I was not far out of the way.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS,
Special Assistant Attorney.

Hon. BENJAMIN H. BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

FEBRUARY 19, 1884.

SIR: I inclose an account for services from November 19 to date. While entitled to charges for expenses, I have not done so, as I desired to escape complication between the Department of Justice and the Auditor's office.

I have the honor to ask that this account may be acted upon promptly and before the current appropriation shall be exhausted.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. BENJAMIN H. BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, February 20, 1884.

SIR: The Attorney-General directs me to say to you that he has received your letter of the 18th instant, and that he will give it all due attention.

Very respectfully,

CECIL CLAY,
Chief Clerk.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq.,

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington February 28, 1884.

SIR: I have received a resolution from the Senate, inquiring when, and by whom, compensation for special attorneys in the star-route cases, in the District of Columbia, was fixed, and to furnish copies of any agreements or memoranda relating thereto, and the facts relating to the reasonableness of such compensation, and my reasons for paying the same; also, whether such attorneys, or any of them, are now in the employ of the Department of Justice, and at what compensation.

I have to request that you will furnish me with copies of any papers or data which you may possess that will enable me to make a prompt and full answer to this resolution.

I have written a similar letter to Mr. Bliss and to Mr. Merrick.

Your early attention will oblige,

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

W. W. KER, Esq.,
Special Counsel, Philadelphia, Pa.

PHILADELPHIA, March 3, 1884.

SIR: In answer to your letter dated February 28, 1884, relating to a resolution of the Senate inquiring when and by whom compensation for special attorneys in the star-route cases of the District of Columbia was fixed, and to furnish copies of any agreements or memoranda relating thereto, and the facts relating to the reasonableness of the compensation, and your reasons for paying the same, I have the honor to state:

On the 21st day of January, 1882, I received from you a commission, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, January 21, 1882.

SIR: You are hereby appointed special assistant United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to aid in the prosecution of certain persons charged with being concerned in frauds on the United States in connection with what is known as the "star-route" investigation, at a compensation to be determined by the Attorney-General when the suits are ended.

You will take the oath prescribed for district attorneys, and transmit the same to this Department.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

WILLIAM W. KER, Esq.,
Washington, D. C.

I immediately took the oath of office, and the commission and oath of office are filed in your Department. There never was any other agreement for compensation than that mentioned in the commission, which is "at a compensation to be determined by the Attorney-General when the suits are ended."

I remained in the service of the Government for nearly two years; that is, I left Washington in the middle of December, 1818. During the trials I presented bills for professional services which were on account. Some of those bills were allowed by you, and some were reduced, as will appear by the records in your Department.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM W. KER.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General, United States.

NEW YORK, March 12, 1884.

SIR: I do not think there can be any question in your mind that in common fairness I am entitled to action by you on my two bills now before you. Since April 5, 1883—now nearly a year—I have received for all my services only $2,500. This covers about two and a half months of services in the Dorsey case, my attendance in the Spencer and Kellogg cases, and my other services.

I am well aware that for a portion of these services there is under the Comptroller's ruling no appropriation. But for services from July 1, 1883, to November 17, 1884, covered by my bill of $9,200 there is—or was, and I presume is—an appropriation, and I have had only $2,500 for such services. I cannot imagine that any calculation can make out that that sum is in full for services between these dates. My letter of February 18 contains all I can say as to these services.

My other bill was forwarded February 19. I have received nothing for the services therein charged for, and there is little room for disagreement as to what I am entitled to.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS,
Special Assistant Attorney.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, March 14, 1884.

SIR: In your letter of the 18th ultimo you use the following language: "Besides these I examined all the other star-route indictments. Besides cases against Brady, there were indicted various others, one on the Mound City route, whose name now escapes me, twice indicted. There were also ex-Deputy Auditor Lilly and others. In all, my recollection is that I went over forty-eight indictments and all the papers relating to those cases."

Again you say:

"I spent days and nights of what should have been my vacation in hard, engrossing work in those matters, even taking the papers along when accompanying my sick wife, till she remonstrated. I say unhesitatingly that I earned and deserve $2,000 in this work at a moderate calculation, and to any officer who means to do his duty by the Government and the accused what I did would be worth that now.

"I cannot give day and date for these services. Sometimes it was a whole day, usually a rainy one, or something of that kind, sometimes half a day. From July 14 to September 6 I think there was no week day I did not do something in these cases.

"Besides this I made again an examination of the cases against Salisbury and others. * * * I also went over a new with the same general intent all the cases which had previously been regarded as suspicious to see if I could not find any ground for criminal proceedings."

The above extracts from your letter of the 18th ultimo are made for the purpose of directing your attention to the character of the answer desired to the inquiry of what cases by name you personally examined and what papers you then had or still have in your possession bearing upon each case, the character of those papers, whether copies of indictments or copies of testimony connected therewith, and the volume thereof; that is, the number of pages connected with each case.

You will permit me to ask that I be furnished with an accurate statement of the particulars above mentioned, as I deem such an answer necessary to a full understanding of the services performed by you, that a just estimate of their value may be reached, because of the following paragraph of your letter:

"If anything contained in this letter should be inconsistent with anything I have formerly written as to the distribution of the services—which it does not occur to me is the case—I have only to say that what I have now said is based upon a careful examination, while my former letters were chiefly based on memory, and that I desire the present statement, therefore, to be deemed correct.”

And because of the expression used in the second quotation herein made, that you “earned and deserved $2,000 in this work.” You have already received by the apportionment of Mr. Phillips, Acting Attorney-General, the sum of $2,500 from the appropriation for the current year.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq.,
Special Assistant United States Attorney, New York City, N. Y.

NEW YORK, March 17, 1884.

SIR: In spite of the insult implied in your inquiry in your letter of 14th just received, as to what papers I had in my possession bearing upon the cases I examined after July 1, 1883, and before November 17, 1883, I beg to say that I had in my possession memoranda as to the subject of each indictment which had been procured after I took hold of the star-route prosecutions; such memoranda showed the persons indicted, the offense alleged, the time and place. I had, moreover, various memoranda as to the evidence in which they were found and by which they could be sustained. Some of these memoranda were found in published reports, some in the reports of inspectors who had been over the routes, some in the files of the Post-Office Department. Anticipating this examination, I, from time to time, before I left Washington, made memoranda from the original papers on file. On two occasions when I visited Washington, I, by examinations, filled up gaps in these memoranda or satisfied myself as to points on which I was doubtful. I had no original papers with me away from Washington, I think, and my memoranda were brief pencil notes taken as to points which did not appear in printed reports or which were not covered by my memory. Of printed reports I consulted the star-route investigations before Congress by the committee of which Mr. Blackburn was chairman, another report of an investigation in Congress which covered some of the points, Gibson's report, Tidball and Shallcross's report and the Postmaster-General's reports. The list of cases I had was one published in the Washington Star about the time the trial closed, verified and corrected by myself at the clerk's office. I cannot at this moment put my hand upon it, but I recall the indictments against Boone—of which there were several—against S. G. Cabell, James N. Donahoe, Charles H. Dickson, E. J. Sweet, W. M. Jackson, Kate M. Armstrong, A. O. Buck, W. S. Bonniger, John R. Minnix, J. B. Henderson, F. B. Lilly, George F. Brott. There were also three or four indictments found at a later period against two of Boone's bondsmen from Mobile or its vicinity, which cases I advised you should in my opinion be prosecuted. There were also two or three against a man who was the contractor in the Monument Bend route, George H. Newell. In these, as in four other indictments, Brady was included. There were also other indictments against Brady. I cannot be more specific, but can say that they included every indictment found in the star-route cases, and if a careful statement is necessary, you can obtain it from the clerk's office. The examination was made at Alexandria Bay, where I was spending the summer, and as its result was to convince me that no cases except the Mobile ones should be proceeded with, I did not regard my memoranda as longer of value, though I presume that when I left Alexandria Bay late in September I sent the papers with all other “traps” to my house. I knew that as to the Mobile cases and one or two others, as to which I desire to do something further, I kept them separate from the other papers.

As to the volumes of papers I consulted, “the number of pages connected with each case,” it is impossible for me to answer you. Gibson's report, for instance, is 180 to 200 pages. I went all over it several times, as I took up one case after another, and yet there is in it comparatively little bearing on any particular case, but I was winnowing it out. Tidball's report is perhaps 75 to 80 pages, and I went over that several times in the same way. The Congressional investigations were, I should say, at least 600 to 800 pages. I went through them again and again, my examinations as repeated enabling me in each successive case to turn the more readily to the precise passage I remembered as applicable to it. So far as there were inspectors' reports in the routes, I had abstracts and pencil copies of them. The papers in the files of the particular routes involved I had abstracts of or memoranda about, some made in view of this intended retrospect, some that I had collected in the first history of the cases, for you will remember I was not marshaling any new papers or evidence; I was only in cooler moments and in the light of experience gained, going over the ground to see what indictments, if any, should be brought to trial.

Thus far I have spoken of the cases in which indictments had been found. As to the rest of your questions, I went over the papers in the routes from Vinita to Las Vegas, from San Antonio to Corpus Christi, from Fargo to Pembina, from Helena to Mineola, Silver Bow to New Chicago, Rock Creek to Eitchetah, Prescott to Santa Fé, Wells to Hamilton, Soledad to Newhall, Fort Worth to Yuma, Monroe to Shreveport, Caldwell to Fort Sill, Camp Supply to Fort Elliott, Sidney to Deadwood, Phoenix to Prescott. There were others, but I cannot now recall them. My endeavor was to go over again those in which we had sought to obtain indictments and failed, and those in which, from the large increase of pay or other cause, there had come to be a suspicion that there had been wrong-doing. I gave a preference to routes which had been reported of by inspectors. In these cases, including those reported upon and others, the printed reports already referred to, other than Tidball's, contained information and were consulted, but my abstracts and memoranda were the chief objects of study. My idea was to see whether there were any routes in which I thought a fresh endeavor should be made to procure indictments, and therefore I bestowed the most pains on routes belonging to the Saulsburys, Parkers, Kerns, Cosgrove, or their respective dummies or representatives, for I felt it would be a subject of inquiry why we had proceeded against the Dorseys and their associates and not the others, and while I felt we had done what we could against the others consistent with the necessary attention to the Dorsey cases, I wished to be sure that now that there was more leisure and more experience I could be able to give an intelligent reason for action or non-action, and to be ready to defend myself, my associates, and the Department of Justice against criticism, which it was obvious was coming. I think the labor I bestowed will stand me in good stead before Mr. Springer's committee, though not apparently recognized as of any value by you. It will show I did more than you think it was my duty to do.

You refer to my statement that I earned and deserve $2,000 in this work and connect with it the fact that I have been paid $2,500 from the current appropriation. This is true, but that amount so paid applies in all my services from July 1 to November 19. The same letter shows my estimates of $500 for attendance in Washington (which is substantially correct) and $1,000 for preparation, &c., in the Kellogg case. In the same letter I showed you I spent during the period covered by the bill of $9,200, but before July 1, sixty-four days away from my office or under such circumstances that I was entitled to charge $6,400 for it, and $350 for services in New York, in addition to not less than $382.21 for expenses, making a total strictly chargeable before July 1, of $8,132. Add to this my statement of $2,000 for the examinations referred to in the earlier part of this letter, $500 for the visits to Washington, and $1,000 for the other matter, besides the matter to which I affixed no specific sum, I should have a total of $11,162, though I have charged only $9,200. The question before you is on the distribution of this $9,200 between the two appropriations.

It is a month since my former letter was written. I presume, to judge from experience, a month hence I shall get some further inquiry, and so further ones till the manifest object of the Department is attained.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS,
Assistant Attorney.

HON. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

P. S.—In reading this over I see that I ought to say that the files of the Post-Office Department in the cases specified not in indictment were examined by me to fill up gaps, explain memoranda, or supply defects of memory on at least one visit to Washington for which I made no charge. They were also so examined once when there on expense, and I think on another visit for which I made no charge, all before November 19.

MARCH 18, 1884.

SIR: It occurs to me to add to my letter of yesterday that, in the case of some of the indictments I examined, questions of this sort came up: What was the effect of the nolle as to Boone upon those who were his bondsmen or co-conspirators? This I had to examine in a legal point of view and to consider in the view of probable success, some of the indictments being conspiracy, some perjury, and some subornation of perjury. In connection with these was the case of Kate M. Armstrong, as to whom there had been a misnomer and a nolle in consequence.

So as to F. B. Lilly, the witness against him, Brott, had been indicted. Mr. Woodward thought such an indictment was a breach of faith toward Brott, and that it had closed his mouth. In fact he had been indicted because the appearances were that he was not keeping faith on his part. These appearances were probably erroneous, but were availed of by Gibson and Cook to induce indictment of him. This left the evidence against Lilly weak without Brott, and put Brott in a position, where, even if disposed to testify, his evidence would not have the weight it would otherwise have. It was, as I remember, also mixed up with the fact that there was a disagreement between Mr. Woodward and Mr. Brott as to what the latter had told the former on a side issue. On these cases I needed and had very few papers or memoranda. The matters were in my memory and needed only to be recanvassed, so to speak, though I had some memoranda of dates, &c.

I state these facts merely to show you the course of my investigation, or rather consideration, in some of the cases.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS,
Special Assistant.

Hon. BENJ. HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, March 19, 1884.

SIR: Your letters of the 17th and 18th instant have been received, in reply to inquiries contained in Department letter of the 14th instant.

They will be examined with a view of ascertaining how far they furnish answers to the inquiries, and whether or not further particulars will be found necessary. The object sought to be reached is a proper judgment of the character of services performed, their value to the Government in the cases mentioned, and whether or not there was a need for the same.

If the result reached supports your views and claims, you will be notified at once. If further explanation is deemed necessary, your attention will be directed to the same, as all necessary information may properly be asked of an employé by the head of a Department without incurring the imputation of sinister motives.

Very respectfully,

BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq.,
Special Counsel, New York City.

MARCH 24, 1884.

SIR: Permit me to remind you that my account for services since November 19 has been in your hands for some weeks; that it has evoked and hardly can evoke any call for further information, and that therefore I am in justice entitled to action at your hands.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS,
Special Assistant Attorney.

Hon. BENJ. HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, March 28, 1884.

SIR: We are directed by the Attorney-General to acknowledge for him the receipt of your letters of the 18th and 19th instant, relating to your bills for services in the star-route cases during the latter part of the last fiscal year, and the present fiscal year, and to explain why these bills have not been definitely acted upon until now. When the Attorney-General received your final explanation as to the nature and extent of your services, he directed us to make an examination into the character and extent of the services rendered by you since the 1st of July last, in order that he might act understandingly upon the bill presented by you for those services. We have been a good deal delayed in this investigation by the absence of one of us, Mr. Howe, who was sent to Alabama during the early part of the month. We have been further delayed by the frequent absences of Inspector Woodward from the city. Mr. Woodward is now absent in Connecticut, as we are informed, but will return on Monday. From him we have already received information which we may have occasion to use in making our report. It is our purpose, and we are so directed by the Attorney-General, to conclude our investigation at once upon his return. It will be necessary for us to have more definite and exact information from Mr. Woodward before reporting finally to the Attorney-General, and we have so stated to him.

Very respectfully,

F. H. HOWE.
HENRY HODGES.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq.,
160 Broadway, New York City.

MARCH 29, 1884.

SIR: I have to-day a letter written by your direction by Messrs. Howe and Hodges trying to explain the delay in passing my bills. I trust the explanation is satisfactory to you. It can be to no one else. They now by your direction say Mr. Woodward delays them and they are waiting his return. Now, conceding that it is important for your agents to see Mr. Woodward to be able to report to you whether I lied to you or not, for this is obviously the object of the inquiry, unless, which clearly could not be the case with an officer like you holding a position of honor, the whole thing is an excuse for delay pending Congressional action; conceding, I say, the importance of seeing Mr. Woodward as to my bill rendered for services prior to November 19, there can be no plausible pretense of any such necessity as to my bill for services after that date. These services were rendered chiefly on your direct, written, urgent personal orders. So far as they were not so rendered Mr. Woodward had and could have no knowledge of any facts bearing upon them. Even if, as to the services not rendered in Washington, there can be any necessity of further inquiry, there cannot be as to those rendered there, and the bill could long since have been passed as to these items. But in fact as to all the services you could long since have sufficiently informed yourself.

You hold a position of honor. You are bound to act in some way regardless of fears of public clamor or other causes. To that duty I, as a citizen and a subordinate, have a right to hold you by private appeal, and, that failing, by public complaint.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS,
Special Assistant Attorney.

Hon. BENJ. HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

In re United States vs. William P. Kellogg.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, March 29, 1884.

SIR: To-day upon an application upon the part of the defendant, Mr. Kellogg, the court ordered his case to be tried upon the 21st day of April, and this makes it necessary for me to express to you a determination I have had in my mind for some time past, and which certainly will not be unpleasant for you to learn, as it conforms to the frequent offers made by you to me to surrender your charge of the star-route cases, to wit, that I will for the future dispense with your services in any of the star-route cases.

I do so for two reasons: First, because there is no necessity for your services; secondly, because it relieves the Government of large expense necessarily incurred by bringing you here, and requiring your action in the cases.

It was for this reason that I did not give you or Mr. Ker notice of this Kellogg matter to-day, for inasmuch as at present Mr. Merrick has had the charge of endeavoring to find Mr. Walsh, he alone was required in court to state what he had done and how he had done it. All that you had done was made plain in the former application, and I therefore did not think it necessary to expose you to the trouble or the Government to the expense of bringing you here to appear in the case and answer the application, knowing it could not be very agreeable to you to be so vexed with this matter.

Mr. Merrick will withdraw from the cases also. This is a piece of personal information that I give you. He has for some time past, by letter and orally, urged me to be permitted to withdraw. I never have intended that he would try the cases after the vehement charges made by Mr. Kellogg that Mr. Merrick was instigating the cases for malicious reasons. I thought that Mr. Merrick's own dignity of character and self-respect would forbid his taking charge of the case when he rested under such accusation from the defendant; and so Mr. Merrick thought himself.

All papers that you have in the star-route matters properly belonging to the Government, all of them, you will please transmit to this Department at your earliest opportunity, for they are of value, and it may be necessary to use them at some future day. Of course I do not mean those papers that are strictly your private papers, but I mean those that were received from the Government, and also, without invading your private rights, if there be any that have been prepared by yourself, which if surrendered would be of service to the Government, I desire them. Please give this your early attention.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq.,
Attorney at Law, 160 Broadway, New York City.

[Bliss & Schley, attorneys and counselors, 160 Broadway.]

NEW YORK, April 7, 1884.

SIR: I am compelled again to call your attention to my last bill rendered for services since November 19, 1883. Of the amount $1,100 was for services rendered in Washington and on your especial direction. Among others, I have dispatches of November 22, 24, and 25 insisting upon my coming. Again on December 12. That I should not be promptly paid for services rendered is little less than an outrage.

I may add that I find I was in Washington on November 14, 15, and 16, for which I have made no charge. Your letter of 16th is to me at the Arlington, nor have I charged expenses.

The other items of the bill I recognize that you have the right to adjust, but I think I have the correlative right to have action on your part.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS.

HON. BENJAMIN H. BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington. April 10, 1884.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL:

In compliance with your directions of the 4th instant, we have examined the original papers in the Post-Office Department in the pending star-route cases, wherein George Bliss, esq., was special counsel.

They are of a twofold character: (1) Those called "straw-bond cases;" and (2) those cases against parties charged with other criminal acts.

The first, commonly called "straw-bond cases," are against parties who obtained contracts on bonds whose sureties were valueless. These parties faithfully performed their duty to the Government under their contracts. Their acts were acceptable to the officers under whose supervision they were, and the Government lost nothing through them. The chief offender in procuring contracts on irresponsible bonds was A. E. Boone.

The indictments against the other parties stand. The indictment against Boone was nolle pros'd that Boone might be made a witness for the Government in the case of the United States against John W. Dorsey et al. for conspiracy, &c. It is deemed conclusive by officers of the Post-Office Department that the condonation of Boone works the condonation of the other parties charged with securing contracts on valueless bonds. Mr. Boone being the chief offender, it may hardly be deemed judicious to prosecute the small offenders.

The history and nature of these "straw-bond cases" are presented in a "letter of the Postmaster-General, transmitting to the President a letter of special counsel, and a report of the Post-Office inspectors upon fraudulent bonds," dated January 3, 1882. The letter and accompanying exhibits make a pamphlet of 85 pages. The pertinency of revising these cases and the accompanying documents depends entirely upon the propriety of their prosecution.

The remaining indictments falling under the second class, above specified, are the cases against (a) Brott and Lilley, (b) Kellogg and Price, and (c) the Messerole indictment.

(a) The papers in the Brott and Lilley case, consisting of the indictment and statement of evidence in its support, together with manuscript notes of special officers and special counsel, are less than 46 pages of legal-cap manuscript.

(b) The papers in the case against Kellogg and Price, consisting of the indictment, the drafts that were paid, with copies of letters and Price's contract and reports of Post-Office inspectors and their accompanying affidavits, are less than 50 pages of manuscript, some large and some small.

(c) The papers of the Messerole indictment with detail of evidence, inspector's reports, and miscellaneous letters, with contract and bond, are less than 45 pages in manuscript.

These papers have, since the 1st of July last, been wholly within the control of the Post-Office Department, and it is not believed that within that time they have been withdrawn from the Department room in which they are kept. They are the material upon which the indictments stand and which must be used in the prosecution. They fall below 141 pages of manuscript, 100 pages of which, although necessary to the establishment of the case, are not, per se, essential to the understanding of the cases except upon a first perusal, being exhibits, canceled drafts, &c.

The remaining 41 pages reduced to ordinary pamphlet form would probably make ten printed pages of the form of pamphlet referred to above.

These are the cases in which the papers, or memoranda and abstracts of them were in the hands of Mr. Bliss.

They embrace all the documents upon which the indictments are based.

Very respectfully,

HENRY HODGES.
F. H. HOWE.

The following papers are referred to in the testimony of the Attorney-General, or relates to matters therein referred to :

Memorandum by the Attorney-General as to the bills of Mr. Bliss.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, May 12, 1884.

The unpaid bills of Mr. George Bliss have been the subject of very careful, serious, and thorough examination in this Department. The first bill he rendered was for $9,200 from April 7, 1883, to November 19, 1883. Believing this bill to have been for services rendered within the past fiscal year, during the trial of the case against Dorsey and others, it was, in the way that his many bills have been presented and acted upon, approved with other accounts put before me, having been submitted to the auditor of the Department and to those having in charge accounts like these.

After that was done the First Comptroller of the Treasury requested me to have Mr. Bliss apportion the amount due him between the two fiscal years, so that he might determine what portion of it was for work actually done within this fiscal year past, so as to be paid out of the current appropriation, and what portion of it having been actually done in the last fiscal year must be reported to Congress in the application for a deficiency appropriation. After some time had passed, and upon repeated requests, and with much hesitation and delay and complaint by Mr. Bliss, and with great reluctance, he did apportion the bill, assigning $4,700 of it to the last fiscal year for work actually done during that year, and $4,500 to the present fiscal year for work actually done during the present fiscal year. In my absence, upon that apportionment so made by him, the Acting Attorney-General, Mr. Solicitor-General Phillips, allowed Mr. Bliss $2,500 on account of the $4,500 charged to the present fiscal year, and he was paid that money. That left due, as claimed by him, $2,000 on the bill for the present fiscal year.

Thus it appeared by this apportionment that nearly one-half of the services charged for by Mr. Bliss were given by him in the present fiscal year, and after the second trial against Dorsey and others had ended, and when it was not possible for Mr. Bliss to have occasion to perform much labor in the so-called star-route cases, and certainly no labor here at the rate of $100 a day, which rate was paid him, as he said, in consideration of his absence from his business and the loss that would necessarily ensue from leaving his home and clients, and being in Washington. In fact, all such services as charged for must have been rendered in New York.

When the bill for $9,200 was rendered it was understood from Mr. Bliss by the officers of this Department and by myself that the sum of $9,200 was earned during his trial of the Dorsey case, for no one knew of any other service that he was called on to render. Having stated the amount which he said was earned for other services, he was required to say in detail what were the services he rendered after the case against Dorsey and others was closed to warrant a charge of $4,500. He replied on January 22, 1884, that after the Dorsey case was closed he went into a most careful and exhaustive examination of all the remaining cases, going over all the facts and evidence, and that this extended over many weeks. This was done in New York, where he was exposed to no unusual loss by absence from his business; done at home and in his own office in conjunction with his other affairs. Why he should undertake this any more than the other two counsel in the case I do not know, and if done at all with a view to learn the facts and evidence so as to determine what ought to be done, it ought to have been the subject of a conference between them all, and not by his individual action to form only his individual opinion. Had all given the same services he did, in a like way and at the same rate of charge, this labor, however necessary, would have been excessive in its expense. I did not authorize it; it was a work that was not needed; it was done by him without ever even intimating to me that he thought it necessary or that he was doing it; and I will not approve it. Mr. Woodward, the Post-Office inspector, who from the first has had these cases in charge, and without whose help Mr. Bliss and all the counsel would have had no information to enable them to conduct any of the cases, was called upon by my authority to learn what time would be required to do what Mr. Bliss states he did in New York, and for which he made this high charge. Mr. Woodward had in his exclusive custody all of the papers which Mr. Bliss alleged he examined in New York, and he stated that the charge made for that service was excessive, and that such work could be done in a very short time.

In fact, upon February 11, 1884, I did write to Mr. Bliss relating to this very charge, telling him that I did not know he had performed it, and that it was a service which I had determined not to authorize till I had considered the advisability of at present pursuing any of the pending criminal cases.

After this expression of opinion by me to Mr. Bliss, made February 11, 1884, he undertook, on the 18th February, 1884, to change the basis of his apportionment so as to avoid my ruling, and assigned to the last fiscal year $6,750, instead of $4,700, and to the present fiscal year $3,500 instead of $4,500.

This cannot be permitted. It is experimenting upon the Department. When Mr. Bliss in the first instance, with deliberation, assigned $4,700 of his bill to the last fiscal year he knew exactly what was right, and what work was done in that year, and he was the only man who did know. He did it with deliberation after he had objected to the call of the First Comptroller to have such an apportionment. The advantage he would obtain by this change would be to transfer more than $1,000 of that which he said was for work done in reviewing the cases and papers, to work done of a wholly different character in trying the cases in Washington, and that work done in Washington had not been objected to as being without authority, while the other work I had already declared to him was unauthorized.

By this act he reduced his claim for the present fiscal year to $3,500. Of that he has received $2,500, and that leaves only $1,000 due to him in this present fiscal year, and only $1,000 subject to the objection that I had expressed to him as being expense incurred for unauthorized labor, and at a rate that was inadmissible. It is very plain that it would be an act of injustice to the Government to permit him now, as an after-thought, to charge $6,750, which he can secure for services which a few months ago he valued at $4,700, a change made solely for the purpose of escaping from my ruling of 18th February, and thus secure that which he knew I had resolved to reject as being for unauthorized and unnecessary services rendered in New York within this fiscal year when all that was charged in the last fiscal year was necessarily for services given in Washington in the Dorsey and Brady trial.

I concur with the opinion expressed by those officials to whom this matter has been referred, and who have carefully examined it, that Mr. Bliss has received and been paid all that he has a right to receive and be paid for every service rendered by him between July 1, 1883, and November 19, 1883, and that the $2,500 which he has received is the utmost that ought to be allowed him, and even that I fear is excessive. But as professional charges cannot be measured as ordinary business transactions for merchandise or other commodities, and as there is no positive standard to go by except the circumstances connected with each particular case and the position of each particular person who charges, and because the Solicitor-General did allow this payment of $2,500 without a knowledge of all the facts which were revealed by these subsequent inquiries made of Mr. Bliss by my direction, and this subsequent action of Mr. Bliss himself reapportioning his bill in this irregular way, I am constrained reluctantly to confirm even this.

Since Mr. Bliss presented his bill for $9,200, he has rendered a second and other bill for services professed to have been given from November 19, 1883, to February 17, 1884, beginning where the last bill ended. That bill is for $2,100.

The charges are for services against Spencer and Kellogg, and some miscellaneous work probably. I concur in the judgment of the officers who have investigated this account, and I think the charge should be reduced. Spencer's case was a failure and signally so, according to the judgment of the court, from a very serious oversight and neglect upon the part of Mr. Bliss.

The large expense incurred first in hunting the man up, and then in bringing him here, was all wasted and lost by an act that Mr. Bliss alone is responsible for, as in effect is expressed in the opinion of the judge. In the Kellogg case I know of no service that Mr. Bliss rendered except in advising those who were seeking to subpoena Mr. Walsh, and for most he did in that matter part of the $2,500 allowed him from July 1, 1883, can very properly be applied. As to the general services in the Kellogg case, remembering he disavored the prosecution, I cannot see how any charges could be made by him in that case except those that related to the attempt to obtain Mr. Walsh.

I therefore decide that on this last account Mr. Bliss can only receive and be allowed the sum of $1,600.

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Mr. Brewster Cameron to Mr. Brewster.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, May 28, 1884.

SIR: Having read a newspaper interview with Mr. Kellogg in which he denied your statement to a Star reporter in this city, that he appealed to you to be relieved from persecution, and that he cried and implored your help, my recollection of his personal importunities at the Department of Justice from the very beginning of the proceedings against him has been roused, and I feel it my duty to make the following statement; and in that way make a record which I can leave with you to counteract any reckless stories that he may wantonly utter, when I will be far away in my new employment and unable to respond promptly to any call you might make for a counter-statement from me.

I saw Mr. Kellogg repeatedly in your office in the Department of Justice in the summer of 1882, while he was still a Senator of the United States, and at or about the time when the proceedings were first begun against him before the grand jury, beseeching you not to permit him to be indicted.

The first time I saw him in conversation with you elsewhere was also in the summer of 1882, at your rooms in Wormley's Hotel, where he was on his knees in front of your bed, holding one of your hands in both of his and crying aloud, and imploring you most piteously to save him. Mr. Kellogg did not see me when I opened the door of your bed-room, but when you looked up and told me to come in, Mr. Kellogg said to me, sotto voce, that he was engaged with you in private conversation and indicated that I step out. You interrupted him and said you wanted to see me and told me to remain, which I did. Mr. Kellogg then rose from his knees, but still holding fast to your hand, and, with tears rolling down his cheeks, he thanked you for a note you had given him, and begged you to interpose and save him. You told him to go and hand Mr. Bliss the letter you had given him, which you had written and handed to him before I came. He then left in a much disturbed condition of mind and manner.

You then arose from your bed where you had been lying, and said you were much worn out by the intense heat of the weather and by the constant application to your duties, and by your study of the star route case (you were then preparing yourself to close the argument), and you told me that Mr. Kellogg had been harassing and worrying you, and that you had in vain asked him to leave you and let you have rest, and finally, to get of him, you had told him to go to Mr. Bliss, who had charge of the prosecution, and talk with him, and that Mr. Kellogg had said to you that Mr. Bliss, perhaps, might not feel authorized to listen to him, and he therefore asked you for a note to Mr. Bliss, and you had scribbled off one; and that that was the note I heard you speak of to Mr. Kellogg. You then said to me that your only object in giving Mr. Kellogg that note was to get rid of him, for you were resolved to have that case disposed of on its merits.

I replied that Mr. Kellogg would surely abuse the note and persuade Mr. Bliss to take some action in his behalf, which you did not wish, using it as a kind of letter of authority for such purpose. You said Mr. Kellogg had always been amiable to you, but if there was any danger of that, I should go at once to the "Arlington" Hotel and see Mr. Bliss, and explain to him how you had given it, merely to get rid of Mr. Kellogg, and he must not regard it in any other light.

I accordingly at once left you and went to Mr. Bliss at the Arlington, and after some delay saw him and told him you said he should attach no importance to the note; that you had directed me to say that you were tired and worn out and that you were obliged to give the note to Mr. Kellogg, who was in great trouble, to get rid of his appeals. This is one of the many appeals he made to your sympathies in my presence.

I do solemnly swear that the above statement is correct and true in each and every particular, so help me God.

BREWSTER CAMERON.

Attorney-General.

NEW YORK, January 9, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I judge an investigation is to be made of the Department of Justice. For my part I am glad of it. It will cause you—and me to a less extent—some inconvenience, but it is the only way of meeting the misstatements and mis-inferences of the reporters and the thieves. In view of it, however, permit me to suggest that before you make any statements as to the star-route, Ottman, &c., you cause your records to be fully examined. I suggest this because in going over my papers I find that you have on various occasions forgotten things which had been done, a result quite natural in your mass of business and yet to be avoided in a public investigation. For instance, it has escaped you apparently, as it had me, that the rate of payment of $100 per day and expenses was fixed by a letter from you to MacVeagh and his acceptance of it, though there had been previous verbal communication between me and Mr. MacV. Again, as to the civil suits. They were placed in my hands by Postmaster-General James before you became Attorney-General. You approved it in writing both before and after you became Attorney-General. Subsequently you have treated the matter as undecided where they should go and then sent the Dorsey cases to me (though you have never yet answered as to whether this covered Vail). Of course in this matter you have acted with my entire concurrence, but I wish to remind you of this record. So in the Ottman business there should be accuracy as to what was done and why and how. Your records will show all this, I think.

In the civil suits I failed in my scheme to get jurisdiction of Dorsey here because Bosler died. I do not, however, give it up absolutely.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER.

Extract from letter to George Bliss, signed by the Attorney-General.

JANUARY 10, 1884.

As to the Ottman case it was brought to my knowledge in the first instance by yourself. You urged the hearing of it, and the disposition of it, and satisfied me by your statements that it ought to be disposed of. In view of your knowledge of the subject, which was made plain to me by your statements and your urgent request to have it disposed of, and because of my confidence in you, I requested you to examine it and report upon it, upon a condition suggested by yourself that you receive no pay for so doing; and you consented to do so. I approved of your report, and I do not disapprove of it now. Perhaps it would have been better, in the light of the criticism that it has been subjected to, that instead of sending it to you I had sent it to the Solicitor-General and had him dispose of it, but at the time I did it I was not very familiar with the machinery of the office. I know now what I would do; I would send it to the Solicitor-General. But under any circumstances I see nothing in it that has been done to be condemned, unless it is distorted and abused.

Mr. Bliss to Mr. Brewster.

BLISS & SCHLEY, ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELLORS,
160 Broadway, New York, January 11, 1884.

DEAR SIR: I have yours of 10th. It illustrates the importance of what I wrote you as to the necessity of accuracy in the matters which, out of the myriad which have passed under your charge, are likely to be the subject of investigation. You say, "As to the Ottman case it was brought to my knowledge in the first instance by yourself" (me). Now this is a great mistake, and a moment's reflection will convince you of it. Had I brought it to your knowledge you never would have committed the manifest impropriety of referring it to me to investigate.

In fact it was brought to your notice by Colonel Corkhill, who stated that Ottman had made an application to him, that he had been Ottman's counsel and could not act. You will find Colonel C.'s letter on file, though I think that was written after a prior interview. You consulted me as to who should be employed to look it up. There was a suggestion of Totten, but he was then in the star-route case against us, and moreover you distrusted anything that seemed to be suggested by Corkhill or Ottman. Jere Wilson, Wells, and others who had been in the case were all talked over and dismissed. You asked me to quietly find out something about the Washington lawyers. My quest was unsatisfactory, and then it was suggested that I should act. I agreed to do so provided I was to do it as a friendly matter to you, and was not to be paid, and I did it. I merely call your attention to this as it emphasizes what I said before.

You are wrong in saying I knew anything about the case when you first spoke to me about or when you referred it to me, except as stated in Corkhill's letter. I got my knowledge afterwards.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. BENJ. HARRIS BREWSTER.

Mr. Brewster to Mr. Bliss.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, January 12, 1884.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of January 11 is received. Notwithstanding your letter, my recollection now is distinct that you did speak with me about the Ottman case, and disclaimed any interest in it, the first I knew of it—disclaimed any personal interest in it whatever, and referred me to Colonel Corkhill upon the subject.

There was no manifest impropriety in my appointing you to look after it. If there was I should have been advised of it at the time, and I do not believe that there was any at all. I did not think so then and I do not think so now; unless there is something that I know nothing of. You spoke to me upon the subject, stated that you had been spoken to, and having confidence in you then, as I have now, I asked you to look into it, because you had spoken to me, or I never would have spoken to you. But that is a matter of no consequence, whether you did or did not speak to me first. If there was a shadow of impropriety in my sending it to you, you were the first person to see it and would have told me of it, and I am yet to learn it now, except from the slurs and slings that are made at you by insolent, defaming newspaper writers.

It matters not whether you or Colonel Corkhill called my attention to it. I have to say this as to it: it was a thing wholly unknown to me until my attention was called to it, and my recollection is you were the person that called my attention to it, and the letter that Colonel Corkhill subsequently gave me I obtained from him.

You were, as you say, consulted by me as to who should be employed to take it up and look into it, because it seemed to be a complex thing that required to be sifted; and Mr. Totten's name was mentioned. If it was by Mr. Corkhill I do not know. Certainly at that time we both distrusted Mr. Corkhill, for you wrote me a positive letter that you would withdraw from the case unless he was expelled from the district attorneyship, and he stood in that light when we began. And you mentioned these other names, none of whom I knew at that time. I hardly knew Mr. Totten, and as to Mr. Wilson and Mr. Wells, I did not know them; and in talking with me you mentioned over these other names. They were men unknown to me, and I was guided by your judgment of them, and knowledge of them.

I did suggest that you should take it, and you did agree to do it as a friendly act for me, and that you were not to be paid. But I do not see what matter it makes whether you spoke to me first or last. I have written to you according to the best of my recollection and belief, and that recollection and belief I still maintain. I do not see how it affects the result in any way. The purpose of the submission was a prudent, judicious, and honest one, for the good of the public service, and to dispose of a suspended and vexed question that ought to have been disposed of, and I believe it was properly disposed of, and if I had to do it again I would do it to-morrow just as I did it then, except in this: That having a better knowledge of the details of the business of the office than I then had, and having been brought more directly in contact with its different officials, I would have asked the Solicitor General to take it in charge, and make his report upon it. I did not do that because, as I say, I saw he was occupied in court, and I did not suppose he would be willing or able to assume such an investigation, but I have since learned that he is both willing and able, and does it, as he does everything else, with ability and integrity, and for the public good.

Very truly, yours,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq.,
Special United States Attorney, &c., New York City.

Extract from a letter of George Bliss to Attorney-General, dated New York, September 27, 1882.

You call upon Cameron and Bowen to answer Dickson's charges. When they do this give Dickson a chance to present any evidence or statement, and publish the whole. Cameron and Bowen's statements will put Dickson in a bad position.

Mr. James to Mr. Bliss.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., December 17, 1881.

SIR: From an examination of the records of this Department, I have been convinced that money has been paid out of the funds of the Government to certain persons under circumstances which bring such payments within section 4057 of the Revised Statutes in a number of instances.

The evidence, which seems to me sufficient to maintain suits by the United States to recover such moneys, is on file in this Department. Copies of much of it are already in your hands.

In compliance with law I hereby request that unless you shall differ from me as to the weight of the evidence you will cause suits to be instituted in the name of the United States for the recovery of said moneys illegally paid from the parties who received the same.

Very respectfully,

THOMAS L. JAMES,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. GEO. BLISS,
Of Counsel in Star-Route Mail Cases.

Mr. Bliss to Mr. James.

WASHINGTON, December, 18, 1881.

DEAR SIR: The request contained in your letter of yesterday that suits should be commenced to recover moneys illegally paid to contractors with the Post-Office Department is received.

When I first became connected with the cases known as the star-route cases I called the attention of the Attorney-General to the propriety of commencing civil suits such as you suggest. He fully agreed with me, but the matter has been delayed in consequence of the unexpected labor connected with the preparation of the criminal cases. I was and am unwilling that any idea should go forth that criminal proceedings were to be forborne or delayed, and civil proceedings substituted. If frauds such as I believe can be shown to have been committed in these cases cannot be punished by convictions in the criminal courts, it is more important to show this fact to the law-making power and the public, and thus secure a change in the law, than to recover for the Government even the whole of the large amount wrongfully taken from the Treasury. I do not believe that our criminal laws—defective as the United States statutes are in all criminal matters—are so defective that crimes such as these are not punishable. Nor do I believe that there will be any hesitation on the part of juries in convicting on proper evidence, such evidence as I believe we can present. Under this conviction I have temporarily put aside the question of civil suits and have devoted myself to the criminal cases.

Even you, familiar as you are with these cases, can have little idea of the amount of labor which has necessarily been bestowed upon the preparation of them. The witnesses are scattered over thousands of miles. Hardly one of them is less than 1,500 miles from this city, and many of them are twice that distance. These witnesses have been sought out by your inspectors with an energy, fidelity, and perseverance rarely combined in subordinates either in public or private life. The thousands of pages of testimony thus gathered, together with that furnished by the voluminous records of the Post-Office and Treasury Departments, have been examined, arranged, and abstracted first by Inspector Woodward and then by counsel with an amount of personal labor far beyond anything I anticipated when I came into the cases, and far beyond anything I would then have been willing to undertake. In this examination breaks and omissions in the chain of testimony have been discovered and supplied. The criminal cases naturally divide themselves into four or five great combinations. We have this week completed to our satisfaction the preparation for the grand jury and for trial of the evidence as to one of these combinations, and though, as a general rule, I prefer not to say anything as to what we expect to do, I may mention that I intend to issue this week subpoenas for about sixty witnesses to appear before the grand jury as soon after the New Year as that body will be ready to examine them.

A good deal of progress has been made in the preparation of the criminal cases connected with the other great combinations, so much indeed that, so far as I can perceive, there is no danger that the statute of limitations can bar any of the cases. I hope they will be ready for the grand jury and for trial as soon as jury and court can attend to them.

Under these circumstances your request for the commencement of civil suits seems to me timely. Personally, I have no authority to commence such suits, but you and I know that the senior counsel, who was yesterday confirmed as Attorney-General, will not hesitate to give the requisite authority, for one of the chief reasons for his selection for that position was his avowed determination to press the star-route cases. I shall at once transmit to him a copy of your letter and ask his approval. When received I will cause civil suits to be commenced in those cases in which the evidence in the possession of the Government seems to justify such a course. You will, I know, agree with me that these civil suits should not in any way supersede the criminal prosecutions, for punishment of the offenders is of infinite more importance than the recovery of money. Both civil and criminal proceedings will be pushed as rapidly as is consistent with justice to the Government and to the defendants, though it is quite possible that you will not find the progress so rapid as you desire.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS,
Special Counsel.

Hon. THOMAS L. JAMES,
Postmaster-General.

Mr. Bliss to Mr. Brewster.

OFFICE OF BLISS & SCHLEY,
New York, December 24, 1881.

DEAR SIR: Though aware that you have not taken your official oath and entered upon your duties as Attorney-General, yet in order that delay may be avoided I send you copies of a letter which I received in Washington from the Postmaster-General and of my reply.

In my opinion there are a considerable number of cases in which the Government is entitled to recover for moneys received in violation of the sections of the Revised Statutes referred to by the Postmaster-General. I have called upon that officer for a tabular statement of all payments made on account of incurred or expedited service, arranged by quarters and giving the persons to whom paid, for it may be the fact that if there was a subcontractor recognized under the law and to whom payment was directly made it may in some cases affect the right of the Government to recover.

I write now only to suggest that you will consider the question so far in anticipation of your assumption of your duties as to express to me your approval of the course I have indicated in my letter to Mr. James.

You will perceive that I assumed that any general retainer from the Attorney-General "in the cases known as the star-route cases," included the civil as well as the criminal cases. Technically I presume the suits must be brought by the district attorneys in the several districts, who will appear on the record, but the management is properly intrusted to a person directly appointed by the Department of Justice. He would, however, need to be appointed as an assistant attorney-general and not as an assistant district attorney, which is the only commission I hold.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER.

Mr. Brewster to Mr. Bliss.

706 WALNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

Monday, December 26, 1881.

MY DEAR SIR: I have received your letter, together with the correspondence between yourself and Mr. Postmaster-General James. I read it all with satisfaction and approve of that which you have written. As soon as I enter on the duties of my Department, which will be in a few days, I propose to give you a special authority to pursue those suggested civil suits with all of the promptitude that orderly litigation will permit.

The uttermost penny lawlessly received and taken from the public treasury must be recovered. Hitherto you have given diligent attention to the criminal proceedings, and before I came into the cases had acquired complete knowledge of the subject. More prosecutions must be earnestly pressed. The trials must be prompt and the cases must be well prepared. On you, together with the other counsel who have been before this investigating these cases, I must refer these in preparation. All that is essential must be ready for use. I have resolved that my duty will require me to take active part in the trials in court, and I propose to be present with you and in person lead in the prosecutions for the United States.

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER.

Col. GEORGE BLISS.

Mr. Brewster to Mr. Bliss.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,

Washington, June 4, 1883.

DEAR SIR: To-day Mr. Postmaster-General Gresham called upon me to learn what had been done with reference to suing these indicted star-route men under the act of Congress to recover back the money that they have frauded the Government of. I told him it was my impression that I had, in conjunction with Postmaster-General James or Postmaster-General Howe, requested you to take charge of those matters, and that you had suspended action in them because of the existing criminal proceedings, thinking it more prudent to wait until they were done.

He also alluded to the Salisbury case, and that reference. He is very eager about both; wants them both to be prosecuted for the purpose of collecting the money, and thinks it is his duty not to delay the matter, and I rather coincide with him. I wish you would see him at once upon this subject. I told him you and I had much correspondence upon the subject of that Salisbury matter. I wish you would explain it all to him. It is important that you should see him and explain all that you know about it.

I am respectfully, &c.,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq.,

Special Assistant United States Attorney in the star-route cases, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Bliss to Mr. Brewster.

WASHINGTON June 15, 1883.

DEAR SIR: Referring to our conversation as to the civil suits in star-route cases, I beg to say that on December 17, 1882, Postmaster-General James requested me by letter to commence civil suits against persons not named but referred to in general terms. These suits were not commenced, because as to all, except the persons just acquitted, an arbitration was arranged, which has only recently been abandoned.

It was apparently Mr. James's view that the Revised Statutes gave him in Post-Office cases the absolute right to select counsel. I was of that opinion, but his selection of me was approved by you.

Now that suits are to be commenced, permit me to say that the Post-Office authorities have recently sent some twenty-four cases to the Sixth Auditor, who will in routine make them up and forward them to the Solicitor of the Treasury. The latter will, unless he receives special directions from you, forward them to the proper district attorneys where defendants reside. The Postmaster-General will, I am advised, notify you of these cases.

Now, as to myself, I do not wish the Government or you to feel bound to me by what has passed. If for reasons of economy or for other reasons it is considered desirable to place these suits in other hands I will gladly concur and assist in every way in my power the person or persons so selected. If, as seems likely, from the necessities of jurisdiction, the suits must be brought in various and distant States, I should greatly hesitate unless I was held to be bound by what has occurred to take charge of them in the sense of having to go there and try them. Wherever brought I am content if desired to supervise their preparation, the pleadings, &c., and thus to place at the service of the Government experience and knowledge already acquired. Of course for such services I should expect compensation at a rate to be arranged with you.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. Benjamin HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Mr. Bliss to Mr. Brewster.

JULY 24, 1883.

DEAR SIR: One or two paragraphs in the newspapers remind me that it is possible I may be held to a responsibility while not aware of it.

As to the civil suits in the star-route cases I wrote you at some length early last month, I think it was, and also had a conversation with you. I called your attention to the fact that while I had been employed in these cases by Postmaster-General James, and with your approval had done something in them, I did not feel sure that you had ever directly sanctioned my employment; that if the cases were to be tried in various forums where jurisdiction could be got, I did not feel that I ought to undertake the responsibility of trial, nor that you ought to incur the expense of employing me to leave home continuously; that, however, if it was desired, I should be glad to continue in charge of all that class of cases as special counsel, preparing the papers, selecting and securing jurisdiction in the places where it seemed probable the fairest trial could be had, and instructing the district attorney or whoever else might be selected to try the cases, this to be done at a compensation to be fixed by you, either beforehand or after the work was done (though the statute probably looks somewhat to the former, which, however, is, I think, not followed in practice).

This idea seemed, in conversation, to commend itself to you, yet I did not understand that you decided it finally. Now I see it stated in the papers that I am "in charge of the civil suits." If you consider me so, please say so, and I will endeavor to justify your confidence. But, on the other hand, consider yourself free to act wholly without reference to the past.

Yours truly,

GEORGE BLISS,
Special Assistant Attorney.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Whoever has charge of the cases, permit me to say that they should be brought with great care, and so far as the pleadings are concerned, in a form outside of the usual one in Post-Office cases.

Mr. Brewster to Mr. Bliss.

HOWLAND HOTEL, LONG BRANCH, N. J.,
July 25, 1883.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 24th of July was handed to me to-day. Some month or more ago—perhaps two months—as I have advised you, the Postmaster-General communicated with me upon the subject of the civil suits arising out of the star-route cases. In consequence of that I put you in direct communication with him, and I conveyed to him copies of all the correspondence between the Department of Justice and yourself as to these cases. You gave me a verbal but brief account of your interview with the Postmaster-General, and I understood you to say that you were to be retained to assist in some general way in the prosecution of those civil suits.

I have not the correspondence by me at this place, or probably I would find in some one of your notes written to me at or about that time a statement of the result of your interview with the Postmaster-General, and what you understood your position to be. My recollection now is that you were to have charge of them in some general way, and much was to be left to your discretion as to when and where you would appear, your desire being that you would not add expense to the case by going to any remote point, if it would be necessary to bring suits other than in Washington or New York, or in some other convenient jurisdiction. Indeed, if I am not much amiss, I now remember that it was your purpose mainly to supervise such suits as might be brought in Washington or in New York, so as to avoid expense that would be occasioned by your absence from your business in New York.

Since that time the Postmaster-General has verbally said to me that he was having the papers prepared for the purpose of directing suits to be brought. I believe much labor was necessary to arrange the papers, and adjust the accounts, and get things ready for the suits. You know that by statute it lies with the Postmaster General alone to direct suits or not to direct them. I have no power, except as I am requested by him, to direct action to be taken, or to take action myself. When he reports to me the result of his preparations, and requests me to bring certain suits to recover claims, of which I can know nothing unless they are so reported to me, I will then be ready and prepared to communicate with you.

When I first became Attorney-General and we advised together upon this subject it was after you conveyed to me the information that Mr. James had deputed you to take charge of these civil cases, and I understood from you that before you intended to act it was your wish that I should know that you so proposed to do, that I should know by what authority you would undertake to act, and that you wished to have my sanction as the head of the Department of Justice to any such suits as you might think it proper to bring under the authority given to you by Mr. James. Then I promptly accepted your proposals and suggestions and assented to your immediate action if you thought it necessary, under the instructions you had received from the Post-Office Department.

The impression I had soon after that communication made by you, and to which I responded, I believe, in writing, was that it was considered inexpedient to begin those civil suits at that time, because of the urgency of the criminal proceedings; and from time to time since then, in my letters to you, I have adverted to these outstanding cases and reminded you of them, indicating my intention to speed them whenever the Post-Office Department and yourself were ready to act; and I have been ever since prepared to sanction such suits, and instruct and direct them when they were brought.

The suggestions of your letter of the 24th of July I will remember. I will also send a copy of that letter to the Postmaster-General, and of this also.

Very respectfully yours,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq.,
Special Assistant United States Attorney in the star-route cases, New York City:

Mr. Brewster to Mr. Gresham.

HOWLAND HOTEL, LONG BRANCH, N. J.,
July 25, 1883.

SIR: With this I send to you a copy of a letter this day received by me from George Bliss, esquire. I also inclose to you a copy of my answer to him.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Hon. WALTER Q. GRESHAM,
Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Gresham to Mr. Brewster.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., July 27, 1883.

SIR: I am just in receipt of your letter of the 25th instant inclosing a letter addressed to you by George Bliss, esq., on the 24th instant, and your reply thereto of the 25th instant.

The Second Assistant Postmaster-General is at work industriously preparing cases for civil suits against a number of star-route contractors. In his absence, his chief clerk informs me that it will be ten days before they will be able to turn the cases over to me for my examination.

Colonel Ingersoll requested yesterday that, before suits were brought against some of the contractors whom he represents, I should inform him of the amount which was demanded. While he did not say so in terms, I inferred that, perhaps, the Salisburys and others contemplated paying the amount which the Government claimed or will claim is due from them. I told Colonel Ingersoll that he and his clients should have an opportunity to settle without suit, if they desired to do so, before I addressed you again upon the subject.

If it shall appear from the papers submitted to me by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, that any star-route contractors have obtained money from the Department by fraud, I shall address a communication to you, requesting that suit be brought against such persons.

Respectfully yours,

W. Q. GRESHAM,
Postmaster-General.

HON. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General, Washington, D. C.

[Extract from letter of Attorney-General to George Bliss, dated November 28, 1883, relating to Dorsey civil suit.]

You spoke to me about that Dorsey matter. I have seen Mr. Simons, and with this I send you the fruit of that interview, and I authorize you to act in the premises according to your best professional judgment.

Extract from letter of George Bliss to Attorney-General, dated November 30, 1883, in reply to above letter.

I will to-night look over the Dorsey papers you send.

Mr. Bliss to Mr. Brewster.

160 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, December 1, 1883.

SIR: I have yours of 29th, inclosing papers in the Dorsey case. On examination I find them wholly insufficient. If this is the result of the summer's work of the Post-Office Department it is a disappointment. Especially do the papers offer no evidence whatever against S. W. Dorsey, as they do not show what payments were made to him or his order. I think the best way will be for me, if I can get a day early next week, to go to the Post-Office Department and work out what I want. I find much of it in the report of the star-route trial but cannot be sure that I have it all correctly.

I assume the papers are with me only for use as against S. W. Dorsey.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS.

HON. BENJ. HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Mr. Bliss to Mr. Brewster.

160 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, December 21, 1883.

DEAR SIR: Referring to the matter of the civil suits in the star-route cases, permit me to say that as to the cases transmitted to me, it seems rather like a waste of money to commence suits against the actual contractors, John W. Dorsey, John R. Miner, and the estate of John M. Peck. All are understood to be impecunious, though it is possible John W. Dorsey has some property. But the suits would involve considerable expense and labor; and unless there are considerations of public policy which require suits against persons who would "beat in the execution" I would advise that such suits be not brought.

As to Stephen W. Dorsey and Henry M. Vaile, who, as subcontractors and otherwise, received a good deal of money fraudulently taken from the Treasury, the condition of things is different. They are understood to be still responsible. If jurisdiction can be obtained of them in a forum where the Government can get fair treatment I should advise proceedings, and, under your letter, propose to take them against S. W. Dorsey. Indeed I should have done so before this, but some arrangements that I had for procuring jurisdiction have been interfered with, though I still expect to obtain it. As to Vaile, you have never said to me whether you wished me to proceed against him.

This reference to Vaile leads me to make a general suggestion as to all the civil suits. I learn that the Post-Office Department has forwarded you statements with detailed reports as to frauds committed by other contractors, who are themselves responsible or were the mere "dummies" of responsible persons. As I had occasion to investigate these cases, or many of them, when I tried to secure indictments against the parties, I feel confident that with proper care a very considerable sum can be realized in these cases. But it will require some diplomacy, some knowledge of the peculiar law applicable, and of Post-Office matters. I am clear that it would be wise to place all these cases in the hands of the same person. As you will give me credit for not speaking from a personal point of view, and as in the long run I do not believe any result that may follow from the suggestion would benefit me, I have determined to give expression to an idea I have thought of a good deal.

My idea is that it would conduce at once to the efficient and economical management of these cases and to the collection of the money if some smart, bright, active young lawyer were employed on a small annual salary—small compared with what would be paid to special counsel ordinarily—and let him do the work in these cases, being directed by some one familiar with the law and the practice. My idea of the man is some one who, having been admitted as a lawyer has little or no business, no experience in these cases, or in any similar cases, but who could learn and be directed. Such a man could be got for a reasonable sum and could then be directed, be under the supervision of an older and more experienced man, who could in such event have to be paid much less than if he was the special counsel in charge of all the details of the cases.

I only describe such a young man because he could be got cheaply. Of course one of more business, more experience than I have pictured would in some respects be better, but he would cost more. The selection of this man should be made with a good deal of care, as by no means every bright man, every man with social or political support behind him, would "fill the bill." Indeed I incline to think one with no such influence is the better man.

As for the counsel, if you should choose to employ me, I should not object, yet I do not seek the employment, and you will quite likely find some one who would do as well and who has not the standing in the profession which justifies, if not requires, the charges I should in such case make. In such case I shall have no feeling, no regrets. All that I want is that an administration of the Department which has been compelled to spend so much money without the direct benefit hoped for may succeed in collecting the large sums which I fully believe can be collected. Perhaps you have already made your arrangements. If so you will excuse my suggestions.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. BENJ. HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

[Extract from letter of George Bliss to Attorney-General.]

JANUARY 9, 1884.

As to the civil suits. They were placed in my hands by Postmaster-General James before you became Attorney-General. You approved it in writing both before and after you became Attorney-General. Subsequently you have treated the matter as undecided where they should go, and then sent the Dorsey cases to me (though you have never yet answered as to whether this covered Vaile). Of course in this matter you have acted with my entire concurrence, but I wish to remind you of the record.

* * * * *

In the civil suits I failed in my scheme to get jurisdiction of Dorsey here because Bosler died. I do not, however, give it up absolutely.

Extract from letter of Attorney-General to George Bliss.

JANUARY 10, 1884.

As to the civil suits. As I now remember it, you were requested to take charge of them by Mr. James, and so you told me. In fact, all I learned about what had been done prior to my coming into the office I learned from you, and I had to depend entirely upon what you stated, and I have no doubt you stated what was correct. I relied upon you because I confided in you and respected you. Of the civil suits since then against these parties, the only one you have had charge of thus far has been the suit against Dorsey, and that was sent to you to New York in consequence of your correspondence with me requesting that it should be, pointing out how you might be able to secure the money.

Mr. Bliss to Mr. Brewster.

NEW YORK, April 19, 1884.

SIR: I inclose you Treasury statements of account against Dorsey, Peck, Miner, and Vaile, forwarded to me by you at a time when you desired me to take charge of civil suits. Now that you are pursuing the policy of letting every one off, while pretending to pursue them, they may be of use to you. They are of none to me.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Mr. Gresham to Mr. Brewster.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 21, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 19th instant, in which you refer to the copy of Mr. Bliss's letter to you of the 16th instant.

Of course I am not expected to bring suits against Mr. Dorsey or others.

I do not see what I can do in the way of causing suits to be commenced in Indiana, Ohio, or Illinois, and getting service upon Mr. Dorsey as he passes through those States.

Very respectfully, yours,

W. Q. GRESHAM,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

[Omitted from letter to George Bliss, signed Attorney-General, May 12, 1883. Reported to Senate See Senate Ex. Doc. 156, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

"I am doing my duty steadily in my Department, and have no regard for outside criticisms of either interested or ignorant people, and I do not need to be spurred nor twitted as if I were negligent, which I am not. I bear the burdens of the Department and its heavy labors with as much practical active industry as any other public officer, so your clients must have some patience and some respect for me.

[Omitted from letter to George Bliss, signed Attorney-General, November 28, 1883. Reported to Senate. See Senate Ex. Doc. 156, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

"It is a very unpleasant thing to receive such letters, and from you; for if there is a gentleman that I have been associated with since I have been in this office that I have been anxious to accommodate and satisfy it is you, and I must again remind you you have said so, and I felt and believed until last spring that I never had done or said a thing that was unpleasant to you."

"Now, in the first place, you must permit me to have some little authority in my own Department; I have not only legal rights, but I have some personal sentiment and feeling in these things, which I am sure you will not willing interfere with."

"However, now permit me to say to you that I wish none of this had passed between us. There has been no occasion for it, and it has caused me the utmost pain to talk to you in this diffuse way in reply to your very diffuse and dissatisfied note. I have dictated this letter just as if I were talking to you, and dictated it with a hesitating sense of unpleasantness that I should be called upon to do it. There is nothing that you can ask, that you yourself will say after deliberate reflection you ought of right to have or of courtesy to look for, that I would not cheerfully accord to you. I do wish most heartily to keep alive with you pleasant, happy associations. They began that way; pray let them continue so."

[Omitted from letter dated January 18, 1884, to the Attorney-General, signed George Bliss. Reported to Senate. See Senate Ex. Doc. 156, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

"A member of Mr. Springer's committee told me to-day that the witnesses from the Department were indulging in opinions, inferences, &c., instead of merely stating facts, and he thought Mr. Springer was encouraging it and not for good purposes."

[Omitted from letter to George Bliss, signed Attorney-General, January 19, 1884. Reported to Senate. See Senate Ex. Doc. 156, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

"I have only asked for an explanation as an act of official duty, and never thought it would give offense.

"By way of note in your letter you report to me some information, and say you had learned from a member of the committee now examining into the affairs of the Department of Justice, that the witnesses were speaking at random and giving opinions and inferences, and that Mr. Springer permitted and encouraged it for a political purpose. With that I have nothing to do. I have not instructed or advised with a witness that went before that committee and I do not know when any one of them went, except Mr. Cameron; neither will I instruct or advise with them. The committee must control their witnesses. If there is anything said that is untrue and I see it, I will disprove it, and if they tell the truth and superadd inferences and opinions, I cannot prevent that, nor do I mean to prevent it, let Mr. Springer have whatever purpose he may in permitting it or in inviting it, as you say he has.

"I have not spoken to any member of the committee. I have not asked anybody to speak to them or any one of them, nor will I. I have no occasion to do so, and if I had need to seek their favor, I ought to leave this office."

Mr. Brewster to Mr. Merrick.

(United States vs. Brady et al.)

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, April 24, 1883.

MY DEAR SIR: After your conference with me in the above case as to the order of speaking I have considered the subject. It has been my intention from the beginning of this present trial to take part in the argument after the case was closed. I could not be present at the trial, for my whole time was occupied without intermission with official duties such as no one could be deputed to undertake.

To keep watch over the proceedings and instruct myself in the details of the evidence that was given, I have steadily, day by day, followed the progress of the case and instructed myself in all that passed. I learn from you and from the reported proceedings that there is some hesitation in the mind of the judge as to the order in which counsel may be directed to speak. The arrangement adopted in the former trial, you inform me, has been set aside, it having been declined. I had believed and hoped, till you informed me of this change, that the course pursued there would be adhered to in this instance, and relying upon that I had intended to have appeared in court to conclude this case, as I did before. In the last case, your speech having been made, you were followed by two or more of the defendants' counsel, and when they had ended I concluded the case for the prosecution, responding to whatever those who immediately preceded me said, and expressing such general views as were called for upon the facts and the law. It was my purpose in the last trial, and it is my will and wish now, to show a determination to have these cases thoroughly tried, and to express in person upon behalf of the Government the resolution to pursue these accusations by lawful means to their lawful end, and thus convey a conviction to the public mind that there was a fixed intention to follow these or any other accused men, no matter how high their past position, and expose and punish their frauds by due course of law.

In this trial the judge himself first suggested, in departing from the former arrangement, that the defense might close, and then be followed by two speeches upon behalf of the Government, one of them to be delivered by yourself and the other by myself. If the judge will do this I would be satisfied. To me it appears to be the proper course in a case like this, complicated as it is, wherein so many defendants are involved, represented by so many different counsel, all of whom being heard in a body before the closing speech of the prosecution outweigh in numbers and effect that single speech in conclusion made for the Government. This order is the one that I would suggest, and did suggest at the former trial before the order then adopted was thought of or accepted. All lawyers know the order of speaking is wholly within the discretion of the court, and I desire you to urge in this case upon the court the fitness and propriety of this plan.

The recorded authorities that I know of show departures in cases like these from the ordinary courses of litigation, and there are many no doubt, very many more, wherein like departures have been made in the exercise of this judicial discretion to answer the ends of justice that cannot be cited, as such orders are generally made at trial where they are not the subject of record. Let me call your attention to Chase's trial, to the Queen's trial, to O'Connell's case. Those you possess and will use. The text-books contain but one principle upon this subject, an undisputed principle, and that is the discretion is exclusively with the court to be exercised according to the circumstances.

In a note like this I do not propose to enlarge in an argumentative way upon the necessities or proprieties of this case demanding the order that two may conclude for the prosecution; that you will do when the question is discussed and submitted to the judge; but I again affirm to you it is my conviction that in this case of all cases that order is the proper one. If the judge determines to rule that there will be but one counsel in conclusion for the prosecution, and declines to adopt the former order of speaking, then of necessity I am excluded, for I think the case requires the knowledge which you have obtained in its prosecution shall be used and expounded by you fully to the jury. It is not only due to the case that you must be heard, but it is due to you; you have borne the brunt of this prolonged and bitter contention, and it is your right, as a point of personal respect, that you shall be heard. I cannot and will not supersede you.

If, however, the judge concludes to readopt the old order, then you will appear as you did, and I will conclude as before. If the judge decides that you may speak in conclusion and I may speak in conclusion, and the counsel for the defendants then refuse to be heard, as one of them has threatened, and they persist in that determination, then I desire to withdraw, for I would not have this or any other case of its magnitude and consequence sent to a jury without giving the accused the benefit of every word that could be said in their behalf. I would not have a verdict tarnished with such an unusual and irregular departure as that which they threatened, although the defendants would deservedly draw down on themselves the consequences of such contumacious refusal to speak, yet it would be better for the sake of the orderly administration of justice that the Government would waive a right adjudged to it by the court rather than appear to obtain that right at the expense of the defendants, who profess to believe that they were wronged and prejudiced by its enforcement.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

RICHARD T. MERRICK, Esq.,
Special Assistant United States Attorney-General in the Star-Route Trial, Washington.

Mr. Bliss to Mr. Brewster.

(Personal.)

DECEMBER 4, 1883.

MY DEAR SIR: I hear to-day in a way that leads me to believe there is something in it that an attempt is to be made to frighten leniency towards Spencer through some letter Gibson has written for him to the President and which Mrs. S. has in charge. The idea suggested is to operate through Chandler. The story goes that C. is greatly annoyed at Spencer and is not likely to help, which I am sure would be so.

Of course the President isn't going to be affected a particle. But it may be that there will be some attempt to affect Judge Wylie.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. B. H. BREWSTER.

Memorandum of a conversation between George Bliss and Brewster Cameron.

A few days after my return from Montgomery, Ala., about the middle of May, 1883, George Bliss came to my office in the Department of Justice. He was then engaged upon the second trial of the case against Dorsey and Brady. He said he was busy but that he came to see me about Paul Strobach, the United States marshal for Alabama, who had been arrested a few days before the date of this conversation.

"Very well," I said. Mr. Bliss then told me it was a great mistake to have arrested Strobach. I replied that he must be misinformed, for the evidence of Strobach's guilt was conclusive. Mr. Bliss said it was not a question of guilt, it was a question of administrative policy.

I told Mr. Bliss that was a matter with which I had nothing whatever to do. I said if a question of policy intervenes it is clearly the Attorney-General's duty and not mine to suspend the administration of the law. It was my duty to obey instructions, and the Attorney-General had directed me to cause Strobach to be arrested if the evidence in the opinion of the United States attorney was such as to warrant his conviction.

Mr. Bliss said I was very useful to the Government, and by my industry and my fidelity to the Attorney-General I had made my services indispensable to his office. He said I had the confidence of the Attorney-General, and that I could control these prosecutions without any difficulty whatever. Mr. Bliss then intimated very plainly that I did practically control them, and was responsible for what had been done.

I told Mr. Bliss I was surprised to hear him speak in that way, for he knew personally that I consulted the Attorney-General as to almost every detail of the business of my office. I reminded Mr. Bliss that the Attorney-General had frequently referred me to him for advice or consultation about comparatively unimportant matters. For my own protection if nothing else I said I had made it a rule to confer fully with the Attorney-General before criminal proceedings were instituted against court officers.

Mr. Bliss said substantially that these consultations were a farce, because the Attorney-General had not the time or the patience to listen to the details.

I told Mr. Bliss it was very true that the Attorney-General did not have the time during the business hours of the day, but that he usually returned to the office about 8 o'clock p. m. after dinner, and staid till 11 and 12 o'clock at night and sometimes later, and that I then carefully submitted to him the evidence in these cases. I also told Colonel Bliss that I was especially careful to advise the Attorney-General of the social standing and political influence of every court officer accused of a crime. The Attorney-General, I said, had never failed to listen with strict attention to the evidence, inquiring into its minutest details; but he had never hesitated, and I was very sure he never would hesitate, to direct the prosecution of a man whose guilt was clear because he was an important political factor.

Mr. Bliss then said these prosecutions had to stop, and the sooner it was understood the better it would be for all parties concerned, and myself particularly.

I asked Mr. Bliss whom he referred to besides Strobach in speaking of "these prosecutions," and he said he alluded to Marshal Brown, of Arkansas.

"Why, Mr. Bliss," I said, "Brown has been convicted, and is in jail now awaiting transportation to the penitentiary."

"I don't care whether he has been convicted or not; the fact is he should not have been arrested. When a man is appointed to a public office all offenses committed by him before the date of that appointment are condoned."

I told Mr. Bliss that the Attorney-General, in my opinion, would never subscribe to that doctrine. I said I was very sure he would not consent to remain in office one minute upon any such terms.

Mr. Bliss did not make any answer to this, but said that he had heard several prominent New Yorkers say that these prosecutions looked like as if the Attorney-General was trying to put the President in a hole.

I told Mr. Bliss that he knew this was not true, and that it was his duty to correct such false impressions, and to say that the Attorney-General prosecuted these marshals solely as an act of duty.

Mr. Bliss said he knew that the Attorney-General was a friend of the President, but that the President's friends generally did not know it and would not believe it so long as these prosecutions continued. "You may not know it," said Mr. Bliss, "but you are held answerable for these arrests, and I may as well say to you frankly, if this thing goes any further you will be removed."

"I would like to know who will remove me, Mr. Bliss," I said; "certainly the Attorney-General will not, for he has carefully examined the evidence and personally directed proceedings to be instituted in each case. I have nothing to do with these cases further than faithfully to report the facts."

Mr. Bliss said that sort of talk was all nonsense; that I could shape these investigations so as to insure a different result; that it was very easy for me, finally, to present the facts in such a manner as to make it appear to the Attorney-General that a criminal prosecution was not advisable; and Mr. Bliss added that if I was a friend of the Attorney-General, I had better observe these suggestions.

I told Mr. Bliss I had too much respect for the Attorney-General to deceive him in that way or any other. I said, moreover, the plan he proposed would fail, for the Attorney-General examined the papers with too much care to be misled, unless I should suppress the evidence. Mr. Bliss said, "there is a good deal of irritation over there" (pointing to the White House), and that something had to be done or there would be trouble; that there could be no objection to prosecuting persons who were appointed by Hayes or Garfield, and who were detected in rendering false accounts, but if any more of the President's appointees were arrested I would certainly be removed, or if the Attorney-General declined to dismiss me he would be removed; and Mr. Bliss then repeated what he had said before about an appointment condoning past offenses.

I told Mr. Bliss that he could not make me believe the President wanted these men retained in office. I said further that I had carefully observed the President's course, and there was nothing in it to warrant the language of Mr. Bliss.

Mr. Bliss replied that the President was all right, and that he did not speak by the President's authority, but there were persons high in authority who had his ear, and who had determined to put a stop to these prosecutions in one of two ways: first, by my dismissal, or, failing in that, secondly, to remove the Attorney-General.

Mr. Bliss said substantially that he spoke to me upon this subject, because he could not speak to the Attorney-General, who would resent as an intrusion the interference from any one not connected with the cases, but he said something must be done and done at once to prevent any more arrests, for there was already a sentiment of hostility to the Attorney-General that had impaired his usefulness as a member of the Cabinet.

"Of course he has the hostility of the star-route thieves and other law-breakers," I said.

"Oh, no," said Mr. Bliss, "I do not refer to that class. There are responsible people, among others, two members of the Cabinet."

"I do not believe there are two," I said.

Mr. Bliss then reassured me that there were two members of the Cabinet who were hostile to the Attorney-General, and he said further that the Attorney-General was of no use to the President as an adviser, for the reason that he never expressed an opinion of his own, but always concurred in the views of the President.

I asked Mr. Bliss if he spoke by the President's authority, and he said, "No, no; don't misunderstand me. I have no authority to speak for the President," but Mr. Bliss went on to say that he knew what he was talking about, and if I wanted to retain my position or see the Attorney-General retain his, that I had better not cause the arrest of any more marshals.

I told Mr. Bliss I would speak to the Attorney-General about it.

He said I must not do that, for he had spoken to me in confidence.

As soon as I saw the Attorney-General I repeated to him the whole of Mr. Bliss's conversation. He condemned the conduct of Mr. Bliss for attempting to interfere with the administration of the law. I expected to see Mr. Bliss dismissed from the service of the Government, but the Attorney-General said, upon reflection, that the removal of Mr. Bliss at that time would be misunderstood and would be disastrous to the star-route cases. The next time I saw Mr. Bliss in my my office I told him I had repeated his remarks to the Attorney-General.

Mr. Bliss turned pale and became very much agitated. He said I had been guilty of a wanton breach of confidence, for he had told me that his conversation was private. He said I might have refused to receive it, but I was in honor bound not to repeat it.

I told Mr. Bliss he had not said his conversation was in confidence till it was over. If he had made secrecy a condition to anything he had to say about the Attorney-

General I would not have listened to a syllable. I told Mr. Bliss that every sense of honor required me to advise the Attorney-General of what he had said, for if he was speaking advisedly, as he pretended to be, and the Attorney-General desired to remain in office, he would be obliged to accept my resignation; and I further informed Mr. Bliss that I was too good a friend of the Attorney-General to complicate him for my own personal advantage, and that I had therefore tendered him my resignation as general agent of the Department of Justice, to take effect whenever he might think it advisable to accept the same.

Mr. Bliss said he had spoken to me in strictest confidence and as a friend, for my own good, so as to temper my zeal.

I asked Mr. Bliss, if it was not his purpose to deter me from doing my duty, what was his object in repeating to Mr. Ker substantially what he had said to me about my removal from office, &c., if these investigations continued to result in prosecutions.

Mr. Bliss then wrote a letter to the Attorney-General in which he said that he was surprised and humiliated beyond expression to learn that I had repeated to him, &c.

The Attorney-General replied that when accusations were preferred against marshals or deputies and made good by sufficient proof that he would follow, expose, and punish them; and wherever the law laid its hands on a man as a culprit and a wrongdoer against the Government, and it came within his immediate jurisdiction and direct knowledge, that he would follow him according to law; and when he could not do that without molestation or hinderance, he wrote Mr. Bliss that he would leave his place.

Mr. Bliss subsequently came to my office and said he had seen the Attorney-General. He was greatly alarmed lest the Attorney-General should report the matter to the President. Mr. Bliss then spoke in high terms of the Attorney-General and of the President's respect for him. Mr. Bliss complained to me that I had given a coloring to his language which conveyed an impression to the mind of the Attorney-General wholly different from what he wished to convey.

I repeated to Mr. Bliss what he had said, especially, about an appointment condoning all past offenses.

Mr. Bliss said he still insisted that that was a correct theory, and he did not complain about that, but that I was either very stupid or perverse or I never would have repeated to the Attorney-General, in the bungling way I must have done to have made all this trouble, what he (Bliss) said about the possible removal of the Attorney-General.

I intimated to Mr. Bliss, if he would have any trouble, that he had brought it upon himself by using the President's name without authority.

Subsequently Mr. Bliss told Mr. Ker substantially that he would punish me by interfering with the appropriation for the examination of accounts out of which the examiners are paid.

BREWSTER CAMERON.

Mr. Bliss to Mr. Brewster.

(Personal.)

MONDAY, A. M. (Received June 6, 1883.)

DEAR SIR: I learn to my surprise and mortification that Mr. Cameron has repeated to you a conversation I had with him, giving to it, I judge, a coloring and importance neither it nor the facts justify. I did not intend that you should be bothered about the matter. As it has come to your ears, I will take an early opportunity to call and explain the whole thing to you that it may cease to worry you, if it has had that effect.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS.

HON. BENJ. HARRIS BREWSTER.

Mr. Brewster to Mr. Bliss.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, June 7, 1883.

MY DEAR SIR: I have spoken to no one upon the subject of what I understood you had said of me but to Mr. Chandler. I said in a very general way only that you had spoken harshly of me, even to him, and I did not tell him that it was Mr. Cameron who repeated it to me. I was hurt, for if I had done anything to annoy or interfere with you I thought it was your place to come to me directly. I am certain I never did anything to annoy you or interfere with you, but on the contrary the last I heard of what you had said of me was most encouraging words of applause and warm words of thankfulness; that I had ever been cordial, friendly, and encouraging to you—in fact, to that degree that you hesitated to come to me, as I always assented to what you said, and you feared to ask too much. I thought if there was any one here with whom I had become acquainted since I had been connected with this office, or immediately before it, whose affectionate friendship I enjoyed, it was yours, and I am sure I never had a thought that was hostile or unfriendly to you.

In your letter you say that Mr. Cameron, you judge, has given a coloring and importance to the matter. Of course, you must infer that, for I entered into no particulars and gave no details to Mr. Chandler. Mr. Cameron is not hostile to you; that I well know, and he did not repeat what he said as an act of hostility or in a spirit of hostility. I never heard him say anything of you except in a spirit of respectful regard, and as a gentleman who was his senior, in whom he had confidence and for whom he had respect. He did report to me, as it was his duty to do, in a straightforward, simple, calm way the conversation you had with him, which I said, and still say, you ought to have had with me, and not with my subordinate or any other person. I was hurt. I will not go into the details of it now, for most of it I have forgotten, and all of it I want to forget. I wish to keep alive friendly relations with you. We began in cordiality, and it shall be no fault of mine if you are not cordial with me to the end.

You know very well the anxieties and vexations that have surrounded me. Part of them have been connected with you in this terrible prosecution that you have had in charge, and which has attracted on me as a focal point the open, avowed, aggressive hostility of the worst men in the United States of America, scattered over its surface from Maine to the remotest Territory—the jobbers and public plunderers and conspiring thieves, and their hatred and hostility is my public compliment. I despise them, and if I can I will punish them, no matter where they are, no matter what they have been; and when accusations are preferred against marshals or deputies, and made good by sufficient proof, I will follow, expose, and punish them, despising them and their vulgar threats; and wherever the law lays its hand upon a man as a culprit and a wrongdoer against the Government, and it comes within my immediate jurisdiction and my direct knowledge, I will follow him according to law, and when I cannot do that without molestation or hinderance I will leave my place. I took it up with honor and I will lay it down with honor as clean as I took it.

If these men, any of them, who rail at me and threaten me had any claim in the remotest way to the status of gentlemen, by association with gentlemen, I would say to them: Gentlemen never threaten, and gentlemen never regard threats; but, as they are a despicable set of low-bred scoundrels, I can only say I despise them.

Now, again, I say I have no desire to have other than cordial, friendly feelings to you. If it is your wish to speak with me about it I will suggest that you first see Mr. Cameron, and learn from him what he did say to me, and then come with him to me and we can talk together in the same spirit of friendship and good feeling that we began in, and as I supposed had maintained to this time.

I am truly, &c.,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER.

Col. GEORGE BLISS,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. Bliss to Mr. Brewster.

NEW YORK, November 30, 1883.

MY DEAR SIR: * * * For some months I have felt that while you showed me every personal kindness, the atmosphere, so to speak, of the Department of Justice was not so kindly, so confidential to me as it was. I traced various unkind remarks—some of them almost slurs—to Mr. Cameron. They dated from about the time when, with the kindest feeling to him, near the time of the Strobach prosecution, I urged upon him that there had been two or three cases in which immediately after the President had appointed marshals or district attorneys the Department of Justice had instituted prosecutions for antecedent matters, and told him that while I believed the persons prosecuted were rascals, I felt that the prosecutions were either too soon or too late, and that no administration could or would permit many repetitions of such a course. I urged tact, judgment, discretion in such cases. Mr. Cameron obviously took what I said not so kindly as it was meant. * * *

Yours, very truly,

GEORGE BLISS.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER.

Extract from letter of George Bliss to Attorney-General, dated New York, November 30, 1883.

I have had or thought I had reason to complain of Mr. Cameron, but have not done so, and to you have taken pains to speak, as you remind me, of his many good qualities. I do believe him a very valuable man to you and to the Government, and think it would be a sad day for both should he leave. But frankly, I think he is, as the saying is, "getting too big for his boots." He has passed beyond the stage of taking counsel. He does and induces you to do things which while abstractly right are under the circumstances not wise to do at all, or not wise to do in the way he does them. You must of course rely upon him, must take his hasty statements of the reasons for this or that letter. He must be your sieve. In that capacity he needs some tact and discretion. He has become self-reliant, self-asserting. He subjects you and the Department to criticism; gives cause for enemies to chuckle and make capital against you and the administration. Understand me. Even if this must continue, as a condition of his continuance with you, I should say he is so valuable that you must keep him cum oneris, but I do wish you could tone these things down; not on my account at all, not on your account solely, but on account of the administration.

Mr. Brewster to Mr. Bliss.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, December 1, 1883.

MY DEAR MR. BLISS: * * * By the by, as to what you say in your letter to me about Mr. Cameron's having people indicted who are recently appointed by the Government, I do not subscribe to what you say about that, nor will the moral sense of the world at large. It would be straining political necessity pretty far to say that it is not the best thing an administration could do to expose and punish its own delinquent appointees. The inspectors who went out to pursue these people have hitherto been negligent of their duty. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been stolen from the public Treasury by these marshals, and their corrupt lives and vicious practices have brought discredit upon the Republican party, and it is the shame of their misconduct, scattered throughout the country, that has created this sense of hostile opposition in the way of independents within our own ranks. Better that we should perish and expose them than our enemies do so; better that we should get rid of these fungi, that are a stench in the nostrils of the Republican community in which they live and over whom they exercise official authority.

They were strangers to Mr. Cameron; they were strangers to me. There is no personality in it; that must be plain to you and to anybody. They were not hunted up because they had been appointees of the party. They were not hunted up at all. The examiners who went out to do their duty went out to do it without knowing who he was, without knowing whether a man had been appointed to-day or a year ago, and they treated him according as his accounts appeared, having no knowledge of him, and no purpose except the truth. The result was that one of them went to the penitentiary, where he ought to be, and his punishment was an honor and a credit to the administration, and the result was that the other was indicted, when he ought to have been; for although acquitted, I must tell you here that, impressed with the complaints that were made that undue severity had been exercised toward Mr. Strobach, I directed the transcript of the trial, and all the evidence, and the judge's charge, and everything connected with that case, to be laid before every assistant attorney-general in the Department of Justice, including the Solicitor-General, and had the judgment of each separately, neither one of them knowing that the other had passed upon it; and the judgment of all thus taken was that Paul Strobach ought to have been convicted.

I did this without expressing a word of my own opinion. In fact, I had no opinion, because I did not read the testimony, being resolved to be impartial to the last minute, and being resolved that the investigation thus made by me should be made in an honest spirit and in an impartial spirit, so that if it turned out that the man had been persecuted, and his acquittal was a just one, in the opinion of the majority of the gentlemen, I would have dealt with Mr. Cameron upon the spot, if there had been any evidence of his complicity in such severity, and I would have dismissed the examiner who occasioned the prosecutions. And now upon the record of the Department lie these opinions, these individual opinions, these unbiased opinions, of every one of these gentlemen, from the Solicitor-General down, condemning that verdict—a verdict obtained (as I have been informed by a great deal of honest testimony it was) by the skillful manner in which Mr. Strobach prepared his own jury.

This I tell you for your satisfaction, for I know very well that it will give you pleasure to know that all of this complaint which these evil-disposed men have instigated is, in the judgment of impartial men, not well founded. If they are entitled to the benefit of doubts, I am very sure that the Department of Justice, and myself particularly, acting from no personal motive, and from no personal knowledge of these men, and only governed by a desire to do a high public duty in an honest way, that I am entitled to the benefit of an honest doubt, too, both as to the integrity of my purpose, and the regularity of my action, and the honest policy of it, too.

Very respectfully, your friend,

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, July 11, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit a copy of an affidavit of Frederick C. Shaw, a member of the panel from which the first star-route jury was drawn, and copies of two affidavits of James A. Nelson, who swear that they were employed in the interest of the defense to corrupt the jury in the star-route cases. These sworn statements were obtained in the investigation which has lately been made into the subject under the supervision of Mr. Woodward, of the Post Office Department.

It was intended to have this matter brought before the committee in the form of oral testimony, with other evidence which would have been developed in the course of the personal examination of these witnesses, but having learned with regret that the committee, owing to the press of other things, and the time being limited, were unable to give it a hearing, though desiring the evidence and having summoned the witnesses, I forward the above-mentioned affidavits for the information of the committee, and with the request that the same may appear in your record to be considered in connection with the result of the star-route trials.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Hon. WILLIAM M. SPRINGER,

Department of Justice, House of Representatives.*

The attempt to bribe jurors.

AFFIDAVITS OF J. A. NELSON.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ss:

I, James A. Nelson, residing at No. 20 Covington street, between Q and R and Ninth and Tenth streets, northwest, do depose and say as follows: About the time that I was employed by the defense in the star-route cases, namely, the first Monday in December, 1882, I was engaged by Mr. A. B. Williams to look out and watch Government counsel, Government spotters, and the members of the star-route jury. My instructions from Mr. Williams was to report to him daily whatever I could find out about the parties named, and such other general information as might be of use to the defendants in the star-route cases, and particularly to watch the jury, see what connections they made at morning, noon, and night. I was continuously employed and reported to Mr. A. B. Williams on these matters from the time named until the Saturday after the verdict in the second trial. During the second trial of the star-route cases, Crossman, who was the agent or partner of John H. Crane, foreman of the jury, was daily around the court-house, and I saw him frequently in communication with Mr. John H. Crane aforesaid and the said A. B. Williams. Said Crossman was constantly around the corner of the court-house east and north of the city hall, where the jury were locked up during the time the jury were in their room, after they were charged by the judge, and I saw the said Crane send or give signals to said Crossman from the east side of the jury-room. The window Crane had was the second one from the northeast corner of the building. I saw said Crane signal from said second window to said Crossman and to A. B. Williams, from said window, and saw both of those gentlemen respond that they understood what he meant. Crane made nine motions with a fan he had in his right hand and by three taps on the window with his left hand. The last signal I saw Crane make, which was to said Crossman, was after the jury had agreed, and was done by Mr. Crane by his bringing his hands together near the center of the window and pulling them away from each other towards the outer extremities of the window, which meant that all was right—that it was a clean thing—the jury had agreed to acquit the defendants. This was the understanding between us all who were working for the defense. I learned of these signals from Ed. Taylor, before they were given.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ss :

I, James A. Nelson, on oath, do depose and say that soon after the termination of the second star-route trial, or about the time that Stephen W. Dorsey left the city of Washington, D. C., for the West, I think in the early part of August, I had a conversation with one Clarence Shields, a juror on the second trial. In said conversation said Shields stated to me that he had been treated badly by said Dorsey; that he (Dorsey) had left the city without making any arrangements to carry out the agreement made with him (Shields), and that he (Shields) understood that the white men on the panel with him in the trial of said cause had been treated differently. Shields further said that he thought it more than likely that Dorsey had fixed matters, but that the parties who had charge of the matter for said Dorsey had failed to carry out his instructions, and that he (Shields) intended to see Dorsey personally when he (Dorsey) returned to Washington, and have a full understanding about it. I had several conversations with Shields subsequently of about the same purport as just narrated, and in one conversation said Shields gave me to understand that something had been done for him, but that the agreement had not been fully carried out, and that it would have to be done when Dorsey came to the city. When said Dorsey came to Washington, in December or January last, I had a talk with Shields, and he told me at that time that he was on his way to Welcker's restaurant to see said Dorsey, and that he (Dorsey) had to do something for him or to get a position for his friends. I am also informed by a reliable person, whose affidavit can be obtained, that he saw Charles Jones, in company with a brother of Jackson Howard (another juror on said second trial), go to the house of said Jackson Howard on the night after said Howard was accepted as a juror in the star-route case, and that the said Charles Jones was at that time in the employment of the star-route defendants and received immediate instructions from A. B. Williams, one of Dorsey's lawyers.

While I was employed by the said A. B. Williams he paid me a compensation of $10 per week, settling with me at that rate in full, until the end of the second star-route trial. I had been previously employed by the said Stephen W. Dorsey in matters relating to the star-route trials, on account of which employment there was a balance due me of $28. When said Dorsey was in Washington, in January last, I sent him a statement of my account with him, showing said balance, and he (Dorsey) responded by sending me his check for said amount, and said check was payable at the First National Bank of Denver, Colo. This account was for services rendered Dorsey after the discharge of the jury in the first star-route trial, and under the personal direction of A. C. Richards, in the interest of the said Stephen W. Dorsey, on account of matters growing out of the first star-route trial.

AFFIDAVIT OF F. C. SHAW.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ss :

I, Frederick C. Shaw, being duly sworn, doth depose and say : While serving as a juror at the March term of the criminal court for the District of Columbia (1882) I received the letter marked A, bearing date April 26, 1882, from one Howard French (a son of the late Sergeant-at-arms, United States Senate) worded as follows :

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 26, 1882.

DEAR SIR : If you are down this way to-morrow please let me see you. I may be out in the forenoon, but will surely be in between 3 and 4.

Yours, &c.,

HOWARD FRENCH.

Mr. ———.

On the following day, between the hours named, I called at the Census Office, corner of Thirteenth street and Pennsylvania avenue, and asked for Mr. French, with whom I had no previous acquaintance. He came out into the hall and asked, "Is this Mr. Shaw?" and said "I don't recognize you as the party I wanted to see." He then said, "It is too bad for you to come so far for nothing; suppose we walk up to Willard's." We then started out together and went to Willard's Hotel. We entered the lobby, where we stood a few minutes in general conversation, when Mr. French was approached by one Col. William P. Rice, whom he introduced to me. French handed Rice a five-dollar note, thanking him for the loan of it, when Rice remarked, "It has been so long I had forgotten it; let us go in and break it up." We then went into the saloon of the hotel, where they took drinks and I took a cigar. We came out and talked awhile in the lobby, when Rice suggested that we go into the restaurant above Willard's, where they (French and Rice) again took drinks and I took a cigar. When we came out Rice and French engaged in a private conversation, after which Rice excused himself and went up Fourteenth street. As I was about to leave French again excused himself for bringing me on a wild-goose chase; said he understood that I was a mighty good clerk, and that Rice was a man for me to cultivate; that he (Rice) had been on the National Republican Committee as assistant secretary; was in the lobby and acquainted with nearly all the Members and Senators, remarking as his last words as I was leaving, "He is a damned good man to know."

On the afternoon of April 29, 1882, the following note, in pencil, was brought to my house by a colored boy, whom I afterwards recognized in the employment of Rice:

MR. SHAW:

Meet me at Willard's Hotel at 4 p. m. on ——. If you are not in when this arrives, come down at 6 o'clock. I will be in the office of hotel.

FRENCH.

APRIL 29.

"At 6 o'clock I was at the hotel, and while waiting to see French, Rice came up and shook hands with me. I asked him if he had seen French, as I had come down there by appointment with him. He said he had not, and after talking for a few moments he suggested that we go up to the Ebbitt House saloon, as French was more likely to be there. We went in and sat down to a table, and Rice ordered beer for both. Rice commenced a running conversation on general subjects, asking me how long I had been in the city, the extent of my acquaintance, who I knew among public men, and as to my circumstances and present employment. After answering his questions in a general way, he ordered two more beers and then said he would like me to come up to his office; that he liked me and might be useful to me. When we got to his office he (Rice) pulled out a roll of money, and laying two $20 notes on the table in front of me said, "I want you to get some information that is of importance to me. I do this on French's recommendation." I had previously told Rice that I was doing nothing except serving as a juror. He (Rice) then took from his pocket a list containing the names of the regular panel of petit jurors in the criminal court and asked me to look over the list and tell him all I could about each member—his politics, financial standing, habits, and the names of his nearest friends and acquaintances. I told him that I was on the panel and I didn't want to do or say anything in reference to the jury. He said he did not want to talk about any particular case, and that there was nothing improper in complying with his request; that he simply wanted to compare my views with information that he had already obtained. I looked over the list and gave him my ideas from the knowledge I had of the different members of the jury, which he noted on the margin of the same slip. Notes had previously been made on the slip opposite several names. I left him with the promise to meet him at his office on the following Monday, May 1. At that time he (Rice) took his breakfast at the restaurant under Willard's, and said that I would always find him there between 10 and 11 a. m., or at his office at 6 p. m. His office at that time was in the rear of the "Stone Building," corner of Fourteenth and F streets, next to Horbach's lottery office. I kept this appointment, and again the same matter was talked over, and I gave him such additional points as I had gathered. As I was about to leave he gave me $10 and said, "Use this around among the boys, and I will give you money in a few days to fix up your own matters." We walked down to the Ebbitt House, got beer, then into the cigar store, when he (Rice) asked for long Key West cigars, two for a quarter, which were given him, the box being taken from the shelf and not from the case. I then left him with the understanding that I could see him at his office or about the Ebbitt House in the evening, or at breakfast, mornings. I continued to meet him from time to time, always in reference to these matters.

On the 3d day of May, 1882 (the day previous to the postponement of the star-route trial on account of the absence of John W. Dorsey), Rice came to my house and was introduced to my wife and children. Before leaving he said to my wife that he had an important business matter with Mr. Shaw (meaning myself) that was developing, and would doubtless be to our mutual advantage. When I went to the door with him he put $40 in my hand, which I handed to my wife when I went in the room, she remarking that I would get in trouble if I did not keep clear of that man. During this conversation with Rice he told me that "Holmead had been seen," and that from what he said I could talk with him and possibly learn something to my advantage.

On the morning of the 4th day of May, after the adjournment of the court on that day, because of the absence of John W. Dorsey, William Holmead (afterwards a juror in the case) and myself walked down Louisiana avenue toward Seventh street. Holmead asked me if I had ever been approached by any one in the interest of the defendants in the star-route cases. I told him that the case had never been mentioned to me, but I had furnished certain information relative to members of the two panels of the criminal jury, and remarked that I had an intimation that he (Holmead) had been "seen." He said that he was first approached by a warm personal friend, who said to him, "You are an old contractor, and know how contractors have to turn corners to get out, and that that is all there is in the star-route business, and you ought to make some money out of it; that they (the defendants) would like to have me foreman of the jury, and that in that case I would get double what any one else did." He further stated that he had agreed that if I would join him he should accept the proposition, remarking that the money must be put up in advance. I told him to go ahead and that I would be with him. Most of this conversation took place in Mades' restaurant, corner of Third street and Pennsylvania avenue, where we had walked during our talk.

During the following week Holmead asked me to walk down to Seventh street with him, and we went into Buckley's cigar store, on E street, opposite the General Post-Office Department, and into the back room, where we sat down. After awhile Michael Talty came in and shook hands with Holmead, by whom he was introduced to me. They had a conversation for a few moments. He (Holmead) said to me as we started out, "Well, I am satisfied now. I would not have gone ahead on uncertainties." I asked him if money had been put up, and he said that he had the word of a man that it was all right, and that that was as good as the money to him.

I continued to see Rice every day, but nothing important occurred until the 30th of May (Decoration day), when I went to his office about 11 o'clock a. m. by appointment. At that time we went over the list of jurors again, and I gave him (Rice) ideas gathered myself and from conversations with Holmead. When I left him he asked me to come down again at 6 o'clock that evening, which I did. We then talked matters relating to the jury over again, when he (Rice) told me to wait at the hotel a few moments until he came back, and went up Fourteenth street to New York avenue. I crossed and went up on the opposite side and saw Rice go into Chamberlain's. I walked back towards F street, and when he came down he stopped at his office door a few moments, then walked up Fourteenth street and beckoned me to follow. We went into Franklin Square, and he there gave me $70 in ten-dollar silver certificates. This was my last interview with Rice until after the trial commenced.

On the morning of June 1, 1882, after having been challenged as a juror, I passed out into the east lobby of the court-house, where Senator Dorsey was walking up and down in company with Judge Charles Pelham. Dorsey stopped me and asked, "What was the matter with you and Merrick?" or words to that effect, and then turning to Pelham remarked, "This is one of Merrick's challenges. I never spoke to this man (meaning me) before in my life." As I came out in front of the city hall I met Col. William P. Rice, who, after greeting me, said he (Rice) had taken a room around on E street, No. 509, and asked me to come around there in about half an hour. I went around as requested, and saw him (Rice) in the back room on the second floor. He asked me what I thought about Murray and Tobriner. I told him that I did not know Tobriner even by sight, and only recognized Murray as a regular attendant at the court. Rice then said, "If those two men are all right it (meaning the jury) will stand twelve to nothing. I have told Dorsey that your services will probably be valuable, and you can consider yourself under pay and report to me here every morning about ten o'clock, when I will give you such points as we want to look up and you can report such information as you have obtained." Under this arrangement I was employed in the interest of Stephen W. Dorsey during the trial, reporting regularly to Rice, and frequently holding conversations with Dorsey himself about the court-house concerning the matters involved in my employment.

After Rice had remained a few weeks in his rooms on E street, he moved around on Sixth street, taking the parlor floor at No. 421, where I continued to report to him. At our first interview, under this arrangement, Rice told me that Stephen W. Dorsey had placed $12,000 in his hands to fix the jury. This was when he referred to Tobriner and Murray. And he then said, as he had nothing to do with them (Tobriner and Murray), it left him a balance of $2,000 in his hands, and he proposed to lay back a little and see what Brady and the other defendants would do for Tobriner and Murray, and that would leave him a stake to work with without calling on Dorsey for more funds. At this first interview with Rice, after the trial commenced, he (Rice) asked me which members of the jury I was best acquainted with. I told him Holmead and Doniphan. He then told me that he was acquainted with Doniphan's family, and had been boat-riding with his (Doniphan's) daughter "Flossie;" that he "had got onto him," and he believed him to be all right, but that I could sound him from time to time and see how the information I got from him agreed with what he (Rice) got himself. I had myself previously talked with Holmead and told Rice that I knew that he (Holmead) was all right, and that I could talk with him without reserve. Rice told me to keep my eyes open as regards all the jurors, the movements of Government counsel, and "spotters," and to interest myself particularly in Doniphan, and to have Holmead keep me posted as to everything that was going on.

On Sunday, the 4th day of June, by direction of Rice, I went to Holmead's store, on what is known as Holmead's Lane, between Mount Pleasant and the Seventh Street road. The store was locked, and I gave a little colored boy ten cents to go to Holmead's house, near by, and tell him a gentleman wished to see him at the store.

Holmead came down and we went into the store. We had a conversation, in which Holmead said if he had known that I would have been challenged he would not have served as a juror, but having made the agreement that he had he should go through with it. I told him that from what I could understand he would not be alone and he need not feel anyway nervous about it. I asked him if any one had approached him in behalf of Brady. He said, no, his agreement only related to the two Dorseys, and that was as much as he wanted to carry. While engaged in this conversation Mr. Andrew Lipscomb (Holmead's lawyer) and a man then introduced to me as a Mr. Harmon, drove up to the store in a buggy. They went in—got a drink—ginger ale and whisky—when Lipscomb remarked to me that he was sorry I was challenged, as he regarded Holmead and myself the two strongest men on the jury for the Government. After they drove away Holmead and myself walked up to Holmead's house, where he introduced me to a man by the name of Stewart, and then we all went around in rear of the house, where Holmead picked some strawberries to fill an order. After walking back to the house, where Stewart left us, Holmead walked with me towards the lane. As we separated I said to him I shall not have anything to say to you around the court-house, but will manage to see you from time to time. He says "We must be mighty careful about this thing; no one will mistrust me, as I have a good deal of property in my own name, and shall be worth at least $60,000 when mother dies, and which is practically mine now."

Edward D. Doniphan lived in the same section of the city I did, and in view of what Rice had said I always talked freely with him and he never hesitated to express himself freely to me; and from his conversations I always inferred that he was in full accord with the defense so far as the Dorseys were interested. On Monday morning, June 5, 1882, I went to Rice's room on E street, and he had company, but said he would meet me at the east front of the Capitol about dusk that evening. He did so, getting off of the car at Sanderson's corner. We went into the bar-room of Sanderson's and got a drink, and then walked up the extent of the Capitol grounds to First street, where we sat down on the stone coping. I related to him the result of my interview with Holmead, and a conversation held on Saturday with Doniphan. While engaged in this conversation, Searles, a baliff of the court, and a lady passed us, and Searles recognized us. I remarked, "that is Searles, Doniphan's son-in-law." Rice replied, "I don't care a damn; you are not on the jury. That is Flossie with him, that I was telling you about."

Some time the last of June or early in July Rice left the city, and I think was gone about a week; it was while the Washington Light Infantry was at Cape May, and that is where he stated to me that he went. Soon after his return the subject of Spencer came up, and Rice stated that that was part of his business away; that Spencer did not really know anything, but that he had talked and didn't want to go on the stand and go back on what he had said; that his (Spencer's) damn mouth had cost Dorsey $100,000, and that he (Rice) was the only man in the United States that could put his hands on him.

On the second or third Sunday in July I went out to Holmead's store; sent a boy up to his house, as before; the boy said he could not find Mr. Holmead, that he was down in the field. I started to walk down that way, and found Holmead laying in the grass with two men. When he saw me he got up and went with me to the store. There we talked over the star-route trial matters, and arranged signals to be given by him from the jury-room. These signals were never used.

During August Rice was again out of town. The first knowledge I had of his return to the city he came to my house about 8 o'clock at night on Saturday, the 26th day of August; he came in a close carriage, which he said he got at the Ebbitt House. It was raining hard; Rice seemed a good deal excited, and said that Dorsey had given him $1,000 for Doniphan, and he (Dorsey) supposed he (Rice) had placed it, but he (Rice) had been led to believe that Doniphan was all right and had held the money. He further said he knew that Doniphan hadn't been fixed; that I should see him Sunday and make an appointment, so that I could bring them (Rice and Doniphan) together, as he (Rice) wanted to give Doniphan some money. Rice said he would give Doniphan two or three hundred dollars to make him easy and satisfy him that everything was all right; that he (Rice) was obliged to leave town on Sunday night, and did not feel safe to go away until it was fixed, and that in case I failed to see him at 12 o'clock to meet him (Rice) at the Baltimore and Potomac Depot at 9 o'clock and he would pay me the balance due me, requesting me to come to his (Rice's) room at 12 o'clock Sunday, and let him know how the matter progressed. I saw Doniphan Sunday morning at the three-cent car stand in the Capitol grounds, and we walked around and sat down on the Senate steps on the west side of the Capitol. I told Doniphan "this party wanted to see him;" that he was a man that he knew, or who claimed to be acquainted with his family. While we were talking it commenced to sprinkle and we separated, Doniphan promising to see me in the afternoon at the same place. I went to Rice's room, on Sixth street, at 12 o'clock, and the lady there told me that Rice's baggage had been sent to the depot, and she supposed he had gone. I saw Doniphan in the evening and told him I failed to see the party, but that I had an engagement to meet him at the Baltimore and Potomac depot at 9 o'clock, and asked him to go down. He said that he had to go as far as the church door with his wife; that he would leave her there and meet me at the depot. He failed to keep the appointment, and I remained at the depot until the departure of the 10.40 train, but missed seeing Rice.

On Friday, the 1st of September, I had a talk again with Doniphan on Pennsylvania avenue between the Capitol and Four-and-a-half street. From what he said to me about the standing of the jury, I felt satisfied that Dorsey had been "played." I passed Holmead in the west lobby of the City Hall near the door of the city surveyor, and in a moment's conversation which we had he expressed the fear that he stood almost alone. This was during recess. I crossed over in front of Hagerty's restaurant, and Dorsey came across in company with Colonel Ingersoll. Colonel Ingersoll passed in the door, and Dorsey came up to me and asked what was the matter—saying that I didn't look happy, or some such remark as that. I said to him, "Do you know when Rice will be in town?" He replied, "What do you want of him. I gave him your money before he went away; and if he has not fixed it I will." I said, "That is all right, I can wait until he comes; it is your own matters that bother me. I don't like the looks of things and think Rice ought to be here." Dorsey then asked, "What is the matter?" I said, "Well, Doniphan, I am satisfied, hasn't got a cent." Dorsey replied, "Why I gave Rice $1,000 for him." I then repeated to him the conversation between Rice and myself at the house on Saturday night. Dorsey then told me to see Doniphan and find out what I could Saturday and to come to his house at 12 o'clock on Sunday. I did not see Doniphan Saturday, but on Sunday, the 3d of September, I went to Senator Dorsey's house opposite the Arlington Hotel. A colored boy, about sixteen years old, came to the door. I went into the parlor, and in a few minutes Dorsey came in. He took out some cigars and handed me one and said, "Now tell me about this Rice business." I then went over the whole matter and told him that from what I learned there was not more than two men on the jury he could depend upon. He says, "Well, we must have Rice here. I have trusted him with everything." He called his oldest son by the name of "Colonel"—"Colonel come here. Get your tablet and pencil and write." He then dictated this. "William P. Rice, Hoffman House, New York. Must be here by 12 o'clock to-morrow without fail." After requiring his son to read over what he had written he told his son to go up stairs and copy it into the book and to send it to the telegraph office at once. Dorsey then said this is the first intimation I have had of any hitch; who can we depend on. I told him there was no question about Holmead. He says, "I want you to go out and see him and let me know to-morrow." I went out to Holmead's, and he (Holmead) said that unless the jurors were lying they were almost unanimous for conviction. I said, "Well, I suppose you are going to stand fire." He answered, "Yes; I am going to see Dorsey through." I says, "How about John Dorsey?" He replied, "The evidence is stronger against him than it is against any one." I replied that his agreement as I understood it was for the two Dorseys, and that S. W. Dorsey wouldn't want to be acquitted if John was sacrificed. Holmead finally said, "All right."

Monday morning, the 4th of September, 1882, I saw Dorsey again in front of Hagerty's and related to him the result of my interview with Holmead. He says, "Well, Rice will probably be here during the day and matters will have to stand as they are until he comes." On Tuesday (September 5) I again saw Dorsey in front of Hagerty's and asked him if Rice had come. He said he had not, and then remarked that you (meaning me) seem to be the only one uneasy, that every one else seems to be in good spirits and thinks it all right. Dorsey then asked me what I thought of To-briner. I told him that I had never come in contact with him, but that I had always been assured by Rice that he was all right. He told me to try and have a talk with Doniphan, and to let him know in the morning if I learned anything of importance.

On the morning of Wednesday, September 6th, I met Doniphan at the southeast corner of the Capitol, as he came up New Jersey avenue, on his way to the court-house. We walked around to the west side and he asked me the time. I told him it was early to get to the court-house and proposed that we sit down and have a talk. We then sat down on the Senate steps, west front, and I asked him what he thought of Ingersoll's speech. He replied that it was having big effect, and if Dorsey proposed to do anything now is the time. He said himself and Martin had been taking notes together through the trial, and that he (Doniphan) could control him. He then went on to say that he was hard pressed, or hard up, not having drawn any money for some time. I told him that the party I had spoken to him about and that I wanted to introduce to him on that Sunday was still out of town, but that I could possibly arrange it to get hold of a little money for him and arrange things satisfactorily, and told him all he had to do was to say the word. He said, "Well, wait and see what turns up to-day, and I will see you this evening." We then walked down the avenue. At Four-and-a-half street he crossed the avenue toward the Colonization Building and I kept straight down to Seventh street. At about 12 o'clock on the same day Dorsey was standing by the curb in front of Hagerty's and called me to him. He asked me if I had seen Doniphan. I told him I had, and gave him the conversation between Doniphan and myself, in substance. Dorsey made some remark about Rice not being here, and then asked me if I could fix this. I replied, if you have got a friend who will act for you I will bring him and Doniphan together to-night. He replied, impatiently, "God damn it, no; there are enough in this already; you must do it, Shaw; all may depend on him. I will stand by you as long as you live." I replied, "Well, I will see him to-night, and you had better arrange matters at once." He told me to meet him at 3 o'clock at Chamberlain's. I went there and passed through the front room into the back room. Dorsey was sitting in the corner by the door between the two rooms and beckoned to me. He handed me $250—two $100 greenbacks, one $20 national note, and three $10 silver certificates. The rooms were in confusion on account of preparations to move, the building having been sold or rented to the Young Men's Christian Association. Dorsey remarked, "Don't make any mistake; I will take care of you." At our previous interview in the morning Dorsey told me that I could give Doniphan a small amount for immediate use, and that he (Dorsey) would stand by any further arrangement that I made with Doniphan. Dorsey further said that he had plenty of influence, and could get all the places in the Departments he wanted, and that I could guarantee Doniphan a good position in addition to any money he might receive; that he (Dorsey) had got Rice's brother a place in the Pension Bureau. Rice had previously shown me a letter written by Commissioner Dudley to Senator Dorsey in effect that he (Dudley) would be gratified to appoint his (Dorsey's) friend Rice to a position in his Bureau, and to send him to him, so that he could talk with him personally and ascertain his qualifications and grade him. Rice was appointed by Dudley.

On the same evening (Wednesday, the 6th of September) I went down to the music at the east front of the Capitol, expecting to see Doniphan. As he did not come I sent my boy to his house on New Jersey avenue to tell him I was there. He sent up word that he would be up at about 7 o'clock. After the music was over I left and went down in the city, and have no knowledge as to whether Doniphan kept the appointment or not.

On Thursday morning, the 7th of September, I met him (Doniphan) again on his way to the court-house. I asked him why he did not keep his appointment, and he replied that things looked bad; that Dickson had been offered $25,000, and had reported it to the court, and that there was likely to be hell when the court met. I then left him, and did not see him again until Friday morning (September 8th) by the Lincoln Monument just as he was going into the court-house. I passed him, neither of us stopping. I remarked, "Do the best you can; I will guarantee everything to be all right." He answered back, "I will see how they stand" (meaning the jury). I also passed Holnead in company with Olcott; called him to me for a moment; told him to be careful of Doniphan, and not to commit himself to any one on the strength of what might have been said to him. After dinner, about 4 o'clock, I came down the street. A man by the name of Byrne came up to me on the avenue between Four-and-a-half and Sixth streets; told me he had just come from my house, and that A. B. Williams wanted to see me at once. I went around to his (Williams's) office, and he told me that Doniphan had "squealed," and that he (Williams) wanted me to go at once with him to Chamberlain's. I told him I had heard nothing, and asked him for particulars, which he gave me. He then handed me two car tickets, and told me to take the avenue cars, and that he would go up on the F-street line and meet me at Chamberlain's, which was done. We went into Chamberlain's, walked back to a small room in the rear where there was a bar and got cigars. Williams asked me several questions about the matter, and I told him I had nothing to say to any one except Senator Dorsey. We walked out into the front room, where everything was still in confusion. A large man, whom I supposed to be Mr. Chamberlain, apologized for the condition of things in the rooms. In a few moments Dorsey came in. Williams walked back into the rear, and Dorsey says, "Now, Shaw, what are you going to do?" I told him I was going to stand; that I wasn't the "squealing" kind. Dorsey said, "Well, what are you going to say?" I said my idea is to make light of it and to say that I was merely sounding Doniphan and had no money, and no idea of bribing him. He then remarked, "Then you didn't succeed in getting the money into his hands." I replied "No," and Dorsey replied, "That is good; now I want you to go out and tell Colonel Ingersoll." I went to the carriage standing at the curb and said to Colonel Ingersoll, "This whole thing is a put-up job, and there is nothing in it so far as Dorsey is concerned." Ingersoll replied, "Of course not; I know that, my boy." I then went back into the house and had a further talk with Dorsey, and showed him a letter which I had received that morning from William P. Rice, of which the following is a copy:

[Globe Hotel, Syracuse, N. Y., Dickinson, Austin & Bacon, proprietors.]

SEPTEMBER 4, 1882.

F. C. SHAW, Esq.:

MY DEAR SIR: I have been here several days—go farther North to-night. Will be in Washington probably next Saturday evening—by Monday morning, sure, and will arrange your matters. Hope everything is right as I left it.

Sincerely yours,

WM. P. RICE.

A line here will reach me Friday morning; let me hear from you by return mail.

Dorsey told me not to answer the letter and to keep away from Rice, adding, "You keep the money you have got on account of anything that he (Rice) may owe you; keep away from him. I will settle with him." He then called Williams and told him that he (Williams) was to act as my attorney; that he would procure bail if necessary and do everything essential for my defense, and at the same time instructed me to confide fully in Williams and be governed by his advice and counsel. Since that time Williams has been my counsel and I have acted in accordance with his instructions.

On the day previous to Dorsey's departure from the city (early in October and after the trial) I went to Dorsey's house, No. 1403 K street NW., by appointment. He then and there told me that Williams would have charge of all of the details of my case in the event I was indicted, and that he would arrange matters with him to provide against expenses, &c. Dorsey further said that I could have Colonel Ingersoll, William A. Cook, Davidge, or all of them if necessary. He said that Cook was under pay from him at that time and that he expected Davidge to take the place of McSweeney. This was the last interview I had with Dorsey until meeting him at the court-house during the progress of the second trial.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 3, 1884.

HENRY D. LYMAN recalled and further examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Mr. William P. Wood and Mr. William A. Cook were before this committee a few days ago, and Mr. Cook then denied that he had ever written a letter recommending the allowance of an extra month's pay to John A. Walsh upon route 40101, Mr. Woodward having testified that such a letter had been written and subsequently withdrawn and destroyed by Mr. Cook. Mr. Wood stated that a clerk by the name of Green had, at his request and as a personal favor to him, brought to him from the post-office files the jacket covering certain papers, and that he had taken that jacket to Mr. Totten, who was counsel for some of the star-route defendants, in order to show what action the Department had taken with regard to the remission of fines and the allowance of an extra month's pay to Mr. Walsh, and he testified that that jacket at that time did not contain the papers that they were looking for; from which he inferred that those papers had been destroyed or suppressed. Please state what action the Department did take in the matter of the allowance to Walsh, and whether such a letter as Mr. Woodward testified to, written or indorsed by Mr. Cook, was ever exhibited to you.

The WITNESS. As I understand you, Mr. Cook's denial is a denial of the statement that he ever joined with Mr. Gibson in recommending the allowance of one month's extra pay to Mr. Walsh.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, that is it; the denial having reference to some recommendation which was said to have been made in writing.

The WITNESS. Such a letter was written. After the application by Mr. Walsh for a month's extra pay was refused, he brought suit in the Court of Claims for the amount, and testimony was taken before Mr. R. S. Boswell, a commissioner. In my testimony before the commissioner I made no allusion to that letter, because I forgot it. Mr. Gibson subsequently testified before the commissioner, and my recollection is that he stated that he and Mr. Cook had united in a letter recommending the allowance of one month's extra pay to Mr. Walsh. As soon as I read Mr. Gibson's testimony it refreshed my recollection and brought the letter clearly back to my mind. Mr. Gibson was asked whether that letter should not be on file, and he said it ought to be; which was very proper, of course. I then made a search on the files to find the letter, but was unsuccessful. I had my clerks search for it, but they could not find it, and I thought it very remarkable that they could not find that letter. Some weeks afterwards Mr. Woodward came into the city from Connecticut, and we were discussing this Walsh case in the Court of Claims, and I said to him, "By the way, there was a letter written by Gibson and Cook recommending this extra month's pay; I distinctly remember it, but I have made search on the files and cannot find it. It is a very singular thing that it has disappeared." Mr. Woodward at once said, "I can tell you all about that letter. One day Mr. Cook asked me to go up stairs and get that letter. I went up stairs and got it and took it down to the room, and while we were there talking Mr. Cook read it and leisurely tore it up into small pieces and threw them into the waste-basket. I did not think anything of it at the time, as we were talking of other matters; but I recollect his tearing up the letter. I said, "Mr. Woodward, that letter was a part of the files of the Department, and ought not to have been destroyed." He said, "That is so. I did not think of that at the time I gave it to Mr. Cook." I distinctly recollect the letter. I think I am not in error as to what Mr. Gibson testified to in the Walsh case in the Court of Claims. That testimony is now on file in the Court of Claims, and can be examined if necessary.

Mr. GIBSON. I think it is not filed. I think the stenographer gave it to Mr. Wilson, one of the counsel for the star-route defendants.

The WITNESS. I think you are in error there.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Wilson told me he had the testimony. That is all I know about it.

The WITNESS. Mr. Boswell told me that he had, with the acquiescence of Mr. Walsh, shown the testimony to Mr. Wilson, but that it was now filed in the Court of Claims.

In relation to the testimony of Mr. Wood about the disappearance of a paper from a remission case on route 40101, I presume he refers to a paper which was indorsed by Mr. Gibson and Mr. Woodward and Assistant Attorney-General Freeman, recommending the remission of certain fines and deductions which had been imposed upon Mr. Walsh as a contractor upon that route. Mr. Wood's testimony as to the absence of that paper from the jacket is correct. After the remission in that case was made, I took that paper out of the jacket and placed it in my safe, for the reason that I feared somebody might abstract it. It was the only paper we had to show why the remission had been made, and I took extra precautions to see that it was secure. I feared that some person might abstract it from the files. Mr. Wood says that Mr. Green did take the jacket to one of the counsel for the defense, and I think that fact goes to show that my action in taking the paper out of the jacket and taking extra precautions to preserve it was amply justified.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. It was for the purpose of preserving the paper that you took it out of the jacket?—A. For the purpose of preserving it, and as Mr. Green took the balance of the papers in that jacket to one of the counsel for the defense and only discovered the absence of that paper in that way, it shows, I think, that my apprehensions and precautions were well founded.

By Mr. GIBSON :

Q. Do you recollect that I asked you to look up that paper, as well as two affidavits made by Walsh?—A. No; I do not recollect that.

Q. And afterwards got them from you?—A. I cannot recall it. It is probably one of those things that happened, but I do not recall it.

By the CHAIRMAN :

Q. At any rate, whether that was suggested by Mr. Gibson or not, it was done.—A. Yes, sir. I will tell you something further that occurred about that paper. We subsequently called for Mr. Green's resignation, for reasons which I do not think it necessary to state here. We thought he was incompetent for the place, and I think the testimony of Mr. Wood amply justifies us in calling for Mr. Green's resignation, although we did not at that time know of the facts as Mr. Wood states them. In the trial of the Dorsey case a subpoena was sent up by the court calling for that jacket and all the papers. In the mean time I had had a certified copy made of the papers that I had taken out. I had done that as an additional precaution. I had put the certified copies in the jacket and placed the originals in my safe, and when the papers were called for by the court I withdrew the copies from the jacket and put the originals back in it, and sent them down. Since they went down to court those papers have disappeared in some mysterious manner, and I have had to have another certified copy made in the place of them.

Q. Then the originals are not now on file in the Department?—A. I cannot find them anywhere. So you see Mr. Wood was correct in his statement that that paper was out of the jacket.

Adjourned.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 3, 1884.

GEORGE M. SWEENEY sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Please state your residence and occupation.—Answer. I reside in Washington. I am chief clerk of the contract office of the Post-Office Department.

Q. How long have you been employed in the Department?—A. I was appointed in April, 1875. I resigned in July, 1882. I was reappointed in October, 1882, and have been there ever since.

Q. There has been some question before this committee and some conflict of testimony as to whether there was ever filed in the Post-Office Department a letter or communication signed by Messrs. William A. Cook and A. M. Gibson, recommending the allowance of a month's extra pay to John A. Walsh as a contractor on route 40101. Do you know anything about any such paper?—A. I have seen a paper purporting to be signed by William A. Cook and I think by A. M. Gibson. I am certain that it purported to be signed by Mr. Cook. I think it was addressed to H. D. Lyman, Acting Assistant Postmaster-General, or to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, a paper recommending such allowance.

Q. About what time was it that you saw that paper?—A. That was in 1881 or 1882. I think in 1881, in the summer time, but I cannot fix the exact date. I should say that it was certainly after the 21st day of May, 1881, and I think it was before cold weather, but I am not certain about that.

Q. Do you know whether that paper is now on file in the Department?—A. I do not know of my own knowledge, but I have been told that it is not on file.

Q. If it has disappeared from the files, you do not know anything about the circumstances of its disappearance?—A. Not of my personal knowledge.

Adjourned.

CHAPTER IV

THE first of the four great principles of the constitution is the principle of the separation of powers. This principle is the foundation of the entire system of government. It is the principle which divides the powers of government into three distinct departments: the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. Each of these departments is vested with a separate and distinct power, and each is held accountable to the people for the exercise of its power. The separation of powers is the principle which makes the government a government of laws, and not a government of men. It is the principle which makes the government a government of the people, and not a government of the few. It is the principle which makes the government a government of the future, and not a government of the past.

THE OTTMAN CASE.

WASHINGTON:
GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.
1884.

THE OTTMAN CASE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 15, 1884.

The chairman laid before the committee the following papers:

APPLICATION OF OTTMAN FOR DISMISSAL OF PROCEEDINGS AGAINST HIM.

NEW YORK, January 21, 1882.

SIR: I respectfully beg leave to call your attention to certain civil suits and criminal prosecutions now pending against me in the supreme court of the District of Columbia and in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia, and ask your favorable consideration of this application for their dismissal.

At a criminal term of the supreme court of the District of Columbia held in December, 1875, I was indicted for the larceny of about $47,000, alleged to have been taken from the Treasury building in Washington about June 2, 1875, and also charged with having received said moneys, the property of the United States, knowing them to have been stolen.

The indictments were consolidated by the order of the court, and I have been twice tried upon them in said court; the first trial was commenced March 21, 1876, and ended April 13, 1876, the jury disagreeing, standing seven for acquittal and five for conviction; the second trial was commenced March 29, 1877, and ended April 13, 1877; the jury disagreeing, standing eleven for acquittal and one refusing to vote, declaring his opinion to be that the evidence would not justify a conviction, but that the jury ought to disagree, so that there could be another trial; this fact is shown by written statement, signed by eleven of the jurors, sworn to and now on file among the papers of the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, and which read as follows:

"We, the undersigned, jurors in the case of W. H. Ottman, do honestly aver that at this last trial in the month of March, 1877, the jury stood eleven (11) for acquittal, and the other one when questioned, replied, 'that he would not vote for acquittal, and the evidence was insufficient to convict,' consequently the jury failed to render a verdict.

H. R. GODDARD,
JULIUS VIEDT,
S. R. WALLS,
WILLIAM A. SCOTT,
JAMES LYNCH,
ORLANDO BELL,
LOUIS P. SEIBALT,
WILLIAM GRIFFIN,
WILLIAM BECKETT,
J. E. PARSONS,
R. E. TALIAFERRO,

and sworn to by James Lynch, one of the said jurors."

The eleven jurors who were in favor of acquittal, for the purpose of testing the dissenting juror, inquired of him whether in case they would all vote for conviction he would vote with them, and thus put an end to the case. He replied that he would not, because he thought the testimony given on that trial was not sufficient to justify a conviction.

That since said second trial, ending in April, 1877, no action has been taken by the United States in or concerning the further prosecution of said indictments, but the same are now pending.

That in August, 1875, the United States commenced a civil action against me in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, to recover said sum of about $47,000, and and a warrant of attachment issued therein, and about $3,000 of my property, real and personal, was attached; that I filed a motion to quash said attachment and said attachment was quashed in July, 1876, and the United States prayed an appeal to the general term of said court, but no further action has been had or taken by the United States therein, and that said suit is now pending.

That in August, 1875, another civil suit was commenced against me by the United States, in the corporation court of Alexandria, Va., to recover said $47,000, and an attachment was issued therein, and certain money, stocks, and certificates of mine were attached, and then said suit was, by the United States, moved into the circuit court of the United States, for the eastern district of Virginia. That I filed my answer in said action and that nothing further has been done therein, and that said action is now pending.

That besides the above suits the officers and authorities of the United States seized in 1875, and now hold, nineteen thousand five hundred dollars of my money and refuse to surrender the same.

Thus all my money and property, the fruit of many years of honest industry, are seized and held and tied up by the United States. I am innocent of the crimes charged against me, and I respectfully submit that I ought not to be further prosecuted in these criminal and civil actions.

In December, 1877, I addressed a letter to the Hon. Kenneth Rayner, Solicitor of the Treasury, asking him to take action in these cases, and to cause them to be dismissed. That application was, as I am informed, the same month referred by the Solicitor to the Attorney-General and by the Attorney-General referred to H. H. Wells, the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, for action, but no action has ever been taken in regard thereto.

I now respectfully ask you to carefully examine, or cause to be examined, these civil and criminal actions, and if consistent with the public interests, the due administration of justice, and your sense of public duty, that you will direct, or authorize the proper district attorneys for the District of Columbia and the eastern district of Virginia, to discontinue said civil suits, and enter a nolle prosequi on said indictment.

I feel sure that you will on such examination become satisfied that I cannot be convicted on said indictment, nor can the United States be successful in said civil actions.

The United States may oppress me and embarrass me, yet I respectfully submit that where no result favorable to the Government can be expected, it should not hold my property, nor continue said indictment against me for all time.

Very respectfully, yours,

W. H. OTTMAN.

Hon. BENJAMIN H. BREWSTER,

Attorney-General for the United States, Washington, D. C.

CORRESPONDENCE.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, February 2, 1882.

SIR: I inclose copy of the petition of W. H. Ottman, praying for the dismissal of all proceedings against him founded upon the charge that he stole about $47,000 from the Treasury building in June, 1875. You will please report the status of the case against Ottman, and advise me whether in your judgment his request ought to be granted. With your report please return the inclosures.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

GEORGE B. CORKHILL, ESQ.,
United States Attorney, Washington, D. C.

OFFICE OF UNITED STATES ATTORNEY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C., February 27, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 2d instant, concerning the cases of the United States vs. William H. Ottman, and of the 7th instant, inclosing a petition of Mr. Ottman's for the dismissal of the pending proceedings against him.

In reply to your request for a report as to the status of the cases, and my opinion as to the propriety of complying with the petitioner's request, I beg to say that in the summer of 1875 Ottman was indicted in the supreme court of this District for the larceny of $47,097.65 of the moneys of the United States from the United States Treasury building in this city.

He was also indicted for receiving the same money knowing it to be stolen, and for receiving it knowing it to be embezzled.

These indictments were subsequently consolidated and twice tried together, as stated in the petition, the jury upon each trial failing to agree. The last trial was in 1877, since which time no action had been taken in the cases. It will be seen that Mr. Ottman was indicted seven years ago; but the last trial was in 1877, while the office of district attorney was held by my predecessor, who did nothing further in the cases, although he remained in office three years after that time. At the time the criminal proceedings were instituted a civil suit was brought against Ottman in the supreme court of the District for the recovery of the amount of the stolen money. Upon the filing of this suit an attachment issued, which, on the 17th of August, 1875, the marshal returned executed upon the property set out in three schedules filed with the return. These schedules embraced:

(1.) A horse and mare, appraised at $1,000, which were subsequently sold, under order of court, and the net proceeds, $277, paid into the registry of the court, where it now remains.

(2.) The stock and fixtures of a bar-room, appraised at $797.85, which were subsequently released to the defendant upon his entering into bond with sufficient security to make good the value of the property in the event of a judgment against the defendant.

(3.) Certain real estate in the city of Washington, standing in the name of the defendant, but which proved to be encumbered to the amount of its value.

No appearance for the defendant was entered in this case other than a special appearance for the purpose of a motion to quash the attachment; which motion prevailed in the court of first instance, but this decision was reversed by the general term, to which the case was appealed by the United States. This reversion was entered May 21, 1877, since which date no step has been taken in the case, except the payment into court of the proceeds of the sale of the horses, June 6, 1877, and the release of the other personalty under bond, December 19, 1877. No issue has ever been made up upon the merits of the case.

In connection with the criminal proceedings, the police authorities of this District acquired possession of the sum of $19,525, of which $14,500 was obtained from the German Bank of Alexandria, Va., where it had been left as a special deposit by Ottman; $1,025 was found upon the person of the defendant, and the balance was obtained from two persons who were alleged to have received it from him for the purpose of having the notes, which were of large denominations, changed and their identity lost. This money, I am informed, is now in the hands of the Treasurer of the United States as a special deposit, subject to the order of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. The title to it is, of course, involved in the pending criminal prosecutions, and is still undetermined. These are the substantial facts as they appear of record in my office.

Having been of counsel for the defendant in both the civil and criminal cases, I cannot with propriety now advise the plaintiff (the United States) as to its further action in the premises, and I therefore respectfully suggest that you designate some member of the bar as special assistant district attorney, whose duty it shall be to investigate the cases with a view to determining whether they should be further prosecuted, or dismissed, and to take entire charge and control of any action.

In accordance with your request, I herewith return the petition of Mr. Ottman.

Very respectfully,

GEORGE B. CORKHILL,
United States Attorney, District of Columbia.

HON. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, March 4, 1882.

SIR: Acknowledging the receipt of your favor of the 21st ultimo, in relation to the case of the United States vs. W. H. Ottman, now pending in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, in which you state that, having acted as counsel for the defendant in both the civil and criminal cases, you cannot now with propriety advise the plaintiff as to its further action in the premises, I have to request that you will place in the hands of George Bliss, esq., whom I have designated to act on the part of the Government, and who will make a report to me, all the papers in your possession relating to the cases.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

OFFICE OF UNITED STATES ATTORNEY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C., March 7, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 4th instant, directing me to hand to George Bliss, esq., the papers in the case of the United States vs. William H. Ottman, and shall have pleasure in complying with your instruction whenever Mr. Bliss shall call for the papers.

Very respectfully,

GEORGE B. CORKHILL,
United States Attorney, District of Columbia.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., March 4, 1882.

SIR: I invite your attention to the inclosed copy of a letter dated the 21st of January, from W. H. Ottman, and a copy of a letter from G. B. Corkhill, United States attorney for the District of Columbia, in relation to certain civil suits and criminal prosecutions now pending against said Ottman in the supreme court of the District of Columbia and the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia.

It having been represented to me by the district attorney that he had acted as counsel for the defendant in both the civil and criminal cases, and therefore cannot with propriety advise the plaintiff—the United States—as to its further action in the premises, I have informed Mr. Corkhill that you have been designated to take charge of these cases, and that he will hand over to you all papers relating to them, and I shall feel obliged if you will be kind enough to report to me at your earliest convenience what conclusions you may reach.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

GEORGE BLISS, Esq., Washington, D. C.

REPORT OF GEORGE BLISS, ESQ., RELATIVE TO CERTAIN PROCEEDINGS AGAINST OTTMAN.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 25, 1882.

DEAR SIR: I duly received your favor of March 4, transmitting me a copy of a letter from W. H. Ottman and a letter from United States Attorney Corkhill, in relation to certain civil suits and criminal prosecutions now pending against Ottman in the supreme court of the District of Columbia and the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia, and stating that Colonel Corkhill had, before he became district attorney, been counsel for Ottman, so that he could not advise the Government as to the cases, and asking me to report at my early convenience what conclusions I arrived at on the request contained in Mr. Ottman's letter.

Mr. Ottman's letter requests that certain civil suits against him be dismissed, a nolle prosequi entered on an indictment, and money seized as his be returned to him.

The nature and details of the proceedings, civil and criminal, are stated in general terms in Colonel Corkhill's letter. They are, briefly, an indictment pending in this District for receiving money knowing it to be stolen and embezzled; a civil suit pending in the supreme court of the District for the recovery of money alleged to be stolen, in which suit an attachment of property which netted $211 was realized and a bond was given for $797.85 more; and, finally, a civil suit for the same purpose now pending in the circuit court for the eastern district of Virginia, in which a debt due from a bank as a deposit for about $12,500 was attached.

Nothing has ever been done in the civil suits beyond some litigation as to the attachments. In connection with the criminal proceedings the police acquired possession of $19,525, of which $14,500 came from a box deposited in the German Bank of Alexandria, $1,025 from the person of Ottman, and $4,000 from a person to whom Ottman is alleged to have given them. This money is in the hands of the Treasurer of the United States as a special deposit, subject to the order of the Commissioners of the District.

Mr. Ottman says:

"Thus all my money and property, the fruit of many years of honest industry, are seized and held and tied up by the United States. I am innocent of the crimes charged against me, and I respectfully submit that I ought not to be further prosecuted in the criminal and civil actions."

He states that he made a similar application in December, 1877, on which no action was taken.

Since I received your letter, I have devoted much time to the examination of the case. I have received from Colonel Corkhill a large mass of papers, many of them originals, of importance. I have procured and examined the elaborate minutes of the testimony taken on the two trials of the indictment, though the copy is not quite complete. As one trial lasted about twenty-two days, and the other fifteen, this alone has involved no slight labor. I have also consulted Judge MacArthur, who tried the case the last time.

Judge Olin, who presided at the first trial, is dead. I have consulted Mr. Wells, who, as district attorney, tried the case, and Mr. Jeremiah Wilson, who, as special counsel, assisted him. I have also seen Mr. Merrick, who was one of Ottman's counsel, and I think I have ascertained all that can be learned. The facts are substantially as follows:

Early in June, 1875, there disappeared from the Treasury Department a package of money containing something over $47,000. It had been put up for the Park Bank, New York, and was discovered to be missing when the packages of that day were sent to the Adams Express office in the room under that in which it was put up. The circumstances of the disappearance left no doubt that it had been stolen by or with the connivance of some one employed in the room where it was put up. Some months subsequently, Benjamin B. Halleck, who was employed in the room, was arrested for the robbery, and Mr. Ottman was arrested charged with knowingly receiving the money, and the civil proceedings specified were also taken against him. Halleck was tried and convicted, but his conviction was set aside at general term. Ottman was tried in April, 1876, before Judge Olin and a jury, and the jury disagreed, standing five for conviction and seven for acquittal. On this trial the court obviously leaned very strongly against the accused, and Halleck's alleged statements, made out of court, under inducements, more or less direct, while he was under arrest, were admitted in evidence. Ottman was tried a second time, in April, 1877, before Judge MacArthur and a jury. On this trial the case of the Government was prepared and presented with wonderful industry and great ability. Every apparent trace of evidence was followed out by the district attorney and special counsel employed. I have never known of a case which seemed more carefully prepared or more thoroughly tried. On this trial Halleck became a witness for the Government under a written agreement with the Attorney-General that if he should testify fully and fairly in this and other cases growing out of the transaction he should himself be freed from prosecution. His story upon the stand was in many respects absurd and improbable. In conversation with me the counsel for the Government do not pretend to believe it was true in important respects. Halleck's story was, briefly, that he did not take the money and knew nothing of its being taken, but that some ten days after it was taken, one Gates, an utter stranger to him, approached him in a drinking saloon and, with very preliminary caution, in effect told him that he, Gates, stole the money and had hidden it in a water-closet in the Treasury building and wanted Halleck's assistance to remove it. Halleck claims that he undertook the job, after consultation with Ottman, and that some days afterwards they got the money away and Ottman kept it, and that they promptly cheated Gates of any share in it, an outrage which he seems to have endured quietly. No man ever saw or heard of Gates. He is a myth. I have no hesitation in saying he never existed, and it is physically impossible the money could have been taken in the manner Halleck says Gates told him he took it. In short, Halleck appeared upon the witness stand the self-confessed recipient and taker of stolen money. He told a story which was in one important respect—the creation of the fabulous Gates—a patent untruth. It was too much to ask a jury to believe anything such a man said. Had he come forward and admitted that he was the thief and was repentant, and wanted to aid the Government to get its own, I think it quite probable he would have been believed. As it was, he was torn to pieces under cross-examination, involved in contradictions, and, if I may judge from the evidence and from what is told me, must have presented a pitiable spectacle.

Apart from Halleck there was no direct or indeed any really incriminating evidence against Ottman. It was shown that Ottman was shortly after the robbery in possession of large sums of money. This money was much of it in bills of $500, which was the denomination of those stolen. There was millions of such bills outstanding. The nearest that the Government could come to an identification of the bills that Ottman had with those stolen was the general recollection of one clerk that among the bills put up that day, those in the stolen package included some numbered in the seven thousands, and a considerable number of the bills found in Ottman's possession were numbered in the seven thousands. Ottman was at the time the proprietor of a large drinking saloon, doing a large business and a man of some means. Some attempt was made on his part to show the possession of considerable sums, but on the whole I do not think, except possibly as to one witness as to one occasion, they were at all successful in showing Ottman possessed at any time of any such amounts of money as were traced to him at this period, while some of his witnesses on this point were, I think, undoubtedly liars. At that time Ottman could not be a witness in his own behalf.

Both before and after his arrest Ottman acted in a very extraordinary manner as to the money found in his possession and as to other money shown to have been disposed of about that time by him. Without going into details, his conduct with reference to the money was such as, it seemed to me, to leave no reasonable doubt that the money he had he desired to conceal and to dispose of without being known. If it was not a part of the money stolen from the Government, it must have been, to judge from Ottman's actions, the proceeds of some other improper transactions. The whole evidence leaves no moral doubt upon my mind that the money seized was in fact a portion of the $47,000 stolen from the Government, though I am not prepared to say that were I a juror, under oath, I could so find; and it is of course possible that Ottman under oath could show that my belief in this respect is not correct. I think as the evidence now stands I should turn Scotchman and say, "not proven."

The condition of things is, then, this: The Government lost $47,000. It has seized in Ottman's possession, or as his, about $33,000, which is I believe a portion of this money. This occurred in 1875. The Government has since in two trials, one in 1876 and one in 1877, sought to satisfy a jury of this latter fact and has failed. On the first trial it had the advantage of a court which ruled strongly in its favor. On the second trial it had the advantage of a case prepared with greater care than often happens. The defendant's mouth was shut. The undoubted thief was seeking under every inducement to swear himself into immunity and freedom. The recollection of the facts were fresh in the minds of all the witnesses, and none were missing. I do not see how the Government could ever again expect to have so favorable situation.

If another trial was now had it would appear that Halleck had been discharged on his own recognizance and has gone to one of the Western Territories. If he were found, as I assume he could be, and were brought here as a witness—though I am told that he would not come if he could avoid it—he would not feel himself in any danger from the Government, and would, therefore, not be a very earnest witness in its behalf. I am told he feels that he was badly treated by the Government; he would naturally not care to revive and repeat the story of his own disgrace. Assuming, however, that he were as honest and willing as ever, he must, so far as possible, tell the same old story, with all its patent absurdity as to Gates. As much of his story is an undoubted lie, he must of necessity become more and more involved in contradictions. It would be impossible after this lapse of time that, under cross-examination, he should not be involved in even greater contradictions and absurdities than before, so that he would be utterly discredited. Without him, the evidence for the Government would be wholly inadequate. With him, it would be largely discredited. As Ottman can now testify in his own behalf he would, even if he were guilty, have no great difficulty in giving a story to account for his possession of so much money, which could be discredited only in case he were a man unable to stand a cross-examination. I do not know what sort of a person he is, but, if guilty, I incline to think that he could at this late day "stand the racket." One or more of the witnesses against Ottman are dead.

In only one respect has it been suggested that the Government would stand better now than it did on former trials. The moral atmosphere of the court and jury rooms is believed to be more favorable to justice now than it was at the time of the former trials. The court could not possibly be more favorable than Judge Olin was on the first trial. On the second trial Judge MacArthur seemed to have been fair and to have believed the money found in Ottman's possession was the Government's, but that it was not proven to be so. As to the jury, they stood, as already stated, on the first trial five for conviction and seven for acquittal. On the second trial they stood eleven for acquittal and one who refused to vote either for conviction or acquittal, saying there was not enough to convict. Among the eleven there was at least a majority of fair, honest men, than whom no better men could be found in the jury-box on a new trial.

I have no idea that on a third trial a conviction could be had. I have found no one who will say he thinks so. Mr. Merrick, who defended Ottman, is confident that such a result could not be obtained, and his judgment is entitled to some weight, because he is careful not to say that the money is not in fact the Government's. Judge MacArthur informs me that he does not think a conviction could be had, though I judge he believes Ottman guilty. Mr. Jeremiah Wilson, who tried the case as special counsel for the Government and is strongly convinced of Ottman's guilt, does not venture to express an opinion that a conviction could be had, though thinking that if Ottman were forced to a new trial he would settle by giving up all claim to the money. As, however, some of it has passed from him by assignment, he could not control it. Mr. Wells, who was district attorney, says he has no idea a conviction could be had.

The case in its final result is then this: The Government has tried twice to convict Ottman under circumstances more favorable to it than could again occur. It has failed, and by a great preponderance, with the jury. It has done nothing for over five years. During that time it has held $33,000 of money found in Ottman's possession or under his control, and maintained its attachment on $14,000 more. Ottman now asks that the proceedings, civil and criminal, should be dropped and the money returned to him. I do not see how the Government can refuse this request so far as the criminal proceedings are concerned. It has no right to expect to be able to convict him. Assuming as I do that the money is part of that stolen from the Government, still I am confident that no jury will ever in a criminal case be convinced of that.

As to the civil proceedings in the case pending in this District, the United States has realized on what property it attached and has no very marked interest to proceed with that suit, unless it could extend its attachments either on mesne process or execution to the $19,500 seized by the police. Assuming that it could do this, it could only hold it by proving in that suit that it had failed to prove in the criminal suit. It must prove Ottman's guilty participation in the receipt of the money. There is no evidence it could rely upon other than what it had in the criminal suit. Halleck would be needed to swear to the same story and would be equally discredited. There would be the same detail of evidence as to the $500 bills. Twelve days after the robbery Ottman was in possession of about $10,000, most of which was in bills of $500 some of or all of them being Treasury notes. There is no proof of their number or anything to identify them with those stolen. There were at that time about 148 million dollars in $500 Treasury notes outstanding, and about 28 millions of that particular series. A month or so later he is shown to have had other bills of the same denomination to the extent of several thousand dollars; but there is just as little proof of their identification. The bills found in the box deposited in the German bank were 29 bills of $500 each. They were Treasury notes, all even numbers, one numbered 2342, one 5172, one 5200, eight between 6950 and 6998, but in no case continuous numbers, and 16 between 7006-7158, but in no case continuous numbers. The ordinary run of notes of these numbers had been issued from the Treasury Department eight or ten months previously, and at the time of the robbery the Treasury was issuing notes numbered from about 48000 upwards. There had, however, shortly before the robbery, been received for redemption a package of notes which had been issued at some previous time, and the package put up for the Park Bank was made up from these notes so received. Among them one witness remembered, as already stated, that there were some notes numbered in the seven thousand, but he said the numbers were "mixed up." There was no other identification of the notes stolen with those seized than is found in the foregoing facts. It is, of course, singular that Ottman should be found eight or ten months after the original issue with so many notes numbered from 6900 to 7100. But there were two numbered in the five thousands and one in the two thousands in the same lot. Moreover, the theory that the bills found in Ottman's box were a portion of those put up for the Park Bank involves the assumption that some person or institution had had in his possession these bills with numbers so nearly continuous for many months and had returned them to the Treasury for redemption, though they were in fact nearly new. Obviously if a person could keep them so long and send them to the Treasury, it is equally possible that a person could keep the bills in the same manner and pass them directly or indirectly to Ottman. I do not suppose this did in fact occur, for I believe the money in Ottman's box belonged to the Government; but apart from Halleck's evidence the only proof of that is this proximity of numbers, and that, together with Ottman's acts and his anxiety to conceal the box, constitutes the only evidence of Ottman's guilt. I don't believe it would convince a jury any more than it did in the criminal case.

The fact of the bills being only even numbers with no odd ones would seem to show that they are not in the order in which they originally went from the Treasury Department, for I learn on inquiry that bills when first issued are carefully kept in their numerical order.

Mr. Wells, the former district attorney, seemed, on an interview, to think that, as the suit in Virginia was in equity, and therefore no jury would be needed, a decision favorable to the Government could be had there. But it would be necessary to prove Ottman's guilt in the same manner as in the other cases. The money deposited in the bank by Ottman could be shown to have been in part at least bills of the denomination of $500, or the proceeds of such bills. But there is no proof as to the numbers of any of them. Other than this the Government must rely upon Halleck and such other evidence as it had in the criminal case. I do not quite understand the nature or theory of this suit in equity, but, assuming that Mr. Wells states it correctly, it could at most result in a judgment for the $12,500 remaining to Ottman's credit.

Having arrived at the conclusion that the Government cannot succeed in its suits, civil and criminal, I have still been impressed by a strong reluctance to advise the absolute surrender of the money the Government holds, for, as I have already said, I believe it is part of the stolen money, and I am unwilling to see such a total failure of justice as I believe would be involved in that course. I have therefore sought to see if, so far as the civil suits were concerned, some compromise could not be effected. I have been baffled in this attempt by the fact that a considerable portion of the money has, by assignment, passed from Ottman's control, and that the legal title to much of it is subject to the claim of the Government in other and bona fide holders. Within a few days, however, I have been led to believe that if it were understood that the Government would take no action unless that course were pursued, an arrangement could be made by which, on the release of all its other claims, the amount attached in Virginia, about $12,500, would be surrendered. This is the sum embraced in the proceeding in which no jury would be necessary, and is all that, in my opinion, the Government would stand the remotest chance of securing by litigation. If you will authorize me to make a negotiation of that sort, I have considerable hope that I can succeed. I ought to add that in such an arrangement all claim by Ottman or his assigns for interest or damages should be waived. If the result of litigation were against the Government the amount of this claim would be considerable.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS.

HON. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

REPORT OF GEO. BLISS, ESQ., RELATIVE TO THE SETTLEMENT OF THE OTTMAN CASES.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, June 3, 1882.

DEAR SIR: Acting upon the authority given me by you on the presentation of the report I made in the case of the application of W. H. Ottman, I have with much difficulty agreed upon the following compromise:

1. Mr. Ottman is to surrender to the Government a sum equal to the amount secured by the attachment in Virginia, to wit, twelve thousand five hundred dollars, and to release all claim for interest, damages, &c.

2. The Government is to release all claim upon all other funds seized or attached, and to discontinue all civil proceedings pending, but the proceedings in Virginia to be left pending until Mr. Ottman can have an opportunity to make arrangements with claimants who will assert their claims after the Government claim is discharged by the payment to it by the agreed sum of $12,700.

3. The criminal proceedings will of course be dismissed, as all agree that they cannot succeed. This should be done as a matter of justice, independent of any compromise as to the money claims.

If you ratify this arrangement I suggest that to carry it out you direct the district attorney of the District to dismiss all civil and criminal proceedings in this district, and that you request the Commissioners of the District to surrender the money in their charge, except that $12,700 thereof should be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

A letter should be addressed to the district attorney having in charge the suit in Virginia to dismiss that suit, but that money be delivered to Mr. Ottman for use when he shall so desire.

If this is done the matter will be closed, and, under the circumstances, greatly to the advantage of the Government in my opinion.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS.

HON. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

THE ARLINGTON,

I also transmit a release and transfer executed by Ottman.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE BLISS.

Release not inclosed; will be sent.—G. M.

ADDITIONAL CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO THE CASE.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, June 3, 1882.

SIR: Referring to previous correspondence concerning the case against W. H. Ottman, I have to inform you that George Bliss, esq., to whom the case was committed as special counsel for the United States, has this day reported to this Department that a settlement has been reached, which settlement I have ratified and approved.

(1) According to the settlement, Mr. Ottman is to surrender to the Government a sum equal to the amount secured by the attachment in Virginia, to wit, $12,700, and to release all claims for interest, damages, &c.

(2) The Government is to release all claim upon all other funds seized or attached, and to dismiss all civil proceedings pending, except the proceedings in Virginia, which are to remain for such time as may be necessary for Mr. Ottman to make certain arrangements with claimants, after the claim of the United States is discharged.

(3) All criminal proceedings are to be dismissed at once—all agree that they cannot succeed. Accordingly you are hereby directed to dismiss all civil and criminal proceedings against Ottman in this District.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
*Attorney-General*GEORGE B. CORKHILL, Esq.,
*U. S. Attorney, Washington, D. C.*DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, June 3, 1882.

GENTLEMEN: The cases of the United States against W. H. Ottman, both civil and criminal, have been settled. The terms of settlement, so far as you need be cognizant of them, are as follows:

(1) Mr. Ottman is to surrender to the Government a sum equal to the amount secured by the attachment in Virginia, to wit, $12,700, and to release all claim for interest, damages, &c.

(2) The Government is to release all claims upon all other funds seized or attached and to dismiss all civil proceedings pending except the following in Virginia, which are to be left pending until such time as Mr. Ottman can have opportunity to make assignment with claimants who have claims after those of the Government.

(3) All the criminal proceedings against Ottman are to be dismissed.

According to this arrangement you are requested to surrender to Ottman the money in your charge, $12,700, which should be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

The COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, July 6, 1883.

SIR: In reply to yours of the 30th ultimo, which refers to a bill in equity pending at Alexandria, Va., against W. H. Ottman, and incloses correspondence betwixt yourself and the United States attorney for Virginia in the same connection, I have to say that I had supposed that the office of the latter contained information of the arrangements made in June, 1882, on the behalf of the United States with Ottman in that regard. Upon the 2d of that month a letter, of which I now inclose a copy for yourself, was transmitted by me to Mr. Wise, at that time United States attorney for Virginia.

The direction therein, to make no entry, for a time, of such arrangement upon the record of the court, of course did not affect the obligation of giving fit answer to any inquiry thereabouts which might be propounded in the regular course of business.

Inasmuch as the United States put up no further claim under the above bill, it seems to be, of course, that any one interested therein may apply to the court and obtain corresponding entries upon the record.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

The SOLICITOR OF THE TREASURY.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.
Washington, June 3, 1882.

SIR: In the cases against W. H. Ottman a settlement has been arrived at. In accordance with the terms thereof Ottman is to surrender to the Government a sum equal to the amount of the attachment in Virginia, to wit, the sum of $12,700, and to release all claims for interest, damages, &c.

The Government is to release all claim upon all other funds seized or attached, and to dismiss all criminal proceedings except those in Virginia, which are to be left pending until Mr. Ottman can have opportunity to make arrangements with claimants who have claims subsequent to those of the Government.

You will please act in accordance with the terms of this arrangement, as far as the proceedings in Virginia are concerned.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, July 9, 1883.

SIR: Replying to your telegram of the 7th instant and this date, you are instructed to dismiss civil suits now pending in the U. S. cir. court at Alexandria, Va., upon defendant's paying all costs, because, as I understand the report of Mr. Bliss, upon the faith of which the case was settled, all the moneys were to be released except a sum equal to the amount attached in Virginia, about $12,700, which amount, I am informed by the Treasurer, was paid into the Treasury 6th of June, 1882. Because this money, which was attached in Virginia, has been assigned by Ottman, prior to this settlement, it was left in that condition to be paid over to the assignee, a sum equal to that being paid into the Treasury, viz., $12,700, as above stated.

Very respectfully,

Was $12,500 all the Government was to have in the Ottman case, or was it also to have the $12,500 in Alexandria? There is an impression that the United States was to have both. Please answer immediately, as court at Alexandria adjourns to-day and the United States attorney wants to dispose of the case.

WASHINGTON, March 15, 1884.

WILLIAM A. COOK recalled and further examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Will you please state to the committee what you know in regard to the so-called Ottman case, the case of the United States vs. W. H. Ottman, which was pending for some time in the District of Columbia, and afterwards compromised?—Answer. I was employed as one of the attorneys of Mr. Ottman. Mr. R. T. Merrick was first employed.

Q. You were an attorney for the defendant?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. State first, if you please, the nature of that complaint and the indictment.—A. There were three indictments found against Mr. Ottman—one, 10917, for receiving United States notes knowing them to have been stolen.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. About what was the amount alleged to have been stolen?—A. $47,197.65. The second indictment was 10924, for receiving United States notes knowing them to have been embezzled. The difference was as respects their being stolen or being embezzled. The third was 11704, in which he was charged with larceny and receiving stolen and embezzled goods and property.

By Mr. FVAN:

Q. They all grew out of the same subject-matter?—A. All grew out of the same subject-matter.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. At what term of the court were those indictments found?—A. I do not remember the exact term, it is so long since. The numbers will determine that. I think in June or October term, 1875.

Q. What was done, so far as the court was concerned, in regard to the trial of this case?—A. There were two trials. The first was on indictment No. 10917.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Was any of the money supposed to have been found?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Can you state the amount?—A. I can. There was a package obtained, supposed to be money that was stolen, which embraced about $19,000. It was obtained from a restaurant on Seventh street, where it had been deposited by Mr. Ottman, and was dug out by the detectives.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Were there any other funds found in Alexandria?—A. There were funds deposited by Mr. Ottman in Alexandria, and those funds were attached as his property.

Q. How much in all did the Government get possession of and attach on account of the money that was stolen from the Treasury?—A. In Alexandria, they attached $14,500. Then they obtained the $19,000 that was in the package I have mentioned. And there were some other amounts that I do not remember accurately that were obtained.

Q. How much in all did the Government obtain by seizure?—A. The amount that they seized was probably altogether $40,000, or perhaps $45,000.

Q. The Government lost how much?—A. The Government lost all but about $12,000.

Q. How much in the first place?—A. About $48,000. I am glancing at a statement from me published in the Evening Critic and in the New York Post some time ago, and I procure these figures from those sources.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. In addition to that was there not $10,225 found on the person of Ottman which was claimed by the Government?—A. There was some found on him.

Q. And about $4,000 found on another person to whom it was alleged Ottman had delivered it?—A. Yes.

Q. That is in addition to the other sums?—A. Yes, sir. And then there was some deposited in Riggs' Bank, and he had when arrested a deposit certificate or check or draft, and that went to one of the attorneys.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. The two trials, I believe, resulted in disagreements of the jury?—A. Yes, sir. In the first trial the jury stood, as we gathered afterwards, seven for acquittal and five for conviction. In the last there was one in favor of conviction; he was an unyielding, irresistible colored man; he "hung" the jury.

Q. Have those indictments been nolle prossed since?—A. They have; the records of the court so show.

Q. When were they nolle prossed?—A. I think only a month or two ago; a short time since. It may have been longer.*

Q. Were any civil suits instituted to recover this money?—A. There was one civil suit instituted here, and there were civil suits instituted in Virginia. The civil suit here was 14481.

Q. Against whom was that suit commenced?—A. That was an action instituted for money had and received and illegally obtained; that was against Ottman, and, as far as it progressed, it was decided in favor of the United States up to the time of settlement. I might give a reference. In 3 McArthur Rep., p. 73, the proceedings and decision in an attempt made on behalf of Ottman to quash the attachment will be found.

* The record shows it to have been November 23, 1883.

Q. Did they proceed to judgment?—A. No, sir; that was never finally disposed of.

By Mr. FVAN:

Q. Was it a plea in abatement or just a motion to quash?—A. It was a motion to quash the attachment, which the court decided could not be done. And under that attachment, I do not know the amount, but some of Ottman's property was obtained. Until the time of the compromise of the case, the suit in Alexandria remained undetermined.

Q. Has that now been settled?—A. It was embraced in the compromise that was made.

Q. Just explain what compromise or adjustment was made of these civil suits.—A. That question, Mr. Chairman, I cannot answer. I was entirely ignorant of the fact of any of the cases. They were carried on and concluded without any consultation in any form with me, or notice to me.

Q. Did you represent Mr. Ottman in the compromise?—A. I did not. He was represented, so far as my knowledge extends, chiefly by Richard Crowley, of New York.

Q. What position in the governmental service did Mr. Crowley occupy at the time?—A. I do not know. He was a member of Congress at one time.

Q. He was a member of the last Congress?—A. Yes, sir. He came into my office some time (I am not sure of the date) in the fall of 1881. He was a stranger to me, but came, if I remember correctly, with a note from Mr. Ottman, stating that he had engaged him to act in his case. Mr. Crowley first sought information from me by various inquiries, which I gave to him, and after I had explained the cases fully to him I observed that I was of the opinion that he was engaging in a difficult, delicate, and perhaps hopeless task; that I could not see how the cases could under the law be compromised in the attitude in which they then existed.

Q. Explain the difficulties that occurred to you.—A. Yes, sir; but perhaps I had better first finish the conversation with Mr. Crowley. He then stated that he was aware of that fact, but that he thought he had a position or influence enough to enable him to secure an adjustment. Now, the difficulties to which I referred were these, and to bring them out clearly will require a reference (which shall be as brief as possible) to the law. I have said that when Ottman was arrested there was a package of $19,000 or more obtained by the detectives.

Section 408 of the Revised Statutes, in relation to the District of Columbia, and in relation to stolen, lost, or abandoned property, provides, among other things, that the property alleged or supposed to have been criminally obtained, and which shall come into the custody of any member of the police force or the criminal court, shall be placed in the custody of the property clerk.

Section 414 declares that stolen property or money taken from any person arrested, or which is supposed to be the proceeds of crime, shall be returned to the person from whom taken only on a written order of the court, after the evidence, that the person arrested is innocent, or that the property rightfully belongs to him; then that it shall be delivered to the accused person himself, and not to any attorney, agent, or clerk of the accused person.

Section 431 provides that it shall be unlawful for any private detective, or any member of the police force, or for any other person to compromise a felony, or any other unlawful act, or to participate in, assent to, or assist with any person suspected of crime to escape a full judicial investigation by failing to give knowledge of facts or reasonable cause of suspicion, or by withholding information relative to the charge or suspicion from the proper judicial authorities, or in any manner to receive any money or any other compensation from or on account of any person arrested or subject to arrest for any crime or supposed crime. And it is declared that violations of any of these provisions shall be deemed as compounding a felony; the punishment to be the same as provided by law for aiding criminals to escape the hands of justice.

Now, it was with reference to those clear and distinct provisions of law that I stated to Mr. Crowley that I was unable to conceive how there could be a legal compromise of the cases. I need not make any comment on the law, because that is your province and not mine.

Q. What was the condition of these cases prior to this compromise?—

A. The criminal cases stood open upon the docket so that a third trial could have taken place. The third trial would probably have been more unfavorable to Mr. Ottman than the previous trials, for there was, to my personal knowledge, additional facts that could have been ascertained, and there would have been a breaking of the ties of friendship between Ottman and some other persons who had co-operated with him in the former trials, from whom fresh information could have been obtained. Whether others knew that, I do not know. My relation would not allow me to so state, still being the attorney of Mr. Ottman. The civil cases only remained to be pressed, and a judgment could unquestionably have been obtained. The difficulty in the trial of the criminal cases arose from the fact that the rule of law, which you gentlemen so well understand, required proof that left no reasonable doubt of guilt, while the civil cases were unembarrassed by that rule, and only required a mere preponderance of evidence. I conducted the examination in one or two trials, especially of the officers of the Treasury Department. They swore with considerable certainty that the money ($19,000) produced was money which they believed had been put up in a package for the Park Bank of Boston, if I remember correctly; and on cross-examination I pressed the witnesses on that point, and took up each separate note, presenting it and asking them, "Can you now positively swear that that was one of the notes?" The answer was necessarily a negative, although there was no doubt in the minds of the witnesses that it was, and it was that chiefly that prevented a conviction—not exclusively, but chiefly. Now, in a civil case, that strictness and severity of proof would never have been required. I have never had any doubt of what the result would be in the civil cases, and in corroboration of that I declined to enter into the civil suits. Mr. Merrick and the late Senator Carpenter appeared in them. I told Mr. Ottman I would defend him on the indictments, but I would not appear in the other cases.

Q. There was then clearly a preponderance of evidence of the fact that this was the actual money that had been stolen from the Treasury?—A. There was no doubt about that. There only remained a question of doubt in the criminal case. That was all.

Q. The Treasury officials, as I understand you to say, recognized the original packages, as they believed?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. There could be scarcely any doubt that the money found on Ottman and attached at Alexandria and that found in the restaurant here was actually the money stolen?—A. Yes, sir; and from personal conversation and knowledge, I can have no doubt that Mr. Ottman would have been willing to compromise the case by having a nolle prosequi entered in the civil suits. I am sure at one time that was his disposition.

Q. Have you any knowledge of the manner in which the settlement was made?—A. Not the slightest. I received no portion whatever of the proceeds of the settlement. My information would conduct me to the conclusion that Mr. Ottman received $4,000 or about that sum, and that the balance was divided up among persons who in the settlement were to a great extent invisible.

Q. Were you able to discern who they were who received any portion of this money other than Ottman?—A. It was said that Mr. Richard Crowley received a considerable portion. It was said at one time, it may be wholly incorrect, but it was a current rumor—such as attorneys gather in their offices or in consultation—that Mr. Bliss got $1,000; not as a fee, but it was said to have been pressed upon him. However, that may not be at all correct. It was also said that Mr. Merrick obtained some of it, but of that I have no knowledge whatever. I presume there must be a receipt somewhere.

Q. Do you know how much was deposited in the Treasury of the United States?—A. I think it was $19,000. It was the amount obtained from Ottman.

Q. I mean how much went into the Treasury of the United States finally?—A. Oh, I do not know excepting by a current rumor. Every one connected with the case was consulted in the settlement but myself and Mr. Carpenter, who was dead.

By Mr. FVAN:

Q. How much did the Government get in that compromise?—A. I have been informed that it got about $12,000. And the idea that I had all along was that the law to which I have referred was really prohibitory against any such settlement in such a case. Besides, they could have attached that money as it existed in the hands of the authorities or obtained a verdict for it in that form.

The CHAIRMAN. In order to explain the settlement I will put in evidence the report of Mr. George Bliss with relation to the settlement of cases pending against W. H. Ottman in the eastern district of Virginia.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. It seems, according to this report, that the Government received $12,700. Now, what became of the rest of the money?—A. I do not know. I never received any of it, nor was any of it ever offered to me.

Q. Then there was $19,000 which was seized in a restaurant here which was a part of this same found?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. According to this compromise, that was released to Mr. Ottman?—A. Yes, sir; that was released to Mr. Ottman.

Q. Besides the attachments made of money found upon his person?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How much would that leave to be divided among the attorneys of Ottman and himself?—A. I do not know how many he had engaged in securing the compromise.

Q. Do you know who were engaged in securing the compromise?—A. The only parties that seemed to be engaged distinctly, so far as my information is concerned, was Attorney-General Brewster, Mr. Bliss, and Mr. Crowley.

Q. Who on the part of Ottman?—A. Mr. Crowley, so far as my knowledge goes was the representative, and the only representative, in the settlement that was made by Mr. Bliss. I have no information that leads me to connect any other person with it.

By Mr. STEWART:

Q. Was he the representative of Mr. Ottman?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then he was not the representative of the Government, of course?—

A. No, sir; he was the only party that ever imparted any information to me of the intention to have a compromise effected. I had already stated, before you came in, that he came to my office and asked me for information about the case, and stated that he was authorized by Mr. Ottman to effect a settlement.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. In the report of Mr. Bliss to the Attorney-General, dated Washington, D. C., March 25, 1882, he says: "Nothing has ever been done in the civil suits beyond some litigation as to the attachments." Do you know whether that states all the facts or not in regard to the civil suits?—

A. Some of the property of Mr. Ottman was attached in a suit that was instituted in this District, and part of it, being perishable property, was sold. Of that I have personal knowledge, but what was the amount released, or what became of the proceeds I do not know.

Q. There was no doubt, then, but what the Government made a legal seizure of the sums of money to which I have referred?—A. There is no doubt about that, and the suits only needed to be pressed to a conclusion, in my opinion, to have obtained a judgment in behalf of the United States.

Q. For the whole amount that was found on Ottman and in bank at Alexandria and in the restaurant here?—A. Yes, sir; and apart from the way the law tied up the amount found in the package and found on his person, there was no difficulty in instituting a suit for money had and received for that amount, if the law was not sufficient to hold it.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Was Mr. Ottman a man of any property outside of what he had received in this way?—A. No particular property.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was there any other evidence against Ottman than the testimony of Halleck?—A. There was some.

Q. Halleck was a clerk in the Treasury Department?—A. Yes, sir. In the first trial Mr. Halleck was not a witness. In the second trial he became a witness.

Q. What was the defense that Ottman set up?—A. That the money belonged to him personally; that it was not the stolen money. One of the chief questions involved was the identity of the money. It was unfortunate that the Government kept no schedule of the notes sent out or of their class, so that the officers could testify only from memory. That raised the question keenly as to whether the money discovered was the money that was actually stolen.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Did it appear on the criminal trial, by the testimony of Halleck, that he delivered large packages supposed to contain money to Ottman?—A. Yes, sir; he so testified.

Q. And that he obtained that money from some secret place in the Treasury building?—A. He was a clerk, and it was part of his business to engage in putting up packages or directing them. Packages were thrown in a mass on a desk and he took the package, or rather his friend Gates (mythical and shadowy) took the money.

Q. And, as he represented, deposited it in a secret place?—A. Yes, sir; in a secret place, in a closet, and afterwards it was taken from that closet.

Q. By Halleck?—A. By Halleck, in connection with Ottman—the two operated together.

Q. Would you feel at liberty to say whether you at the time believed the truth of the statement of that witness so far as the taking of this money from the Treasury Department was concerned?—A. I did not believe him. I did not believe that there was any person whom he designated as Gates, or if there was, it was some special friend of his whose name——

Q. That is not the question. Did you, as an individual, entertain a shadow of a doubt that the money which had been seized by the Government was in fact the money which had been taken from the Treasury Department?—A. My inner conviction was that it was the money.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Could you have returned a verdict to that effect upon the evidence that was produced upon the trial?—A. In a civil suit I would have had no hesitancy at all, but in a criminal suit I could not. There was too much uncertainty.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. But the weight of evidence——A. (Interrupting.) The weight of evidence tended unquestionably to show that it was the money taken by Halleck out of the Treasury Department.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Still there was a reasonable doubt?—A. Still there was a reasonable doubt.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. That doubt was raised from the manner of your cross-examination of the witnesses?—A. Very largely and primarily.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You have stated something in regard to the probabilities of the result of a third criminal trial.—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did I understand that you thought the evidence would be stronger against Ottman in a third trial?—A. I had such information.

Q. Mr. Bliss in his report says:

I have no idea that on a third trial a conviction could be had. I have found no one who will say that he thinks so.

What have you to say about that?—A. He did not consult me. I had no knowledge of the proceeding at all.

Q. He states that Mr. Merrick took that view.—A. Well, Mr. Merrick primarily advised, when the case became intricate, Mr. Ottman to plead guilty and accept a proposition of the United States to give him a light sentence. I, at the request of Mrs. Ottman chiefly, antagonized that proposition, and stated that we were employed to defend within the limits of the law Mr. Ottman and not to aid him in pleading guilty.

Q. Mr. Bliss, in his report to the Government as to the civil suits, says:

As to the civil proceedings in the case pending in this District, the United States has realized on what property it attached and has no very marked interest to proceed with that suit, unless it could extend its attachment, either on mesne process or execution, to the $19,500 seized by the police. Assuming that it could do this, it could only hold it by proving in that suit what it has failed to prove in the criminal suit.

H. Mis. 38, pt. 3—2*

Is that your understanding of this?—A. No, sir. There could have been additional information procured.

Q. Was it necessary to prove his participation in the stealing?—A. No, sir; not at all.

Q. The simple question was whether this was the Government's money?—A. That was the simple question.

Q. He might have been an innocent holder of it, and yet have had to pay it over?—A. Yes, sir. The facts as to his possession of it would have become important.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Do you think there was evidence which would have identified that money as the actual money taken from the Government?—A. In a civil suit I think the evidence was sufficient. The officers of the Government swore with sufficient positiveness, those engaged in putting up the packages, that it was the money—that that was their impression or conviction, but they could not identify any one of the notes.

Q. Would it not have been necessary in a civil suit, in order to recover that money, if Mr. Ottman was an innocent holder, to have identified it as the identical money?—A. It would have been necessary unquestionably to identify it as the money of the United States, but the point was that the evidence would probably have been sufficient where it was a mere question of the weight of evidence to have satisfied any jury.

Q. Does it not require pretty strong evidence to identify money—money which is changing all the time, and a thing so easily changed?—A. Certainly it does. It requires some evidence that is satisfactory to the minds of the jury.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. But the measure of evidence is different in the two cases?—A. Essentially so.

Q. One is governed by a preponderance, while the other needs only to carry a conviction to the mind of the jury beyond a reasonable doubt?—A. Beyond a reasonable doubt, or it must be such as leaves no other reasonable hypothesis of an honest possession.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Is it not your experience with juries that the amount of evidence it requires to insure a verdict in the one case and the other is usually about the same?—A. I think not. I have acquitted many men on that simple elementary principal of law.

Q. Don't you think that in this very case, or any other case exactly like it, where the question was one of identifying money, proving it to be the same money, the same bills that were taken, that if there was a doubt in the minds of the jury they would be liable to give the defendant the benefit of the doubt?—A. They might. But in view of the different quality, or rather quantity, of the evidence required, the conception I had of it was this: that considering the large amount of money, and considering the fact that civil suits could have been instituted and pressed, it ought to have been done.

Q. I am not asking what you as a lawyer, understanding of course very clearly the difference between the evidence required in civil and criminal cases, would have done, but what an ordinary jury would have been likely to do about it?—A. Perhaps my best answer to that question is one that I gave on this subject prior to your coming in. I was engaged to defend Mr. Ottman in the criminal cases. I declined to be connected with the civil suit, because I was of the opinion that in a civil suit the verdict of the jury would be against Mr. Ottman. That was my conviction at the time.

Q. What was the amount of money for which you would have advised civil suits to have been brought?—A. About $19,000 or $20,000, perhaps.

Q. This money was held by Ottman?

Mr. FYAN. He has told us that it had been attached.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Now, here was $19,000 which Ottman stated was his own property——

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. These suits were in rem, and he was only incidentally a party to the suits?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The property was seized as the property of the Government?—A. Yes.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. But he claimed that this was his own money, this $19,000?—A. He did.

Q. Now, do you not believe that an ordinary jury would require about as much evidence to decide to take that money from Ottman and give it to the Government as they would to have convicted him in a criminal suit?—A. I think not. There was another circumstance. There was a gentleman connected with the case commonly called Peg Leg Brown. He was indicted. Towards the termination of the second trial he was disposed to become a witness against Ottman, and, in point of fact, had received part of the money, taking it to Saratoga and other places, and passed it off, and he was prepared to become a witness.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Was that fact brought to the attention of Mr. Bliss?—A. I do not know.

Mr. FYAN. I suppose that the whole tendency of this evidence goes to show that neither Mr. Bliss nor any other Federal officer had a right to compound a felony. Is that the object of this testimony?

The CHAIRMAN. That is it.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. And beyond that, that it was not a provident adjustment.

Mr. FYAN. Then the two objects in view are, first, to show that it was an improvident compromise, and, second, that they had no legal right to make it under any circumstances?

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. Exactly.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Mr. Bliss says in his report:

Having arrived at the conclusion that the Government cannot succeed in its suits' civil and criminal, I have been impressed by a strong reluctance to advise the absolute surrender of the money the Government holds; for, as I have already said, I believe it is a part of the stolen money, and I am unwilling to see such a total failure of justice as I believe would be involved in that course. I have therefore sought to see if, so far as the civil suits are concerned, some compromise could not be effected. I have been baffled in this attempt by the fact that a considerable portion of the money has, by assignment, passed from Ottman's control, and that the legal title to much of it is, subject to the claim of the Government, in other and bona fide holders.

Now could there have been any bona fide holder who had acquired title?—A. Certainly not; and there was no assignment prior to the seizure of the money by the attachments and detectives.

Q. Well, could there be any right which would enable them to set up the claim that they were bona fide holders when the Government had attached this property?—A. No, sir; there could not be. And there was a record in the police department of the money being stolen.

Q. He says further:

Within a few days, however, I have been led to believe that if it were understood that the Government would take no action unless that course were pursued, an arrangement could be made by which, on the release of all its other claims, the amount attached in Virginia, about $12,500, would be surrendered. This is the sum embraced in the proceeding in which no jury would be necessary, and is all that, in my opinion, the Government would stand the remotest chance of securing by litigation.

Is that your opinion?—A. If any person was acquainted with the Ottman case in all its ramifications from its inception to its close I certainly was. That conclusion is directly in antagonism to the views which I formed with regard to it. I believe that in the civil suits there could have been recovery, and I regarded the $19,000 in the hands of the police department as bound up by the letter of the law, to which I have referred, or, if it was not, a suit could have been instituted which would have held it.

Q. Was not that $19,000 in the original package in which it was taken from the Department?—A. It was mainly in $500 notes, which was proved clearly to have been the kind of money that was put up.

Q. That was found in a saloon in this city?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In whose saloon?—A. I do not remember at this moment.

Q. But it was proved that it was deposited there by Ottman?—A. Oh, yes.

Q. Do you remember the testimony of the Treasury officials as to whether that was or was not the original package?—A. I do not. But I remember that they gave the $500 notes, and they testified that those notes were within the general numbers which they put up in the package.

Q. Did not the Treasury officials swear that that was the original package, and that those were the real notes that were taken from the Treasury?—A. I don't remember; I could not state definitely on that point.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Do you remember whether the jacket of the package was in court or not?—A. I do not remember.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Did Mr. Bliss originally institute these civil suits?—A. No, sir.

Q. Who did?—A. Mr. Wells, or Fisher, his predecessor.

Q. Was Mr. Bliss second in prosecuting them?—A. No, sir; he had no connection with them until he acquired it by virtue of his authority to compromise them.

Q. And that was all the connection he had with them?—A. That was all the connection he had with them.

Q. Do you know whether Mr. Wells approved of that?—A. I do not know.

Q. He is here in the city, is he not?—A. Yes, sir. He may have been spoken to; he had no doubt of the guilt of Ottman, not the slightest.

Q. I am speaking of the civil suits?—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. How long ago did this occur?—A. I think it was in 1875.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You were and are cognizant of all the material facts in this case?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You have no doubt but what the civil suit for the recovery of the $19,000 deposited by Ottman in that saloon here could have been prosecuted successfully by the Government?—A. I have never had any real doubt about it; the fact is that he never——

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. You do not think there is a bit of law in that opinion of Mr. Bliss in his letter that there was a bona fide holder?—A. No, sir; not in view of the facts.

Q. Your idea was that there was no such thing as innocent parties in reference to stolen property?—A. Not in this instance, certainly.

Q. Nor in any instance?—A. In any instance. That has been expressly decided.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. This was either Mr. Ottman's money or the Government's?—A. One or the other, according to the theory set up in the case.

Q. If it was Ottman's what right had the Government to take any of it?—A. None whatever.

Q. If it was the Government's money was there anybody authorized to make this compromise, or that could have been authorized?—A. I have already said that I believe the settlement was in direct violation of the letter and spirit of the law of this District in reference to compromising felonies.

Mr. FYAN. What I want to call attention to is this: Mr. Bliss gives as a reason for compromising these cases that the money had passed into the hands of innocent parties. Now I say, on the assumption that that money had been stolen from the Government, that there was no such thing as innocent parties.

The WITNESS. That is my assumption, as the facts or cases stood.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Why could there not be an innocent party?—A. It was stolen property.

Q. Supposing it was, he might receive it innocently?—A. Yes; but you could recover the money.

Q. But you took the ground that there could be no innocent party?—A. I mean so far as respects the money is concerned taken from Ottman or which had been attached by the United States there could be no bona fide holders. I did not intend to speak generally.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I will read again what Mr. Bliss says:

I have been baffled in this attempt by the fact that a considerable portion of the money has, by assignment, passed from Ottman's control, and that the legal title to much of it is, subject to the claim of the Government, in other and bona fide holders.

Now regarding it as stolen property?—A. To respond to the question in another form, I do not consider that the assignment conveyed any title whatever.

Q. Could there be a bona fide holder of property that was already attached as stolen property with notice to all the world?—A. Certainly not. In addition to the first principle there was the notice by the institution of the suits, and by the records of the police department, that the money was regarded as stolen from the Government. I refused to take an assignment of a dollar of it. I never received a dollar in the case. I am the one attorney in that case who failed to receive any fee.

Q. Did he offer to give you an assignment at any time?—A. He did, and I refused to take it. I told him I would not have a fee when there was a question as to whether the money was stolen.

Q. You did not think you would get a bona fide title?—A. I did not. Well, I thought that morally I was not entitled to take that money for a fee, and I think so now.

By Mr. FVAN :

Q. Do you know that it was understood between Mr. Bliss and this defendant that if he gave up this money criminal prosecutions were to be abandoned and nolle entered?—A. Yes, sir; that was a part of the agreement.

Q. How do you know that?—A. From the report of Mr. Bliss.

Q. That was never carried out until a month ago?—A. It was held back a considerable time. The records of the court will show when.

Q. I understood you to say that it was carried out about a month ago?—A. Yes, but it may have been before that. It was on November 23, 1883, as appears from the court record.

The CHAIRMAN. It was recommended June 3, 1882, by Mr. Bliss.

The WITNESS. It was simply substituting Mr. Bliss and these other parties in place of the ordinary proceedings in a court of justice and the ordinary provisions of law.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you know any provision of law which authorized such a compromise?—A. I do not. I regard it as entirely extrajudicial and unauthorized—I might say, unprofessional too.

Q. Is there any other matter material to this case which you recall?—A. I do not think there is. I do not recall any, nor with regard to the other matter; but when I read over the evidence, with your permission, of the other witnesses, there may be some facts revived in my recollection, and, if so, I will come and ask permission to state them if they are of any importance.

The CHAIRMAN. There are a number of letters furnished by the Attorney-General at our request, some of which are material as explaining the nature of the settlement of the Ottman case. There is a letter on this subject from the Attorney-General, addressed to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, which you have before you.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Were there any other criminal cases against Mr. Ottman except the one tried?—A. No, sir; no others.

Q. Then before this compromise was effected Mr. Ottman was twice tried, and the Government had twice failed to recover a verdict?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know whether Ottman in the course of compromising this ever acknowledged his guilt?—A. I do not.

Q. Did you ever learn whether he did or did not?—A. I never had any conversation directly or indirectly in connection with the settlement with any person; and what occurred with me personally in defending him I would not be at liberty to state.

Q. Do you as a lawyer think that after the Government had had two trials and failed to recover a verdict if Ottman offered to pay $12,000, rather than to be further prosecuted, claiming at the same time that he was innocent, that the settlement by the Government would amount to compounding a felony?—A. I don't know whether it would or not. The provisions of law to which I have referred seem to contemplate that there shall be no disposition except to the party himself, of money that may be taken from an individual alleged to have been stolen, unless the judge of the courts is satisfied of his innocence or unless there is proof that it rightfully belonged to him, in either a felony or misdemeanor.

Q. I understand from your testimony the case to be this: if I am wrong correct me. The Government claimed that Ottman was guilty?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. He claimed that he was innocent?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The Government tried twice to convict him in two criminal prosecutions?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. In both suits it failed? Ottman then, rather than be further prosecuted, agreed to pay $12,000, and the Government settled with him upon those terms?—A. The idea that I have of the law is this: That it is prohibitory of any compromise where a charge of felony exists.

Q. Although it has been twice tried?—A. Yes, sir; so long as the indictments remain undisposed of, there can be no adjustment and no compromise where the charge of felony exists against the individual, or of any other unlawful act.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. If there was a confession on the part of the alleged criminal, would it be tolerable under any circumstances to compromise?—A. Certainly not.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Your idea is that when a charge of that kind is brought, it must be prosecuted to a termination or else a nolle entered?—A. One or the other. It must be absolutely abandoned before the party is entitled to receive the money, and that has been the practice of our court.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. And if there is a nolle entered he is entitled to all of it?—A. Yes, sir; and an order is made to return it to him.

Q. And the Government has no right to any part of it?—A. The Government has no connection with it at all. It is the act of the court.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. I understand, since I came into the room, that the position of Mr. Bliss was that while he believed Ottman to be guilty he believed that he could not prove him to be guilty, and choose to take what he could get.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. How did you get the understanding that out of this money Ottman secured only $4,000?—A. By various persons coming into the office and speaking of the compromise, some of them who had conversed with Mr. Ottman, as they stated to me, whether correctly or not, and that he had got only $4,000.

Q. Then, in other words, the Government got $12,500, Ottman about $4,000, and the rest was distributed among those parties who made the settlement?—A. One way in which that came to me was, on one occasion the statement of Mr. Ottman, that he regretted it, but he could not afford to pay me a fee because he only received about $4,000.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Do you believe that Ottman told the truth in that case, or was he pleading an excuse for non-payment of your fee?—A. I had sent him a note stating that as the case was settled I would be glad to get a payment from him for my labors.

Q. You were attorney for Ottman?—A. Yes, sir; all through.

Q. Now, if Ottman had deliberately become the receiver of stolen goods, do you believe he would hesitate to lie to you about the amount which he received?—A. O, he may have lied; I would not place any confidence in what Mr. Ottman would state at all, unless it was corroborated by circumstances or the testimony of others.

Q. Did you receive information so direct that under ordinary circumstances you could rely upon it that Ottman received only $4,000? Did you get it from any one who was not connected with the fellows who received the stolen goods?—A. My information, I think, came from two persons—from Major Sweet, who had once been his attorney, and, I think, from Colonel Moore.

Q. Could any one have known how the stolen goods were divided except some fellow who was connected with the stealing, either directly or indirectly?—A. To which stealing do you refer, the first or the last?

Q. Either of them. I simply want to find out how much reliable testimony there is that Ottman received $4,000.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Where does Mr. Richard Crowley live?—A. Somewhere in the State of New York.

Q. Is he a lawyer?—A. He is.

Q. Was he a member of Congress at the time he effected this compromise?—A. The date will show.

Q. Do he and Mr. Bliss live in the same locality?—A. They were intimate personal friends. I know personally that they were politicians together—New York politicians.

Q. Mr. Crowley never appeared as attorney in this case?—A. Oh, never.

Q. But he is the man, in your judgment, who effected this compromise?—A. I believe he did, and I believe it from his own statements, made in my office.

Q. And the relations between him and Mr. Bliss were very intimate?—A. Yes, sir. I ought to say that Mr. Ottman called into my office perhaps shortly before Mr. Crowley did, and stated to me that he had employed Mr. Crowley, and that Mr. Crowley would call to see me. After the compromise was fairly commenced Mr. Ottman never came near my office. I had no further knowledge of him or the transaction.

Q. Did Mr. Crowley, in the conversation with you, intimate how he could bring about this compromise?—A. No, sir; not beyond stating that he thought he was in a position and had influence.

Q. With whom?—A. He did not say with whom. I think I made the remark that it certainly would require influence to effect such a settlement.

Q. How long was this before the letter or report to the Attorney-General of June, 1883?—A. It was a considerable time.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Mr. Crowley stated to you that he was the attorney for Ottman?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And Ottman stated to you that he had employed Mr. Crowley?—A. Yes, sir. Ottman was the keeper of the bar at the Saint James Hotel in New York, and the employment was made there in New York.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. As I understand, Mr. Crowley did not propose to settle this case by virtue of his character as an attorney, but by virtue of his influence with the parties with whom he was going before to bring about the compromise?—A. That was substantially the conception I gathered from what he said in the interview.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. It is not your conception that we want; we want what you know.

—A. Well, I will tell you what I know, and then, if it will assist any, I will give you my conception too, if you will accept it.

Q. Did Mr. Crowley tell you that he hoped to effect this compromise by virtue of his influence with the officers of the Government, or any of them, or anybody who was employed by the Government to prosecute this case?—A. It is difficult for me to remember the exact language, but I said to him that that was a task that I would not undertake—to settle the matter in that way.

Q. Were you and Mr. Crowley both attorneys for Mr. Ottman at the same time?—A. My original employment for Mr. Ottman still existed. That was to defend him in the criminal cases; that was the only employment I had.

Q. Were you still employed by Ottman at the time of this compromise?—A. I was employed by him up to the final disposition of the case, although I was not consulted.

Q. Then Mr. Crowley, at this time, was employed by Mr. Ottman to make this compromise?—A. So he stated.

Q. Then you were both attorneys for Ottman at the same time?—A. I think so.

Q. Now, I would like to have an answer to my question—as to what he told you?—A. What he said, I think, was, that he was in a position, or had influence sufficient, to enable him to effect a compromise.

Q. Did he tell you whether that influence was with the officers of the Government, or with the counsel of the Government, or with Ottman?—A. He did not. Nor did he state either, directly, whether it was his personal ability that he referred to, and influence arising from that.

The CHAIRMAN. No influence that he might have with Ottman would assist him.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Even if he had influence with Ottman that could not make a compromise with the other side?—A. No, sir.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Let us see. In order to effect a compromise it was necessary to make both parties agree, was it not?—A. The inference I had was that the influence must be two-fold; first, to induce Ottman to place the case in his hands, and, second, sufficient influence with some one in the Government to secure the compromise.

Q. Yes, but may not the Government have been already prepared to compromise, and may not Mr. Crowley have referred to his influence with Ottman?—A. It may have been so.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Well, may not Mr. Crowley have had such influence with Mr. Bliss as to enable him to bring about the compromise?—A. He may have had.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. But is it to be inferred because Mr. Crowley said that he had influence sufficient to bring about a compromise that that influence was necessarily with the attorneys of the Government?—A. I cannot say. His statements to me were indefinite, but I had no doubt as to what he referred to, in my own mind.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Did the interview that he had with you at your office disclose the purpose for which he came there?—A. He came there to obtain information from me to enable him to prepare the case and present it to the Government so that it might be adjusted.

Q. It was to become possessed of the facts of the case that he came there?—A. Yes, sir; that was it.

Q. Did you withhold your opinion of the force of the evidence as bearing upon the guilt of Ottman?—A. No, sir; I did not. I gave him an outline of the case, as I understood it.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Did you give him your opinion of the case?—A. I stated that it was a case that required the greatest possible professional exertion to prevent a conviction—the combined efforts of Mr. Carpenter, Mr. Merrick, and myself.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. That was in the criminal case, but what about the civil suit?—A. The civil case I regarded as against Mr. Ottman from its inception.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Yes, but did you tell Mr. Crowley so?—A. I do not remember whether I told him that distinctly or not.

By Mr. CRISP:

Q. Did your suggestion as to requiring influence to obtain that compromise refer to influence with the Government or to influence with Mr. Ottman?—A. My suggestion with regard to influence related to influence with the Government.

Q. Mr. Ottman was the defendant?—A. He was.

Q. And anxious to compromise?—A. It seemed so.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Did Mr. Crowley make any suggestion to you with regard to having influence with the Government?—A. Never in terms. With me that was inferential.

Q. You inferred it?—A. Yes, sir; and I could not conceive of what value the influence would be, as he already represented Mr. Ottman with anybody but the Government.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Did Mr. Crowley intimate to you that if a compromise could be effected it was so much money saved?

Mr. MILLIKEN. To whom?

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. In the interest of his client.

The WITNESS. That suggests to me that this remark was made, that "it would be better for Mr. Ottman to get what he could," I think that was the expression.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you know what Mr. Crowley's relations to Mr. Bliss were?—A. I do, as we all gather up information with regard to the social position and political standing of others, and that was that they were intimate.

Q. Do you know what his relations were in a social way to Mr. Ottman?—A. Oh, there was no social relation whatever existing between them.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Simply professional relations?—A. Professional relations.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Do you know what has become of this $12,500 at Alexandria, Va.; who did get that?—A. I do not know.

Q. I believe that is the amount that was left to be divided between the Government and the outside parties, or the "bona-fide holders"?—

A. Yes, sir. Nor do I know who those persons were. It was attempted in court to ascertain where the entire sum went.

Adjourned.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 19, 1884.

H. H. WELLS sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Please state your age, residence and occupation.—Answer. I am sixty years of age. My residence is Washington, D. C. My occupation is that of a lawyer.

Q. Have you been at any time in the service of the United States?—

A. Yes, sir; twenty years and more in one way and another.

Question. In what positions?—Answer. I was in the Army between three and four years; I was United States district attorney for the eastern district of Virginia for three years; I was military governor of the State for between two and three years; I was district attorney of the United States for the District of Columbia for a little over four years, and I have received sundry and divers employments from the Government as special counsel.

Q. Were you district attorney of the District of Columbia during any part of the time when the case of the United States vs. Ottman was pending?—A. Yes. I was appointed district attorney and entered on the office on the 4th of September 1875. The Ottman robbery was committed in May or June, I think, before that, and I tried the case twice.

Q. Will you make a brief statement of the suits and prosecutions instituted by the Government in that case?—A. There were two attachment suits commenced, I think, by Mr. Wilson, who was special counsel employed by the United States before I came into the office, attaching some personal property and some real property. There were also some examinations had, perhaps one in the police court before I came into the office, and after I came in an indictment was found against Ottman charging him with the larceny, and, I think, an indictment charging him with receiving stolen goods, and an indictment against Benjamin Halleck for the larceny, and an indictment against a man named Brown, whose first name I do not remember, both for the larceny and the receiving. That is my recollection of the suits that were instituted.

Q. You say there were two trials of the criminal suits?—A. Yes; that is, two against Ottman.

Q. In which the jury failed to agree?—A. The jury disagreed in both trials. I think the first trial was in 1876.

Q. Was there ever any trial of the civil suits against Ottman growing out of that transaction?—A. There was a motion to quash the attachment on the ground that the United States had not given the bond required. That case went to general term, but it was decided adversely to their pretensions. It was held that the case was properly commenced.

Q. It was then ready for trial?—A. Yes, sir; on the attachment suit. The property was taken possession of. The real estate was found to be incumbered for about its value. There was a pair of trotting horses that finally ate up themselves and a good deal more, and they were sold at auction. That was the end of the attachment suit, if I remember right.

Q. State the amount of the funds that were seized by the Government as having been stolen.—A. The amount of the robbery, if I remember, was forty-nine thousand or forty-seven thousand dollars and some hundreds, being a package made up in the Treasury Department for the Park Bank of New York. The circumstances attending the making up of that package were these: The bank had sent some mutilated or other currency to Washington to get new notes. The clerk who made up the package went into the vault on the morning that the package was made up and brought out a package of $500 notes—$50,000 or $100,000 in $500 notes; I cannot remember exactly. It seemed that there was a custom in the Treasury Department of that day in reissuing old notes, and this package of $500 notes was in fact made up of old notes. The explanation was this, that a package of either $100,000 or $50,000, I do not remember which, had been sent to some bank in Boston; had been kept there some little time and returned from there without the notes ever being used. So when they took the package they said, "This is not absolutely a new package but the notes are practically new," and they counted out of it $500 bills enough to make up the round sum of $47,000, and then from other packages enough to make up the odd sum. The method of doing business was a package put up by one clerk, who made a little bill of it, so many notes of such a denomination and a wrapper put about it, and a memorandum of his put upon it. It was passed to another clerk, who verified the count and closed it up and put his seal on it. It passed through several hands in that way. At last the package reached the table or desk of a clerk named Halleck. It never was seen after it reached Halleck's desk, and he had performed his part in relation to the package. The loss was discovered immediately, of course, perhaps the same day, or within a day or two at any rate. Some investigations were set on foot for the purpose of discovering who the thief was. Halleck, I think, had been to New York—I am not quite certain about that, at all events, there was found in his pocket a little red book (which I do not see in this package of papers), and on one of the leaves, was in pencil, some figures showing the amount of notes stolen; there was a division made of it showing that a certain portion of it was probably going to somebody else. It was divided into certain parts. When Mr. Ottman was arrested there was found on his person a little note half the size, perhaps a quarter of the size, of a sheet of large letter paper, written by "C. Gates," in pencil. I do not see the note here, although it was here when I saw the papers last. And in that note, my recollection is that he speaks of a division being made and complains that it is time that the division was made. That was found in Ottman's possession. We then commenced pushing the inquiry in different directions, and at last Halleck made a confession, and that confession was said to have been voluntary and made to Mr. McDevitt, I think, one of the then detectives. Halleck was tried and convicted. A new trial was granted by the general term on the ground that the confession was never shown to have been absolutely free and voluntary. That was before the trial of Ottman. When we came to try the Ottman case we put upon the stand Halleck, who was used as a witness for the Government. He testified to the circumstances and to the manner in which the package was made up, and that the money was stolen by a man by the name of Gates. Since that they have made a change in the Treasury Department, but before that change there was no wire screen, so that a person could get near the clerks. His testimony was that Gates put an iron hoop over the top of his desk and hooped up this package; that the money was taken to Mr. Ottman at his restaurant on the avenue, and Ottman took charge of it and undertook, in their parlance, "to shove it," or pass it off—to exchange large bills for smaller bills. Another piece of testimony in that connection was this, that Ottman, just a few days before his arrest, had gone to a German by the name of Welckener, a friend of his, and said that he had a package of valuable papers that he was very anxious to have placed in bank at Alexandria, Va.—insurance papers. Welckener did not happen to be in at the time, but the papers were left in the charge of his wife or somebody in charge of the establishment. That was Saturday, and they were thrown into a common pine desk where they remained until Monday morning. Ottman came to ask Welckener if the papers had been sent to Alexandria and he said no, he didn't suppose there was anything important, and he had let them stay. Subsequently that package was sent to the German-American Bank at Alexandria, of which Mr. Portner was the president. It was deposited with the president of the bank as a safe deposit. We obtained the testimony of a colored man of the name of Matthews, who was in the prison where Ottman was confined, who testified that Mr. Ottman came to him and said that he had a valuable package at Alexandria, and would give him $5,000 if he would get that package, bury and secure it for him; and if he could not do that to destroy it, and he furnished a note to Matthews on the bank for the package. Matthews went there and the result was (I am not sure whether Matthews got it), but the result was that we got the package and on opening it it proved to be a box made by taking a piece of inch and a quarter pine and mortising out of it a hole large enough to put in without folding a bank note; then taking two of the pieces and in this opening thus made putting the money and then screwing them together. On getting this and opening it we found that it contained twenty-nine $500 Treasury notes. The notes were kept of course in precisely the same order in which they were found, and on inspection we found, for instance, that the first note in the package had a little mark on it, No. 1; the next note under that was No. 5; the next note under that was No. 9, and so on. We discovered that when they print those notes in the Treasury Department a piece of paper is taken large enough to make four of them. They are printed at one stroke. The first note is No. 1, the next is No. 2, the next 3, next No. 4, and there are 100 of those perhaps; and after they are printed a machine cuts right through the whole of them, so that when you take them off they are No. 1, No. 5, No. 9. They lie together in that order. We found this package of notes lying in their regular order, portions of them, not all of them. Then, in addition to that, they have what are known as serial numbers, and we found those notes running in their serial numbers. Out of the twenty-nine notes, my recollection now is that there were eight or nine of the right serial numbers. That demonstrated to my mind, of course, that this package had never been distributed, because all the money in the world, after that package had been distributed and had gone into circulation, could never have put those notes back in that order. It was an utter impossibility. Then the position of the serial numbers was another point.

That bundle contained $14,500. It was first put in possession of the property clerk, under a statute of the District of Columbia. All property supposed to be stolen is required to be put into the custody of the property clerk, who is an officer of the District of Columbia. Not feeling it quite safe, I made suggestion that the package, after I had used it on the trial, should be deposited for safe-keeping in the Treasury of the United States, and it was so deposited. That, of course, accounted for only $14,500 of the $49,000. There was then arrested a man named Brown, commonly called "Peg-leg Brown," a one-legged man and a gambler, a not very reputable person, and we discovered that there had been some telegrams passing between Mr. Ottman and the man Brown, and in these books you will find receipts for the different telegrams. You should find the telegrams themselves among the papers. The nature of the telegrams showed that there was something quite out of the usual way passing between these two persons, one at Saratoga and the other at Washington. This was in the summer. On arresting Brown there was found on him either fourteen or fifteen hundred dollars, I do not remember which, in pretty large amounts. On going to the First National Bank at Saratoga we found that the same "Brown" had bought a draft on the First National Bank, New York, in favor of William H. Ottman, for $2,500.

There was also another draft drawn by the same bank on the same bank on the same day for $1,000, and in substantially the same words as the first one. We were able to show by Mr. Richards and another clerk in the bank at Saratoga, that those drafts were purchased by Brown, and paid for in $500 bills. Of course, it was not possible to make any fuller description or proof of the notes. We traced Brown and found that he then went to Worcester, Mass., and there purchased another draft, dated on the 19th of July, 1875, drawn on the Fourth National Bank of New York, to the order of William H. Ottman, for $550. I am not sure whether there was another draft or not.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. How much is that in all?—A. $4,050. We found that those drafts were indorsed by William H. Ottman to Riggs & Co., of this city. We subsequently found that a man by the name of Proctor, who has since deceased, had been sent a day or two before Ottman's arrest, perhaps on the same day, my recollection is, with a draft or check, drawn by Ottman on Riggs & Co., for a large sum of money, and the proceeds of that check or draft were deposited by this man Proctor in the bank at Alexandria, and Ottman had paid Proctor some money, perhaps $100, or something of that sort, for transferring the funds from one bank to the other. Ottman had also given Proctor one or two $500 notes to get converted into other money. My recollection now is that we got $1,100 from Proctor, part of the money that he had received from Ottman. Another one of the transactions was with a gentleman by the name of Bouton, General Bouton, who stated that Ottman met him some time in the summer and put into his possession twenty $500 notes, possibly it was but ten. I think, however, it was twenty notes, amounting to $10,000, and General Bouton took the notes to some broker in New York, perhaps a cotton broker in New York or Brooklyn, made the deposit there, and subsequently withdrew that money and paid it over to Ottman. We also proved that Ottman after this event went up to a town in Northern New York, I do not remember the name of it, perhaps Ogdensburg, and at a hotel where he registered for a day and a night he paid his bill by changing another $500 note. He also exchanged a $500 note with a gentleman on Pennsylvania, in this city, whose name I have forgotten. In that way we traced into his hands a very large proportion of all of the notes. Before the trial commenced an offer of compromise was made, a proposition was made to pay $32,000; that is, to deliver to the United States all the money that we had in hand that we had taken from the different persons, and also the money in bank at Alexandria, on condition that Ottman should be sentenced to jail for a period not to exceed twelve months, which was the longest period he could be sent for. When that was offered the Attorney-General declined to accept the offer.

Q. Who made that proposition?—A. It was made by Mr. Elliot, one of Ottman's counsel.

Q. Was it in writing?—A. No; it was a verbal proposition made to me in the hall of the criminal court a day or two before we commenced the first trial.

Q. Did you communicate the fact in writing to the Department of Justice?—A. I am not sure whether I did or not. I have never thought of it since, until this morning. My recollection is that General Devens was the Attorney-General at that time; I am not sure of that even. I know, however, that it was declined.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. It was communicated to the Attorney-General by you either in writing or orally?—A. Yes, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. It was a proposition in good faith?—A. Oh, yes; it was made by a gentleman of the highest character. I believe I said I would accept the proposition if Ottman took an ordinary imprisonment in the penitentiary, which they declined.

Q. When was this offer made?—A. My recollection is that it was in 1876, before the first trial. I am not quite sure of the dates, yet that is my impression.

Q. Who were representing Ottman then as attorneys?—A. I think Mr. Merrick, Mr. Eliot, and Mr. William A. Cook.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. And Mr. Carpenter?—A. No, sir; Mr. Carpenter came in later.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. What reason did General Bouton give for taking that money from Ottman?—A. He said that they thought of making some operations in stock or cotton in New York through some broker, and that Ottman had met him, and he took the money for that purpose; but no operation was made, and no order given for any such operation, but the money was withdrawn and returned to Ottman.

Q. He professed to know nothing about Ottman's connection with the robbery?—A. Yes, sir; he professed to be entirely innocent of any knowledge on that subject. General Bouton is still here but he is in very infirm health.

Q. State the result of the first trial.—A. The first trial occupied, I should think, ten or twelve days; I don't know but a little longer than that. It resulted in a disagreement. A second trial was had which occupied even a longer period, and in that case Senator Carpenter had become an associate counsel for Ottman, and took part in the trial. That also resulted in a disagreement. That was the last that was done in court in relation to that case during my incumbency of the office of district attorney. I left the office on the 12th of January, 1880.

Q. When do you say the last trial closed?—A. I am not able to say that. I should say it was in 1877 or 1878, but I cannot be positive, because I have not seen a paper in the case since the trial until to-day.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Mr. Cook testified here that he resorted to strategy in the defense of that case by taking these bills separately and putting the question direct to the witness whether they could swear directly that that was one of the identical bills stolen; was that his mode of examination?—A. I think it likely. They resorted to almost all modes.

Q. But he said he relied upon that more especially for an acquittal of the defendant, and he believed that that line of examination was the occasion of the disagreement.—A. Well, I don't believe any such thing. It was probably as weak as any of the defenses, because the notes that I speak of were kept and never changed from the order in which they were first found by us, and of course any clerk from the Treasury would say, "No, I cannot say that that is one of the notes. All I can say is that the notes in this original package embraced three series" (six thousands, two thousands, and eight thousands, for instance), and then he would say, "I find some of each of these series in the twenty-nine notes here. In addition to that I find the corresponding numbers, and I find them lying here in that identical order in which they were originally placed as 1, 5, and 9." I don't remember the line of cross-examination Colonel Cook speaks of.

Q. That would show the similarity; but he put the direct question as to identity, and they not being able to answer positively, it left the question open and in doubt, and he went to the jury upon that theory, that there was a doubt and that the accused should be entitled to the benefit of it.—A. I, of course, cannot say what his theory was, but that certainly was not the strongest defense in that case in my judgment.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. What was the strongest defense?—A. The uncertainty as to the truth of the statement made by Halleck. In the first place, it was insisted with immense vehemence and remarkable ability by Mr. Carpenter that Halleck was the thief himself, and that he was swearing to put this case onto Ottman; and then it was said that nobody could pick up the bills in the way in which Halleck described them to have been picked up. Halleck also testified that the bills after they left the Treasury Department were taken into one of the retiring rooms and concealed there in a very improbable place; and I should say that the worst thing there was the cross-examination of Halleck, which was a remarkable cross-examination; I have rarely ever seen a more able one.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. There was no doubt in the mind of anybody but what Halleck was an accessory?—A. Oh, he was a thief.

Q. He admitted that?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you relied on him for conviction?—A. Yes, in part; not entirely.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Why should Halleck, after he had confessed his own guilt, desire to implicate Ottman if Ottman were innocent?—A. I do not think he did. I think he would have been glad to let Ottman go. I do not think that argument was sound, but it was the one that was used.

Q. It produced an effect upon the jury, you think?—A. It did beyond question. I may mention one thing here without any impropriety, I think. Rumors came during the retirement of the jury from what seemed to be authentic sources as to the standing of the jury. Indeed, I think almost everybody connected with the prosecution understood that the jury stood nine to three—nine for conviction and three for acquittal—until they had been out two or three days, and on the morning of the last day it was suggested that the jury did not stand quite in that way; and I was so well satisfied that I had been imposed upon up to that time that I said to the court I did not believe in keeping that jury out any longer, and they were discharged. The jury stood eleven for acquittal, when everybody supposed they stood the other way.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You had full possession of all the facts in reference to this case?—

A. I believe I had.

Q. What was your opinion as to the guilt of the accused?—A. I had never any doubt upon that subject any more than I have of my own existence.

Q. What was your opinion as to the result of a civil suit merely to recover the money?—A. I had no doubt but it would result in the recovery of all the money that was in reach, all that they had attached, all that was in their possession, and all that was in bank at Alexandria.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Why was not a civil suit instituted?—A. There was a suit instituted by the district attorney of the eastern district of Virginia, at Alexandria, in that court. My present recollection is that it was an equity suit under a peculiar statute that they have there, and the bank was made a party. It seemed that the bank stated that there was an assignment of that fund in the bank belonging to Ottman, and they therefore refused to pay the money over to the United States, and the suit was brought. In that suit it was competent to have put Ottman on the stand as a witness, and, of course, he would have had to tell where he obtained the $500 notes, and he would have told. Then I think there was a stipulation entered into at one time (I am not quite certain of this, but I think I was told so by Mr. Wilson) by which the depositions taken in that criminal case might be used on the trial of the civil suit. And here was another important consideration, that if there was a doubt as to Ottman's guilt he was entitled, of course, to be acquitted in the criminal cases, while in the civil suit the case was to be determined upon the preponderance of evidence, a very important distinction.

Q. Would Ottman have been obliged to testify as a witness as to where he got those $500 notes if his answer tended to convict him of crime?—A. Perhaps not; but there is a statute which provides that a man shall not be punished for any discovery he makes either before a committee of Congress or a court. But I assume that he would have had to say that he could not tell where he got those notes without implicating those parties, and I think that would have satisfied the judge very well under the circumstances and the testimony that it was part of this stolen package.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. In other words you mean that the rule of law was that he would have been at liberty to answer, but not answer in the civil suit?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, in this District is that permitted in a criminal suit?—A. Oh, yes; in a United States suit.

Q. But you cannot force him?—No; you can force him in a civil suit.

Q. That is, you can force him, but it is the duty of the judge to inform him that he is at liberty to decline. And your idea is that if he had refused to answer that would have satisfied the judge, and as it was an equity case you think you would have gained it?—A. I haven't the slightest doubt in the world.

The CHAIRMAN. In connection with the statement you have just made, allow me to call attention to Mr. Bliss' report, page 673: "Mr. Wells says he has no idea a conviction could be had.

The WITNESS. Shall I tell all of that interview in the order in which it occurred?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I think you may make a statement, as you have been referred to for the purpose of justifying this compromise.

The WITNESS. Mr. Bliss called at my office. I cannot undertake to remember the date, but it was during the actual progress of the star-route cases, or just before they were about to resume one of the trials. I have known him for many years. Mr. Bliss said, "The Attorney-General has said to me that he is overrun with important matters, and that he is worried about a case—the Ottman case, and he has asked me if I, as his friend, without any compensation, would not look up that case and give him a report of what there was in it; that there had been a proposition to compromise," and he said, "I have come over to ask you about it. I have been to the District attorney's office, and I find that the case seems to have been prepared with the greatest care, and I would like to know what you think of it." My impression is that he asked me if I thought Ottman could now be tried and would be likely to be convicted. I expressed doubt as to whether he would be convicted at that date; either I said to him that I did not think it could be or would be. He asked me if I had any doubt about his guilt. I said not the slightest in the world. My recollection is that I said it was not a simple matter of opinion; but it was a matter of positive knowledge on my part. He asked me if I could state that knowledge to him. I said I could not. That I should decline to state it to anybody, because it was protected by professional confidence. He asked my opinion as to what would be the probable result of the civil suit. I said I had no doubt at all upon that subject, and I thought a day would be ample time to get a decree for the United States for the whole amount of money. I expressed it very strongly to him. I will not undertake to give the exact phraseology. He said, "Wouldn't you be met with the difficulty of identification?" I said, "Of course, but it is only a difficulty; it is not an insurmountable difficulty." And then I proceeded to narrate to him, even more fully than I have here, the different steps by which the identification could be established. I mentioned to him facts in relation to the notes themselves, how they had been pushed at every convenient season, the fact that Brown was to receive 5 per cent. for passing, the fact that Brown had bought drafts and those drafts had been taken in Ottman's name and had gone immediately into his cash account. He said, "As far as the twenty-nine notes are concerned, that may be so, but is not the difficulty in relation to the money in bank in Alexandria?" I said, "Yes, of course; but that seems to me almost as simple, because you can take first the $500 bank notes and prove them into drafts all by Ottman's agent, he receiving 5 per cent. for making the purchase; those drafts subsequently, under Ottman's indorsement, going into Riggs & Co.'s bank, and from Riggs & Co.'s into the bank at Alexandria, and here is the assignment of that bank account to pay counsel for their services in his case. I think that is the substance of all that occurred between us. That is my recollection of it now. If there was anything else, I would be glad to have you call my attention to it.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. How long after this was the compromise made?—A. I do not know. I know nothing on that subject.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. When was this conversation that you had with Mr. Bliss?—A. I should say it was about February, 1882.

Q. Did you have more than one interview with Mr. Bliss?—A. No, sir.

Q. In his report Mr. Bliss says, "Mr. Wells, the former district attorney, seemed, on an interview, to think that, as the suit in Virginia was in equity, and therefore no jury would be needed, a decision favorable to the Government could be had there. But it would be necessary to prove Ottman's guilt in the same manner as in the other cases," I suppose referring to the criminal cases.—A. Does he put that language into my mouth?

Q. Look at the report for yourself.—A. (After reading the statement in the report of Mr. Bliss.) I do not understand that to be the rule at all. I understand the radical difference between the proof required in civil and criminal cases to be this, that if there is a reasonable doubt in the minds of the jury as to the full establishment of the guilt of the accused, they are to acquit, while the rule in a civil suit would be that the court or the jury are to decide on the weight of evidence. In the one case they can decide on mere preponderance, and in the other case no mere preponderance will justify a conviction.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. In your experience as a lawyer have you found that juries make that distinction in returning their verdicts?—A. I think they do almost without exception.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. You regarded this case in Virginia as much the strongest case that you had, because there would be no jury at all?—A. Yes, sir; certainly.

Q. And for that reason it would be stronger than even a civil case that could be tried by a jury?—A. Undoubtedly.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. And as to the case pending here you thought you had almost the direct proof of the identity of the bills themselves?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you communicate to Mr. Bliss that there had been already a compromise proposed involving the payment of $32,000, and that it was refused?—A. I am not sure whether I did or not. I should judge I must have done so, because I did not intend to withhold anything from him. I feel quite certain that I did, yet I could not say positively.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Mr. Bliss was not in the case at the time that proposition was made?—A. He never was in the Ottman case.

Q. But he was not then employed by the Government in that matter?—A. Oh, no. That proposition was made in 1876, and this interview occurred in 1882.

Q. Do you feel certain that you remembered in 1882 to state that fact to Mr. Bliss that such a proposition had been made?—A. I cannot remember whether I did or not positively, but my best judgment is that I told him all that I knew about it.

Q. Might not you have forgotten that fact?—A. No, sir; I had not forgotten it.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Was it not such a prominent feature in connection with the proposed compromise that it must necessarily recur to your mind?—A. Oh, inevitably. There has never been a day from that to this that it has not been in my mind as to where it was made, who was present, and all about it.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did Mr. Bliss ask you as to the propriety of compromising the civil suits?—A. I do not think he asked me, "Can they be compromised?" He asked my opinion, and I told him they should not be.

Q. You were of the opinion that every dollar seized or attached by the Government could be recovered in a civil suit?—A. Certainly, and I told him so.

Q. Now, in connection with that, I call your attention to that part of his report which I have marked there. He there says, "We think it would be necessary for the Government to prove Ottman's guilty participation in the receipt of the money, in order to recover in the civil suit;" is that the way you understood him?—A. I think it is very likely that is what he said. I do not understand that to be the law.

Q. This is what he reported to the Attorney-General, that it would be impossible to recover in the civil suits unless he could prove Ottman's guilty participation in the theft?—A. I have no doubt he stated that; but I do not understand that that is the law.

Q. What do you understand to be the law?—A. What I understand on that subject is that if one comes into possession unlawfully of another man's money, he can be made to pay it over.

Q. Was there anything said in the conversation between you and Mr. Bliss to the effect that it would be impossible to recover this money in a civil suit unless the Government could prove Ottman's guilty participation in the receipt of the money?—A. I cannot say whether he said that or not. He may have expressed that opinion. I am rather inclined to think that he did, and that I disagreed with him.

Mr. FVAN. He expressed that opinion in his communication to the Attorney-General.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Is it not true that the Government could have recovered that money from Ottman if it could have identified it, even if he had been an innocent holder?—A. Certainly. That is, if they could have identified the bills. And without identifying the bills the United States could recover whatever had been put into gold, because the right of the Government to recover for money had and received did not depend upon its being the identical money. I remember that Mr. Bliss suggested the question: How could the Government recover the $14,000 of bills? I said, "Mr. Bliss, I have not thought as to the form of the action. I take it for granted, however, that the United States will retain the money until they find the necessary form of action." I remember that.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. It is also stated that the case against Ottman all depended upon Halleck's testimony. Did you regard the evidence as conclusive merely upon the identification of the bills themselves?—A. Yes; I did not deem that Halleck's testimony was absolutely necessary. On the other hand, I have really questioned whether the case was not weakened by calling Halleck. We tried Ottman the first time without that testimony. It was possible always to make the use of it that was made of it in the cross-examination of Halleck on the second trial.

Q. At the time of the criminal trial, did the law permit the defendant to be sworn at his own instance?—A. On the 16th of March, 1878, the statute was passed which allowed parties charged with crime to testify in their own behalf. I think that was after the last trial.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Did Ottman testify?—A. He did not.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. It was evidently Mr. Bliss' judgment that the statute had been passed since the first trial, and he bases his opinion to the Attorney-General upon that. Now, in your judgment, would Ottman's defense have been better or worse if Ottman had gone on the stand?—A. Worse, almost infinitely worse.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Mr. Bliss in his report states that "no man ever saw or heard of Gates; he is a myth. I have no hesitation in saying he never existed, and it is a physical impossibility that the money could have been taken in the manner Halleck says Gates told him he took it. In short, Halleck appeared upon the witness stand, a self-confessed recipient and taker of stolen money. He told a story which was, in one respect, the creation of the fabulous Gates, an untruth."—A. I think Mr. Bliss overstates that matter. In the first place, it was not a physical impossibility. There was a railing which was, according to my recollection, about so high [indicating about 5 feet], and when the man stood on the outside the package was on the other side as high from the floor as the height of the tables. There was a large number of packages one above another, tapering down so that they would not tumble over, and it was not a physical impossibility to bring one over in that way.

Q. Especially if a man was trained in that business?—A. Yes; if he was a thief and had the assistance of the man inside to help him. Now the strong circumstances tending to establish the existence of a participant in that transaction who passed under the name of "Gates" was this, that when Ottman was arrested in Washington there was found in his pocket the memorandum signed "C. Gates," in relation to this transaction. That was found to be a strong circumstance.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. In regard to the testimony of Halleck, did it tend to establish any independent fact in itself other than the manner of the transfer of the money from the possession of the Government to Ottman?—A. Oh, yes. For instance, he stated that when the money was taken to Ottman that Ottman had in his cellar on the avenue, under his restaurant, a heavy bench upon which he piled up ale and beer in casks or half barrels, and that they turned that table over and fastened, by a nail or otherwise, this package on the bottom of that bench, and there it remained concealed. He told how long it remained there. He said that was regarded as the safest place, that all the searches that were made for the packages failed to discover it, because nobody ever thought of lifting off those barrels of beer and turning that bench over to look on the under side. Then he stated how the money was divided and how Ottman had given him money at the time.

Q. Were Ottman's premises ever searched for the money?—A. My recollection is that they were searched more than once, although I do not know. I was not in the case, you see, at the very outset. I think the larceny was in June, and I came into the case in September.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. I think you have said you were United States attorney here for four years?—A. More than four years.

Q. Is there any law requiring the testimony to be written down before the grand jury?—A. No, sir.

Q. What was the rule?—A. Ordinarily it was not reduced to writing. The grand jury have a foreman and a clerk, and there is furnished to them, by the district attorney, a memorandum, a general history of the case, and they call the witnesses and the clerk makes brief notes of the testimony; sometimes they are very imperfect and sometimes they are spread out more in detail, and he keeps a book of minutes, and that book of minutes is very often——

Q. (Interposing.) If an indictment is found, what becomes of that evidence that is so taken down; is it turned over?—A. It is put into this grand-jury book and goes to the district attorney. There is, however, in that office another custom that obviates, to a considerable extent, the thing you are asking me about now. When the examination is held before the police court the district attorney takes down the testimony and makes a full report in writing in a volume that is kept, and when the district attorney goes to the grand jury he has that before him, and when he goes to the traverse jury he has that still before him.

Q. Was that case of Ottman tried before the police court?—A. My recollection is that it was.

Q. You were not district attorney then?—A. (After a pause.) Why I hesitate replying to that question is this: I went into the office in September, and I am pretty certain that I went into the police court one day with Mr. Wilson in that matter, so I suppose there must have been a part of this examination before the police court after I came into the office.

Q. Do you know what has become of that evidence?—A. No. There are a good many papers that are missing from the package now. For instance, this note of "Gates" about the division of the money.

Q. Is it the rule in all cases to hold the examination before the police court in the first instance, or can they go directly before the grand jury?—A. They can; but commonly a case is taken first before the committing magistrate—the police court.

Q. Even if the grand jury is in session?—A. Yes; there is no absolute necessity for it, but it is commonly done.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. And he binds them over to go before the grand jury?—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. I understand that this proposition, made by Mr. Eliot, one of the counsel for the defense, was to pay the Government $32,000, provided you discharged Ottman from both the civil and criminal cases, and also that he would accept a term of imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding twelve months?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the only difference between you and Mr. Eliot in relation to that was that you insisted that, in addition to the payment of the $32,000, there should be imprisonment in the penitentiary instead of the county jail; is that it?—A. All but one expression which you put in there. I said, "I will recommend the taking all these amounts in full settlement, if the man goes to the penitentiary for a moderate term." But that was not my decision. The matter had been communicated to the Attorney-General.

Q. That they declined?—A. That they declined.

Q. Then, the difference was the difference between going to jail for twelve months and taking a moderate term of imprisonment in the penitentiary?—A. Yes.

Q. And your impression, although you have no distinct recollection of it, is that when Mr. Bliss came to communicate with you on the subject you informed him of these facts?—A. Yes, sir; I think so. I would not like to state positively, but my impression is that I must have told him that.

Q. Did Mr. Bliss communicate to you how it happened that he had become interested?—A. He told me it was simply a friendly act toward the Attorney-General; that the Attorney-General was overrun with business, and had asked him to look after this matter.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. In connection with the final compromise, did anybody on the part of the Government apply to you for information touching this case except Mr. Bliss?—A. No, sir.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. I understand you, then, to say that Mr. Bliss told you that the Attorney-General first called his attention to the case?—A. Yes.

Q. He did not say that he first called the Attorney-General's attention to it?—A. No, sir.

Q. But that he was in the case simply because the Attorney-General had called his attention to it, and said that he was so burdened with business that he wanted to get relieved of that Ottman case?—A. Yes, sir; and Mr. Bliss said that he would do it without any fee, and simply as a matter of friendship to the Attorney-General.

Q. Was any of this money sent to Saratoga, N. Y., or to Springfield, Mass.?—A. To Worcester, Mass., and Saratoga, N. Y. I have already mentioned that.

Q. Have you read Mr. Bliss's report on the subject?—A. No, sir; I declined to read or know anything about it.

Q. You do not know whether Mr. Bliss informed the Attorney-General of that fact?—A. I do not.

Q. But it was a fact that some of the money went to Saratoga, N. Y., and some to Worcester, Mass.?—A. Oh, yes, sir.

Q. What was done with it?—A. It was converted into drafts which were brought here and deposited with Riggs & Co. and the proceeds taken to Alexandria and put in bank there.

Q. Mr. Bliss in his report (and the chairman has called your attention to the matter) states that Halleck put off this crime on "Gates" and that "Gates" was a myth, a fictitious person that had no existence.—A. Does Mr. Bliss say he is a myth?

Q. Yes; that is the way I understand it. He says:

Halleck's story was, briefly, that he did not take the money, and knew nothing of its being taken, but that some ten days after it was taken one Gates, an utter stranger to him, approached him in a drinking saloon and, with very preliminary caution, in effect told him that he, Gates, stole the money and had hidden it in a water-closet in the Treasury building, and wanted Halleck's assistance to remove it. Halleck claims that he undertook the job, after consultation with Ottman, and that some days afterwards they got the money away and Ottman kept it, and that they promptly cheated Gates of any share in it, an outrage which he seems to have endured quietly. No man ever saw or heard of Gates. He is a myth. I have no hesitation in saying he never existed, and it is physically impossible the money could have been taken in the manner Halleck says Gates told him he took it. In short, Halleck appeared upon the witness stand the self-confessed recipient and taker of stolen money.

Q. Now, do you know anything about Gates?—A. No; we never found "Gates." We tried faithfully, but we could not find him.

Q. What is your judgment, from your examination of that case, as to whether Halleck was telling a lie in relation to that man Gates, or have you any delicacy in answering?—A. It is a mere opinion. My impression is that there was a third person in that case; whether his name was Gates or something else I do not know. I have doubts as to whether or not the money was stolen in the precise way in which Halleck described, but there was never any concealment by him, after the first trial, of his guilt in connection with the larceny, although he did maintain that Gates was the man that hooped up the package.

Q. I understood Mr. Bliss to say in his report that if there had been a third trial Halleck was away off in the West and perhaps could not have been got here.—A. I know nothing about that. I understood that Halleck was in some Western State.

Q. He bases his suggestion or advice of a compromise on that ground. Now, if I understand you, you say that that would have cut no material figure; in fact, you think it would have come nearer conviction without Halleck than with him?—A. I am inclined to think, after the event, that putting Halleck on did not aid the case.

Q. And you think Halleck's absence would not have tended to defeat the case even if he had not come?—A. I do not think it would.

Q. Even if he had been present you would not have put him on the stand?—A. I think I would not.

Q. You think your case would have been stronger without his evidence than with it?—A. I think I should have preferred to rest my case on testimony independent of Halleck.

Q. Then if this compromise was brought about in consequence of the absence of Halleck you think it was a very serious mistake?—A. I am not going to pass an opinion upon other people in that way.

Q. But I am assuming that this compromise was brought about by reason of Halleck's absence. You say that if you had Halleck here you would not have put him on the stand?—A. I do not object to your conclusions, but I do object to stating my opinions.

Q. I am trying to get yours.—A. I object to stating them.

Mr. FYAN. The difference between the witness and me is that he has got a very finely established character as an attorney, so that his opinion will carry much weight.

The WITNESS. I am very much obliged to you.

Q. Mr. Bliss reports there was no proof of the numbers of these bills and nothing to indentify them; that the bills were not in consecutive numbers; how were those bills; were they not in 4's? Didn't the plate strike off four bills at a time?—A. That is my recollection, and that they struck off through a large number of sheets, then cut down, and took up that first package to make the package.

Q. That is to say, they were numbered 1, 5, 9, 13, 17?—A. Yes, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. They did follow, then, in consecutive numbers?—A. A portion, not all of them.

Q. And you regarded that as conclusive that those bills had been taken from the Treasury?—A. I did not see how there could be any reasonable doubt about it.

Q. Were not those enough to identify the accompanying ones?—A. It would seem to me so. I was very clear on that.

Q. If it was true in one thing it was true in all, and if false it was false in all?—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. You say you advised the compromise by Ottman paying $32,000, and you say also that the Government could have recovered, in your opinion, in the civil suits, and the whole amount was $47,000?—A. Yes; but they could only have recovered what they had their hands on, and that amounted in the aggregate to between $30,000 and $33,000, which was the amount to be turned over.

Q. What had become of the remainder?—A. I could not tell about that.

Q. The Government never got hold of the remainder?—A. Oh, no.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Mr. Bliss says in his report that the stolen bills must have been returned to the Treasury for redemption. Did you not tell him that those bills had been returned by a Boston bank for smaller bills?—A. I mentioned the fact to him that it was proven on the trial, the circumstance as I have narrated it this morning, why they had paid out of what would ordinarily be denominated an old package, because they were unsoiled bills, and apparently as new as when first made.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. What do you know about any liens in favor of private individuals that may have existed as to the money deposited in Alexandria?—A. I only know that it was said by the bank (perhaps I may have seen the paper, although I do not remember it) that an assignment of the fund in bank had been made by Mr. Ottman for the payment of his counsel.

Q. Mr. Bliss states in his report to the Attorney-General:

I have therefore sought to see if, so far as the civil suits were concerned, some compromise could not be effected. I have been baffled in this attempt by the fact that a considerable portion of the money has, by assignment, passed from Ottman's control, and that the legal title to much of it is subject to the claim of the Government in other and bona fide holders.

Q. State who those holders were, if you know.—A. All that I know is that it was stated that there was an assignment of all the balances standing to his credit in bank at Alexandria for the balance of the fees of counsel.

Q. In the very case about which he was being tried?—A. Yes; and that I learned long before the first trial, and I said, "Well, gentlemen, we shall pay no respect to that."

Q. Did you regard those claims as such bona fide claims as to "baffle" the Government?—A. I do not think they were either bona fide or such as were calculated to baffle anybody.

Q. The parties who took those assignments knew or must have known when they took them that this was the same money that was alleged to have been stolen?—A. I could not say that.

Q. They were attorneys for the defendants?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the suit was for this very matter?—A. Yes, sir. I can simply say that they were his attorneys, and that he was indicted for the larceny of this money; what knowledge they had of that I do not know. This assignment was probably made before any indictment, almost immediately after he was arrested. He was arrested and put into jail, and looked out for counsel and then for funds to pay them.

Q. Then the assignments at Alexandria were assignments to attorneys who defended him in the criminal suits?—A. I do not know which of the attorneys, but my impression is that it was the attorneys who defended him on the first trial.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Mr. Carpenter was not in the first trial?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you instigate the attachment of the money?—A. No; that was done before I was district attorney.

Q. That was done before the preliminary examination was completed, then?—A. Yes, before it was completed.

Q. That was not a secret transaction?—A. What do you mean?

Q. The levying of the attachment at the Alexandria bank.—A. Oh, no.

Q. Known of all men?—A. Known by a good many. After the second trial, in which Mr. Carpenter did take a part, my recollection is that Mr. Coleman, who was his law partner, applied in the criminal court for an order directing some portion of this money to be turned over to Mr. Carpenter.

Q. The money in Alexandria?—A. I am not able to say whether it was the money in Alexandria, but some part of this money that the Government had control of, and that motion was resisted and the court promptly refused it.

Q. Mr. Bliss, in his statement in reference to bona fide holders or claimants to that money, says, further: "Within a few days, however, I have been led to believe that if it were understood that the Government would take no action unless that course were pursued, an arrangement could be made by which, on the release of all its other claims, the amount attached in Virginia, about $12,500, would be surrendered."

Q. You being the district attorney at the time Mr. Ottman was tried, and most conversant with the facts and with the Government's case, both in the civil and criminal suits, is it unreasonable to suppose that your opinion would have been taken as to the propriety of compromising this case by the receipt of $12,500?—A. I shall have to be excused from answering that.

Q. Was it taken?—A. It was not, except in the manner I have mentioned.

Q. I mean as to whether the Government should compromise this suit for $12,500; was that advice ever given by you?—A. No, sir.

Q. If you had been consulted as to the propriety of compromising it, what would have been your opinion?—A. I should have recommended against it.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Do you know why that compromise was made?—A. I do not.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you know anything about the manner in which the funds were finally divided?—A. I do not.

Q. You only know that you did not get any of them?—A. I am sure of that.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. You have testified here, if I remember your evidence, that the evidence before the jury was to the effect that this man Ottman had made a little box to put this money in, and that it was deposited in the Alexandria Bank, and that he employed a negro named Matthews to go there and get that money, and offered to pay him $5,000?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you communicate that fact to Mr. Bliss?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The reason I ask you is because it does not appear in his communications to the Attorney-General.—A. Let me answer that a little fuller. The box was made at Ottman's request by a carpenter who was a witness on the stand, and testified that Ottman paid him a dollar for making it. And Matthews was on the stand, and I mention in tracing that money how the box was made, and the facts and circumstances.

Q. Yes, you mention it here. Did you mention it to Mr. Bliss?—A. Yes, sir; I did mention it to Mr. Bliss.

Q. Did that negro testify that Mr. Ottman told him when he got the package if he could not preserve it to destroy it?—A. Yes.

Q. When he got it out of the bank at Alexandria if he could not keep it to destroy it?—A. He was to bury it and conceal it in any way where it would be perfectly safe, and if he could not do that he was to destroy the package.

Q. That was $14,500?—A. Yes, twenty-nine notes of $500 dollars each.

Q. And you mentioned that fact to Mr. Bliss?—A. I did.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. You have testified that you advised a settlement with Ottman for $32,000?—A. I said I would recommend the acceptance of a proposition that embraced the turning over of all the money; (we had an account of something like $32,000 or $33,000), he to plead guilty and take a moderate sentence of confinement in the penitentiary.

Q. Why did you make that condition that he should go to the penitentiary?—A. Because, on conference with the Attorney-General, we all agreed that the offense was so grave that we should stamp the man with all of the consequences of a confinement in the penitentiary.

Q. To have compromised without sending him to the penitentiary would have been compounding a felony, would it not?—A. No, it would not have been compounding a felony; it would be only giving him a lesser punishment. It is a little doubtful what is a felony in the District of Columbia.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. That implies a conviction for a felony?—A. But the answer was that we took a plea simply for grand larceny instead of making the offense a felony. The doctrine is that it is the place of the imprisonment that determines in the District of Columbia whether the offense is a misdemeanor or a felony.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. What is the maximum punishment for offenses of this kind?—A. From three to five years.

Q. Not less than three or more than five?—A. Yes; not less than three; I may be mistaken about that.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. To have taken money in settlement without sending Ottman to prison at all, would not that have been compounding a felony in the District of Columbia?—A. I am not able to answer that question. It is rather an abstruse question of law.

Q. What does amount to compounding a felony?—A. The statute provides what shall be compounding a felony. If an officer fails to communicate what he knows in relation to an offense, if he fails to arrest, if he fails to produce the proof necessary to convict when he has it in his power, the statute says he shall be deemed to have compromised a felony. We had, of course, the common law in the District of Columbia as it existed prior to the session of 1801, and thereafter when we come to try a man we may try him under the common law of offenses, as you cannot do in the United States district court.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. The proposition that was pending before you was not a compromise or compounding of a felony?—A. Oh, no.

Q. It is usual, is it not, where a party is indicted for a higher crime to take a plea for a lesser one?—A. Quite usual.

Q. That was never regarded as compounding the felony?—A. No.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Do you mean to say that sending a man to jail is convicting him of a felony?—A. I do not think it is. I would not agree to his going to jail, though.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Was the settlement made by Mr. Bliss of this Ottman case the compounding of a felony in the District of Columbia?—A. I should say not, if you ask my opinion. I am clearly of opinion it was not.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Was the larceny of the $47,000 from the Treasury a felony under the District of Columbia?—A. It would be if he was convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary, beyond any doubt or question.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. He was indicted for grand larceny?—A. He was indicted for a larceny of over $35. We have no such thing as grand larceny except as is determined by the amount taken.

Q. And a conviction for an amount under that cannot be felonious?—A. Yes, a conviction and a sentence to the penitentiary.

Q. If he was sentenced only to jail it was simply a misdemeanor?—A. It would be practically misdemeanor, although at common law a larceny was always a felony.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Then, whenever you convict a man for stealing more than $35 he goes to the penitentiary, and for less he goes to the county jail?—A. Yes; not to exceed twelve months.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. And where the amount stolen is over $35, and conviction follows, the court must either suspend the sentence absolutely or send him to the penitentiary?—A. To the penitentiary.

Q. And that would constitute a felony?—A. I mean to say that if there is a sentence to a penitentiary, where there may be hard labor, I have no doubt it would constitute a felony.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Is your opinion that it was not compounding a felony based upon the fact that there was no felony?—A. Oh, no; I did not put that in that sense at all. It was not a compounding of the felony because it was not secret or done for a malicious or wicked purpose, but it was simply done for the purpose of making an adjustment.

Q. What would it be then if the Government accepted $12,500 when they could have got as much as $33,000 by going to trial?—A. Well, I should think it was very bad practice.

By Mr. FYAN:

Q. Suppose that a United States attorney, or a person employed by the Government to bring about such a compromise, should withhold information that was material in relation to the facts, from the officers who have the power to effect that compromise, what would you call that?—A. It would depend on the intent with which it was withheld.

Q. If he intentionally withheld that information for the purpose of bringing about a compromise less favorable to the Government than the Government was entitled to?—A. That question is too big for me.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. I will put it in this way. Suppose you are the United States Attorney and in possession of certain facts against me, I being indicted, and you, in order to bring about a compromise, make statements to the Attorney-General, and withhold certain material information which if he knew, you have reason to believe the compromise would not be effected?

Mr. MILLIKEN. And that being done with the intention of making a more favorable compromise for the defendant than the Attorney-General would make if he knew all the facts?

Mr. FYAN. Yes.

The WITNESS. Well, I think, gentlemen, I may say, without going too far, that each case of that sort must depend upon its own peculiar circumstances, and I could not undertake to say what it would be in all cases.

TUESDAY, March 25, 1884.

RICHARD CROWLEY sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Please state your residence and occupation.—Answer. I reside in Lockport, N. Y.; I am a lawyer.

Q. During what time were you a member of the House of Representatives?—A. During the Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh Congresses.

Q. Your official term expired when?—A. The 4th of March one year ago this present month.

Q. State whether you were an attorney for William H. Ottman in the settlement of the suits of the United States against him.—A. I was attorney for William H. Ottman in certain cases pending in the courts in Washington and Virginia.

Q. State to the committee the facts which led to the compromise or settlement of that case.—A. Some time in the early spring of 1881 Mr. Ellison, who had been the engineer in charge of the machinery of the House of Representatives prior to that time, and who at that time I believe was the clerk of the Committee on Agriculture, came to me and said that Mr. William H. Ottman, a friend of his, desired to employ counsel in the place of Mr. Matthew H. Carpenter, to take charge of his cases pending in the courts of the United States in the District of Columbia and Virginia. I said to him that Mr. Ottman was a stranger to me, and that my engagements were such that I could not at that time give an answer whether I could accept his cases or not.

He made a brief statement of the cases. Nothing more occurred in connection with them until the latter part of May, 1881. While I was at Albany I received a letter from Mr. Ottman which I hold in my hands and which I will read :

SAINT JAMES HOTEL, BROADWAY AND TWENTY-SIXTH STREET,
New York, May 29, 1881.

DEAR SIR: I believe Colonel Ellison mentioned the facts of my case (in brief to you) now on the docket in the United States court, District of Columbia. I am anxious to have you take hold of it. I am willing to give you a contingent fee of $5,000 on the entering of a nolle prosequi and the releasing of my funds now attached in bank. I have no funds, and am from necessity compelled to put the fee in this shape. Please acknowledge the receipt of this.

Very truly, yours,

WILLIAM H. OTTMAN.

Hon. RICHARD CROWLEY.

That is the first communication I had personally with Mr. Ottman. From Albany I answered his letter, saying that in the course of a few days I expected to be in New York City, and that, stopping at the Saint James Hotel frequently, I would see him upon my first arrival in New York. Early in June, I think before the middle of June, I was in the city and stopped at the Saint James Hotel, and Mr. Ottman came to see me. He then stated briefly the facts of his case to me, and I stated to him that I was going to Washington in the course of a short time, that I would make examination of his cases, and that I saw no reason then why I could not accept the cases, but I would not decide the matter until I could make a fuller examination of them. He told me who his attorneys were; that Mr. Carpenter had been his leading attorney, that Mr. Merrick had been one also, and that Mr. William A. Cook, of Washington, was also one of his attorneys, and I think he told me Colonel Corkhill had been also employed, but of that I am not sure. I came to Washington, arriving here on the morning of the 11th of July, 1881. I remained here July 11, 12, and 13, leaving on the evening of the 13th. I devoted those three days to the examination of the case of Mr. Ottman. I found three indictments pending in the district court of the District of Columbia against him, charging him with having stolen about the sum of $47,000 from the Treasury Department, with having embezzled a like amount of the moneys of the Government stolen from the Treasury Department, and with having received that amount of the funds of the Government knowing them to be the funds of the Government. Those indictments I found had been, by the order of the court under a provision of the Revised Statutes, consolidated into one, and Mr. Ottman had been tried twice upon them as shown by the records of the court. He was not, as I am informed has been testified to before this committee, tried first upon one indictment and then upon another; but he was tried upon the three indictments consolidated into one.

The alleged larceny took place, I think, in June, 1875. The first trial I found had taken place in March, 1876, and occupied several days. I was informed that the jury stood seven for acquittal and five for conviction. The criminal cases then stood over until the next year, when a second trial, which lasted several days, was had in March, 1877, and I am informed, and it appears as of record on a statement signed by eleven of the jurors, and sworn to by one more of them, that upon that second trial eleven of the jurors were in favor of acquittal and one seemed to be undecided whether he was in favor of acquittal or conviction, but refused to find a verdict of acquittal. That was the condition of the criminal indictments. I found, also, from the records of the court that a civil action had been commenced by the Government against Mr. Ottman in the district court for this District, claiming to recover some forty-seven thousand and odd dollars. That civil action was commenced by Mr. Fisher, who was then district attorney, as appears from the records, and he, through his counsel, demurred that an attachment was granted by the court after the civil action was commenced, and under the practice here a motion was made to vacate that attachment upon the ground that it was upon a tort and that an attachment should not issue except in case of contract. The judge holding the court granted the motion, quashing the attachment. From that order an appeal was taken to the general term of the District, and I am informed that the general term reversed the action of the judge holding the special term and sustained the attachment. This action was commenced in 1876. The decision of the courts was in 1876 and 1877, and nothing appeared to have been done in the civil action after this decision of the general term affirming the validity of the attachment.

I then called upon Mr. Cook (Mr. Carpenter was not here and Mr. Merrick was out of town), and had a brief conversation with him in regard to this case. I had been informed by Mr. Ottman that Mr. Cook had been his attorney, and Mr. Cook so informed me also. That is the first and the last time that I have ever seen Mr. Cook. I see from the newspapers that he states that in my conversation with him I said that I expected to effect a compromise of those cases because of my supposed "influence" with some powers real or imaginary. Mr. Garfield was then President of the United States; Mr. MacVeagh was the Attorney-General, with whom I had no personal acquaintance at all; Mr. Corkhill was the district attorney, who, at that time, I had not seen—an entire stranger to me. I was—I will not use the adjective I was about to use—but in May and June of that year I was trying to return Mr. Conkling and Mr. Platt to the Senate of the United States, and therefore I stood in open antagonism to the President, and could not be supposed to possess much influence with his administration. Without making any further remark on Mr. Cook's statement, suffice it to say in this connection that no such conversation as that which he details with regard to my effecting a compromise of this case, through any "influence," ever occurred. From Mr. Cook I went to see Mr. Corkhill. Colonel Corkhill told me that he had been of counsel for Ottman, and therefore could not take any action on behalf of the Government either in the civil or the criminal cases against him. The courts were not in session at that time, so that I could not go into court and ask for any order with regard to the disposition of the criminal cases for the failure to prosecute; nor could I notice the civil cases for trial and move their trial, the court not being then in session; and Colonel Corkhill having been of counsel for Ottman, suggested that the only course was, that the Attorney-General should appoint some special assistant counsel to represent the Government in those cases.

From Washington I went to Alexandria, and examined the records of the court there. I found that there in the municipal court an action had been commenced against Ottman, claiming to recover this same amount of money, and that that action had been removed into the circuit court of the United States for that district of Virginia, and was there pending. There was on deposit in the German Bank of Alexandria the sum of $10,000, and the bank had been forbidden by the authorities of the United States to pay that money to Mr. Ottman, who had deposited it there and held a certificate of deposit. At that time, and so far as I know down to the present time, Mr. Ottman was and has been a stockholder in that bank. He was in 1876, and for years afterwards. That was the condition of those cases.

I remained, as I have said, those three days examining the records of the courts here in the civil and criminal cases, conversing with Colonel Corkhill and Mr. Cook; and also examining the records in the court at Alexandria, Va. Colonel Corkhill, as I have stated, could not act in the matter, having been counsel for Mr. Ottman; the courts were not open, and nothing could be done except to let the matter remain just as it was. I returned to New York and stated to Mr. Ottman the character of the cases as I found them, and said that I was willing to take the chances of going into court and taking charge of his cases to the best of my ability. In January, 1882, a statement was prepared setting forth the condition of the cases pending in behalf of the Government against Mr. Ottman. That statement was signed by Mr. Ottman and transmitted to the Attorney-General. Some time after that—I cannot tell how long, but I think in the month of January, according to my recollection—Colonel Bliss was stopping at the Arlington Hotel, where I was living, and he said to me that he was going to the Attorney-General's office, and I stated to him that Mr. Ottman, whom I was representing in these cases, had made application to the Attorney-General to have the cases disposed of in some way or other, as they had been pending several years; that his petition to that effect was on file, and I asked him if he would not call the attention of the Attorney-General to the petition. He said he would; and he stated to me, either the same day, or very shortly thereafter, that he had done so. The next I heard of the cases was that the Attorney-General had called upon the district attorney, Mr. Corkhill, for a statement of the condition of them, and Mr. Corkhill informed me that he had made a report of the condition of the cases to the Attorney-General. That report I never saw until within the last two or three days.

The CHAIRMAN. It is printed in our record.

The WITNESS. Yes, sir. I have seen it within the last few days. Some little time thereafter, I cannot state how long, the Attorney-General appointed Mr. Bliss special United States Attorney to take charge of those cases. Mr. Bliss informed me of that fact. Mr. Bliss made an examination of the cases, as I was informed through him and also through others, and made a report in writing to the Attorney-General. That report I never saw until last week. Mr. Bliss stated to me that, after a full and careful examination of the cases, he was satisfied that there could be no conviction upon the indictments pending against Mr. Ottman in the district court in the District of Columbia; but that Mr. Wells was of opinion, and he (Mr. Bliss) also thought, that the Government might possibly succeed in the civil suit pending against Mr. Ottman in Alexandria. He said he was unwilling, so far as he was concerned, to recommend to the Attorney-General, or to go into court and recommend to the court, that the criminal indictments should be nolle prossed and this civil suit dismissed also, but that if Ottman was willing to allow the Government to receive the amount which it held by attachment in the German Bank of Alexandria, $10,000 with interest on it, I think, at 3 per cent. from the date of its deposit down to that time, he was willing to recommend, as district attorney, a settlement of the case. I sent for Mr. Ottman and stated to him what Mr. Bliss had stated to me. Mr. Ottman was very much disinclined to accept it; but after some delay he consented to accept it, and authorized me to draw a power of attorney from him to myself for me to carry out that arrangement. I want to say, in this connection, that my own judgment was and is from reading the evidence which was furnished to me by Mr. Ottman taken upon both of the criminal suits, and from my own experience, having been United States attorney for the northern district of New York for eight years, that no conviction within any reasonable probability, whether Mr. Ottman was guilty or innocent, could have been had against Mr. Ottman upon the criminal indictments. Nor do I think that any judgment could have been recovered against him in either of the civil suits pending either in the District of Columbia in the District court or in the circuit court in Virginia. Mr. Wells, who tried Mr. Ottman twice, and who had charge of both the criminal indictments against him and of the civil suit, is made to say that in his judgment the civil suits could possibly have been prosecuted to success.

The CHAIRMAN. Undoubtedly that was his statement.

The WITNESS. Yes. Now, as counsel for Mr. Ottman, my answer to that is this: Mr. Wells tried this criminal case the first time in 1876, when the jury disagreed. He tried it again in March and April, 1877, when the jury disagreed, standing eleven to one, and he remained United States Attorney for nearly three years after that, and never moved those criminal cases or took a single step in them at all. When the civil suit was commenced by Mr. Fisher, he succeeded to it, and after the general term sustained the attachment, although Mr. Wells was district attorney for three years he never took a step in the civil suits as United States Attorney to recover the moneys, if any, due to the Government from Mr. Ottman. The district attorneys in Virginia, two or three of them, I think, after the commencement of this action in the municipal court, and after its removal under the statute of the United States to the circuit court, appear never to have taken any steps in regard to its prosecution. So that this alleged offense and this alleged right of action accruing against and to the Government in 1875 ran along down until 1882 with no action having been taken in the civil or criminal cases to 1877. I said to Mr. Bliss that it was due to Mr. Ottman that the Government should either prosecute those cases or dismiss them; that while the Government was rich and great, it could not afford to be in the attitude of holding indictments for years over a citizen and holding money which he claimed to be his, and which the Government claimed belonged to it, yet to which it could not establish a title. I said that it was due to Mr. Ottman either to prosecute those suits to final results or to dismiss them, and that, two trials having been had without securing a conviction, there was no probability that after this lapse of time, and when the witnesses were scattered all over the country, a different result would be reached. Mr. Ottman came to Washington and saw Mr. Bliss. I said to Mr. Ottman, "No matter what your views may be of this case—you claim that you are innocent, and that this money belongs to you, and that you are not guilty of this offense; but nevertheless the Government of the United States can hold these indictments against you and these civil actions, and they can bring you up any day of any week of any month of any year, and in my judgment it is better for you to buy your peace if you have to do so, than to have this pending against you, liable to be brought up at any time." After considerable demur he accepted that view and executed a power of attorney, which I think is on file.

The Government never had in its possession the $19,525 under attachment. That money was seized, part of it in the German bank at Alexandria, part of it in Mr. Ottman's possession, and part of it elsewhere, just exactly where I do not remember now, nor is it material. It was seized by the police officers and handed over to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, they being the head, I suppose, of the police force of this District. They kept it in their possession, and it was used as evidence upon both trials against Mr. Ottman. In 1878 or 1879, and after the failure of the second trial in 1877, Mr. Morgan and his associate Commissioner took the $19,525, sealed it up in a package, took it to Mr. Gilfillan, Treasurer of the United States, and made a special deposit of that package with him; and when this compromise was effected, as has been testified to and as I have stated, I went with Mr. Morgan, the District Commissioner who held the receipt of Mr. Gilfillan, and with Mr. Bliss, and met Mr. Gilfillan in the Treasury Department and this package was brought out. The seals were broken and it contained $19,525, a deed of trust, and some papers and small articles, the personal property of Mr. Ottman. This was $19,525 in currency; there was in the German Savings Bank a deposit of $10,000, made by Mr. Ottman in 1875 or 1876, I forget which year it was now. For that a certificate of deposit was made to him. It bore interest for a short time, and then there was written across the back of it an agreement that the bank was not to pay interest after that. That was the money that the Government had notified the bank officers not to pay while this suit was pending to determine who was the owner of it. When this suit was settled by the Government claiming that they could possibly succeed in the civil suit in Alexandria as against that money, with interest, the interest was figured up, and the principal and interest amounted to about $12,700, according to my best recollection. Mr. Bliss stated that they did not propose to take a lawsuit, and that while they were willing that Mr. Ottman should have and use the name of the Government to protect his rights in the suit pending by the United States against him and against the bank, they should insist that that amount, $10,000, with interest from the time of its deposit up to the time of this settlement, should be paid out of these moneys on special deposit with Treasurer Gilfillan, leaving Mr. Ottman to fight this suit in Alexandria as best he might. That was assented to by Mr. Ottman in person. We met, as I have stated, at the Treasurer's office. This package was produced, the seal was broken, and it was found to contain $19,525; $12,700 was paid to Mr. Bliss to be deposited to the credit of the United States; the balance was paid to me. I retained my fee of $5,000, in accordance with the letter which I have read here and placed in evidence, and the balance I paid to Mr. Ottman in New York City, and took his receipt for it.

Q. What was that balance?—$12,700 paid to the Government, $5,000 paid to myself, makes $17,500, and the balance is the difference between that and $19,525. When Mr. Ottman was in Washington he asked me to loan him $95, and when the settlement was effected I retained that amount out of the balance and paid the rest to him, and that is his signature at the bottom of that paper. Then that left the suit in Alexandria pending. Before Mr. Carpenter's death, as Mr. Ottman informed me, and as Mr. Coleman, the surviving law partner of Mr. Carpenter, also informed me, this certificate of $10,000 for the money deposited at Alexandria, had been turned over to Mr. Carpenter in payment, or as security, or both, for services which he had rendered to Mr. Ottman, and was to render in the future in the management of his cases. I called upon Mr. Coleman who was the law partner of Mr. Carpenter, and he produced the certificate stating that it had been sent to him by Mr. Russell Sage of New York City, who claimed to be the owner of it (this was after Mr. Carpenter's death), and that he had instructions to commence suit against the bank at Alexandria to recover the amount of that certificate. I went with Mr. Coleman and Mr. Ottman to Alexandria. I there saw Mr. Francis M. Smith, whose father before him had been, and who was himself, in my time, attorney of record for Mr. Ottman in that suit in Alexandria, and talked over the matter of adjusting this certificate of deposit.

Q. Was that certificate for the whole amount of the deposit of $10,000?—A. Yes, sir; just $10,000. No conclusion was reached. Mr. Coleman commenced suit in the name of Mr. Russell Sage against the bank, and I think also against Mr. Ottman, claiming to be owner of this certificate of deposit and the money which it represented. I went afterwards with Mr. Coleman, twice I think, certainly once, to Alexandria, and saw the cashier of the bank, the attorney of the bank, and Mr. Smith, the local attorney of Mr. Ottman, and we had a consultation with regard to the matter, but failed to arrive at any adjustment of the conflicting claims of the bank and Mr. Ottman and Mr. Sage. The matter stood in that shape until last summer. Last summer I was called to California by matters almost beyond my own control, and was absent for some time during June and July, and while I was absent I understand that this suit of Mr. Russell Sage against the bank and against Mr. Ottman (if it was against Ottman, I am not so certain about that) had been settled and adjusted between the bank and Mr. Ottman, represented by Mr. Smith, and by Mr. Coleman, representing Mr. Sage. I was not present at that settlement, and had no part in it further than I have mentioned already. I am informed by Mr. Ottman, and also in substance by Mr. Coleman, that the basis of that settlement was that Mr. Russell Sage claimed to have bought the certificate of Mr. Carpenter, paying therefor $6,000, and that he received of the amount of money deposited in Alexandria (upon which the bank did not pay interest except for two or three months) his $6,000, with, I think, 3 per cent. interest from the time of the purchase of the certificate down to the settlement, that being the amount of interest which the certificate bore on its face; and that the balance of the money was paid to Mr. Ottman.

Q. Mr. Russell Sage obtained $6,000 with 3 per cent. interest from the time he purchased the certificate of Mr. Carpenter until the time of the settlement?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that was deducted from the $10,000 certificate of deposit?—A. Yes; and the balance paid to Mr. Ottman, as the parties informed me.

Q. Do you know what Mr. Ottman received on that balance?—A. I do not, except that it would be the difference between those sums. I don't remember the exact time of the purchase of the certificate, but the complaint would undoubtedly show it. It was the difference between $6,000, with the interest added from the time of the purchase of the certificate, and $10,000.

Q. Did the bank allow interest at 3 per cent.?—A. It did for a short time, and then by agreement between Mr. Ottman and itself it ceased to pay interest after a certain date—the date of the agreement which was written across the face or on the back of the certificate of deposit.

Q. Was the date of that agreement after the time when the money was attached? A. I think it was before that, though I am not certain.

Q. Then the Government did not get any part of the money on deposit in Alexandria?—A. No, sir; the Government retained in this settlement out of the special deposit with Treasurer Gilfillan the $10,000 which it had sought to attach in Alexandria, with interest from the date of the attachment down to the time of the settlement, the amount being $12,700. That, gentlemen, in brief, is my connection with the Ottoman case, and the facts of the case so far as they are known to me. I am now ready to answer any questions which any member of the committee may desire to ask.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Can you explain why you were of opinion that the Government could recover the $10,000 deposited in bank at Alexandria, but could not recover the $19,000 and odd held here in Washington, both sums being part of the same transaction?—A. I did not express the opinion that the Government could recover the $10,000 on deposit in Alexandria. I expressed the opinion that they could not recover that amount.

Q. Well, it was the opinion of Mr. Bliss that the Government could recover the money deposited in Alexandria?—A. The opinion of Mr. Bliss was that they possibly could succeed in the civil suit in Alexandria as against that amount alone.

Q. When did you have the first conversation with Mr. Bliss in regard to this compromise?—A. It was some time in January, 1882, according to my best recollection.

Q. Did Mr. Bliss know anything about the case then?—A. Nothing at all, to my knowledge. It was the first time that I ever talked with him about it, and I had no information or knowledge that he had ever heard of the case before.

Q. Did he state to you that he would call the attention of the Attorney-General to the case?—A. To this petition which Mr. Ottman had presented.

Q. Did you call upon the Attorney-General at all in reference to the case?—A. I have no recollection of calling upon the Attorney-General in connection with the case at all.

Q. Whatever you did with the Department of Justice with reference to the settlement of this case was done through Mr. Bliss?—A. Entirely.

Q. After his first interview in reference to the case with the Attorney-General, at your instance, what did Mr. Bliss report to you as to the condition of things?—A. The substance of it was that he had called the attention of the Attorney-General to the case, and that the Attorney-General had said he would call the attention of the district attorney, Colonel Corkhill, to the matter.

Q. Did you suggest at any time to Mr. Bliss that he should be appointed a special attorney to settle this matter?—A. No, sir; I did not.

Q. Did he suggest to you in any way that he would get that appointment?—A. No, sir; I did not know whom the Attorney-General would appoint. Colonel Corkhill, the district attorney, being disqualified from acting in the case by his previous service as an attorney of Ottman, my simple desire was that somebody should be appointed to go into court on the part of the Government and take charge of the cases; I did not care who it was; it made no difference to me. I expected then to have to go into court with the cases.

Q. You expected to have to represent your client in the courts?—A. I did so expect, and I did represent him in the court.

Q. But at the time you presented the case, through Mr. Bliss, to the Department of Justice, did you present it upon the theory that you were demanding trial for your client in the courts on both the civil and criminal cases, or upon the theory that you desired to have the matter settled outside of the courts?—A. My theory was that I was acting within the courts and that I wanted somebody to represent the District Attorney, who was disqualified from acting in the cases. And let me say here that if the Attorney-General had not appointed somebody to act in the place of Colonel Corkhill, or to represent him in that matter, I should have gone into court, and, upon the presentation of the facts of the case and the records, I should have asked the court to make an order directing the district attorney to move those cases for trial or dismissal. The civil action could have been noticed for trial.

Q. Did you prepare the petition that Ottman submitted to the Attorney-General, which is dated January 21, 1882?—A. I think not; but I gave direction for its preparation to one of my clerks in my office. I caused it to be prepared.

Q. It was done at your instance as Ottman's attorney?—A. Yes.

Q. Was it your intention, then, to defend this criminal case, and also the civil case in the courts?—A. It was.

Q. Your expectation was to be able to defeat the Government on the trial?—A. I expected either to have the case tried in court or dismissed in court.

Q. Did you demand, or intend to demand, a speedy trial?—A. I did, just as soon as I ascertained that Colonel Corkhill was disqualified; I came here for that purpose; and when I learned that he had been of counsel for Ottman (which I did not learn until I came to Washington in July), then I expected as soon as somebody should be appointed to represent the Government to proceed to the trial of the cases.

Q. In Ottman's petition to the Attorney-General, dated January 21, 1882, he says:

I now respectfully ask you to carefully examine, or cause to be examined, these civil and criminal actions, and if consistent with the public interests, the due administration of justice, and your sense of public duty, that you will direct or authorize the proper district attorneys for the District of Columbia and the eastern district of Virginia to discontinue said civil suits and enter a nolle prosequi on said indictment.

That does not seem to indicate that he desired any trial of the cases, but simply asked, in view of the long delay that had occurred, that the suits should be discontinued.—A. I expected, Mr. Chairman, that when counsel for the Government came to examine those cases, and to ascertain that there had been two trials of the criminal indictments, both of which had been failures, that several years had elapsed since the commencement of the civil suit, and that no further action had been taken in that suit since its commencement, he would make up his mind that he could not succeed in the cases, and would himself dismiss them.

Q. Did you ask Mr. Bliss, as special counsel for the Government, to have either the civil or criminal Ottman cases set down for trial?—A. I did not.

Q. Did you not solicit him to compromise the cases outside of court, instead of going to trial?—A. I insisted that Mr. Ottman was entitled to have this indictment nolle prossed, and to have this civil action dismissed, upon the ground that the Government had made an utter failure in its attempt either to establish its right to the money or to establish his guilt.

Q. But the Government had never had a trial of the civil suit?—A. That was the fault of the Government.

Q. But it was not yet too late to have a trial of that suit, so far as the Government was concerned?—A. No, sir.

Q. You believed then, as attorney for your client, that the Government was not entitled to any of this money?—A. I did so believe, from the action which had been taken in the case, and the result of that action, and from the statements of Mr. Ottman.

Q. You believed that the Government could not recover any of this money?—A. I did, and I do now.

Q. Then, instead of compromising the matter and paying the Government a portion of the money, would it not have been better for you to have insisted upon a trial, which, according to your view, would have given you all the money?—A. Possibly not; for this reason, which I stated partially in my direct statement: The Government could try these cases at almost any time it saw fit. It should have tried them before, but it could try them when it pleased. The Government of the United States was rich and powerful. Ottman was poor. If this was his property, the Government had all of his property. He was at the mercy of the Government, and, in my judgment, to buy his peace was better for him under the circumstances than to undergo litigation, civil and criminal, which would probably last through a long period of time, perhaps through years, before it could be disposed of.

Q. Was he released on his own recognizance, or had he given bail?—A. I never saw the bail bond, but I understood that he had given bail in regular form. The records of the court will show that, however.

Q. These cases having dragged along in the courts for so many years, could you not have rightly insisted upon having them set down for trial?—A. Not necessarily.

Q. How long may the Government keep indictments pending?—A. Well, if you will tell me who administers the Government, I will perhaps answer that question.

Q. Mr. Corkhill in this case.—A. Mr. Corkhill was disqualified from acting in the case, because he had been counsel for Ottman.

Q. But he was not disqualified from appointing an assistant?—A. No, sir; he could appoint his regular assistants; but I should doubt the propriety of an assistant appointed by Mr. Corkhill conducting the case, because his action would be the action of Mr. Corkhill. The only course that seemed to me proper was for Mr. Ottman to ask that somebody should be appointed to represent the Government in the matter, and then insist that the cases should be either tried or dismissed. That is what we did, and that was all; and after having the cases tied up for seven years that was our right. Of course, I don't want to testify here as to what I would do or might do, or as to what my processes of reasoning about the case were or might be. I want to give you simply the facts; but if you want me to reason about the case, or to theorize about it, that is another thing.

Q. Did you consult with Mr. Bliss with regard to the preparation of his report?—A. I did not. I never saw his report until last week.

Q. Didn't you know what he had recommended to the Attorney-General?—A. I did not; except as he stated it to me after he had made it.

Q. What did he state to you that he had recommended?—A. As I have already said, he stated that he had reported he did not believe that the Government would succeed in the criminal case, but thought it possible it might succeed in the civil suit.

Q. It was not material, so far as the recovery of the money was concerned, that the criminal suit should be prosecuted at all, was it?—A. No, sir.

Q. So far as that was concerned, the Government might have nolle prossed the criminal suit and still have maintained its action in the civil suit?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And could have succeeded in the civil suit?—A. I think not; that is a matter of opinion.

Q. Well, it might have succeeded in the civil suit, independent of the criminal case, might it not?—A. Possibly. I cannot tell in advance what courts and juries will do.

Q. But it was your opinion that the Government was not entitled to any of this money?—A. That was my opinion, and it is my opinion now, and I base it upon both the criminal trials, upon the results of the action of the juries in those two cases, and the failure of the Government to establish the identity of the money stolen with this money it was seeking to recover.

Q. Did Mr. Bliss tell you that Mr. Wells had said to him that an offer had been made on the part of Ottman by Mr. Elliott, his former counsel, to pay the Government $32,000 and to take one year's imprisonment in the county jail?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you ever learn that fact?—A. I learned the fact that such statements had been made, but never from Colonel Bliss; and it is due to Mr. Ottman to say that he denies ever having made any such offer.

Q. But you knew that Mr. Elliott had been his attorney?—A. I did not. I did not know who Mr. Elliott was or is.

Q. How often did you have interviews with Mr. Bliss in regard to the preparation of his report?—A. I did not have any interviews with him in regard to the preparation of his report.

Q. I mean interviews in which he obtained the facts upon which he based the report?—A. I gave Mr. Bliss the evidence taken upon both the criminal trials, and I gave him copies of the indictments. With that exception I did not give him anything. He asked me for the evidence. I think it was not in the district attorney's office, but Mr. Ottman had copies of it in his possession which he furnished me and which I furnished Mr. Bliss. With those exceptions I furnished no papers to Colonel Bliss, according to my present recollection; nor did I have any communication with him in regard to the preparation of his report. When he made the report he informed me of what it was in substance; but the report I never saw until last week.

Q. What course did you then pursue?—A. I sent for Mr. Ottman and brought him here and talked with him about the case, and asked him to go and see Colonel Bliss. He went and saw Colonel Bliss and talked with him about it. Mr. Ottman objected to the settlement, and went back to New York to consult with his wife and friends; and having been absent some days, he came back and said he had concluded to accept a settlement.

Q. Mr. Cook spoke here about a statement to which you have referred, namely, that you had influence with some person or persons who might help you to settle these cases; may he not have had Mr. Bliss in his mind as the gentleman as to whom that statement referred?—A. I cannot tell whom Colonel Cook may have had in his mind. Mr. Bliss was not in the case at that time. That was in July, and Mr. Bliss was not appointed until the February following, and knew nothing of the case at that time, so far as I know, or until January, 1882. What Mr. Cook may have had in his mind I do not know; but as a matter of reasoning I should say that he could not have had Mr. Bliss in his mind in that connection.

Q. It was after that conversation between you and Colonel Cook that Mr. Bliss came into the case?—A. Oh, yes; this conversation was in July, 1881. I came here on the 11th of July, and remained here until the evening of the 13th looking into this case, and it was at that time that I had the interview with Colonel Cook. Colonel Bliss was not appointed special assistant counsel until the latter part of January or first part of February, 1882.

Q. Had you in your mind the idea of having Mr. Bliss appointed special counsel?—A. Not at all. I had no one in my mind at that time.

Q. Was not Mr. Bliss special counsel in the star-route cases?—A. No, sir; I think not at that time. I think his appointment was made after that time. I think it was in August or September, 1881. This time that I had the conversation with Mr. Cook was in the early part of July, 1881.

Q. So there was no one, then, in the administration that you could have had influence with?—A. No, sir. Mr. MacVeagh, the Attorney-General, was personally a stranger to me. General Garfield was at that time lying wounded. Colonel Corkhill I never had had the pleasure of an interview with; and certainly I could not be presumed to have much influence with an administration that I was engaged in fighting.

Q. What were your relations to Colonel Bliss?—A. My relations with Colonel Bliss have been pleasant and friendly. I have known him eighteen or twenty years.

Q. It has been stated that Colonel Bliss shared a portion of the fee which you were entitled to or received?—A. I received $5,000 as my fee, and retained the whole of it—did not share it with anybody. I am not sharing my fees.

Q. Did you make any present to Colonel Bliss or to any other person who may have assisted you in this matter?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did Mr. Ottman?—A. I do not know what Mr. Ottman did, but he did not do it with my knowledge or belief.

Q. Then the basis of the compromise, so far as your information went, was that the Government should take the equivalent of the $10,000 and interest, which was on deposit in the bank at Alexandria, and should release its claim there?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. So as to leave Ottman free to fight it out with the bank and the assignee of this certificate of deposit, and the other creditors?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that that was to be in full settlement of all the claim of the Government against this money, and that the criminal cases were to be nolle prossed, and the money that the Government had tied up was to be released?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You received your fee, and deposited the rest of the money with Mr. Bliss to be paid into the Treasury?—A. Yes, sir; $12,700. I retained my fee of $5,000, and paid the balance to Mr. Ottman.

Q. When was that final settlement consummated?—A. Along in the last days of May or the first days of June, 1882. It was along at that time that this amount was received from Treasurer Gilfillan, and I paid Mr. Ottman in New York City on the 6th of June, as shown by a memorandum which I have here, which is in accordance with my recollection. The settlement as to the balance of the money which was in Alexandria was made some time last summer in July or August, while I was away on the Pacific coast.

Q. But the money had been paid into the Treasury prior to that?—A. Oh, yes. I suppose it was paid probably the same day it was paid to Mr. Bliss, or the next day.

Q. It appears from Mr. Gilfillan's statement to have been paid into the Treasury June 6, 1882.—A. I have no personal knowledge of the time it was paid into the Treasury by Mr. Bliss. I only know the time it was paid to him.

Q. You paid the money to Mr. Bliss?—A. I did.

Q. And Mr. Bliss at once paid the money over into the Treasury?—

A. I suppose he did. It was the understanding that he should do so.

Q. The amount that you paid Mr. Bliss is the exact amount deposited in the Treasury?—A. Yes, sir; $12,700.

Q. Were you a member of Congress at that time?—A. I was.

Q. You ceased to be a member of Congress when?—A. On the 4th of March, 1883.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. You say that Ottman denied having made the offer of $32,000?—

A. Yes, sir; he denied it to me. In some way, which I cannot now recall, the statement was made to me, and I called Mr. Ottman's attention to it, and he denied ever having made any such offer. Of course, whether he did or not, I do not undertake to say; but his statement was that he never did.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you know the exact manner in which the difference between the $6,000, with interest, and the whole amount of the deposit at Alexandria, was disposed of?—A. I do not. I was not there, and I do not know of my own personal knowledge.

Q. The presumption is that it went to Ottman and his attorneys, is it not?—A. I met Mr. Ottman in New York after my return, and he told me that that suit in Alexandria was settled. I asked him how it was settled. He said that Mr. Sage had received the $6,000, with interest, and that he (Ottman) had received the balance.

Q. Did he state how much he had received?—A. He did not.

Q. Have you been special counsel for the Government in any other case recently?—A. Not since a year ago this month.

Q. In what cases were you special counsel for the Government?—A. In 1882, I think about midsummer, after the adjournment of Congress, according to my recollection, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue had a conversation with me about arguing what is known as the New York Central Railroad tax case. That was a suit of the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company against John M. Bailey, who had been internal-revenue collector in the Albany district, and had there collected from the Central Railroad Company about $500,000 on account of alleged income taxes. I was then district attorney, and tried the case. The court directed a verdict against us. We appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed the judgment below, and sent the case back for a new trial. We tried it again, and the jury found partly in favor of the Government and partly in favor of the road. I took an appeal to the Supreme Court, and the Attorney-General wrote me a letter and asked me to appear for the Government and argue that case in the Supreme Court. I have not got that letter here, but I have it in my office. I was subpoenaed last evening, and I brought along such memoranda and papers as I could lay my hands upon, and that letter I have not got here.

Q. What was the date of that commission?—A. Some time in midsummer, 1882, according to my recollection. I appeared here, I think, at the October term, 1882. I prepared a brief and argued the case in the Supreme Court.

Q. Did the Attorney-General send you a special appointment, or just a letter requesting you to appear?—A. I think it was a letter asking me to appear. I was the attorney of record in my own proper name, not as United States attorney, but it was "John M. Bailey by Richard Crowley, his attorney."

Q. You appeared for Bailey?—A. I appeared for Bailey nominally, but really for the Government, Bailey having been a collector of internal revenue, and the Government defending him as its officer.

Q. You were United States district attorney for the northern district of New York at the time the case was tried in the court below?—A. It was tried twice in the courts below. I resigned my office as district attorney to take my seat in Congress at the called session in 1879, so I had ceased to be United States attorney at the time the Attorney-General requested me to argue this case.

Q. Did you receive an appointment to argue this case in the Supreme Court as special counsel, and did you take the oath and receive a commission?—A. No, I think not. It would not have been necessary in that case, you see, because, as I have said, I was the attorney of record in the case.

Q. But you could not be the attorney in the Supreme Court merely because you had been United States district attorney when the case was tried below?—A. No, perhaps not; but I would not care to follow the case up there and argue it as a mere gratuity. I had no desire to do the work unless I was paid for it.

Q. But you appeared in the Supreme Court under a different authority from that under which you appeared in the court below?—A. If my recollection is clear, I think that by an official letter from the Department of Justice, sent by the Attorney-General officially, I was requested to take charge of the case and argue it in the Supreme Court.

Q. Have you a copy of that letter?—A. I have not a copy here, but I have it in my office at home. I went to the Department this morning and tried to find a copy of it, but I was unable to do so, although I found copies of my other letters of appointment.

Q. I call your attention to this from the fact that there has been some question raised as to the manner in which these appointments should be made.—A. Well, that is the way that I think that appointment was made. I was not required to take an oath of office and file it in the Department, as is usually required of special assistant attorneys.

Q. You being a member of Congress at that time?—A. Oh, not for that reason at all.

Q. But you were at that time a member of Congress?—A. I was.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. But the reason was that you had represented the Government as the attorney of record in the court below?—A. Yes, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You received no compensation from Mr. Bailey, I suppose?—A. No, sir. All my fees in the matter came from the Government.

Q. Bailey was simply the nominal defendant in the case?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. State what services you rendered in the case.—A. Well, I was of course familiar with the case, having tried it twice in the courts below, and having prepared a record bringing it from the circuit court to the Supreme Court. I prepared my brief, which is on file in the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court, with the other papers, and I came here and remained several days in attendance upon the court waiting for the case to be called, and argued it when it was called.

Q. What was the action of the Supreme Court in that case?—A. They sustained the judgment in the court below.

Q. What was that?—A. The amount which the railroad sought to recover was about $720,000, and the jury found that the Government was entitled to about $300,000, and rendered a verdict for the railroad company for the balance. Exception had been taken to that finding of the jury, and the Supreme Court affirmed the verdict of the jury and the rulings of the court below.

Q. The railroad company took the case up to the Supreme Court?—A. No, sir; I appealed the case.

Q. The Government was not satisfied with the judgment of the court below?—A. No, sir; and they appealed.

Q. Did you receive any compensation from the Government for your services in that matter?—A. I did. I received $2,500 and my expenses in coming to Washington to argue the case.

Q. Please look at the statement on page 50 of this Executive Document No. 40, and state whether the item of $2,500 to which I call your attention is the charge which you made for your services in that case?—A. (After inspecting the document.) I have no doubt that it is. I know that my charge in that matter was $2,500 and my expenses.

Q. Please look on the next page and state whether you find there a statement of your expense account?—A. I do.

Q. Is that the amount for which your bill was originally rendered, and was there any disagreement between you and the Department as to what the amount of your bill should be?—A. I think there was an item of $1.65 in my expense account which was disallowed. It seems that in some of my hotel bills there was a charge for some cigars and some whisky, and I think the Department reported that the account was allowed less this charge for cigars and whisky, which they said had no doubt been inadvertently inserted in the account. The bill was rendered to me, and I gave it to some of my clerks to make out my expense account, and I suppose the item got in in that way.

Q. What do you say was the amount of your charge for your services in that case?—A. Twenty-five hundred dollars.

Q. Was that the amount of your original bill?—A. In that case it was.

Q. What time was this case argued in the Supreme Court?—A. At the October term, 1882, I think.

Q. That term began in October and went on right through the year up to May?—A. Yes; but we argued the case in October.

Q. I see that your bill at the Arlington Hotel is dated October 20, 1882. That was probably the time you argued the case?—A. Yes, sir; I know that I had to remain here for several days in attendance upon the court before the case was reached. It was set down for a particular day, but several days passed, perhaps a week, before it was reached.

Q. I see on the next page of this document an account of yours in some other cases, the case of the United States against Reuben Porter Lee, and against Hall. Please tell us about those cases.—A. In the middle of April, 1882, the First National Bank of Buffalo failed. I may state here that my law office for the past three years has been in the city of Buffalo, although my residence is in Lockport. That bank failed, and the Comptroller appointed a receiver of it. The receiver desired me and my firm to act as the counsel. I consented to act as counsel for the receiver, and am so acting yet, in that bank case. Upon an examination of the books, papers, and assets of the bank, it was discovered that serious offenses had been committed by the president and others, and the president of the bank, Herman J. Hall, was arrested. An examination was had before the commissioner, which lasted several days, and I was requested by the district attorney, Hon. Martin I. Townsend, to represent the Government in the cases. I telegraphed Mr. Townsend that I did not care to represent the Government in any criminal cases, because I had all I wanted to do in civil matters, and did not care to give my time to prosecute criminal cases for the Government gratuitously. In reply, Mr. Townsend informed me that he would request the Attorney-General to retain me as counsel to try the criminal cases growing out of the failure of that bank. On the 22d of May, 1882, I received a letter from the Department of Justice, signed by the Attorney-General officially, a copy of which I hold in my hand, and which reads as follows:

SIR: You are hereby appointed a special assistant to the district attorney for the northern district of New York, to represent the Government in the case or cases against the "First National Bank of Buffalo" and its officers. Such compensation for your services will be paid you as the Attorney-General, at the end of the litigation, shall deem just and reasonable.

Calling your attention to section 366 Revised Statutes, I will thank you to take and transmit to this Department the oath required of district attorneys.

Very respectfully,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

HON. RICHARD CROWLEY,
House of Representatives.

I took the oath of office some days after that letter was received, and proceeded to act in those cases. I conducted the examination of Mr. Lee, and others, running through two weeks, before the commissioner in Buffalo. I then prepared the case for presentation to the grand jury at the Canandaigua term in June, 1882, and drew the indictments; and I presented the cases to the grand jury, and they indicted Lee and Hall. I moved the trial at the term, and the trial lasted seven or eight days, and the jury disagreed. In the November term, 1882, at Syracuse, I moved the trial of the cases again, and again it lasted seven or eight days. On that trial the jury convicted Lee, and the judge sentenced him to imprisonment for the term of ten years, and he is undergoing that sentence now. I sent in my bill for my services in those cases for $5,000. The Attorney-General, without any consultation with me, reduced the amount to $2,500. The newspapers have stated that I received $10,000 or $15,000 for my services in that case. The fact is that I sent in my bill for $5,000, the Attorney-General reduced it to $2,500, and I received either $2,100 or $2,200, the balance being still unpaid, because, as the Department informs me, the judiciary fund is exhausted.

Q. It was in that case and not in the other that the disallowance was made in your expense account, I believe?—A. Probably. I do not remember which case that was in.

Q. There is no other disallowance except that item, is there?—A. I do not remember any other, except the disallowance, or rather the reduction, of my bill from $5,000 to $2,500.

Q. I see that in this case your pay was reduced to $2,500 and that your expense account was $980, making a total of $4,380; have you received all of that account?—A. I have.

Q. Then the Government does not owe you anything now in connection with the matter?—A. It owes me nothing except the difference between the $2,500, which was allowed me for my services, and the $2,200, I think it was that was paid, there being no money to pay the balance. When we got over to the Treasury Department there was not enough to pay the bill, as they reported, that fund being exhausted.

Q. Please state what you know in regard to the decision of the Comptroller, Mr. Lawrence, which is printed on page 54 of this pamphlet.—A. Yes, sir. That illustrates pretty well the way in which some of the matters are managed in some of the Departments. My fee for arguing the New York Central tax case, $2,500, went through the Treasury Department without any demur. When I sent in my bill for my services in the Hall case, which was subsequently, the First Comptroller, in his wisdom, decided that because I was a member of Congress at the time, therefore I could not draw two salaries from the Government, and I was required to furnish law for the Treasury Department, and I did file a brief to show that a member of Congress was not among the executive officers of the Departments, to whom that statute applied; that members of Congress were not intended to be included by the Congress that passed the law, nor by any subsequent Congress that amended it. Then the Comptroller took that view, and wrote an elaborate opinion, which I have not seen.

Q. That opinion was to the effect that a Representative in Congress is not in any branch of the public service contemplated by section 1765 of the Revised Statutes, by which certain persons in the employ of the Government are excluded from receiving extra compensation or allowance?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. But the services in the cases to which you refer were performed during the time you were a member of Congress?—A. Yes, sir. I think, Mr. Springer, I am not the only member of Congress who has presented bills to the Government for services rendered while he was a member.

Q. Can you name any others?—A. I am informed that you presented a bill to the Government for $10,000.

The CHAIRMAN. That is just where you are mistaken.

The WITNESS. Well, I may be; but I know that there are other members who have presented bills for services rendered while they were in Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. That statement about myself got into the press, but it is a mistake.

The WITNESS. I am very sorry that it is, for your sake.

The CHAIRMAN. I appeared in the case of the United States against the Centennial Exposition, and argued the case there in which a million and a half was involved, and the judgment of the court below was reversed, and the Government got the money; but I have never received a cent for my services.

The WITNESS. I remember that the War Department employed Mr. Conkling early in the war to go to Elmira to try the cases against Haddock, who was convicted; and Mr. Conkling charged $10,000 for his services in that matter and it was paid. In fact, there are scores of cases where members of Congress have been employed to perform special services for the Government and have been paid.

The CHAIRMAN. As you have called attention to my own case, I will state that I did file a petition in the House of Representatives asking to be allowed to go before the Court of Claims to prove the value of my services, on the ground that I was excluded by the statute from obtaining compensation, unless I was relieved by a special act of Congress.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Were these which you have mentioned here the only cases in which you appeared for the Government during your official service as a member of Congress?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the aggregate of your fees in those cases— A. (Interposing.) The aggregate amount allowed me for my services, not including my disbursements, was a little less than $5,000.

Q. But you were allowed your expenditures in addition to that?—A. Yes, sir. In the bank case my expenditures covered the examination of the books and papers, and assets of the bank for a long period of time, and the Government allowed me to employ a stenographer to report the evidence on the trials, and I think his bill was $300, or $400, or $500.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Did you charge the Government any larger fee than you are in the habit of receiving from your other clients?—A. No, sir; I did not. If I ever earned $5,000 in my profession, and I have been practicing law since May, 1861, I earned it in those bank cases. I did not charge the Government any more than I would charge other clients; and my employment by the Government has not been a source of any profit to me—I mean anything more than I would have received—not even as much as I could have made in my private business.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you know whether there was sufficient force in the office of the Attorney-General in this city to attend to those cases in which you were employed?—A. I have no doubt that there was sufficient force; but having tried that tax case twice, the case involving over $700,000, and being a case of very great importance; I think that the employment of myself by the Government to argue the case here was eminently proper, and I think it was equally proper that the Government should pay me a reasonable fee for my services. I have no doubt that the Department could have taken hold of the case, and gone into court and argued it without my assistance—of course if I had been dead they would have had to do so; but what I mean to say is, that in my judgment, the employment of a counsel, who, as district attorney, had tried the case previously, and who was competent to take charge of it—I think the employment of such a person to follow the case up into the Supreme Court was entirely proper and reasonable.

Now, to close my statement of the cases in which I have been employed by the Government, in January, 1883, the Attorney-General said that he desired to retain me, if I would consent to be retained, to try the South Carolina election cases, and that I would not be required to go to South Carolina to try them until after the adjournment of Congress. He said that the district attorney down there, Mr. Melton, desired some assistance, and that the Department would be very glad to have me go there and help him. After thinking the matter over for some time, I consented to act, and on the 12th of January (according to a letter, a copy of which I have here) the Attorney-General appointed me. Here is his letter:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, January 12, 1883.

SIR: You are hereby employed and retained in the name of the United States to assist Samuel W. Melton, attorney for the United States, in the district of South Carolina, in the discharge of his duty in prosecuting offenses against the election laws of the United States.

Due notice will be given you of the time when your presence in that district will be required, and the amount of your compensation will be such as I shall deem just on consideration of the service you may render. On accepting this employment you will please attend at this Department to take the oath prescribed and receive your commission.

Very respectfully,

BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

Hon. RICHARD CROWLEY.

When I received that letter I filed the usual oath of office, and at once put myself in correspondence with Mr. Melton. I examined all the letters on file in the Department in relation to these South Carolina election cases, and I prepared a brief in regard to the standing aside of jurors under the practice in South Carolina, preparatory to going down to try those cases. But after my fee in the Hall case had been reduced to $2,500, and when I discovered that the fund was exhausted so that I could not even have that fee paid in full, I made up my mind that I had rendered the Government about all the service that I cared to render; so I made no charge for what I did in the South Carolina cases, but on the 25th of March I wrote the Attorney-General a letter withdrawing myself from any further connection with those cases, and also from any further connection with the case of the First National Bank of Buffalo.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. So that for this last service which you rendered the Government in connection with the South Carolina cases you received no compensation?—A. Nothing at all. The papers have been kind enough to say (but I suppose I ought not to complain of that, because something has to be said) that I have received $30,000 in those cases. I wish I had.

I believe I have now stated fully my connection with the Government service in these matters, so far as I have any present recollection of it.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Were you at any time employed on behalf of persons charged with frauds upon the star-route mail service?—A. No, sir.

Q. Were you applied to by any of the defendants, or persons suspected of frauds in connection with that service, to become counsel for them?—A. No, sir; I cannot say that I was. I think that at one time, though perhaps it is an improper inference for me to draw, a person did desire to employ me as counsel for some of the star-route people, but there was no offer made me of any retainer; I do not know but perhaps I may be doing injustice, but still I think that if I had been willing to accept a retainer at that time it would have been given to me. However, I may be wrong about that. The gentleman to whom I refer is Mr. Bosler.

Q. Did he make you any offer at all?—A. No, sir.

Q. It was merely a matter of inquiry?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you acquainted with John M. Sanderson?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you ever have any dealings with him at all?—A. I do not know him at all. I never saw him, and should not know him if I should see him now.

Q. Were you acquainted with the Salisburys, who were supposed to have been connected with the star-route contracts?—A. I have met one of the Salisburys here in Washington, but which one I do not know, and I have no personal acquaintance with him, with the exception of a casual meeting.

Q. Did they, or any of their agents or attorneys, solicit you to become counsel for them?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know anything about the Parkers?—A. No; I do not know them at all.

Q. Then, as I understand, you have had no dealings, directly or indirectly, with any of the defendants in those star-route cases, so far as you recollect?—A. I desire to state here, to be entirely frank about the matter, because it has come to me since I have been in Washington this time, and otherwise when you spoke about Sanderson, I should not have known what Sanderson was meant—I desire to state that I have heard that the rumor prevails that Mr. Sanderson was directed to employ me, and that a sum of considerable magnitude—$20,000—was offered me to take charge of his case. Until last week I never heard of Sanderson, and I do not know anything about him. No such proposition was ever made to me on behalf of any one, nor do I know of any such proposition being made to anybody.

Q. Did anybody come to you representing that he spoke for Sanderson?—A. No, sir; I never heard Sanderson's name until this last week.

Q. And you did not know anything about him, or what relation he had to the cases?—A. Nothing at all.

Q. Did you have any knowledge of the transactions between the Government and the star route contractors pending the suits or prosecutions, or efforts to bring suits or prosecutions, against them in Washington?—A. I heard of this matter in the papers, and knew that such transactions were pending between the parties, and of course I knew of the trials of the persons indicted.

Q. But you had no business relations with any of the defendants, as I understand you?—A. No, sir.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. How many years were you district attorney for the northern district of New York?—A. Eight years.

Q. Is the criminal calendar of that district large?—A. It is.

Q. Does it cover the general scope of offenses under the statutes?—A. It does.

Q. Then you are necessarily familiar, from your long practice in that district, with the character of the jurors there?—A. Yes, sir; and let me say that I was specially familiar with these bank cases, for I had had a similar case in Oswego, growing out of the failure of a bank and the conversion of its money by the officers, and I had also had another such case in another place in New York.

Q. In stating, as you have stated here, that Ottman denied that he had ever made an offer to pay the Government $32,000 by way of compromise, you do not mean to be understood, I suppose, that that raises any question of veracity, so far as ex-District Attorney Wells is concerned?—A. Not at all, sir. I simply say that that statement came to me in some way, and I asked Mr. Ottman about it, and he denied it. Of course I am raising no question of veracity; but I think it simply just to Mr. Ottman that his denial of the statement should be mentioned here.

Q. Did you understand the offer to come through the representative of Ottman?—A. If I understood anything about that at the time, it has escaped from my memory. The substance of what I heard was, I think, that it had come from him, but whether directly from him in person, or indirectly through somebody else, I do not now remember.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. During what years were you district attorney for the northern district of New York?—A. I was appointed in April, 1871, and resigned in February, 1879.

Q. I wish you would explain for my information the statement with regard to the fees in the northern district of New York from 1873 to 1883, which is set forth in this document which I now hand you.—A. (Referring to the document.) I cannot explain anything later than February, 1879, because I went out of office at that time.

Q. Was there any portion of the fees earned covered into the Treasury during that period?—A. In the District of Columbia and the southern district of New York the district attorneys have a salary of $6,000. In the other districts outside of those two places the district attorney gets a fixed salary of $200 a year, the balance of his salary, not exceeding in all $6,000, being made up by fees. The district attorney is allowed so much per day, $5 a day for attending courts and attending before commissioners, and he is allowed 10 cents a mile each way. In all those other districts the whole of his salary above the $200 is made out of fees.

Q. Was there any portion of the fees included in this statement covered into the Treasury as the excess beyond the limit fixed by law?—A. That would not be so. To illustrate, the fees of my office allowed by statute may amount to $10,000. I make an itemized account of every species of service that I perform for which the law authorizes me to charge a fee, and I send that account to the Attorney-General. He audits it, and transmits it to the pay officer of the Department. That is fees which I have earned; but the Department pays me my $6,000, and no more.

Q. Then all fees in excess of that remain in the Treasury and do not go out?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. They are put down, however, as the expenditures of the office, as this statement shows. For instance, in 1873 the gross earnings of your office appeared to be $10,400, and the office expenditures $4,000.—

A. I had two assistants and a clerk. The assistants were paid directly by the Treasury Department, but the clerk was embraced in the expenses of the office; and there were also included gas and fuel, and they allowed me at one time a stenographer. Of course I cannot tell you, without looking at the voucher, how the items composing that $4,000 were made up.

Q. What I desired to learn was the practice as to returning earnings in excess of the limit of the fees.—A. We do not receive the fees at all. The whole system of compensation of marshals and district attorneys is, in my judgment, a failure, and should have been abolished long ago. The Government could save hundreds of thousands of dollars every year, in my judgment, if they would pay their district attorneys and marshals fixed salaries, thus doing away with the disposition to make unnecessary fees.

By Mr. MILLIKEN:

Q. Don't you think the clerks of the courts should be paid in the same way?—A. Yes, sir. Some of them are paid in that way now.

Q. You could hardly extend the salary system to the deputy marshals, though?—A. Well, I can see how it would be very difficult. The sheriffs and the county clerks in our State are paid by fees now; but I can see that it would be very difficult to adjust a proper scale of compensation for the deputy marshals.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. In addition to the earnings of the marshals and their deputies in criminal cases to which the United States is a party, they must have a large amount of earnings in civil business in which the United States is not concerned at all?—A. They do. That they claim the right to retain as their own, without reporting their receipts to the Government, because the Government has no interest in the cases.

Q. You say they claim the right to retain that money, even if it exceeds the limit of $6,000?—A. Yes, sir. I say "they"; I mean that I know that some of them do. I know it has been a matter of controversy between the Department and the marshals and the clerks as to their reporting their fees in bankruptcy cases and applying them in payment of their salaries. I know that some of them claim that that kind of business is a matter of litigation between private individuals with which the Government has nothing to do.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. From your long experience in connection with the courts in the northern district of New York, how much of the time of the clerk do you think is exclusively employed in the business of his office?—A. It would be a little difficult to answer that. When the internal revenue law was in full force and the bankruptcy law in existence the district attorney and the clerk in that district were exceedingly busy. The northern district of New York, however, is perhaps hardly a fair example to take, because it is one of the largest judicial districts, and contains a larger population than any other—about three million people. It extends from Albany to Buffalo, and from the Pennsylvania line to the Saint Lawrence and the Lakes, and it has a frontier bordering on Canada for a great many miles. The clerk's office of the northern district of New York has been an exceedingly busy office. Of course, now that the internal-revenue law has been largely wiped out, and the bankruptcy proceedings have been entirely done away with, the business of the office is getting down to what may perhaps be called its legitimate basis, as it was before the war; at least it has been considerably reduced.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. It is your opinion that the Government might save large amounts of money by providing fixed salaries for marshals and clerks?—A. Yes, sir; although, if I were sitting in Congress now, and were asked to devise a scheme which would be a just one to all the United States attorneys and their assistants and the marshals, I can see that it would be a very difficult thing to do, but at the same time I think it would be a very proper thing to do; and, whenever it is done, the Government will be much better served.

Q. You do not think that we could make the matter any worse than it is now by an attempt in that matter?—A. So far as my personal experience goes, I think there has been a good deal of unjust criticism upon those officers.

Q. I mean as a matter of economy, do you think we could make the matter much worse by an attempt to improve it?—A. No; I do not see how you can make it any worse; I do not see how the doors can be open any more widely than they are under the present system.

Adjourned.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 7, 1884.

HORACE A. WHITNEY sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Please state your residence and occupation.—Answer. I reside in New York. I am assistant cashier of the Treasury.

Q. Were you in the Treasury Department at the time of the theft of money known as the Ottman steal?—A. I was, sir.

Q. State what you know in regard to that transaction.—A. I only know that on the second day of June, 1882, a package of money amounting to forty-seven thousand and sixty-five dollars and some odd change, I think 98 cents, was missing.

Q. Were you in the cash-room at that time?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you see the package that was afterwards brought to the Treasury Department or produced in court?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. State what was the result of your investigations as to the bills found in that package.—A. Well, if I might state something previous to that it would connect with my bringing the notes at the time. At the time we lost that money the $500 bills that we were using were in the serial numbers of somewhere between 48000 and 60000, the regular numbers. I was the shipping teller at that time. I know that we were very short of $500 notes, the demand was so heavy. That day I drew out $350,000 of that denomination together with other denominations. They hadn't enough in the vault to give me the brand-new notes, so they gave me one package that had been out, what we call a made-up package, notes good enough to use. I remember that immediately after the robbery one package contained many notes within a certain number, say seven thousands, and the notes that were handed me to count that were brought from Alexandria were in the seven thousands. Some may have been in the six thousands, but the majority were in the seven thousand.

Q. Was there any paper or other thing about those notes that induced you to believe that they were the identical notes that had been stolen from the Treasury?—A. There was nothing in the package but the notes, that I saw.

Q. Was there anything about the manner in which they were folded, or the numbers, which indicated they were the same?—A. No more than the manner in which they were lost, and the question as to who was supposed to have been connected with the robbery.

Q. Had you made up this package?—A. No; I had made it up originally as a $50,000 package; I made up the package, however, to ship to the National Park Bank that day.

Q. That was the package that was stolen?—A. Yes, sir. That package was used, taking out $3,000 and putting in a twenty and five and a two and some change. The package contained $47,097.65, I think.

Q. Did you find any of the bills lying in the consecutive order in which they had been placed?—A. I don't recollect that; there was a list of them taken at the time they were opened.

Q. Did you testify on the first or the second trial?—A. On both trials.

Q. Do you remember that you testified as to their being in consecutive order?—A. I don't remember to have testified that they were in consecutive order; I do not know that I knew that, and yet I may have done so.

Q. From the investigation you made was there any doubt in your mind that this money really belonged to the Government?—A. Not the slightest; except from the want of ability to swear to any note by its number, I was perfectly satisfied that those were the notes stolen from the Government on the 2d day of June.

WASHINGTON, April 7, 1884.

GEORGE W. McELFRESH sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Please state your residence and occupation.—Answer. I reside at 410 Massachusetts avenue, Washington; my occupation is that of an independent detective at present.

Q. Were you employed at any time by the Government in detective work?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you employed at any time by Colonel Cook during the star-route trials?—A. No, sir. I was a metropolitan detective officer for about ten years until about a year ago.

Q. Were you cognizant of any of the facts in relation to the arrest of Howgate?—A. No, sir. The bondsmen of Mr. Howgate employed me to have him watched to see that he did not run away, and I employed two men and had them follow him.

Q. State what you know in regard to the arrest of Ottman?—A. Major Richards sent Mr. McDevitt and myself to New York on the 6th of August, 1875. We arrived there on the morning of the 7th. About one o'clock on the 7th of August we arrested Halleck at the Globe Insurance Office on Broadway, and started to Washington on the 3 o'clock train that same day and arrived here at 11.15, and carried him to the old central guard-house on Louisiana avenue, and locked him up.

Q. Was Halleck at that time a fugitive from justice?—A. I think not. I think he was away on leave of absence.

Q. And it had not been discovered that he was connected with this robbery until after he had gone away?—A. I guess not. I always suspected that he was. Mr. Sargent and I were at police headquarters.

Q. Did you have anything to do with the arrest of Ottman?—A. No, sir. I think he was arrested while I was on my way to New York. He was arrested on the same day.

Q. Did you have anything to do with the arrest of anybody else except Halleck?—A. No, sir; only Halleck.

Q. Did you have any conversation with Halleck in regard to the matter?—A. Yes, sir; I had a talk with him coming over on the cars. During the trip he had his little memorandum book out and was making a calculation, and Mr. McDevitt and myself watched him, and when he got through we took away the memorandum from him and added it up and it amounted to $47,097.

Q. The exact sum lost?—A. The exact sum. He was dividing it into two parts.

Q. What was the nature of the memorandum?—A. It was a little memorandum book, and we took the book and tore the slip out, and I think it was delivered to Governor Wells, the district attorney.

Q. What did those figures indicate?—A. It seemed to be a division of the amount into two parts. We added it up at the central guard-house; I don't remember all the particulars, but I know that the whole thing added up amounted to about $47,097.

Q. Did he admit, then, that he had stolen the money, or was he denying it?—A. He did not admit, and he did not deny it. We did not have much talk on the subject coming over.

Q. What do you know about the recovery of this money that was stolen?—A. There was a man, named A. M. Proctor, who has died since, who was a friend of Ottman, and he sent for me on Sunday, and we went over in the Smithsonian grounds and talked, and he told me that he had a good deal of money transactions with Ottman. I asked him, "Bud, have you had anything to do with this Treasury money?" "Well," said he, "I don't know whether it is Treasury money, but I have handled a good deal of his money." I then asked, "Have you got any of his money now?" "Yes," he said. I replied, "You had better let me have it." And he gave me $2,950, I think it was.

Q. Where did he get it?—A. He said he got it from Ottman. I turned it over to the chief of police, and it was turned over to the property clerk.

Q. How had he come into possession of it?—A. Well, I guess in attending to money business for Ottman. He appeared to be a kind of agent for him. He was a runner for Riggs' Bank. This was on Sunday, while Ottman was under arrest. Proctor came in and asked me if he could have some conversation with Ottman, and I told him yes. In the back part of the room was the washstand, and up at the other end was the water-closet. He went in and had some conversation with Ottman. After a while he went out, and was gone some four or five hours. He came back again, and asked me if he could see Ottman. I told him yes. At this door they had some conversation, and he handed something to Ottman, who walked to the water-closet, and I heard the trap pulled up; I told some one to get Ottman and Proctor out of the room, and I rolled up my sleeve and got part of an order that Ottman had given Proctor on Mr. Portner, the president of the bank in Alexandria, to deliver this package to him, Proctor. On that same Sunday Ottman asked me if I wouldn't take him out to ride; he said that he had got cramped up loafing around the office. I didn't know what his object was at that time. I told him I had no objections if the chief of police said so. Just then the major came out of his office; as Ottman's back was to him, I nodded to the major to say no. I have learned since that Ottman's object was to go to Alexandria to get the package himself. If the major had said yes I would have gone with him, and I suppose he would have knocked me out of the buggy and got away. His object was to go down and get that package.

Q. Was Ottman, at that time, protesting his innocence?—A. I never heard him say much about it. I never had much conversation with him. He and Brown were around the office, and I don't think they were locked up for a day or two.

Q. Do you know how any of this money was found?—A. I went to Alexandria with the chief of police and Mr. Sargent, and others, when we got this box containing $14,500.

Q. From the examinations or investigations made with regard to this matter, was there any doubt in your mind as to who were the guilty participants in this robbery?—A. Not a particle, in my mind.

Q. Had you any doubt as to whether this was the money actually stolen from the Government?—A. That was my view of it.

Q. Has Mr. Bliss ever asked you to give him any information with regard to this matter?—A. I never spoke a word to Colonel Bliss in my life. I always thought that if Mr. Wells had taken the advice of the chief of police there would have been a conviction of both Halleck and Ottman; that is, by putting Brown on the stand as a witness.

By Mr. VAN ALSTYNE:

Q. Who was the chief of police?—A. Major Richards. I took $1,050 off Brown when they concluded to lock him up at headquarters. I don't know whether that is in the hands of the property clerk or not; I don't think it has been included in that settlement made lately.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Have you any knowledge of the cause of the failure to convict in those two trials?—A. I think it was the fault of the district attorney more than anybody else.

Q. The evidence was accessible to him to make out a case for the Government?—A. I think that by putting Brown on the stand (and I don't think there would have been anything wrong in doing so) they would have had a conviction in both cases. Instead of that, Governor Wells sent a man named Hall down to the jail, locked him up with Halleck, and killed the whole case. I think Governor Wells is better at getting indictments than at prosecuting them.

You asked Mr. Sargent if he knew of any further action being taken in the Howgate case. I will state that last summer I was connected with Mr. McDevitt and Mr. Flinder, on E street, and we got out a number of circulars, I think a thousand, by direction of General Hazen, offering a thousand dollars reward for Howgate; and we sent them all over this country and Europe. I think Flinder has got a copy of that circular now.

Q. So far as you know, Howgate has not been found?—A. Not to my knowledge.

Q. Do you know whether any paper from him transferring any of his property in the District has been filed since his escape?—A. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. SARGENT. I think I noticed about a month ago that one piece of property was released to satisfy a mechanic's lien—to satisfy his builder.

Q. That was by order of the court; but I want to know whether any papers have been acknowledged by him showing his whereabouts?—A. I think not.

Q. Did you have any employment from any of the defendants in the star-route cases?—A. No, sir. In the latter part of this last trial I was employed by Mr. Williams to let him know anything I heard here.

Q. How long did you continue in that employment?—A. About four or five weeks.

Q. What was the nature of your duties?—A. Just to give him any information that I might get.

Q. Were you able to give him any information?—I never gave him any; I never bothered myself about any.
